Some of this literature is only for the specialist, and the drama, written for a highly stylized form of theater,⁷ possesses only moderate distinction. But the teachings of Confucius or Kung-fu-tze (551-478 B.C.) collected in his Analects, have been widely disseminated in the West. This master of wise and discreet behavior and champion of good government ("Oppressive government," he declared, "is fiercer than a tiger"), rejected the passive mysticism of earlier thinkers. For four years he governed a province, reformed its laws, and devoted himself to the guidance of an important prince. When the latter failed him, Confucius, who continued seeking opportunities to put his reforms into operation, gave his doctrine to all China. He assembled many students, collected and edited the best in Chinese literature and history, and left to his people the example of a life richly spent. His maxims, the Analects,⁸ are masterpieces of serene wisdom and insight; they are free of metaphysical muddlement and mythological esotericism, and are readily comprehensible. A charming personality shines through them. He did not exhaust Chinese philosophy, which was rich in many schools of thought from mysticism, known as Taoism, to sophism and socialism. But he was the most catholic and persuasive Chinese thinker, and his influence never disappeared.

Confucius also provided a strong stimulus to the creation and enjoyment of Chinese poetry through his collection of ancient lyrics, the Shi-Shing or Book of Odes. Through them he taught his generation to cherish the thoughts and sentiments of their forebears, reverence for whom became the stabilizing force of this vast nation, as well as a barrier to progress in later centuries.

Poetry, indeed, became China's major literary achievement. The Chinese poets celebrated the delights of nature and simple pleasures. They were partial to peaceful pursuits far from ambitious strife, to the sentiment of domestic affection, and to the edifications of cultivated friendship. They were eminently reflective writers, and their ironic or sober comments on government and war penetrate deeply. In short, they were graceful devotees of the civilized approach to living.

This temper is evident exuberantly in the work of China's most popular master, the shiftless Li Po or Li T'ai-Po (701-762 A.D.). He simply could not have enough of either life or wine, and he was drowned, according to legend, in a state of intoxication while trying to embrace the moon in the Yellow River. One of the world's most genial lyricists, he was followed by Tu Fu (712-770 A.D.), a more restrained and refined poet who was the scholars' favorite, and by Po Chü-i (772-846 A.D.), a man of great simplicity, humor, and tenderness who found repose and serenity even in an active political career. Most of the poets sought shelter from the heat of the political race, tried to win content in simple things, and never thought of storming heaven and hell. One of the finest of them, T'ao Ch'ien (365-427 A.D.), retiring from public life because he could no longer "crook the hinges of the back for five pecks of rice a day," expressed their general sense of relief when he wrote: "For a long time I have lived in a cage; now I have returned."

⁶ Latest researches have unearthed a civilization in Mongolia as far back as 20,000 B.C.

⁷ The Chinese style of staging is most familiar to those who saw Thornton Wilder's stage play, Our Town.

⁸ The original title, Lun Yu, means Discourses and Dialogues. It was the translator Legge who called this book Analects, i.e., collected fragments.

Subtlety and purity of expression are the main characteristics of Chinese poetry. It does not resort to figures of speech, metaphors, comparisons, and other devices of Western poetry but presents the thing itself. Passion is set down without exaggeration or excitement in phrasing or form; the strongest feeling is given with restraint and scrupulous taste; and the lyric flight is generally brief and to the point.

BOOK OF THE DEAD

Hymn to Rā

A hymn of praise to Rā when he riseth in the Eastern part of heaven. Those who are in his train rejoice, and lo! Osiris Ani, victorious, saith:

"Hail, thou Disk, thou lord of days, who risest on the horizon day by day! Shine thou with thy beams of light upon the face of Osiris Ani, who is victorious; for he singeth hymns of praise unto thee at dawn, and he maketh thee to set at eventide with words of adoration. May the soul of Osiris Ani, the triumphant one, come forth with thee into heaven. May he come into port, and may he cleave his path among the never-resting stars in the heavens."

Osiris Ani, being in peace and in triumph, adareth his lord, the lord of eternity, saying: "Homage to thee, O Herukhuti, who art the god Khepera, the self-created; when thou risest on the horizon and sheddest thy beams of light upon the lands of the North and of the South, thou art beautiful, yea beautiful, and all the gods rejoice when they behold thee, the King of heaven. The goddess Nebt-Unnut is stablished upon thy head; and her uræi¹ of the South and of the North are upon thy brow; she taketh up her place before thee. The god Thoth is stablished in the bows of thy boat to destroy utterly all thy foes. Those who are in the Tuat (underworld) come forth to meet thee, and they bow in homage as they come toward thee, to behold thy beautiful Image. And I have come before thee that I may be with thee to behold thy Disk every day. May I not be shut up in the tomb, may I not be turned back, may the limbs of my body be made new again when I view thy beauties, even as are those of all thy favored ones, because I am one of those who worshipped thee whilst I lived upon earth. May I come in unto the land of eternity, may I come even unto the everlasting land, for behold, O my lord, this hast thou ordained for me."

And lo, Osiris Ani triumphant in peace, the triumphant one, saith: "Homage to thee, O thou who risest in thy horizon as Rā, thou reposest upon law which changeth not nor can it be altered. Thou passest over the sky, and every face watcheth thee and thy course, for thou hast been hidden from their gaze. Thou dost show thyself at dawn and at eventide day by day. The boat wherein is thy Majesty goeth forth with might; thy beams shine upon all faces; the number of thy red and yellow rays cannot be known, nor can thy bright beams be told. The lands of the gods, and the eastern lands of Punt² must be seen, ere that which is hidden in thee may be measured. Alone and by thyself thou dost manifest thyself when thou comest into being above the sky. May Ani advance, even as thou dost advance; may he never cease to go forward, even as thy Majesty ceaseth not to go forward, even though it be for a moment; for with strides dost thou in one little moment pass over the spaces which would need 10 hundreds of thousands and millions of years for man to pass over; this thou doest, and then dost thou sink to rest. Thou puttest an end to the hours of the night, and thou dost count them, even thou; thou endest them in thine own appointed season, and the earth becometh light. Thou settest thyself before thy handiwork in the likeness of Rā; thou risest in the horizon."

Osiris, the scribe Ani, triumphant, declareth his praise of thee when thou shinest, and when thou 20 risest at dawn he crieth in his joy at thy birth: "Thou art crowned with the majesty of thy beauties; thou moldest thy limbs as thou dost advance, and thou bringest them forth without birth-pangs in the form of Rā, as thou dost rise up into the upper air. Grant thou that I may come unto the heaven which is everlasting, and unto the mountain where dwell thy favored ones. May I be joined unto those shining beings, holy and perfect, who are in the underworld; and may I come forth with 30 them to behold thy beauties when thou shinest at eventide and goest to thy mother Nu. Thou dost place thyself in the west, and my two hands are raised in adoration of thee when thou settest as a living being. Behold, thou art the maker of eternity, and thou art adored when thou settest in the heavens. I have given my heart unto thee without wavering, O thou who art mightier than the gods."

Osiris Ani, triumphant, saith: "A hymn of praise to thee, O thou who risest like unto gold, and who dost flood the world with light on the day of thy birth. Thy mother giveth thee birth upon her hand, and thou dost give light unto the course of the Disk. O thou great Light, who shinest in the heavens, thou dost strengthen the generations of men with the Nile-flood, and thou dost cause gladness in all lands, and in all cities, and in all the temples. Make thou glorious Osiris Ani with victory in the underworld; grant thou that in the netherworld he may be without evil. I pray thee to put away his faults behind thee: grant thou that he may be one of thy venerable servants who are with the shining ones.

And the god saith:

"Thou shalt come forth into heaven, thou shalt pass over the sky, thou shalt be joined into the starry deities. Praises shall be offered unto thee in thy boat, thou shalt be hymned in the Atet boat, thou shalt behold Rā within his shrine, thou shalt set together with his Disk day by day, thou shalt see the Ant fish when it springeth into being in the waters of turquoise, and thou shalt see the Abtu fish in his hour. It shall come to pass that the Evil One shall fall when he layeth a snare to destroy thee, and the joints of his neck and of his back shall be hacked asunder. Rā saileth with a fair wind, and the Sektet boat draweth on and cometh into port. The mariners of Rā rejoice, and the heart of Nebt-ānkh is glad, for the enemy of her lord hath fallen to the ground. Thou shalt behold Horus on the standing-place of the pilot of the boat, and Thoth and Maāt shall stand one upon each side of him. All the gods shall rejoice when they behold Rā coming in peace to make the hearts of the shining ones to live, and Osiris Ani, victorious, the scribe of the divine offerings of the lords of Thebes, shall be along with them!"

THE TWO BROTHERS

Once there were two brethren, of one mother and one father; Anpu was the name of the elder, and Bata was the name of the younger. Now, as for Anpu he had a house, and he had a wife. But his little brother was to him as it were a son; he it was who made for him his clothes; he it was who followed behind his oxen to the fields; he it was who did the plowing; he it was who harvested the corn; he it was who did for him all the matters that were in the field. Behold, his younger brother grew to be an excellent worker, there was not his equal in the whole land; behold, the spirit of a god was in him.

Now after this the younger brother followed his oxen in his daily manner; and every evening he turned again to the house, laden with all the herbs of the field, with milk and with wood, and with all things of the field. And he put them down before his elder brother, who was sitting with his wife; and he drank and ate, and he lay down in his stable with the cattle. And at the dawn of day he took bread which he had baked, and laid it before his elder brother; and he took with him his bread to the field, and he drove his cattle to pasture in the fields. And as he walked behind his cattle, they said to him, "Good is the herbage which is in that place"; and he listened to all that they said, and he took them to the good place which they desired. And the cattle which were before him became exceeding excellent, and they multiplied greatly.

Now at the time of plowing his elder brother said unto him: "Let us make ready for ourselves a goodly yoke of oxen for plowing, for the land has come out from the water, it is fit for plowing. Moreover, do thou come to the field with corn, for we will begin the plowing in the morrow morning." Thus said he to him; and his younger brother did all things as his elder brother had spoken unto him to do them.

And when the morn was come, they went to the fields with their things; and their hearts were pleased exceedingly with their task in the beginning of their work. And it came to pass after this that as they were in the field they stopped for corn, and he sent his younger brother, saying, "Haste thou, bring to us corn from the farm." And the younger brother found the wife of his elder brother, as she was sitting tying her hair. He said to her: "Get up, and give to me corn, that I may run to the field, for my elder brother hastened me; do not delay." She said to him: "Go, open the bin, and thou shalt take to thyself according to thy will, that I may not drop my locks of hair while I dress them."

The youth went into the stable; he took a large measure, for he desired to take much corn; he loaded it with wheat and barley; and he went out carrying it. She said to him, "How much of the corn that is wanted, is that which is on thy shoulder?" He said to her: "Three bushels of barley, and two of wheat, in all five; these are what are upon my shoulder." Thus said he to her. And she conversed with him, saying, "There is great strength in thee, for I see thy might every day." And her heart knew him with the knowledge of youth. And she arose and came to him, and conversed with him, saying, "Come, stay with me, and it shall be well for thee, and I will make for thee beautiful garments." Then the youth became like a panther of the south with fury at the evil speech which she had made to him; and she feared greatly. And he spake unto her, saying: "Behold thou art to me as a mother, thy husband is to me as a father, for he who is elder than I has brought me up. What is this wickedness that thou hast said to me? Say it not to me again. For I will not tell it to any man, for I will not let it be uttered by the mouth of any man." He lifted up his burden, and he went to the field and came to his elder brother; and they took up their work, to labor at their task.

Now afterward, at eventime, his elder brother was returning to his house; and the younger brother was following after his oxen, and he loaded himself with all the things of the field; and he brought his oxen before him, to make them lie down in their stable which was in the farm. And behold the wife of the elder brother was afraid for the words which she had said. She took a parcel of fat, she became like one who is evilly beaten, desiring to say to her husband, "It is thy younger brother who has done this wrong." Her husband returned in the even, as was his wont of every day; he came unto his house; he found his wife ill of violence; she did not give him water upon his hands as he used to have, she did not make a light before him, his house was in darkness, and she was lying very sick. Her husband said to her, "Who has spoken with thee?" Behold she said: "No one has spoken with me except thy younger brother. When he came to take for thee corn he found me sitting alone; he said to me, 'Come, let us stay together, tie up thy hair.' Thus spake he to me. I did not listen to him, but thus spake I to him: 'Behold, am I not thy mother, is not thy elder brother to thee as a father?' And he feared, and he beat me to stop me from making report to thee, and if thou lettest him live I shall die. Now behold he is coming in the evening; and I complain of these wicked words, for he would have done this even in daylight."

And the elder brother became as a panther of the south; he sharpened his knife; he took it in his hand; he stood behind the door of his stable to slay his younger brother as he came in the evening to bring his cattle into the stable.

Now the sun went down, and he loaded himself with herbs in his daily manner. He came, and his foremost cow entered the stable, and she said to her keeper, "Behold thou thy elder brother standing before thee with his knife to slay thee; flee from before him." He heard what his first cow had said; and the next entering, she also said likewise. He looked beneath the door of the stable; ¹⁰ he saw the feet of his elder brother; he was standing behind the door, and his knife was in his hand. He cast down his load to the ground, and betook himself to flee swiftly; and his elder brother pursued after him with his knife. Then the younger brother cried out unto Ra Harakhti, saying, "My good Lord! Thou art he who divides the evil from the good." And Ra stood and heard all his cry; and Ra made a wide water between him and his elder brother, and it was full of crocodiles; and the one brother was on one bank, and the other on the other bank; and the elder brother smote twice on his hands at not slaying him. Thus did he. And the younger brother called to the elder on the bank, saying: "Stand still until the dawn of day; and when Ra ariseth, I shall judge with thee before him, and he discerneth between the good and the evil. For I shall not be with thee any more forever; I shall not be in the place in which thou art; I shall go to the valley of the ³⁰ acacia."

Now when the land was lightened, and the next day appeared, Ra Harakhti arose, and one looked unto the other. And the youth spake with his elder brother, saying: "Wherefore camest thou after me to slay me in craftiness, when thou didst not hear the words of my mouth? For I am thy brother in truth, and thou art to me as a father, and thy wife even as a mother: is it not so? Verily, when I was sent to bring for us corn, thy wife said to ⁴⁰ me, 'Come, stay with me'; for behold this has been turned over unto thee into another wise." And he caused him to understand of all that happened with him and his wife. And he swore an oath by Ra Harakhti, saying, "Thy coming to slay me by deceit with thy knife was an abomination." Then the youth took a knife, and cut off of his flesh, and cast it into the water, and the fish swallowed it. He failed; he became faint; and his elder brother cursed his own heart greatly; he stood ⁵⁰ weeping for him afar off; he knew not how to pass over to where his younger brother was, because of the crocodiles. And the younger brother called unto him, saying: "Whereas thou hast devised an evil thing, wilt thou not also devise a good thing, even like that which I would do unto thee? When thou goest to thy house thou must look to thy cattle, for I shall not stay in the place where thou art; I am going to the valley of the acacia. And now as to what thou shalt do for me; it is even that thou shalt come to seek after me, if thou perceivest a matter, namely, that there are things happening unto me. And this is what shall come to pass, that I shall draw out my soul, and I shall put it upon the top of the flowers of the acacia, and when the acacia is cut down, and it falls to the ground, and thou comest to seek for it, if thou searchest for it seven years do not let thy heart be wearied. For thou wilt find it, and thou must put it in a cup of cold water, and expect that I shall live again, that I may make answer to what has been done wrong. And thou shalt know of ¹⁰ this, that is to say, that things are happening to me, when one shall give to thee a cup of beer in thy hand, and it shall be troubled; stay not then, for verily it shall come to pass with thee."

And the youth went to the valley of the acacia; and his elder brother went unto his house; his hand was laid on his head, and he cast dust on his head; he came to his house, and he slew his wife, he cast her to the dogs, and he sat in mourning for his younger brother.

Now many days after these things, the younger brother was in the valley of the acacia; there was none with him; he spent his time in hunting the beasts of the desert, and he came back in the even to lie down under the acacia, which bore his soul upon the topmost flower. And after this he built himself a tower with his own hands, in the valley of the acacia; it was full of all good things, that he might provide for himself a home.

And he went out from his tower, and he met the Nine Gods, who were walking forth to look upon the whole land. The Nine Gods talked one with another, and they said unto him: "Ho! Bata, bull of the Nine Gods, art thou remaining alone? Thou hast left thy village for the wife of Anpu, thy elder brother. Behold his wife is slain. Thou hast given him an answer to all that was transgressed against thee." And their hearts were vexed for him exceedingly. And Ra Harakhti said to Khnumu, "Behold, frame thou a woman for Bata, ⁵⁰ that he may not remain alive alone." And Khnumu made for him a mate to dwell with him. She was more beautiful in her limbs than any woman who is in the whole land. The essence of every god was in her. The seven Hathors came to see her: they said with one mouth, "She will die a sharp death."

And Bata loved her very exceedingly, and she dwelt in his house; he passed his time in hunting the beasts of the desert, and brought and laid them before her. He said: "Go not outside, lest the sea seize thee; for I cannot rescue thee from it, for I am a woman like thee; my soul is placed on the head of the flower of the acacia; and if another find it, I must fight with him." And he opened unto her his heart in all its nature.

Now after these things Bata went to hunt in his daily manner. And the young girl went to walk under the acacia which was by the side of her house. Then the sea saw her, and cast its waves up after her. She betook herself to flee from before it. She entered her house. And the sea called unto the acacia, saying, "Oh, would that I could seize her!" And the acacia brought a lock from her hair, and the sea carried it to Egypt, and dropped it in the place of the fullers of Pharaoh's linen. The smell of the lock of hair entered into the clothes of Pharaoh; and they were wroth with the fullers of Pharaoh, saying, "The smell of ointment is in the clothes of Pharaoh." And the people were rebuked every day, they knew not what they should do. And the chief fuller of Pharaoh walked by the bank, and his heart was very evil within him after the daily quarrel with him. He stood still, he stood upon the sand opposite to the lock of hair, which was in the water, and he made one enter into the water and bring it to him; and there was found in it a smell, exceeding sweet. He took it to Pharaoh; and they brought the scribes and the wise men, and they said unto Pharaoh: "This lock of hair belongs to a daughter of Ra Harakhti: the essence of every god is in her, and it is a tribute to thee from another land. Let messengers go to every strange land to seek her: and as for the messenger who shall go to the valley of the acacia, let many men go with him to bring her." Then said his Majesty, "Excellent exceedingly is what has been said to us"; and they sent them. And many days after these things the people who were sent to strange lands came to give report unto the King: but there came not those who went to the valley of the acacia, for Bata had slain them, but let one of them return to give a report to the King. His Majesty sent many men and soldiers, as well as horsemen, to bring her back. And there was a woman among them, and to her had been given in her hand beautiful ornaments of a woman. And the girl came back with her, and they rejoiced over her in the whole land.

And his Majesty loved her exceedingly, and raised her to high estate; and he spake unto her that she should tell him concerning her husband. And she said, "Let the acacia be cut down, and let one chop it up." And they sent men and soldiers with their weapons to cut down the acacia; and they came to the acacia, and they cut the flower upon which was the soul of Bata, and he fell dead suddenly.

And when the next day came, and the earth was lightened, the acacia was cut down. And Anpu, the elder brother of Bata, entered his house, and washed his hands; and one gave him a cup of beer, and it became troubled; and one gave him another of wine, and the smell of it was evil. Then he took his staff, and his sandals, and likewise his clothes, with his weapons of war; and he betook himself forth to the valley of the acacia. He entered the tower of his younger brother, and he found him lying upon his mat; he was dead. And he wept when he saw his younger brother verily lying dead. And he went out to seek the soul of his younger brother under the acacia tree, under which his younger brother lay in the evening. He spent three years in seeking for it, but found it not. And when he began the fourth year, he desired in his heart to return into Egypt; he said, "I will go tomorrow morn." Thus spake he in his heart.

Now when the land lightened, and the next day appeared, he was walking under the acacia; he was spending his time in seeking it. And he returned in the evening, and labored at seeking it again. He found a seed. He returned with it. Behold this was the soul of his younger brother. He brought a cup of cold water, and he cast the seed into it: and he sat down, as he was wont. Now when the night came his soul sucked up the water; Bata shuddered in all his limbs, and he looked on his elder brother; his soul was in the cup. Then Anpu took the cup of cold water, in which the soul of his younger brother was; Bata drank it, his soul stood again in its place, and he became as he had been. They embraced each other, and they conversed together.

And Bata said to his elder brother: "Behold I am to become as a great bull, which bears every good mark; no one knoweth its history, and thou must sit upon my back. When the sun arises I shall be in the place where my wife is, that I may return answer to her; and thou must take me to the place where the King is. For all good things shall be done for thee; for one shall lade thee with silver and gold, because thou bringest me to Pharaoh, for I become a great marvel, and they shall rejoice for me in all the land. And thou shalt go to thy village."

And when the land was lightened, and the next day appeared, Bata became in the form which he had told to his elder brother. And Anpu sat upon his back until the dawn. He came to the place where the King was, and they made his Majesty to know of him; he saw him, and he was exceeding joyful with him. He made for him great offerings, saying, "This is a great wonder which has come to pass." There were rejoicings over him in the whole land. They presented unto him silver and gold for his elder brother, who went and stayed in his village. They gave to the bull many men and many things, and Pharaoh loved him exceedingly above all that is in this land.

And after many days after these things, the bull entered the purified place; he stood in the place where the princess was; he began to speak with her, saying, "Behold, I am alive indeed." And she said to him, "And, pray, who art thou?" He said to her, "I am Bata. I perceived when thou causedst that they should destroy the acacia of Pharaoh, which was my abode, that I might not be suffered to live. Behold, I am alive indeed, I am as an ox." Then the princess feared exceedingly for the words that her husband had spoken to her. And he went out from the purified place.

And his Majesty was sitting, making a good day with her: she was at the table of his Majesty, and the King was exceeding pleased with her. And she said to his Majesty, "Swear to me by God, saying, 'What thou shalt say, I will obey it for thy sake.'" He hearkened unto all that she said, even this. "Let me eat of the liver of the ox, because he is fit for naught." Thus spake she to him. And the King was exceeding sad at her words, the heart of Pharaoh grieved him greatly. And after the land was lightened, and the next day appeared, they proclaimed a great feast with offerings to the ox. And the King sent one of the chief butchers of his Majesty, to cause the ox to be sacrificed. And when he was sacrificed, as he was upon the shoulders of the people, he shook his neck, and he threw two drops of blood over against the two doors of his Majesty. The one fell upon the one side, on the great door of Pharaoh, and the other upon the other door. They grew as two great Persea trees, and each of them was excellent.

And one went to tell unto his Majesty, "Two great Persea trees have grown, as a great marvel of his Majesty, in the night by the side of the great gate of his Majesty." And there was rejoicing for them in all the land, and there were offerings made to them.

And when the days were multiplied after these things, his Majesty was adorned with the blue crown, with garlands of flowers on his neck, and he was upon the chariot of pale gold, and he went out from the palace to behold the Persea trees: the princess also was going out with horses behind his Majesty. And his Majesty sat beneath one of the Persea trees, and it spake thus with his wife: "Oh, thou deceitful one, I am Bata, I am alive, though I have been evilly entreated. I knew who caused the acacia to be cut down by Pharaoh at my dwelling. I then became an ox, and thou causedst that I should be killed."

And many days after these things the princess stood at the table of Pharaoh, and the King was pleased with her. And she said to his Majesty, "Swear to me by God, saying, 'That which the princess shall say to me I will obey it for her.'" And he hearkened unto all she said. And he commanded, "Let these two Persea trees be cut down, and let them be made into goodly planks." And he hearkened unto all she said. And after this his Majesty sent skillful craftsmen, and they cut down the Persea trees of Pharaoh; and the princess, the royal wife, was standing looking on, and they did all that was in her heart unto the trees. But a chip flew up, and it entered into the mouth of the princess; she swallowed it, and after many days she bore a son. And one went to tell his Majesty, "There is born to thee a son." And they brought him, and gave to him a nurse and servants; and there were rejoicings in the whole land. And the King sat making a merry day, as they were about the naming of him, and his Majesty loved him exceedingly at that moment, and the King raised him to be the royal son of Kush.

Now after the days had multiplied after these things, his Majesty made him heir of all the land. And many days after that, when he had fulfilled many years as heir, his Majesty flew up to heaven. And the heir said, "Let my great nobles of his Majesty be brought before me, that I may make them to know all that has happened to me." And they brought also before him his wife, and he judged with her before him, and they agreed with him. They brought to him his elder brother; he made him hereditary prince in all his land. He was thirty years King of Egypt, and he died, and his elder brother stood in his place on the day of burial.

THE RIG-VEDA

The Creation Hymn

BOOK X.—HYMN 129

1. Then was not non-existent nor existent: there was no realm of air, no sky beyond it.
What covered in, and where and what gave shelter? Was water there, unfathomed depth of water?
2. Death was not then, nor was there aught immortal: no sign was there, the day's and night's divider.
That One Thing, breathless, breathed by its own nature: apart from it was nothing whatsoever.
3. Darkness there was: at first concealed in darkness this All was indiscriminated chaos.
All that existed then was void and formless: by the great power of Warmth was born that Unit.
4. Thereafter rose Desire in the beginning—Desire,²⁰ the primal seed and germ of Spirit.
Sages who searched with their heart's thought discovered the existent's kinship in the non-existent.
5. Transversely was their severing line extended: what was above it then, and what below it?
There were begetters, there were mighty forces, free action here and energy up yonder.
6. Who verily knows and who can here declare it, whence it was born and whence comes this creation?³⁰
The Gods are later than this world's production.

Who knows then whence it first came into being?

7. He, the first origin of this creation, whether he formed it all or did not form it,
Whose eye controls this world in highest heaven, he verily knows it, or perhaps he knows not.

To the Unknown God

BOOK X.—HYMN 121

1. In the beginning there arose the Golden Child (Hiranya-garbha); as soon as born, he alone was the lord of all that is. He established the earth and this heaven: Who is the God to whom we shall offer sacrifice?
2. He who gives breath, he who gives strength, whose command all the bright gods revere, whose shadow is immortality, whose shadow is death: Who is the God to whom we shall offer sacrifice?
3. He who through his might became the sole king of the breathing and twinkling world, who governs all this, man and beast: Who is the God to whom we shall offer sacrifice?
4. He through whose might these snowy mountains are, and the sea, they say, with the distant river (the Rasa), he of whom these regions are indeed the two arms: Who is the God to whom we shall offer sacrifice?

7. When the great waters went everywhere, holding the germ (Hiranya-garbha), and generating light, then there arose from them the sole breath of the gods: Who is the God to whom we shall offer sacrifice?

10. Pragâpati, no other than thou embraces all these created things. May that be ours which we desire when sacrificing to thee: may we be lords of wealth!¹

BHAGAVAT GITA

The Transfiguration

ARJUNA. This, for my soul's peace, have I heard from thee,

The unfolding of the Mystery Supreme Named Adhyâtman; comprehending which,
My darkness is dispelled; for now I know—
O Lotus-eyed!—whence is the birth of men, 5
And whence their death, and what the majesties
Of thine immortal rule. Fain would I see,
As thou thyself declar'st it, Sovereign Lord!
The likeness of that glory of thy form
Wholly revealed. O thou Divinest One! 10
If this can be, if I may bear the sight,
Make thyself visible, Lord of all prayers!
Show me thy very self, the Eternal God!

KRISHNA: Gaze, then, thou Son of Prithâ! I manifest for thee
Those hundred thousand thousand shapes that clothe my Mystery: 15

I show thee all my semblances, infinite, rich, divine,

My changeful hues, my countless forms. See! in this face of mine,

Adityas, Vasus, Rudras, Aswins, and Maruts; see Wonders unnumbered, Indian Prince! revealed to none save thee.

Behold! this is the Universe!—Look! what is live and dead 20

I gather all in one—in me! Gaze, as thy lips have said,

On God Eternal, Very God! See me! see what thou prayest!

Thou canst not!—nor, with human eyes, Arjuna! ever mayest!

Therefore I give thee sense divine. Have other eyes, new light!

And, look! This is my glory, unveiled to mortal sight! 25

SANJAYA: Then, O King! the God, so saying,

Stood, to Prithâ's Son displaying

All the splendor, wonder, dread

Of his vast Almighty-head.

Out of countless eyes beholding, 30

Out of countless mouths commanding,

Countless mystic forms enfolding

In one form: supremely standing

Countless radiant glories wearing,

Countless heavenly weapons bearing, 35

Crowned with garlands of star-clusters,

Robed in garb of woven lusters,

Breathing from his perfect Presence

Breaths of every subtle essence

Of all heavenly odors; shedding 40

Blinding brilliance; overspreading—

Boundless, beautiful—all spaces

With his all-regarding faces;

So he showed! If there should rise

Suddenly within the skies 45

Sunburst of a thousand suns

Flooding earth with beams undeeded-of

¹ This last verse, identifying the "Unknown God" with Pragâpati, is generally regarded as a later addition.

Bhagavat Gita. Translation by Sir Edward Arnold.

Then might be that Holy One's Majesty and radiance dreamed of!

So did Pandu's Son behold
All this universe enfold
All its huge diversity
Into one vast shape, and be Visible, and viewed, and blended
In one Body—subtle, splendid,
Nameless—th' All-comprehending
God of Gods, the Never-Ending Deity!

But, sore amazed,
Thrilled, o'erfilled, dazzled, and dazed,
Arjuna knelt; and bowed his head,
And clasped his palms; and cried, and said:
ARJUNA: Yea! I have seen! I see!
Lord! all is wrapped in thee!
The gods are in thy glorious frame! the creatures
Of earth, and heaven, and hell
In thy Divine form dwell,
And in thy countenance shine all the features

Of Bráhmâ, sitting lone
Upon his lotus-throne;
Of saints and sages, and the serpent races
Ananta, Vāsuki;
Yea! mightiest Lord! I see Thy thousand thousand arms, and breasts, and faces,

And eyes—on every side
Perfect, diversified;
And nowhere end of thee, nowhere beginning,
Nowhere a center! Shifts—
Wherever a soul's gaze lifts—
Thy central Self, all-wielding, and all-winning!

Infinite King! I see
The anadem on thee
The club, the shell, the discus; see thee burning
In beams insufferable,
Lighting earth, heaven, and hell
With brilliance blazing, glowing, flashing; turning

Darkness to dazzling day,
Look I whichever way;
Ah, Lord! worship thee, the Undivided,
The Uttermost of thought,
The Treasure-Palace wrought
To hold the wealth of the worlds; the Shield provided

To shelter Virtue's laws;
The Fount whence Life's stream draws
All waters of all rivers of all being:
The One Unborn, Unending:
Unchanging and Unbending!
With might and majesty, past thought, past seeing!

Silver of moon and gold
Of sun are glories rolled
From thy great eyes; thy visage, beaming tender
Throughout the stars and skies,
Doth to warm life surprise
Thy Universe. The worlds are filled with wonder

Of thy perfections! Space
Star-sprinkled, and void place
From pole to pole of the Blue, from bound to bound,
Hath thee in every spot,
Thee, thee!—Where thou art not,
O Holy, Marvelous Form! is nowhere found!

O Mystic, Awful One!
At sight of thee, made known,
The Three Worlds quake; the lower gods draw nigh thee;
They fold their palms, and bow
Body, and breast, and brow,
And, whispering worship, laud and magnify thee!

Rishis and Siddhas cry
"Hail! Highest Majesty!"
From sage and singer breaks the hymn of glory
In dulcet harmony,
Sounding the praise of thee;
While countless companies take up the story . . .

These see thee, and revere
In sudden-stricken fear;
Yea! the Worlds—seeing thee with form stupendous,
With faces manifold,
With eyes which all behold,
Unnumbered eyes, vast arms, members tremendous,

Flanks, lit with sun and star,
Feet planted near and far,
Tushes of terror, mouths wrathful and tender—
The Three wide Worlds before thee
Adore, as I adore thee,
Quake, as I quake, to witness so much splendor!

I mark thee strike the skies 140
 With front, in wondrous wise
 Huge, rainbow-painted, glittering; and thy mouth
 Opened, and orbs which see
 All things, whatever be
 In all thy worlds, east, west, and north and south.

O Eyes of God! O Head! 146
 My strength of soul is fled,
 Gone is heart's force, rebuked is mind's desire!
 When I behold thee so,
 With awful brows a-glow, 150
 With burning glance, and lips lighted by fire

Fierce as those flames which shall Consume, at close of all,
 Earth, Heaven! Ah me! I see no Earth and Heaven!
 Thee, Lord of Lords! I see, 155
 Thee only—only thee!
 Now let thy mercy unto me be given,

Thou Refuge of the World!
 Lo! to the cavern hurled
 Of thy wide-opened throat, and lips white-tushed,
 I see our noblest ones, 161
 Great Dhritarashtra's sons,
 Bhishma, Drona, and Karna, caught and crushed!

The Kings and Chiefs drawn in,
 That gaping gorge within; 165
 The best of both these armies torn and riven!
 Between thy jaws they lie,
 Mangled full bloodily,
 Ground into dust and death! Like streams down-driven

With helpless haste, which go 170
 In headlong furious flow
 Straight to the gulping deeps of th' unfilled ocean,
 So to that flaming cave
 Those heroes great and brave
 Pour, in unending streams, with helpless motion!

Like moths which in the night 176
 Flutter toward a light,
 Drawn to their fiery doom, flying and dying,
 So to their death still throng,
 Blind, dazzled, borne along 180
 Ceaselessly, all those multitudes, wild flying!

Thou, that hast fashioned men,
 Devourest them again,
 One with another, great and small, alike!

The creatures whom thou mak'st, 185
 With flaming jaws thou tak'st,
 Lapping them up! Lord God! Thy terrors strike

From end to end of earth,
 Filling life full, from birth
 To death, with deadly, burning, lurid dread! 190
 Ah, Vishnu! make me know
 Why is thy visage so?
 Who art thou, feasting thus upon thy dead?

Who? awful Deity!
 I bow myself to thee, 195
*Nâmostu Tê, Devavara! Prasîd!*¹
 O Mightiest Lord! rehearse
 Why hast thou face so fierce?
 Whence doth this aspect horrible proceed?

KRISHNA: Thou seest me as Time who kills, Time who brings all to doom, 200
 The Slayer Time, Ancient of Days, come hither to consume;

Excepting thee, of all these hosts of hostile chiefs arrayed,
 There stands not one shall leave alive the battlefield! Dismayed
 No longer be! Arise! obtain renown! destroy thy foes

Fight for the kingdom waiting thee when thou hast vanquished those. 205

By me they fall—not thee! the stroke of death is dealt them now,
 Even as they show thus gallantly; my instrument art thou!

Strike, strong-armed Prince, at Drona! at Bhishma strike! deal death

On Karna, Jyadratha; stay all their warlike breath!
 'Tis I who bid them perish! Thou wilt but slay the slain; 210

Fight! they must fall, and thou must live, victor upon this plain!

SANJAYA: Hearing mighty Keshav's word,
 Tremblingly that helmèd Lord
 Clasped his lifted palms, and praying
 Grace of Krishna—stood there, saying, 215
 With bowed brow and accents broken,
 These words, timorously spoken:

ARJUNA: Worthily, Lord of Might!
 The whole world hath delight
 In thy surpassing power, obeying thee; 220
 The Rakshasas, in dread
 At sight of thee, are sped
 To all four quarters; and the company

¹ "Hail to thee, God of Gods! Be favorable!"

- Of Siddhas sound thy name.
 How should they not proclaim 225
 Thy Majesties, Divinest, Mightiest?
 Thou Brahm, than Bráhmâ greater!
 Thou Infinite Creator!
 Thou God of gods, Life's Dwelling-place and Rest.
 Thou, of all souls the Soul! 230
 The Comprehending Whole!
 Of being formed, and formless being the Framer;
 O Utmost One! O Lord!
 Older than eld, who stored
 The worlds with wealth of life! O Treasure-
 Claimer, 235
 Who wottest all, and art
 Wisdom thyself! O Part
 In all, and All; for all from thee have risen
 Numberless now I see
 The aspects are of thee! . . . 240
 Hail to thee! Praise to thee! Thou One in all;
 For thou art All! Yea, thou! 260
 Ah! if in anger now
 Thou shouldst remember I did think thee Friend,
 Speaking with easy speech,
 As men use each to each;
 Did call thee "Krishna," "Prince," nor comprehend 265
 Thy hidden Majesty,
 The might, the awe of thee;
 Did, in my heedlessness, or in my love,
 On journey, or in jest,
 Or when we lay at rest, 270
 Sitting at council, straying in the grove,
 Alone, or in the throng,
 Do thee, most Holy! wrong,
 Be thy grace granted for that witless sin
 For thou art, now I know, 275
 Father of all below,
 Of all above, of all the worlds within Garu of Gurus; more
 To reverence and adore
 Than all which is adorable and high! 280
 How, in the wide worlds three Should any equal be?
 Should any other share thy Majesty?
 Therefore, with body bent
 And reverent intent, 285
 I praise, and serve, and seek thee, asking grace.
 As father to a son,
 As friend to friend, as one
 Who loveth to his lover, turn thy face
- In gentleness on me! 290
 Good is it I did see
 This unknown marvel of thy Form! But fear
 Mingles with joy! Retake,
 Dear Lord! for pity's sake
 Thine earthly shape, which earthly eyes may bear;
 Be merciful, and show 296
 The visage that I know;
 Let me regard thee, as of yore, arrayed
 With disk and forehead-gem,
 With mace and anadem, 300
 Thou that sustainest all things! Undismayed
 Let me once more behold
 The form I loved of old,
 Thou of the thousand arms and countless eyes!
 This frightened heart is fain 305
 To see restored again
 My Charioteer, in Krishna's kind disguise.
 KRISHNA: Yea! thou hast seen, Arjuna! because
 I loved thee well,
 The secret countenance of me, revealed by mystic spell,
 Shining, and wonderful, and vast, majestic, manifold, 310
 Which none save thou in all the years had favor to behold;
 For not by Vedas cometh this, nor sacrifice, nor alms,
 Nor works well-done, nor penance long, nor prayers, nor chanted psalms,
 That mortal eyes should bear to view the Immortal
 Soul unclad,
 Prince of the Kurus! This was kept for thee alone!
 Be glad! 315
 Let no more trouble shake thy heart, because thine eyes have seen
 My terror with my glory. As I before have been So will I be again for thee; with lightened heart behold!
 Once more I am thy Krishna, the form thou knew'st of old!
 SANJAYA: These words to Arjuna spake 320
 Vâsudev, and straight did take Back again the semblance dear
 Of the well-loved charioteer;
 Peace and joy it did restore
 When the Prince beheld once more 325
 Mighty Bráhmâ's form and face
 Clothed in Krishna's gentle grace
 ARJUNA: Now that I see come back, Janârdana!

This friendly human frame, my mind can think Calm thoughts once more; my heart beats still again! 330

KRISHNA: Yeal it was wonderful and terrible
To view me as thou didst, dear Prince! The gods
Dread and desire continually to view!
Yet not by Vedas, nor from sacrifice,
Nor penance, nor gift-giving, nor with prayer 335

Shall any so behold, as thou hast seen!
Only by fullest service, perfect faith,
And uttermost surrender am I known
And seen, and entered into, Indian Prince!
Who doeth all for me; who findeth me 340
In all; adareth always; loveth all
Which I have made, and me, for Love's sole end,
That man, Arjuna! unto me doth wend.

THE PANCHATANTRA

How the Crow-Hen Killed the Black Snake

In a certain region grew a great banyan tree. In it lived a crow and his wife, occupying the nest which they had built. But a black snake crawled through the hollow trunk and ate their chicks as fast as they were born, even before baptism. Yet for all his sorrow over this violence, the poor crow could not desert the old familiar banyan and seek another tree. For

Three cannot be induced to go—
The deer, the cowardly man, the crow:
Three go when insult makes them pant—
The lion, hero, elephant.

At last the crow-hen fell at her husband's feet and said: "My dear lord, a great many children of mine have been eaten by that awful snake. And grief for my loved and lost haunts me until I think of moving. Let us make our home in some other tree. For

No friend like health abounding;
And like disease, no foe;
No love like love of children;
Like hunger-pangs, no woe.

And again:

With fields o'erhanging rivers,
With wife on flirting bent,
Or in a house with serpents,
No man can be content.

We are living in deadly peril."

At this the crow was dreadfully depressed, and he said: "We have lived in this tree a long time, my dear. We cannot desert it. For

Where water may be sipped, and grass
Be cropped, a deer might live content;
Yet insult will not drive him from
The wood where all his life was spent.

Moreover, by some shrewd device I will bring death upon this villainous and mighty foe."

"But," said his wife, "this is a terribly venomous snake. How will you hurt him?" And he replied: "My dear, even if I have not the power to hurt him, still I have friends who possess learning, who have mastered the works on ethics. I will go and get from them some shrewd device of such nature that the villain—curse him!—will soon meet his doom."

After this indignant speech he went at once to another tree, under which lived a dear friend, a jackal. He courteously called the jackal forth, related all his sorrow, then said: "My friend, what do you consider opportune under the circumstances? The killing of our children is sheer death to my wife and me."

"My friend," said the jackal, "I have thought the matter through. You need not put yourself out. That villainous black snake is near his doom by reason of his heartless cruelty. For

Of means to injure brutal foes
You do not need to think,
Since of themselves they fall, like trees
Upon the river's brink.

And there is a story:

A heron ate what fish he could,
The bad, indifferent, and good;
His greed was never satisfied
Till, strangled by a crab, he died."

"How was that?" asked the crow. And the jackal told the story of

The Heron That Liked Crab-meat

There was once a heron in a certain place on the edge of a pond. Being old, he sought an easy way of catching fish on which to live. He began by lingering at the edge of his pond, pretending to be quite irresolute, not eating even the fish within his reach.

Now among the fish lived a crab. He drew near and said: "Uncle, why do you neglect today your usual meals and amusements?" And the heron replied: "So long as I kept fat and flourishing by eating fish, I spent my time pleasantly, enjoying the taste of you. But a great disaster will soon befall you. And as I am old, this will cut short the pleasant course of my life. For this reason I feel depressed."

"Uncle," said the crab, "of what nature is the disaster?" And the heron continued: "Today I overheard the talk of a number of fishermen as they passed near the pond. 'This is a big pond,' they were saying, 'full of fish. We will try a cast of the net tomorrow or the day after. But today we will go to the lake near the city.' This being so, ²⁰ you are lost, my food supply is cut off, I too am lost, and in grief at the thought, I am indifferent to food today."

Now when the water-dwellers heard the trickster's report, they all feared for their lives and implored the heron, saying: "Uncle! Father! Brother! Friend! Thinker! Since you are informed of the calamity, you also know the remedy. Pray save us from the jaws of this death."

Then the heron said: "I am a bird, not competent to contend with men. This, however, I can do. I can transfer you from this pond to another, a bottomless one." By this artful speech they were so led astray that they said: "Uncle! Friend! Unselfish kinsman! Take me first! Me first! Did you never hear this?

Stout hearts delight to pay the price
Of merciful self-sacrifice,
Count life as nothing, if it end
In gentle service to a friend."

Then the old rascal laughed in his heart, and took counsel with his mind, thus: "My shrewdness has brought these fishes into my power. They ought to be eaten very comfortably." Having thus thought it through, he promised what the thronging fish implored, lifted some in his bill, carried them a certain distance to a slab of stone, and ate them there. Day after day he made the trip with supreme delight and satisfaction, and meeting the fish, kept their confidence by ever new inventions. ⁵⁰

One day the crab, disturbed by the fear of death, importuned him with the words: "Uncle, pray save me, too, from the jaws of death." And the heron reflected: "I am quite tired of this unvarying fish diet. I should like to taste him. He is different, and choice." So he picked up the crab and flew through the air.

But since he avoided all bodies of water and seemed planning to alight on the sun-scorched rock, the crab asked him: "Uncle, where is that pond without any bottom?" And the heron laughed and said: "Do you see that broad, sun-scorched rock? All the water-dwellers have found repose there. Your turn has now come to find repose."

Then the crab looked down and saw a great rock of sacrifice, made horrible by heaps of fish-skeletons. And he thought: "Ah me!

Friends are foes and foes are friends
As they mar or serve your ends;
Few discern where profit tends.

Again:

If you will, with serpents play;
Dwell with foemen who betray;
Shun your false and foolish friends,
Fickle, seeking vicious ends.

Why, he has already eaten these fish whose skeletons are scattered in heaps. So what might be an opportune course of action for me? Yet why do I need to consider?

Man is bidden to chastise
Even elders who devise
Devious courses, arrogant,
Of their duty ignorant.

Again:

Fear fearful things, while yet
No fearful thing appears;
When danger must be met,
Strike, and forget your fears.

⁴⁰

So, before he drops me there, I will catch his neck with all four claws."

When he did so, the heron tried to escape, but being a fool, he found no parry to the grip of the crab's nippers, and had his head cut off.

Then the crab painfully made his way back to the pond, dragging the heron's neck as if it had been a lotus-stalk. And when he came among the fish, they said: "Brother, why come back?" Thereupon he showed the head as his credentials and said: "He enticed the water-dwellers from every quarter, deceived them with his prevarications, dropped them on a slab of rock not far away, and ate them. But I—further life being predestined—perceived that he destroyed the trustful, and I have brought back his neck. Forget your worries. All the water-dwellers shall live in peace.”

“And that is why I say:

A heron ate what fish he could, . . .

and the rest of it.”

“My friend,” said the crow, “tell me how this villainous snake is to meet his doom.” And the jackal answered: “Go to some spot frequented by a great monarch. There seize a golden chain or a necklace from some wealthy man who guards it carelessly. Deposit this in such a place that when it is recovered, the snake may be killed.”

So the crow and his wife straightway flew off at random, and the wife came upon a certain pond. As she looked about, she saw the women of a king’s court playing in the water, and on the bank they had laid golden chains, pearl necklaces, garments, and gems. One chain of gold the crow-hen seized and started for the tree where she lived.

But when the chamberlains and the eunuchs saw the theft, they picked up clubs and ran in pursuit. Meanwhile, the crow-hen dropped the golden chain in the snake’s hole and waited at a safe distance.

Now when the king’s men climbed the tree, they found a hole and in it a black snake with swelling hood. So they killed him with their clubs, recovered the golden chain, and went their way. Thereafter the crow and his wife lived in peace.

Leap and Creep

In the palace of a certain king stood an incomparable bed, blessed with every cubicular virtue. In a corner of its coverlet lived a female louse named Creep. Surrounded by a thriving family of sons and daughters, with the sons and daughters of sons and daughters, and with more remote descendants, she drank the king’s blood as he slept. On this diet she grew plump and handsome.

While she was living there in this manner, a flea named Leap drifted in on the wind and dropped on the bed. This flea felt supreme satisfaction on examining the bed—the wonderful delicacy of its coverlet, its double pillow, its exceptional softness like that of a broad, Gangetic sand-bank, its delicious perfume. Charmed by the sheer delight of touching it, he hopped this way and that until—fate willed it so—he chanced to meet Creep, who said to him: “Where do you come from? This is a dwelling fit for a king. Begone, and lose no time about it.” “Madam,” said he, “you should not say such things. For

The Brahman reverences fire,
Himself the lower castes’ desire;
The wife reveres her husband dear;
But all the world must guests revere.

Now I am your guest. I have of late sampled the various blood of Brahmans, warriors, business men, and serfs, but found it acid, slimy, quite unwholesome. On the contrary, he who reposes on this bed must have a delightful vital fluid, just like nectar. It must be free from morbidity, since wind, bile, and phlegm are kept in harmony by physicians. It must be enriched by viands unctuous, tender, melting in the mouth; viands prepared from the flesh of the choicest creatures of land, water, and air, seasoned furthermore with sugar, pomegranate, ginger, and pepper. To me it seems an elixir of life. Therefore, with your kind permission, I plan to taste this sweet and fragrant substance, thus combining pleasure and profit.”

“No,” said she. “For fiery-mouthed stingers like you, it is out of the question. Leave this bed. You know the proverb:

The fool who does not know
His own resource, his foe,
His duty, time, and place,
Who sets a reckless pace,
Will by the wayside fall,
Will reap no fruit at all.”

Thereupon he fell at her feet, repeating his request. And she agreed, since courtesy was her hobby, and since, when the story of that prince of sharpers, Muladeva, was being repeated to the king while she lay on a corner of the coverlet, she had heard how Muladeva quoted this verse in answer to the question of a certain damsel:

Whoever, angry though he be,
Has spurned a suppliant enemy,
In Shiva, Vishnu, Brahma, he
Has scorned the Holy Trinity.

Recalling this, she agreed, but added: “However, you must not come to dinner at a wrong place or time.” “What is the right place and what is the right time?” he asked. “Being a newcomer, I am not au courant.” And she replied: “When the king’s body is mastered by wine, fatigue, or sleep, then you may quietly bite him on the feet. This is the right place and the right time." To these conditions he gave his assent.

In spite of this arrangement, the famished bungler, when the king had just dozed off in the early evening, bit him on the back. And the poor king, as if burned by a firebrand, as if stung by a scorpion, as if touched by a torch, bounded to his feet, scratched his back, and cried to a servant: "Rascal! Somebody bit me. You must hunt ¹⁰ through this bed until you find the insect."

Now Leap heard the king's command and in terrified haste crept into a crevice in the bed. Then the king's servants entered, and following their master's orders, brought a lamp and made a minute inspection. As fate would have it, they came upon Creep as she crouched in the nap of the fabric, and killed her with her family.

The Mice That Ate Iron

In a certain town lived a merchant named Naduk, who lost his money and determined to travel abroad. For

The meanest of mankind is he Who, having lost his money, can Inhabit lands or towns where once
He spent it like a gentleman.

And again:

The neighbor gossips blame
His poverty as shame
Who long was wont to play
Among them, proud and gay.

In his house was an iron balance-beam inherited from his ancestors, and it weighed a thousand pals. This he put in pawn with Merchant Lakshman before he departed for foreign countries.

Now after he had long traveled wherever business led him through foreign lands, he returned to his native city and said to Merchant Lakshman: "Friend Lakshman, return my deposit, the balance-beam." And Lakshman said: "Friend Naduk, your balance-beam has been eaten by mice."

To this Naduk replied: "Lakshman, you are in no way to blame, if it has been eaten by mice. Such is life. Nothing in the universe has any permanence. However, I am going to the river for a bath. Please send your boy Money-God with me, ⁵⁰ to carry my bathing things."

Since Lakshman was conscience-stricken at his own theft, he said to his son Money-God: "My dear boy, let me introduce Uncle Naduk, who is going to the river to bathe. You must go with him and carry his bathing things." Ah, there is too much truth in the saying:

There is no purely loving deed
Without a pinch of fear or greed
Or service of a selfish need.

And again:

Wherever there is fond attention
That does not seek a service pension,
Was there no timid apprehension?

So Lakshman's son took the bathing things and delightedly accompanied Naduk to the river. After Naduk had taken his bath, he thrust Lakshman's son Money-God into a mountain cave, blocked the ²⁰ entrance with a great rock, and returned to Lakshman's house. And when Lakshman said: "Friend Naduk, tell me what has become of my son Money-God who went with you," Naduk answered: "My good Lakshman, a hawk carried him off from the river-bank."

"Oh, Naduk!" cried Lakshman. "You liar! How could a hawk possibly carry off a big boy like Money-God?" "But, Lakshman," retorted Naduk, "the mice could eat a balance-beam made of iron. ³⁰ Give me my balance-beam, if you want your son."

Finally, they carried their dispute to the palace gate, where Lakshman cried in a piercing tone: "Help! Help! A ghastly deed! This Naduk person has carried off my son—his name is Money-God."

Thereupon the magistrates said to Naduk: "Sir, restore the boy to Lakshman." But Naduk pleaded: "What am I to do? Before my eyes a hawk carried him from the river-bank." "Come, Naduk!" said they, "you are not telling the truth. How can a hawk carry off a fifteen-year-old boy?" Then Naduk laughed outright and said: "Gentlemen, listen to my words.

Where mice eat balance-beams of iron
A thousand pals in weight,
A hawk might steal an elephant;
A boy is trifling freight."

"How was that?" they asked, and Naduk told them the story of the balance-beam. At this they laughed and caused the restoration of balance-beam and boy to the respective owners.

CONFUCIUS

Analects

The Master said: "In governing, cleave to good; as the north star holds his place, and the multitude of stars revolve upon him."

The Master said: "To sum up the three hundred songs in a word, they are free from evil thought."

The Master said: "Guide the people by law, subdue them by punishment; they may shun crime, but will be void of shame. Guide them by example, subdue them by courtesy; they will learn shame, and come to be good."

The Master said: "At fifteen, I was bent on study; at thirty, I could stand; at forty, doubts ceased; at fifty, I understood the laws of Heaven; at sixty, my ears obeyed me; at seventy, I could do as my heart lusted, and never swerve from right."

Meng Yi asked the duty of a son.

The Master said: "Obedience."

As Fan Ch'ih was driving him, the Master said: "Meng-sun asked me the duty of a son; I answered 'Obedience.'"

"What did ye mean?" said Fan Ch'ih.

"To serve our parents with courtesy whilst they live," said the Master; "to bury them with all courtesy when they die; and to worship them with all courtesy."

Meng Wu asked the duty of a son.

The Master said: "What weighs on your father and mother is concern for your health."

Tzu-yu asked the duty of a son.

The Master said: "To-day a man is called dutiful if he keep both our dogs and horses, and unless we honor parents, is it not all one?"

Tzu-hsia asked the duty of a son.

The Master said: "Our manner is the hard part. For the young to be a stay in toil, and leave the wine and cakes to their elders, is this to fulfil their duty?"

The Master said: "If I talk all day to Hui, like a dullard, he never stops me. But when he is gone, if I pry into his life, I find he can do what I say. No, Hui is no dullard."

The Master said: "Look at a man's acts; watch his motives; find out what pleases him: can the man evade you? Can the man evade you?"

The Master said: "Who keeps the old akindle and adds new knowledge is fitted to be a teacher."

The Master said: "A gentleman is not a vessel."

Tzu-kung asked, What is a gentleman?

The Master said: "He puts words into deeds first, and sorts what he says to the deed."

10 The Master said: "A gentleman is broad and fair: the vulgar are biassed and petty."

The Master said: "Study without thought is vain: thought without study is dangerous."

The Master said: "Work on strange doctrines does harm."

The Master said: "Yu, shall I teach thee what is understanding? To know what we know, and know what we do not know, that is understanding."

20 Tzu-chang studied with an eye to pay.

The Master said: "Listen much, keep silent when in doubt, and always take heed of the tongue; thou wilt make few mistakes. See much, beware of pitfalls, and always give heed to thy walk; thou wilt have little to rue. If thy words are seldom wrong, thy deeds leave little to rue, pay will follow."

Duke Ai asked, What should be done to make the people loyal?

Confucius answered: "Exalt the straight, set aside the crooked, the people will be loyal. Exalt the crooked, set aside the straight, the people will be disloyal."

Chi K'ang asked how to make the people lowly, faithful, and willing.

The Master said: "Behave with dignity, they will be lowly: be pious and merciful, they will be faithful: exalt the good, teach the unskilful, they will grow willing."

One said to Confucius: "Why are ye not in power, Sir?"

The Master answered: "What does the book say of a good son? 'An always dutiful son, who is a friend to his brothers, showeth the way to rule.' This also is to rule. What need to be in power?"

The Master said: "Without truth I know not how man can live. A cart without a crosspole, a carriage without harness, how could they be moved?"

Tzu-chang asked whether we can know what is to be ten generations hence.

The Master said: "The Yin inherited the manners of the Hsia; the harm and the good that they wrought them is known. The Chou inherited the manners of the Yin; the harm and the good that they wrought them is known. And we may know what is to be, even an hundred generations hence, when others follow Chou."

The Master said: "To worship the ghosts of strangers is fawning. To see the right and not do it is want of courage."

The Master said: "Love makes a spot beautiful: who chooses not to dwell in love, has he got wisdom?"

The Master said: "Loveless men cannot bear need long, they cannot bear fortune long. Loving hearts find peace in love; clever heads find profit in it."

The Master said: "A man and his faults are of a piece. By watching his faults we learn whether love be his."

The Master said: "To learn the truth at daybreak and die at eve were enough."

The Master said: "A scholar in search of truth who is ashamed of poor clothes and poor food it is idle talking to."

The Master said: "A gentleman has no likes and no dislikes below heaven. He follows right."

The Master said: "Gentlemen cherish worth; the vulgar cherish dirt. Gentlemen trust in justice; the 10 vulgar trust in favour."

The Master said: "The chase of gain is rich in hate."

The Master said: "Be not concerned at want of place; be concerned that thou stand thyself. Sorrow not at being unknown, but seek to be worthy of note."

The Master said: "Who contains himself goes seldom wrong."

The Master said: "A gentleman wishes to be 20 slow to speak and quick to act."

The Master said: "Good is no hermit. It has ever neighbours."

The Master said: "One thread, Shen, runs through all my teaching."

"Yes," said Tseng-tzu.

After the Master had left, the disciples asked what was meant.

Tseng-tzu said: "The Master's teaching all hangs 30 on faithfulness and fellow-feeling."

Great trees in the south
Give me no shelter,
And women loitering by the Han
Leave me cold.

O Han too deep for diving,
O Kiang too long for poling! 5

Faggots, brambles,
I cut them with a will—
But those girls facing home,
I should like to feed their horses. 10

Faggots, artemisia,
I cut them with a will—
But those girls facing home,
I should like to feed their colts. 15

O Kiang too long for poling!

Bringing in the Wine

See how the Yellow River's waters move from heaven,
Entering the ocean, never to return!
See how lovely locks in bright mirrors in high chambers,
Though silken black at morning, have turned by night to snow!
O let a man of spirit venture where he pleases 5
And never tip his golden cup empty towards the moon!
Since heaven gave the talent, let it be employed!
Spin a thousand pieces of silver, all of them come back!
Cook a sheep, kill a cow, whet the appetite,
And make me, of three hundred bowls, one long drink! 10

To old Master Ts'en
And young Tan-ch'iu
Bring in the wine!
Let your cups never rest!
Let me sing you a song! 15
Let your ears attend!
What are bell and drum, rare dishes and treasure?
Let me be forever drunk and never come to reason!
Sober men of older days and sages are forgotten,
And only the great drinkers are famous for all time. 20
Prince Ch'en paid at a banquet in the Palace of Perfection,
Ten thousand coins for a bucket of wine, with many a laugh and quip . . .
Why say, my host, that your money is gone?
Go and buy wine and we'll drink it together!
My flower-spotted horse, 25
My furs worth a thousand,
Hand them to the boy to exchange for good wine,
And we'll drown away the woe of ten thousand generations!

Answering Vice-Prefect Chang

As the years go by, give me but peace,
Freedom from ten thousand matters.
I ask myself and always answer,
What can be better than coming home?
A wind from the pine-trees blows my sash,
And my lute is bright with the mountain-moon.
You ask me about good and evil? . . .
Hark, on the lake there's a fisherman singing!

The Beautiful Hsi-Shih

Since beauty is honored all over the empire,
 How could Hsi-shih remain humbly at home?
 At dawn washing clothes by a lake in Yueh;
 At dusk in the palace of Wu, a great lady!
 Poor, no rarer than the others—
 Exalted, everyone praising her rareness.
 But above all honors, the honor was hers
 Of blinding with passion an emperor's reason.
 Girls who had once washed silk beside her
 Now were ordered away from her carriage . . .
 Ask them, in her neighbors' houses, ¹¹
 If by wrinkling their brows they can copy her beauty.

Anxiety of a Young Lady to Get Married

Ripe, the plums fall from the bough:
 Only seven tenths left there now!
 Ye whose hearts on me are set,
 Now the time is fortunate!

Ripe, the plums fall from the bough; ⁵
 Only three tenths left there now!
 Ye who wish my love to gain,
 Will not now apply in vain!

No more plums upon the bough!
 All are in my basket now! ¹⁰
 Ye who me with ardor seek,
 Need the word but freely speak!

A Complaint

The wind blows from the north.
 He looks and his eyes are cold.
 He looks and smiles and then goes forth,
 My grief grows old.

The wind blows and the dust. ⁵
 Tomorrow he swears he will come.
 His words are kind, but he breaks his trust,
 My heart is numb.

All day the wind blew strong,
 The sun was buried deep. ¹⁰
 I have thought of him so long, so long,
 I cannot sleep.

The clouds are black with night,
 The thunder brings no rain.
 I wake and there is no light, ¹⁵
 I bear my pain.

A View of T'ai-Shan

What shall I say of the Great Peak?
 The ancient Dukedoms are everywhere green,
 Inspired and stirred by the breath of Creation;
 With the Twin Forces balancing day and night,
 I open my breast toward widening clouds,
 And I strain my sight after birds flying home . . .
 When shall I climb to the top and hold ¹¹
 All mountains in a single glance!

With Her Beauty

Lovelier than all the rest,
 But living alone in an empty valley,
 She says that she came from an excellent clan
 Which is humbled now among grasses and tree-trunks . . .

When trouble arose in the Kūan district, ⁵
 Her brothers and close kin were killed.
 What use were their high offices,
 Not even saving their own lives!
 The world has but scorn for adversity;
 And hope goes out, like the light of a candle. ¹⁰
 Her husband, with a vagrant heart,
 Finds a new love like a new piece of jade;
 And when morning-glories furl at night
 And mandarin-ducks lie side by side,
 All he can see is the smile of the new love ¹⁵
 While the old love weeps unheard.

Pure was the spring in its mountain-source,
 But away from the mountain its waters are roiled . . .

Waiting for her maid to come from selling pearls
 For straw to cover the roof again, ²⁰
 She breaks off flowers, not now for her hair,
 And absently fills up her hand with pine needles
 And, forgetting her worn silk sleeve, and the cold,
 Leans in the sunset by a tall bamboo.

White gleam the gulls across the darkling tide,

The Red Cockatoo

Sent as a present from Annam—
 A red cockatoo.
 Colored like the peach-tree blossom,
 Speaking with the speech of men.

 To the learned and eloquent.
 They took a cage with stout bars
 And shut it up inside.

Madly Singing in the Mountains

There is no one among men that has not a special failing:

And my failing consists in writing verses.
 I have broken away from the thousand ties of life:
 But this infirmity still remains behind.
 Each time that I look at a fine landscape: 5
 Each time that I meet a loved friend,
 I raise my voice and recite a stanza of poetry
 And am glad as though a god had crossed my path.

Ever since the day I was banished to Hsün-yang
 Half my time I have lived among the hills. 10
 And often, when I have finished a new poem,
 Alone I climb the road to the Eastern Rock.
 I lean my body on the banks of white stone:
 I pull down with my hands a green cassia branch.
 My mad singing startles the valleys and hills: 15
 The apes and birds all come to peep.
 Fearing to become a laughing-stock to the world,
 I choose a place that is unfrequented by men.

—PO CHÜ-I

A Cicada

Pure of heart and therefore hungry,
 All night long you cry in vain
 With a final, broken, indrawn breath.
 Among the green, indifferent trees . . .
 Knocking about like a piece of driftwood,
 Letting my garden fill with weeds,
 I bless you for your true advice
 To purify my life again.

—LI SHANG-YIN

Homeward

No letters to the frontier come,
 The winter softens into spring . . .
 I tremble as I draw near home,
 And dare not ask what news you bring.

THE MOHAMMEDAN WORLD

Although the areas occupied by the Mohammedan cultures of the Near East—Persia and Arabia—had pre-Mohammedan civilizations, they attained literary importance largely after the triumph of the prophet Mahomet and his successors. For several centuries the people of this faith outshone medieval European man in everything cultural, and contributed to his development more than ancient Greece and Rome.

From time immemorial, Arabia, homeland of Mohammedanism, had been populated by nomads of the Semitic race, continually warring against one another and frequently drifting into Egypt, the Mediterranean coast of Asia Minor, and Mesopotamia. In Arabia proper, there were no world-shaking events, and its literature, rich in impassioned love poetry, was unknown to the outside world. Even in the seventh century A.D. the mass of the population was poor and undeveloped, and only along the main caravan routes of the south did two cities, Mecca and Medina, enjoy some prosperity and cultivation. Except for Jewish colonists and proselytes, the people were pagans, and their worship centered in a Meccan sanctuary known as the Kaaba, the chief feature of which was a meteorite; it was regarded as a god superior to the many minor tribal deities. This was the spiritual condition of the Arabs when an unlettered man, born in 570, began to ruminate on religious matters and came to regard himself as the sole prophet of a new faith.

In his fortieth year, Mahomet (Mohammed or Muhammad), probably influenced by both Judaism and Christianity during his travels, began to preach monotheism. As his influence spread, his native city became alarmed for it had subsisted on the polytheistic cult that brought numerous pilgrims to the Kaaba. At last he had to flee for his life, but he found a ready following in the rival city of Medina. This flight (the Hegira), in 622 A.D., proved a memorable event and, after some fighting, the prophet's faction triumphed. Mecca accepted his religion under the terms of a compromise requiring all Mohammedans to turn toward Mecca while praying. Before he died in 632 Mahomet was master of all Arabia.

There was little originality in his teachings, which amalgamated Judaism and Christianity and ranked both Moses and Jesus as prophets next in importance to Mahomet. There was as little sublimity in his religion as in his life, which was marred by cruelty and sensuality. Nevertheless, the new faith of Islam swept over Asia Minor and northern Africa, and was ultimately carried into Spain. Its tenets were simple and unmetaphysical. It appealed to an uncritical imagination with its clear-cut division between paradise and hell, its ornate fancifulness, and its promise of happiness to the believer who, upon passing Al Sirat (the Bridge of Judgment), would be permanently settled in a luxurious garden tended by beautiful nymphs (the Houris), and would receive seventy-two wives and eighty thousand servants. A multitude of angels, demons, peris (fairies), and devs (giants) peopled the Mohammedan world, and ensured a life of perpetual wonder and excitement.¹ So attractive was Arabian mythology that it entered Europe in the eleventh century and became an element in medieval and Renaissance romances. During the romantic movement of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, this fanciful world also attracted much attention. Goethe, Robert Southey, Thomas Moore, Byron, and others used Mohammedan themes and backgrounds.

The ethics of this faith, moreover, "established in the world a great tradition of dignified fair dealing, they breathe a spirit of generosity, and they are human and workable."² The faithful are ordered to observe considerate treatment of women and slaves, kindness in daily conduct, and the brotherhood of all members of the faith. The book which contains Mahomet's teachings, the Koran,³ is one of the Bibles of the world. It presents in rhythmical prose the revelations of the one god Allah to his prophet. Though undistinguished as a whole and confusingly arranged, it nevertheless has ethical fervor and some exalted passages.

Under the leadership of the Prophet's friend, Abu Bekr, who became the first Caliph (Successor), the Arabs began their attempted subjugation of the world. The worship of Allah was carried by the sword to the very gates of Constantinople, throughout the eastern Mediterranean countries, through Persia, into parts of India, and beyond. Mohammedanism overran all of northern Africa and Spain, and was turned back in the eighth century only in southern France. Religious dissension, intrigue in the harems of rulers, and oriental luxury began to corrode the Arab world, but it was some centuries before it crumbled. It was strong enough to resist successive European invasions. Although the Crusaders succeeded in capturing and holding Jerusalem for a time, they could not prevail against the Arabs in Palestine, and Christian Spain could not drive them out until the end of the fifteenth century, shortly before Columbus started on his voyage of discovery. When, moreover, the Arabs were conquered by the Mongol Turks, Mohammedanism continued to spread over the world, for the Turks, who had adopted the faith, captured Constantinople and conquered all of the Balkans.

Although the conquests brought much misery to Christian Europe (reflected in many slurs on the character and religion of the Arabs), it remains true that, until the thirteenth century and even later, Mohammedan culture was higher than anything Europe could show. The Arab world, coming into contact with Greek, Jewish, and Hindu civilization, flowered magnificently in science, art, and literature. Great universities arose in Bagdad, Cairo, and Spanish Cordoba. Their scientists devoted themselves to important research and invention. In mathematics, building on Greek foundations, the Arabs developed algebra, spherical trigonometry, and the decimal system of notation; they also gave the world the useful Arabic system of numerals, and invented the zero. They modernized medicine, discovered new chemical substances, constructed astronomical instruments, and made important astronomical calculations. Their philosophers, Avicenna, Averroës, and the Spanish Jew Maimonides, preserved and developed Aristotelian thought. The Arabs brought much of the learning of Greece and the ancient East to fruition and passed it on to the crude new nations of the West during the Middle Ages.

Europe went to school to Arabian civilization for its medicine, mathematics, and philosophy. Southern France was in continual contact with the Arabs in Spain, who were known as the Moors; Christian scholars attended the Moslem universities; and the Crusaders who went to the Near East with the intention of crushing a barbaric people were filled with wonder and learned much from them.⁴ This also led to a strong infiltration of tales and legends that the Mohammedans had brought from the East, and undoubtedly stimulated the rise of European love poetry, a field in which the Arabs had been supreme as early as the sixth century A.D. Of this poetry immediately before the advent of Mahomet, the great student of Arabic culture Wilfrid Scawen Blunt wrote, that it is "the most delightful wild flower of literature the Eastern world can show." It is perhaps too torrid for Western taste (the Arabs considered Greek poetry lukewarm), but its manly feeling and imaginative intensity entitled it to be better known than it is.

In spite of these powerful influences on the Western World, the actual literary works of the Arabs known to Europeans and assimilated by them are very few. But one of their collections of stories, The Thousand and One Nights (usually known as The Arabian Nights), became a household article in the West. The time of these tales is the reign of Haroun al Raschid (766?-809), whose love of letters was exceeded only by that of his son Al Mamoun, who made Bagdad a center of all learning he could gather from different parts of the world. In The Arabian Nights the Sultan of India is entertained with a seemingly endless string of tales by his queen Scheherezade in a desperate effort to postpone her execution night after night. As each tale is only half told, she keeps him interested for a thousand and one nights until he finally relents.

Although the work is of unknown authorship, the date of composition uncertain,⁵ and its literary history vague, The Arabian Nights is a distillation of oriental story-telling. Their spirit is romantic but not war-like; they reflect the interests of a mercantile, far-traveling people, and must have been developed after the Arabs settled down to enjoy the fruits of their conquest. The tales were undoubtedly collected with great catholicity from various times and places; many of them had their origin in India. Included are some excellent short poems, revealing a love for nature and filled with passion and a pained sense of the transitoriness of life and glory. Great delicacy appears in the verses. But it is the stories that have captured the imagination of the world with their exuberant fantastication and escape into the world of the marvelous. They were given to European readers in 1704 in the French translation of Galland, and immediately became known throughout the West.

This does not, however, exhaust the Mohammedan world's legacy to us, for some of the finest oriental literature came to us from Persia after its conquest by the followers of Mahomet.

Persia had, of course, enjoyed a powerful civilization from very early times, even before Cyrus the Great started its Aryan-speaking people on the road to conquest in the sixth century B.C. Its major literary composition, which may have been begun in the eighth century B.C., if not earlier, was the Zendavesta (The Living Word), a sacred book containing the doctrines of Persia's religious and moral teacher Zarathustra, known to the West as Zoroaster. The chief feature of its teaching, an effort to explain the world and to guide mankind, is the doctrine that attributes everything to the conflict between two principles—Ormuzd, the principle of the good as represented by light, and Ahriman, the principle of evil as represented by darkness. Both born from eternity, they contend for the dominion of the world and of man's soul until the time when Ormuzd will conquer Ahriman. Men are either servants of the one or the other, and this can be determined by their adhering to or turning from the moral code. This religion penetrated deeply into Western thought, filtered into Greek philosophy, and into Christianity in the form of Manicheism.⁶ It lingered on as late as the twelfth century in southern France, where it was fused with Christianity by the heretical Albigensian sect. This dualistic interpretation of divine providence enabled its believers and the much earlier Gnostic sect, to explain the presence of evil in the world. They maintained that the god of the Old Testament was evil and that Jesus, the good principle, was actually his opponent.

However, nothing produced by ancient Persia, not even the Zendavesta, has struck the West as possessing literary distinction. Work of this quality began to appear only in Mohammedan Persia from the tenth to the thirteenth centuries of our era. This was largely inspired by the rise of a pantheistic sect of mystics called the Sufis, from which most of the poets drew their ideas and imagery. Probably deriving their thought from India, the Sufis taught that worldly attachments are worthless and that the object of life should be identification with the permeating spirit of the world. Love, wine, and intoxication were some of the symbols representing the feeling of rapture upon union with the spirit. At the same time, the growth of luxury fostered the development of intensely romantic sentiment. Philosophical and worldly feelings, contempt for the world and enjoyment of its pleasures, mystic faith and sophisticated skepticism, existed side by side in the golden age of Persian literature.

Three love stories served many poets: Khosru and Shireen, a tale of idyllic love; Mejnoun the Arabian, a romance of unhappy love that drove its victim to madness; and Yussuf and Zuleika, the passion of Potiphar's wife for the biblical Joseph and the triumph of holiness over carnal desire. These tales inspired long romances highly regarded in the East and occasionally favored by writers of the West. But it is the Persian lyrics and epigrams that impressed themselves most strongly on the latter, except for the epic Shah Nameh (Book of Kings) by Firdausi (about 940-1020), from which ⁵ The thirteenth century has been suggested as the probable date.

⁶ See p. 445, Introduction to The Christian Church.

Matthew Arnold took the matter of his long poem Sohrab and Rustum.⁷

The first of the poets to impress the West, Omar Khayyam (died about 1123), was in a sense unique among the Persian writers. A redoubtable scientist who contributed to the development of astronomy, reformed the Persian calendar, and made it almost as accurate as the Gregorian Calendar, he was in philosophy a skeptic and an epicurean. Having no faith in the ecstasies of the mystics, he satirized their beliefs freely. Since life is transient, it is the better part of wisdom not to burden oneself with fruitless speculation, love of power, and a sense of sin, but to enjoy one's worldly existence as far as possible. Omar, who avoided political office and led a pleasant scholarly life, expressed his thought in his Rubaiyat in disconnected quatrains that are remarkably epigrammatic. They consist of four lines of equal length linked by a single rhyme, with the third line (generally unrhymed) suspending the movement and carrying it over into the last line.

Omar was not a great descriptive poet, and his poetic flights are very short; he could not, or did not care to, write a developed, organic poem. He has, in fact, been overrated in the English-speaking world because his stanzas appear in a superb translation. But an appealing personality glows in the quatrains. These often alternate between grave and gay feelings. The poet is alternately depressed and playful, argumentative and serene, pessimistic and ecstatic, though he leaves the final impression of pessimism on anyone accustomed to the consolations of Christianity. As Edward Fitzgerald noted, what especially distinguishes Omar is that in his verses we have the Man Omar himself "with all his humors and passions, as frankly before us as if we were really at Table with him, after the Wine had gone around."

The poem was introduced to the English-speaking world by Edward Fitzgerald in 1859. His translation is a very free reworking of the original. Its popularity for fifty years was enormous, not only because of the sheer beauty of the poetry but because the best-known quatrains expressed ideas that were in the minds of many of the readers, chiefly the pessimism and determinism that Victorians derived from the advancing science of the period. Here they read of the shortness of life, the impossibility of knowing certainly anything about such questions as God or immortality, and the conclusion of the whole matter in a philosophy of "eat, drink and be merry, for tomorrow we die." Nowhere has that doctrine been expressed more enticingly than in the lines of Omar Khayyam.

As a poet Omar had his peers in at least two Persian writers who have been abundantly translated into English: Sa'di (1184-1291) and Hafiz (who died in 1389).

Sa'di, acclaimed by the Persians as "the nightingale of the groves of Shiraz," the city in which he was born, spent part of a long life in travel, and then enjoyed the remainder in philosophical retirement. He was a man of simple devotion, a believer in plain living and high thinking. "I never complained of my condition but once, when my feet were bare and I had not money to buy shoes. But I met a man without feet, and I became contented with my lot." His most famous books, the Bustan (Fruit Garden) and the Gulistan (Rose Garden), consist of short philosophic and moralistic poems, exceedingly apt and well-turned in their epigrammatic incisiveness. His favorite style reveals his simplicity and tenderness, his sensitivity and knowledge of human nature. At worst he lapsed into platitudes.

The prince of Persian lyricists is Hafiz, another native of Shiraz, who deserves to be placed in the company of the world's greatest lyricists. Disdaining the courts to which he was frequently invited and preferring a life of proud independence and easy companionship, he spent his life in poverty without any dampening of his natural exuberance. Whether he celebrated conviviality and love or mystic ecstasy, he remained a pure poet. This contemporary of Dante is so revered in Persia that his tomb near Shiraz is a shrine. Every year the maidens of Shiraz bring him bouquets of roses, tied together with brightly colored silken handkerchiefs, and try to tell their futures by consulting his odes. His reflective and religious poems are permeated with a fine ecstasy, but it is as the great poet of love that he is venerated. These verses are odes (gazels) and, in accordance with convention, weave in the poet's name in the final couplet. He is also the rhapsodist of wine and conviviality, and is deservedly known as the "Anacreon of the East." Among his admiring English translators have been Sir William Jones, Gertrude Lowthian Bell, Richard Le Gallienne, Ralph Waldo Emerson.

⁷ Arnold's style is, however, in conscious imitation of Homer, and therefore not Persian at all.

The Tavern shouted—"Open then the Door! 10
You know how little while we have to stay,
And, once departed, may return no more."

IV

Now the New Year reviving old Desires,
The thoughtful Soul to Solitude retires, 14
Where the WHITE HAND OF MOSES on the Bough
Puts out,¹ and Jesus from the Ground suspires.

Iram indeed is gone with all his Rose,
And Jamshyd's Sev'n-ring'd Cup where no one knows;
But still a Ruby-kindles in the Vine,
And many a Garden by the Water blows. 20

VI

And David's lips are lockt; but in divine
High-piping Pehlevi,² with "Wine! Wine! Wine!
Red Wine!"—the Nightingale cries to the Rose
That sallow cheek of hers to incarnadine.

VII

Come, fill the Cup, and in the fire of Spring 25
Your Winter-garment of Repentance fling:

The Bird of Time has but a little way
To flutter—and the Bird is on the Wing.

VIII

Whether at Naishapur³ or Babylon,
Whether the Cup with sweet or bitter run, 30
The Wine of Life keeps oozing drop by drop,
The Leaves of Life keep falling one by one.

IX

Each Morn a thousand Roses brings, you say;
Yes, but where leaves the Rose of Yesterday?
And this first Summer month that brings the Rose 35
Shall take Jamshyd and Kaikobad away.

X

Well, let it take them! What have we to do
With Kaikobad the Great, or Kaikhosru?
Let Zal and Rustum bluster as they will,
Or Hatim⁴ call to Supper—heed not you. 40

XI

With me along the strip of Herbage strown
That just divides the desert from the sown,
Where name of Slave and Sultan is forgot—
And Peace to Mahmud⁵ on his golden Throne!

XII

A Book of Verses underneath the Bough, 45
A jug of Wine, a Loaf of Bread—and Thou
Beside me singing in the Wilderness—
Oh, Wilderness were Paradise enow!

XIII

Some for the Glories of This World; and some Sigh for the Prophet's Paradise to come; 50
Ah, take the Cash, and let the Credit go,
Nor heed the rumble of a distant Drum!

Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam. Translated by Edward Fitzgerald. Omar Khayyam was born at Naishapur in Persia, son of a tent-maker. He was a mathematician and astronomer. He died about 1123 A.D. His rubaiyat (or four-line stanzas) were quite unconnected. The semblance of order is due to Fitzgerald's rearrangement.

² The ancient heroic language of Persia; therefore any heroic strain.

³ Naishapur, the small town, or Babylon, the metropolis.

⁴ Like all the names just given, a famous man of old.

XIV

Look to the blowing Rose about us—"Lo,
Laughing," she says, "into the world I blow.
At once the silken tassel of my Purse 55
Tear, and its Treasure on the Garden throw."

XV

And those who husbanded the Golden grain,
And those who flung it to the winds like Rain,
Alike to no such aureate Earth are turn'd
As, buried once, Men want dug up again. 60

XVI

The Worldly Hope men set their Hearts upon
Turns Ashes—or it prospers; and anon,
Like Snow upon the Desert's dusty Face,
Lighting a little hour or two—is gone.

XVII

Think, in this batter'd Caravanserai 65
Whose Portals are alternate Night and Day,
How Sultan after Sultan with his Pomp
Abode his destined Hour, and went his way.

XVIII

They say the Lion and the Lizard keep
The Courts where Jamshyd gloried and drank deep: 70
And Bahram, that great Hunter—the Wild Ass
Stamps o'er his Head, but cannot break his Sleep.

XIX

I sometimes think that never blows so red
The Rose as where some buried Cæsar bled;
That every Hyacinth the Garden wears 75
Dropt in her Lap from some once lovely Head.

XX

And this reviving Herb whose tender Green
Fledges the River-Lip on which we lean—
Ah, lean upon it lightly! for who knows
From what once lovely Lip it springs unseen! 80

XXI

Ah, my Beloved, fill the Cup that clears
TODAY of past Regrets and Future Fears:
Tomorrow!—Why, Tomorrow I may be Myself with Yesterday's Sev'n thousand Years.

XXII

For some we loved, the loveliest and the best 85
That from his Vintage rolling Time hath prest

Have drunk their Cup a Round or two before,
And one by one crept silently to rest.

XXIII

And we, that now make merry in the Room
They left, and Summer dresses in new bloom, 90
Ourselves must we beneath the Couch of Earth
Descend—ourselves to make a Couch—for whom?

XXIV

Ah, make the most of what we yet may spend,
Before we too into the Dust descend;
Dust into Dust, and under Dust to lie 95
Sans Wine, sans Song, sans Singer, and—sans End!

XXV

Alike for those who for TODAY prepare,
And those that after some TOMORROW stare,
A Muezzin from the Tower of Darkness cries, 99
"Fools! your Reward is neither Here nor There."

XXVI

Why, all the Saints and Sages who discuss'd
Of the Two Worlds so wisely—they are thrust
Like foolish Prophets forth; their Words to Scorn
Are scatter'd, and their Mouths are stopt with Dust.

XXVII

Myself when young did eagerly frequent 105
Doctor and Saint, and heard great argument
About it and about: but evermore
Came out by the same door where in I went.

XXVIII

With them the seed of Wisdom did I sow,
And with mine own hand wrought to make it grow; 110
And this was all the Harvest that I reap'd—
"I came like Water, and like Wind I go."

XXIX

Into this Universe, and Why not knowing
Nor Whence, like Water willy-nilly flowing;
And out of it, as Wind along the Waste, 115
I know not Whither, willy-nilly blowing.

XXX

What, without asking, hither hurried Whence?
And, without asking, Whither hurried hence!
Oh, many a Cup of this forbidden Wine
Must drown the memory of that insolence! 120

XXXI

Up from Earth's Center through the Seventh Gate
I rose, and on the Throne of Saturn⁶ sate;
And many a Knot unravel'd by the Road;
But not the Master-knot of Human Fate.

XXXII

There was the Door to which I found no Key: 125
There was the Veil through which I might not see:
Some little talk awhile of ME and THEE
There was—and then no more of THEE and ME.

XXXIII

Earth could not answer; nor the Seas that mourn
In flowing Purple, of their Lord forlorn; 130
Nor rolling Heaven, with all his Signs reveal'd
And hidden by the sleeve of Night and Morn.

XXXIV

Then of the THEE IN ME who works behind
The Veil, I lifted up my hands to find
A Lamp amid the Darkness; and I heard, 135
As from Without—"THE ME WITHIN THEE BLIND!"

XXXV

Then to the lip of this poor earthen Urn
I lean'd, the Secret of my Life to learn:
And Lip to Lip it murmur'd—"While you live,
Drink!—for, once dead, you never shall re- 140 turn."

XXXVI

I think the Vessel, that with fugitive
Articulation answer'd, once did live,
And drink; and Ah! the passive Lip I kiss'd.
How many Kisses might it take—and give!

XXXVII

For I remember stopping by the way 145
To watch a Potter thumping his wet Clay:
And with its all-obliterated Tongue
It murmur'd—"Gently, Brother, gently, pray!"

XXXVIII

And has not such a Story from of Old
Down Man's successive generations roll'd 150
Of such a clod of saturated Earth
Cast by the Maker into Human mold?

XXXIX

And not a drop that from our Cups we throw
For Earth to drink of, but may steal below

To quench the fire of Anguish in some Eye 155
There hidden—far beneath, and long ago.

XL

As then the Tulip for her morning sup
Of Heav'nly Vintage from the soil looks up,
Do you devoutly do the like, till Heav'n
To Earth invert you—like an empty Cup. 160

XLI

Perplex no more with Human or Divine,
Tomorrow's tangle to the winds resign,
And lose your fingers in the tresses of
The Cypress-slender Minister of Wine.

XLII

And if the Wine you drink, the Lip you press, 165
End in what All begins and ends in—Yes;
Think then you are TODAY what YESTERDAY
You were—TOMORROW you shall not be less.

XLIII

So when that Angel of the darker Drink
At last shall find you by the river-brink, 170
And, offering his Cup, invite your Soul
Forth to your Lips to quaff—you shall not shrink.

XLIV

Why, if the Soul can fling the Dust aside,
And naked on the Air of Heaven ride, Were't not a Shame—were't not a Shame for
him 175
In this clay carcase crippled to abide?

XLV

'Tis but a Tent where takes his one day's rest
A Sultan to the realm of Death address;
The Sultan rises, and the dark Ferrash
Strikes, and prepares it for another Guest. 180

XLVI

And fear not lest Existence closing your Account, and mine, should know the like no more;
The Eternal Saki from that Bowl has pour'd
Millions of Bubbles like us, and will pour.

XLVII

When You and I behind the Veil are past, 185
Oh, but the long, long while the World shall last,
Which of our Coming and Departure heeds
As the Sea's self should heed a pebble-cast.

⁶ Saturn was lord of the seventh heaven.

XLVIII

A Moment's Halt—a momentary taste
Of BEING from the Well amid the Waste— 190
And Lo!—the phantom Caravan has reach'd
The NOTHING it set out from—Oh, make haste!

XLIX

Would you that spangle of Existence spend
About the SECRET—quick about it, Friend!
A Hair perhaps divides the False and True—
And upon what, prithee, may life depend? 196

L

A Hair perhaps divides the False and True;
Yes; and a single Alif were the clue—
Could you but find it—to the Treasure-house,
And peradventure to THE MASTER too; 200

LI

Whose secret Presence, through Creation's veins
Running Quicksilver-like eludes your pains;
Taking all shapes from Mah to Mahi; and
They change and perish all—but He remains;

LII

A moment guess'd—then back behind the Fold 205
Immerst of Darkness round the Drama roll'd
Which, for the Pastime of Eternity,
He doth Himself contrive, enact, behold.

LIII

But if in vain, down on the stubborn floor 209
Of Earth, and up to Heav'n's unopening Door,
You gaze TODAY while You are You—how then
TOMORROW, You when shall be You no more?

LIV

Waste not your Hour, nor in the vain pursuit
Of This and That endeavor and dispute;
Better be jocund with the fruitful Grape 215
Than sadden after none, or bitter, Fruit.

LV

You know, my Friends, with what a brave Carouse
I made a Second Marriage in my house;
Divorced old barren Reason from my Bed,
And took the Daughter of the Vine to Spouse. 220

LVI

For "is" and "is-not" though with Rule and Line
And "UP-AND-DOWN" by Logic I define,
Of all that one should care to fathom, I
Was never deep in anything but—Wine.

LVII

Ah, but my Computations, People say, 225
Reduced the Year to better reckoning?—Nay,
'Twas only striking from the Calendar
Unborn Tomorrow, and dead Yesterday.

LVIII

And lately, by the Tavern Door agape,
Came shining through the Dusk an Angel Shape
Bearing a Vessel on his Shoulder; and 231
He bid me taste of it; and 'twas—the Grape!

LIX

The Grape that can with Logic absolute
The Two-and-Seventy jarring Sects confute:
The sovereign Alchemist that in a trice 235
Life's leaden metal into Gold transmute:

LX

The mighty Mahmud, Allah-breathing Lord,
That all the misbelieving and black Horde
Of Fears and Sorrows that infest the Soul
Scatters before him with his whirlwind Sword. 240

LXI

Why, be this Juice the growth of God, who dare
Blaspheme the twisted tendril as a Snare?
A Blessing, we should use it, should we not?
And if a Curse—why, then, Who set it there?

LXII

I must abjure the Balm of Life, I must, 245
Scared by some After-reckoning ta'en on trust,
Or lured with Hope of some Diviner Drink,
To fill the Cup—when crumbled into Dust!

LXIII

Oh threats of Hell and Hopes of Paradise!
One thing at least is certain—This Life flies; 250
One thing is certain and the rest is Lies;
The Flower that once has blown forever dies.

LXIV

Strange, is it not? that of the myriads who Before us pass'd the door of Darkness through,
Not one returns to tell us of the Road, 255
Which to discover we must travel too.

LXV

The Revelations of Devout and Learn'd
Who rose before us, and as Prophets burn'd,
Are all but Stories, which, awoke from Sleep
They told their comrades, and to Sleep return'd. 260

LXVI

I sent my Soul through the Invisible,
Some letter of that After-life to spell:
And by and by my Soul return'd to me,
And answered "I Myself am Heav'n and Hell:"

LXVII

Heav'n but the Vision of fulfill'd Desire, 265
And Hell the Shadow from a Soul on fire,
Cast on the Darkness into which Ourselves,
So late emerged from, shall so soon expire.

LXVIII

We are no other than a moving row
Of Magic Shadow-shapes that come and go 270
Round with the Sun-illuminated Lantern held
In Midnight by the Master of the Show;

LXIX

But helpless Pieces of the Game He plays
Upon his Chequer-board of Nights and Days;
Hither and thither moves, and checks, and slays,
And one by one back in the Closet lays. 276

LXX

The Ball no question makes of Ayes and Noes,
But Here or There as strikes the Player goes;
And He that toss'd you down into the Field,
He knows about it all—HE knows—HE knows! 280

LXXI

The Moving Finger writes; and, having writ,
Moves on: nor all your Piety nor Wit
Shall lure it back to cancel half a Line,
Nor all your Tears wash out a Word of it.

LXXII

And that inverted Bowl they call the Sky, 285
Whereunder crawling coop'd we live and die,
Lift not your hands to It for help—for It
As impotently moves as you or I.

LXXIII

With Earth's first Clay They did the Last Man
knead, 289
And there of the Last Harvest sow'd the Seed:
And the first Morning of Creation wrote
What the Last Dawn of Reckoning shall read.

LXXIV

YESTERDAY This Day's Madness did prepare;
TOMORROW'S Silence, Triumph, or Despair:

⁷ The Pleiades and Jupiter.

Drink! for you know not whence you came, nor why: 295
Drink! for you know not why you go, nor where.

LXXV

I tell you this—When, started from the Goal,
Over the flaming shoulders of the Foal
Of Heav'n Parwin and Mushtari⁷ they flung,
In my predestined Plot of Dust and Soul 300

LXXVI

The Vine had struck a fiber: which about
If clings my being—let the Dervish flout;
Of my Base metal may be filed a Key,
That shall unlock the Door he howls without.

LXXVII

And this I know: whether the one True Light
Kindle to Love, or Wrath-consume me quite, 306
One Flash of It within the Tavern caught
Better than in the Temple lost outright.

LXXVIII

What! out of senseless Nothing to provoke
A conscious Something to resent the yoke 310
Of unpermitted Pleasure, under pain
Of Everlasting Penalties, if broke!

LXXIX

What! from his helpless Creature be repaid
Pure Gold for what he lent him dross-allay'd—
Sue for a Debt he never did contract, 315
And cannot answer—Oh the sorry trade!

LXXX

Oh Thou, who didst with pitfall and with gin
Beset the Road I was to wander in,
Thou wilt not with Predestined Evil round
Enmesh, and then impute my Fall to Sin! 320

LXXXI

Oh Thou, who Man of baser Earth didst make,
And ev'n with Paradise devise the Snake:
For all the Sin wherewith the Face of Man
Is blacken'd—Man's forgiveness give—and take!

LXXXII

As under cover of departing Day 325
Slunk hunger-stricken Ramazan⁸ away,
Once more within the Potter's house alone
I stood, surrounded by the Shapes of Clay.

⁸ The month of fasting.

LXXXIII

Shapes of all Sorts and Sizes, great and small,
That stood along the floor and by the wall; 330
And some loquacious Vessels were; and some Listen'd perhaps, but never talk'd at all.

LXXXIV

Said one among them—"Surely not in vain
My substance of the common Earth was ta'en
And to this Figure molded, to be broke, 335
Or trampled back to shapeless Earth again."

LXXXV

Then said a Second—"Ne'er a peevish Boy Would break the Bowl from which he drank in joy;
And He that with his hand the Vessel made
Will surely not in after Wrath destroy." 340

LXXXVI

After a momentary silence spake
Some Vessel of a more ungainly Make;
"They sneer at me for leaning all awry:
What! did the Hand then of the Potter shake?"

LXXXVII

Whereat someone of the loquacious Lot— 345
I think a Sufi pipkin—waxing hot—
"All this of Pot and Potter—Tell me then,
Who is the Potter, pray, and who the Pot?"

LXXXVIII

"Why," said another, "Some there are who tell
Of one who threatens he will toss to Hell 350
The luckless Pots he marr'd in making—Pish!
He's a Good Fellow, and 'twill all be well."

LXXXIX

"Well," murmur'd one, "Let whoso make or buy,
My Clay with long Oblivion is gone dry:
But fill me with the old familiar Juice, 355
Methinks I might recover by and by."

XC

So while the Vessels one by one were speaking,
The little Moon⁹ look'd in that all were seeking:
And then they jogg'd each other, "Brother!
Brother! 359
Now for the Porter's shoulder-knot a-creaking!"

XCI

Ah, with the Grape my fading Life provide,
And wash the Body whence the Life has died,
And lay me, shrouded in the living Leaf,
By some not unfrequented Garden-side.

XCII

That ev'n my buried Ashes such a snare 365
Of Vintage shall fling up into the Air
As not a True-believer passing by
But shall be overtaken unaware.

XCIII

Indeed the Idols I have loved so long
Have done my credit in this World much wrong:
Have drowned my Glory in a shallow Cup 371
And sold my Reputation for a Song.

XCIV

Indeed, indeed, Repentance oft before
I swore—but was I sober when I swore?
And then and then came Spring, and Rose-in-hand 375
My thread-bare Penitence apieces tore.

XCV

And much as Wine has play'd the Infidel,
And robb'd me of my Robe of Honor—Well,
I wonder often what the Vintners buy
One half so precious as the stuff they sell. 380

XCVI

Yet Ah, that Spring should vanish with the Rose!
That Youth's sweet-scented manuscript should close!
The Nightingale that in the branches sang,
Ah whence, and whither flown again, who knows!

XCVII

Would but the Desert of the Fountain yield 385
One glimpse—if dimly, yet indeed, reveal'd,
To which the fainting Traveler might spring,
As springs the trampled herbage of the field!

XCVIII

Would but some winged Angel ere too late
Arrest the yet unfolded Roll of Fate, 390
And make the stern Recorder otherwise
Enregister, or quite obliterate!

⁹ Indicating the close of the month of fasting.

XCIX

Ah Love! could you and I with Him conspire
To grasp this sorry Scheme of Things entire,
Would not we shatter it to bits—and then 395
Re-mold it nearer to the Heart's Desire!

Yon rising Moon that looks for us again—
How oft hereafter will she wax and wane;

How oft hereafter rising look for us 399
Through this same Garden—and for one in vain!

CI

And when like her, oh Saki, you shall pass
Among the Guests Star-scatter'd on the Grass,
And in your joyous errand reach the spot
Where I made One—turn down an empty Glass!

TAMAM

SA'DI

The GulistanPurgatory May Be Paradise

A king was embarked along with a Persian slave on board a ship. The boy had never been at sea, nor experienced the inconvenience of a ship. He set up a weeping and wailing, and all his limbs were in a state of trepidation; and, however much they soothed him, he was not to be pacified. The king's pleasure-party was disconcerted by him; but they had no help. On board that ship there was a physician. He said to the king: "If you will order it, I can manage to silence him." The king replied: 10 "It will be an act of great favor." The physician so directed that they threw the boy into the sea, and after he had plunged repeatedly, they seized him by the hair of the head and drew him close to the ship, when he clung with both hands by the rudder, and, scrambling upon the deck, slunk into a corner and sat down quiet. The king, pleased with what he saw, said: "What art is there in this?" The physician replied: "Originally he had not experienced the danger of being drowned, and under- 20 valued the safety of being in a ship; in like manner as a person is aware of the preciousness of health when he is overtaken with the calamity of sickness. A barley loaf of bread has, O epicure, no relish for thee. That is my mistress who appears so ugly to thy eye.—To the houris, or nymphs of paradise, purgatory would be a hell; ask the inmates of hell whether purgatory is not paradise.—There is a distinction between the man that folds his mistress in his arms and him whose two eyes 30 are fixed on the door expecting her."

The Wrestler

A person had become a master in the art of wrestling; he knew three hundred and sixty sleights in this art, and could exhibit a fresh trick for every day throughout the year. Perhaps owing to a liking that a corner of his heart took for the handsome person of one of his scholars, he taught him three hundred and fifty-nine of those feats, but he was putting off the last one, and under some pretence deferring it.

In short, the youth became such a proficient in the art and talent of wrestling that none of his contemporaries had ability to cope with him, till he at length had one day boasted before the reigning sovereign, saying: "To any superiority my master possesses over me, he is beholden to my reverence of his seniority, and in virtue of his tutorage; otherwise I am not inferior in power, and am his equal in skill." This want of respect displeased the king. He ordered a wrestling match to be held, and a spacious field to be fenced in for the occasion. The ministers of state, nobles of the court, and gallant men of the realm were assembled, and the ceremonials of the combat marshalled. Like a huge and lusty elephant, the youth rushed into the ring with such a crash that had a brazen mountain opposed him he would have moved it from its base. The master being aware that the youth was his superior in strength, engaged him in that strange feat of which he had kept him ignorant. The youth was unacquainted with its guard. Advancing, nevertheless, the master seized him with both hands, and, lifting him bodily from the ground, raised him above his head and flung him on the earth. The crowd set up a shout. The king ordered them to give the master an honorary dress and handsome largess, and the youth he addressed with reproach and asperity, saying: "You played the traitor with your own patron, and failed in your presumption of opposing him." He replied: "O sire! my master did not overcome me by strength and ability, but one cunning trick in the art of wrestling was left 10 which he was reserved in teaching me, and by that little feat had today the upper hand of me." The master said: "I reserved myself for such a day as this. As the wise have told us, put not so much into a friend's power that, if hostilely disposed, he can do you an injury. Have you not heard what that man said who was treacherously dealt with by his own pupil: 'Either in fact there was no good faith in this world, or nobody has perhaps practised it in our days. No person learned the art of archery 20 from me who did not in the end make me his butt.'"

From Slavery to Slavery

Having taken offence with the society of my friends at Damascus, I retired into the wilderness of the Holy Land, or Jerusalem, and sought the company of brutes till such time as I was made a prisoner by the Franks, and employed by them, along with 30 some Jews, in digging earth in the ditches of Tripoli. At length one of the chiefs of Aleppo, between whom and me an intimacy had of old subsisted, happening to pass that way, recognized me, and said: "How is this? and how came you to be thus occupied?" I replied: "What can I say? I was flying from mankind into the forests and mountains, for my resource was in God and in none else. Fancy to thyself what my condition must now be, when forced to associate with a tribe 40 scarcely human?—To be linked in a chain with a company of acquaintance were pleasanter than to walk in a garden with strangers.'"

He took pity on my situation; and, having for ten dinars redeemed me from captivity with the Franks, carried me along with him to Aleppo. Here he had a daughter, and her he gave me in marriage, with a dower of a hundred dinars. Soon after this damsel turned out a termagant and vixen, and discovered such a perverse spirit and virulent 50 tongue as quite unhinged all my domestic comfort. A scolding wife in the dwelling of a peaceable man is his hell even in this world. Protect and guard us against a wicked inmate. Save us, O Lord, and preserve us from the fiery, or hell, torture.

Having on one occasion given a liberty to the tongue of reproach, she was saying: "Are you not the fellow whom my father redeemed from the captivity of the Franks for ten dinars?" I replied: "Yes, I am that same he delivered from captivity for ten dinars, and enslaved me with you for a hundred!" I have heard that a reverend and mighty man released a sheep from the paws and jaws of a wolf. That same night he was sticking a knife into its throat, when the spirit of the sheep reproached him, saying: "Thou didst deliver me from the clutches of a wolf, when I at length saw that thou didst prove a wolf to me thyself."

Wealth

He that owns wealth, in mountain, wold, or waste,
Plays master—pitches tent at his own taste;
Whilst he who lacks that which the world commends
Must pace a stranger, e'en in his own lands.

The Bustan

The Great Physician

A tumult in a Syrian town had place:
They seized an old man there of wit and grace;
Still in my ear lingers his noble saying,
When, fettered fast, they smote him in the face.

Quotha: "If of all Sultans the Sultàn 5
Gives not the word for plunder, who else can?
Who, save upon His bidding, would be bold
To do such deeds? Therefore I hold the man

That wrongs me not mine enemy but friend;
God hath appointed him unto this end! 10
If there fall scorn or honor, gifts or shackles,
'Tis God—not Zayd or Omar—who doth send."

Right, Sheykh! no griefs the wise heart will annoy;
The Great Physician sharp drugs doth employ!
A sick man's not more skillful than his Hâkim;
Take what the Friend gives as a bliss and joy. 16

The Dancer

I heard how, to the beat of some quick tune,
 There rose and danced a Damsel like the moon,
 Flower-mouthed and Pâri-faced; and all around her
 Neck-stretching Lovers gathered close; but, soon

A flickering lamp-flame caught her skirt, and set 5
 Fire to the flying gauze. Fear did beget
 Trouble in that light heart! She cried amain.

Quoth one among her worshipers, "Why fret,

Tulip of Love? Th' extinguished fire hath burned
 Only one leaf of thee; but I am turned 10
 To ashes—leaf and stalk, and flower and root—
 By lamp-flash of thine eyes!"—"Ah, Soul concerned

"Solely with self!"—she answered, laughing low,
 "If thou wert Lover thou hadst not said so.
 Who speaks of the Belov'd's woe as not his 15
 Speaks infidelity, true Lovers know!"

HAFIZ

A Persian Song

Sweet maid, if thou wouldst charm my sight,
 And bid these arms thy neck infold;
 That rosy cheek, that lily hand,
 Would give thy poet more delight
 Than all Bocara's vaunted gold, 5
 Than all the gems of Samarcand.

Boy, let yon liquid ruby flow,
 And bid thy pensive heart be glad,
 Whate'er the frowning zealots say:
 Tell them, their Eden cannot show 10
 A stream so clear as Rocnabad,
 A bow'r so sweet as Mosellay.

Oh! when these fair perfidious maids,
 Whose eyes our secret haunts infest,
 Their dear destructive charms display, 15
 Each glance my tender heart invades,
 And robs my wounded soul of rest,
 As Tartars seize their destined prey.

In vain with love our bosoms glow:
 Can all our tears, can all our sighs, 20
 New luster to those charms impart?
 Can cheeks, where living roses blow,
 Where Nature spreads her richest dyes,
 Require the borrowed gloss of art?

Speak not of fate:—ah! change the theme, 25
 And talk of odors, talk of wine,

Talk of the flow'rs that round us bloom:
 'Tis all a cloud, 'tis all a dream;
 To love and joy thy thoughts confine,
 Nor hope to pierce the sacred gloom. 30

Beauty has such resistless pow'r,
 That ev'n the chaste Egyptian dame
 Sighed for the blooming Hebrew boy:
 For her how fatal was the hour 35
 When to the banks of Nilus came
 A youth so lovely and so coy!

But ah! sweet maid, my counsel hear (Youth should attend when those advise Whom long experience renders sage) 40
 While music charms the ravished ear,
 While sparkling cups delight our eyes,
 Be gay, and scorn the frowns of age.

What cruel answer have I heard?
 And yet, by Heav'n, I love thee still
 Can aught be cruel from thy lips? 45
 Yet say, how fell that bitter word
 From lips which streams of sweetness fill,
 Which nought but drops of honey sip?

Go boldly forth, my simple lay,
 Whose accents flow with artless ease, 50
 Like orient pearls at random strung;
 Thy notes are sweet, the damsels say,
 But oh, far sweeter, if they please
 The Nymph for whom these notes are sung.

Ode 11

I have borne the anguish of love, which ask me not to describe:
I have tasted the poison of absence, which ask me not to relate.

Far through the world have I roved, and at length
I have chosen
A sweet creature (a ravisher of hearts), whose name ask me not to disclose.

The flowing of my tears bedews her footsteps 5
In such a manner as ask me not to utter.

On yesternight from her own mouth with my own ears I heard
Such words as pray ask me not to repeat.

Why dost you bite thy lip at me? What dost thou not hint (that I may have told)?
I have devoured a lip like a ruby: but whose, ask me not to mention. 10

Absent from thee, and the sole tenant of my cottage,
I have endured such tortures, as ask me not to enumerate.

Thus am I, HAFIZ, arrived at extremity in the ways of Love,
Which, alas! ask me not to explain.

Ode 12

I said to heaven that glowed above
O hide yon sun-filled zone,
Hide all the stars you boast;
For, in the world of love
And estimation true, 5
The heaped-up harvest of the moon
Is worth one barley-corn at most,
The Pleiads' sheaf but two.

If my darling should depart,
And search the skies for prouder friends, 10
God forbid my angry heart
In other love should seek amends.

When the blue horizon's hoop
Me a little pinches here,
Instant to my grave I stoop, 15
And go find thee in the sphere.

Ode 13

Oft have I said, I say it once more,
I, a wanderer, do not stray from myself.
I am a kind of parrot; the mirror is holden to me;
What the Eternal says, I stammering say again.

Give me what you will; I eat thistles as roses,
And according to my food I grow and I give.
Scorn me not, but know I have the pearl,
And am only seeking one to receive it.

THE ARABIAN NIGHTS

The First Voyage of Es-Sindibad of the Sea

Know, O masters, O noble persons, that I had a father; a merchant, who was one of the first in rank among the people and the merchants, and who possessed abundant wealth and ample fortune. He died when I was a young child, leaving to me wealth and buildings and fields; and when I grew up, I put my hand upon the whole of the property, ate well and drank well, associated with the young men, wore handsome apparel, and passed my life with my friends and companions, 10 feeling confident that this course would continue and profit me; and I ceased not to live in this manner for a length of time. I then returned to my reason, and recovered from my heedlessness, and found that my wealth had passed away, and my condition had changed, and all [the money] that I had possessed had gone. I recovered not to see my situation but in a state of fear and confusion of mind, and remembered a tale that I had heard before, the tale of our lord Suleyman the son of Da'ud¹ (on both of whom be peace!), respecting his saying, Three things are better than three: the day of death is better than the day of birth; and a living dog is better than a dead lion; and the grave is better than the palace. Then I arose, and collected what I had, of effects and apparel, and sold them; after which I sold my buildings and all that my hand possessed, and amassed three thousand pieces of silver; and it occurred to my mind to travel to the countries of other people.

Upon this, I resolved, and arose, and bought for myself goods and commodities and merchandise, with such other things as were required for travel; and my mind had consented to my performing a sea-voyage. So I embarked in a ship, and it descended to the city of El-Basrah, with a company of merchants; and we traversed the sea for many days and nights. We had passed by island after island, and from sea to sea, and from land to land, and in every place by which we passed we sold and bought, and exchanged merchandise. We continued our voyage until we arrived at an island like one of the gardens of Paradise, and at that island the master of the ship brought her to anchor with us. He cast the anchor, and put forth the landing-plank, and all who were in the ship landed upon that island. They had prepared for themselves fire-pots, and they lighted the fires in them; and their occupations were various: some cooked; others washed; and others amused themselves. I was among those who were amusing themselves upon the shores of the island, and the passengers were assembled to eat and drink and play and sport. But while we were thus engaged, the master of the ship, standing upon its side, called out with his loudest voice, O ye passengers, whom may God preserve! come up quickly into the ship, hasten to embark, and leave your merchandise, and flee with your lives, and save yourselves from destruction; for this apparent island, upon which ye are, is not really an island, but it is a great fish that hath become stationary in the midst of the sea, and the sand hath accumulated upon it, so that it hath become like an island, and trees have grown upon it since times of old; and when ye lighted the fire upon it, the fish felt the heat, and put itself in motion, and now it will descend with you into the sea, and ye will all be drowned: then seek for yourselves escape before destruction, and leave the merchandise.—The passengers, therefore, hearing the words of the master of the ship, hastened to go up into the vessel, leaving the merchandise, and their other goods, and their copper cooking-pots, and their fire-pots; and some reached the ship, and others reached it not. The island had moved, and descended to the bottom of the sea, with all that were upon it, and the roaring sea, agitated with waves, closed over it.

I was among the number of those who remained behind upon the island; so I sank in the sea with the rest who sank. But God (whose name be exalted!) delivered me and saved me from drowning and supplied me with a great wooden bowl, of the bowls in which the passengers had been washing, and I laid hold upon it and got into it, induced by the sweetness of life, and beat the water with my feet as with oars, while the waves sported with me, tossing me to the right and left. The master of the vessel had caused her sails to be spread, and pursued his voyage with those who had embarked, not regarding such as had been submerged; and I ceased not to look at that vessel until it was concealed from my eye. I made sure of destruction, and night came upon me while I was in this state; but I remained so a day and a night, and the wind and the waves aided me until the bowl came to a stoppage with me under a high island, whereon were trees overhanging the sea. So I laid hold upon a branch of a lofty tree, and clung to it, after I had been at the point of destruction; and I kept hold upon it until I landed on the island, when I found my legs benumbed, and saw marks of the nibbling of fish upon their hams, of which I had been insensible by reason of the violence of the anguish and fatigue that I was suffering.

I threw myself upon the island like one dead, and was unconscious of my existence, and drowned in my stupefaction; and I ceased not to remain in this condition until the next day. The sun having then risen upon me, I awoke upon the island, and found that my feet were swollen, and that I had become reduced to the state in which I then was. Awhile I dragged myself along in a sitting posture, and then I crawled upon my knees. And there were in the island fruits in abundance, and springs of sweet water: therefore I ate of those fruits; and I ceased not to continue in this state for many days and nights. My spirit had then revived, my soul had returned to me, and my power of motion was renewed; and I began to meditate, and to walk along the shore of the island, amusing myself among the trees with the sight of the things that God (whose name be exalted!) had created; and I had made for myself a staff from those trees, to lean upon it. Thus I remained until I walked, one day, upon the shore of the island, and there appeared unto me an indistinct object in the distance. I imagined that it was a wild beast, or one of the beasts of the sea; and I walked towards it, ceasing not to gaze at it; and, lo, it was a mare, of superb appearance, tethered in a part of the island by the sea-shore. I approached her; but she cried out against me with a great cry, and I trembled with fear of her, and was about to return, when, behold, a man came forth from beneath the earth, and he called to me and pursued me, saying to me, Who art thou, and whence hast thou come, and what is the cause of thine arrival in this place? So I answered him, O my master, know that I am a stranger, and I was in a ship, and was submerged in the sea with certain others of the passengers; but God supplied me with a wooden bowl, and I got into it, and it bore me along until the waves cast me upon this island. And when he heard my words, he laid hold of my hand and said to me, Come with me. I therefore went with him, and he descended with me into a grotto beneath the earth, and conducted me into a large subterranean chamber, and, having seated me at the upper end of that chamber, brought me some food. I was hungry; so I ate until I was satiated and contented, and my soul became at ease. Then he asked me respecting my case, and what had happened to me; wherefore I acquainted him with my whole affair from beginning to end; and he wondered at my story.

And when I had finished my tale, I said, I conjure thee by Allah, O my master, that thou be not displeased with me: I have acquainted thee with the truth of my case and of what hath happened to me, and I desire of thee that thou inform me who thou art, and what is the cause of thy dwelling in this chamber that is beneath the earth, and what is the reason of thy tethering this mare by the sea-side. So he replied, Know that we are a party dispersed in this island, upon its shores, and we are the grooms of the King El-Mihraj, having under our care all his horses; and every month, when moonlight commenceth, we bring the swift mares, and tether them in this island, every mare that has not foaled, and conceal ourselves in this chamber beneath the earth, that they may attract the sea-horses. This is the time of the coming forth of the sea-horse; and afterwards, if it be the will of God (whose name be exalted!), I will take thee with me to the King El-Mihraj, and divert thee with the sight of our country. Know, moreover, that if thou hadst not met with us, thou hadst not seen anyone in this place, and wouldst have died in misery, none knowing of thee. But I will be the means of the preservation of thy life, and of thy return to thy country.—I therefore prayed for him, and thanked him for his kindness and beneficence; and while we were thus talking, the horse came forth from the sea, as he had said. And shortly after, his companions came each leading a mare; and, seeing me with him, they inquired of me my story, and I told them what I had related to him. They then drew near to me, and spread the table, and ate, and invited me: so I ate with them, after which, they arose, and mounted the horses, taking me with them, having mounted me on a mare.

We commenced our journey, and proceeded without ceasing until we arrived at the city of the King El-Mihraj, and they went in to him and acquainted him with my story. He therefore desired my presence, and they took me in to him, and stationed me before him; whereupon I saluted him, and he returned my salutation, and welcomed me, greeting me in an honorable manner, and inquired of me respecting my case. So I informed him of all that had happened to me, and of all that I had seen, from beginning to end; and he wondered at that which had befallen me and happened to me, and said to me, O my son, by Allah, thou hast experienced an extraordinary preservation, and had it not been for the predestined length of thy life, thou hadst not escaped from these difficulties; but praise be to God for thy safety! Then he treated me with beneficence and honor, caused me to draw near to him, and began to cheer me with conversation and courtesy; and he made me his superintendent of the sea-port, and registrar of every vessel that came to the coast. I stood in his presence to transact his affairs, and he favored me and benefited me in every respect; he invested me with a handsome and costly dress, and I became a person high in credit with him in intercessions, and in accomplishing the affairs of the people. I ceased not to remain in his service for a long time; and whenever I went to the shore of the sea, I used to inquire of the merchants and travelers and sailors respecting the direction of the city of Baghdad, that perchance someone might inform me of it, and I might go with him thither and return to my country; but none knew it, nor knew anyone who went to it. At this I was perplexed, and I was weary of the length of my absence from home; and in this state I continued for a length of time, until I went in one day to the King El-Mihraj, and found with him a party of Indians. I saluted them, and they returned my salutation and welcomed me, and asked me respecting my country; after which, I questioned them as to their country, and they told me that they consisted of various races. Among them are the Shakiriyeh, who are the most noble of their races, who oppress no one, nor offer violence to any. And among them are a class called the Brahmans, a people who never drink wine; but they are persons of pleasure and joy and sport and merriment, and possessed of camels and horses and cattle. They informed me also that the Indians are divided into seventy-two classes; and I wondered at this extremely. And I saw, in the dominions of the King El-Mihraj, an island, among others, which is called Kasil, in which is heard the beating of tambourines and drums throughout the night, and the islanders and travelers informed us that Ed-Dejjal is in it. I saw too, in the sea in which is that island, a fish two hundred cubits long, and the fishermen fear it; wherefore they knock some pieces of wood, and it fleeth from them; and I saw a fish whose face was like that of the owl. I likewise saw during that voyage many wonderful and strange things, such that, if I related them to you, the description would be too long.

I continued to amuse myself with the sight of those islands and the things they contained, until I stood one day upon the shore of the sea, with a staff in my hand, as was my custom, and lo, a great vessel approached, wherein were many merchants; and when it arrived at the harbor of the city and its place of anchoring, the master furled its sails, brought it to an anchor by the shore, and put forth the landing-plank; and the sailors brought out everything that was in that vessel to the shore. They were slow in taking forth the goods, while I stood writing their account, and I said to the master of the ship, Doth aught remain in thy vessel? He answered, Yes, O my master; I have some goods in the hold of the ship; but their owner was drowned in the sea at one of the islands during our voyage hither, and his goods are in our charge; so we desire to sell them, and to take a note of their price, in order to convey it to his family in the city of Baghdad, the Abode of Peace. I therefore said to the master, What was the name of that man, the owner of the goods? He answered, His name was Es-Sindibad of the Sea, and he was drowned on his voyage with us in the sea. And when I heard his words, I looked at him with a scrutinizing eye, and recognized him; and I cried out at him with a great cry, and said, O master, know that I am the owner of the goods which thou hast mentioned, and I am Es-Sindibad of the Sea, who descended upon the island from the ship, with the other merchants who descended; and when the fish that we were upon moved, and thou calledst out to us, some got into the vessel, and the rest sank, and I was among those who sank. But God (whose name be exalted!) preserved me and saved me from drowning by means of a large wooden bowl, of those in which passengers were washing, and I got into it, and began to beat the water with my feet, and the wind and the waves aided me until I arrived at this island, when I landed on it, and God (whose name be exalted!) assisted me, and I met the grooms of the King El-Mihraj, who took me with them and brought me to this city. They then led me into the King El-Mihraj, and I acquainted him with my story; whereupon he bestowed benefits upon me, and appointed me clerk of the harbor of this city, and I obtained profit in his service, and favor with him. Therefore these goods that thou hast are my goods and my portion.

But the master said, There is no strength nor power but in God, the High, the Great! There is no longer faith nor conscience in anyone!—Wherefore, O master, said I, when thou hast heard me tell thee my story? He answered, Because thou heardest me say that I had goods whose owner was drowned: therefore thou desirest to take them without price; and this is unlawful to thee; for we saw him when he sank, and there were with him many of the passengers, not one of whom escaped. How then dost thou pretend that thou art the owner of the goods?—So I said to him, O master, hear my story, and understand my words, and my veracity will become manifest to thee; for falsehood is a characteristic of the hypocrites. Then I related to him all that I had done from the time that I went forth with him from the city of Baghdad until we arrived at that island upon which we were submerged in the sea, and I mentioned to him some circumstances that had occurred between me and him. Upon this, therefore, the master and the merchants were convinced of my veracity, and recognized me; and they congratulated me on my safety, all of them saying, By Allah, we believed not that thou hadst escaped drowning; but God hath granted thee a new life. They then gave me the goods, and I found my name written upon them, and nought of them was missing. So I opened them, and took forth from them something precious and costly; the sailors of the ship carried it with me, and I went up with it to the King to offer it as a present, and inform him that this ship was the one in which I was a passenger. I told him also that my goods had arrived all entire, and that this present was a part of them. And the King wondered at this affair extremely; my veracity in all that I had said became manifest to him, and he loved me greatly, and treated me with exceeding honor, giving me a large present in return for mine.

Then I sold my bales, as well as the other goods that I had, and gained upon them abundantly; and I purchased other goods and merchandise and commodities of that city. And when the merchants of the ship desired to set forth on their voyage, I stowed all that I had in the vessel, and, going in to the King, thanked him for his beneficence and kindness; after which I begged him to grant me permission to depart on my voyage to my country and my family. So he bade me farewell, and gave me an abundance of things at my departure, of the commodities of that city; and when I had taken leave of him, I embarked in the ship, and we set sail by the permission of God, whose name be exalted! Fortune served us, and destiny aided us, and we ceased not to prosecute our voyage night and day until we arrived in safety at the city of El-Basrah. There we landed and remained a short time; and I rejoiced at my safety, and my return to my country; and after that, I repaired to the city of Baghdad, the Abode of Peace, with abundance of bales and goods and merchandise of great value. Then I went to my quarter, and entered my house, and all my family and companions came to me. I procured for myself servants and other dependants, and memluks and concubines and male black slaves, so that I had a large establishment; and I purchased houses and other immovable possessions, more than I had at first. I enjoyed the society of my companions and friends, exceeding my former habits, and forgot all that I had suffered from fatigue, and absence from my native country, and difficulty, and the terrors of travel. I occupied myself with delights and pleasures, and delicious meats and exquisite drinks, and continued in this state.

PART THREE

THE MEDIEVAL WORLD

In conventional chronology the period of European history from about 450 to 1450 is known as the Middle Ages. The term is significant, for it was introduced by leaders of the Renaissance and by eighteenth-century intellectuals who considered everything between classic times and their own as "middle." According to them, it was an age of barbarism and darkness in which mankind had retrogressed.

This view of the age recalls the famous description of chaotic society by the seventeenth-century English philosopher Thomas Hobbes, in his Leviathan: "In such condition, there is no place for industry, because the fruit thereof is uncertain, and consequently no culture of the earth; no navigation nor use of the commodities that must be imported by sea; no commodious building; no instruments of moving and removing such things as require much force; no account of time; no arts; no letters; no society; and what is worst of all, continual fear and danger of violent death; and the life of man, solitary, poor, nasty and short." This depressing picture is supported by many facts, but these apply only to two or three centuries—from the sixth to the ninth. And even then, conditions were not uniform throughout Europe: In the southeastern part, the Byzantine, or Eastern Roman Empire, held its own, although it was steeped in decadence; in southwest Europe, vestiges of Roman civilization stood out like oases in the desert; everywhere the Church kept some order and maintained outposts of culture; and the Teutonic tribes that conquered the Roman world were either partially Romanized or had some orderly native customs.

After the tenth century, moreover, Europe began to move toward notable achievements. A world that produced the wonderful Gothic cathedrals, epics, romances, lyric poetry, medieval drama, and the philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas, can hardly be called primitive. By the thirteenth century, in fact, Europe had experienced an early renaissance.

The literature that is most strictly medieval in spirit is that which emanated from medieval institutions. These were the medieval Church (which we have already considered); the world of the Celtic peoples of Ireland, Wales, and Brittany in northern France; the religious and warlike traditions of the Germanic peoples before and during their mastery of Europe; and the institutions of feudalism and chivalry. It is a literature that, in one sense, requires no introduction. We respond directly to its tales of heroism, to its wonder and magic, and to its chivalry and romance. However, we shall understand it better and shall be able to place it more intelligently in the stream of world literature, if we are familiar with its background. The history of this period consists largely of the conquests of the Germanic peoples, their adoption of Christianity, the mingling of the Germanic races with the older populations of the Roman empire, the establishment of a social pattern which we call feudalism, and the rise of those kingdoms and empires that laid the foundations for the states of modern Europe.

When in A.D. 493 Theodoric, a Gothic chieftain, became King of Rome, the classic empire in the West was split into numerous petty, unstable kingdoms. It was, in the sixth century, a "shattered civilization, without law, without administration, with roads destroyed and education disorganized."¹ It was an age of pillage and brigandage, with one group of invaders harrying the other.

A new organization became necessary if men were to survive at all, and it arose from the instinct for banding together and from the residue of civilized ideas and habits that many people retained. The freemen of towns or villages and the rulers of tiny communities began to align themselves with some comparatively powerful lord. They placed themselves under his protection, and thus arose the feudal system, which acquired a legal status as well as the traditions and customs now preserved only in the literature of romance. This form of association was partly inherited from the Roman economic and social system under which clients congregated around some wealthy patron, and partly from the Germanic military grouping of many warriors around some chieftain.

The system was pyramidal, in the sense that one lord would owe allegiance to a higher lord, who in turn was the vassal of a still more powerful leader; finally, a king stood on the apex of this pyramid of allegiances. It was even possible for one king to be the vassal of another; thus, for some time, the kings of England were supposed to be vassals of the kings of France. The relationships were often confused and loose; there was little uniformity of practice; and the system was frequently, in the words of H. G. Wells, little better than "confusion roughly organized."

Such a "system" obviously needed the cement of customs and ideals. "The foundation of the feudal relationship proper was the fief, which was usually land. . . . In return for the fief, the man became the vassal of his lord; he knelt before him, and, with his hands between the lord's hands, promised him fealty and service. . . . In the ceremony of homage² and investiture, which is the creative contract of feudalism, the obligations assumed by the two parties were, as a rule, not specified in exact terms. They were determined by local custom. . . . We may say, however, that they fall into classes, general and specific. The general included all that might come under the idea of loyalty, seeking the lord's interests, keeping his secrets, betraying the plans of his enemies, protecting his family, etc. The specific services . . . usually received exact definition in custom and sometimes in written documents. The most characteristic of these was the military service, which included appearance in the field on summons with a certain force, often armed in a specific way, and remaining a specified length of time." It was largely a private obligation, entered into voluntarily or forced upon the vassal by war. It always needed reaffirmation by custom, ceremony, or threat, or a show of force. But where this system was effectively enforced, under a strong ruler, stable kingdoms could actually flourish for a time.

The first real state to emerge was the Frankish kingdom in France, founded by Clovis (465-511), who extended his frontiers from Belgium to the Pyrenees. After his death, the kingdom split into two parts—Austria or the Rhineland, which retained the Low German speech, and Neustria, the land of the Western Franks who had become more Romanized in culture and race, and who spoke the corrupted Latin of the conquered population, which later became the French tongue.³ The court leaders of the successors of Clovis took over the government. It was one of these mayors, Charles Martel, who stopped the Moslems in the decisive battle of Poitiers in 732. His grandson, Charlemagne, actually established an empire that, during his lifetime, took the place of the one the Cæsars had lost to the Germanic invaders. He subjugated the Saxons and Bavarians, conquered northern Italy (Lombardy), and on Christmas Day in 800 was crowned Emperor of Rome by Pope Leo III.

More lasting than his empire-building and campaigns was Charlemagne's effort to introduce learning into his kingdom by attracting teachers to his court. From England, where the monasteries already had excellent scholars, he brought the learned Alcuin, and he established in his palace a school engaged in literary and theological discussion. He collected the war-songs and tales of the early Teutons. He encouraged architecture, importing architects from Italy; built numerous cathedrals, and founded monastic schools.

These beginnings were not fated to develop as rapidly as Charlemagne expected, and his empire fell apart. Europe began to be harassed by new invasions from the north. The seafaring Vikings, whose destructiveness became proverbial, pushed into England, invaded northern France, and established the kingdom of Normandy, in 885. Nevertheless, Europe recovered from these fresh onslaughts within a century. The Danes in England were assimilated, and in Wessex, Alfred the Great inaugurated a veritable revival of learning. In Normandy, the Northmen or Normans (who lent their name to this province) quickly adopted Frankish customs, intermarried with the French, and developed feudalism to a high degree. When they invaded England in 1066, they brought with them a culture manifestly superior to that of the Anglo-Saxons.

Throughout this early period, the Church was making itself a powerful center of culture. Its first medieval leader, Gregory I (540-604), started missions that Christianized and civilized the barbaric tribes. It was with his sanction that his friend St. Benedict was able to establish the civilizing Benedictine monasteries that took the place of the Roman schools. The Benedictine monks served God actively with their minds and hands, in accordance with the Benedictine formula that to work was to pray (laborare est orare). They were pioneers in agriculture, not disdaining to soil their hands with common toil and thus raising labor to some dignity in the eyes of warriors who considered fighting the only manly occupation. These monks also became craftsmen, and busy towns grew up around their monasteries; they even started medieval architecture, some of them working as master masons. In addition, they preserved, copied, and illustrated manuscripts. Although the Benedictine monasteries were ultimately corrupted by wealth, they were unassailable outposts of culture for centuries.

In the eleventh century a strong cleric, Pope Gregory VII (1020-1085), reformed the Church, making it powerful enough to curb emperors and to give Europe some sorely needed spiritual and moral guidance. His successor Urban II (1042-1099) introduced a new spiritual ferment by inspiring the first Crusade. This brought the many warring feudal lords together; and although they never ceased quarreling, their meeting as allies was beneficial. Contact with Moslem civilization proved particularly enriching, and European culture began to flower again.

Meanwhile, in southern France (the Provence), during the eleventh and twelfth centuries, industry started to flourish; universities, at which Jewish scholars taught, arose in Narbonne and Montpellier; and feudal chivalry began to express itself in refined manners and a new literature based not on Teutonic mythology and war stories, but on tales of pleasure and love. The poetry of its troubadours spread into Italy, northern France, and Germany. From Germany, moreover, came the half-Italian, autocratic Emperor Frederick II, who gathered Jewish, Mohammedan, and Christian scholars at his court in Sicily. Arabic numerals and algebra were introduced there, and Aristotle was studied in translations and in Arabian-Jewish commentaries. Frederick established the University of Naples and expanded the ancient medical school at Salerno. Himself a writer of Italian poetry, he could point with some pride to the minnesingers, in the German part of his realm, writers of love poetry, whose lyrics and romances are a memorable portion of medieval literature. The greatest of them, Walther von der Vogelweide, expressed the same liberal opinions as the emperor, and the same revolt against too much priestly authority. In northern France, too, a succession of rulers encouraged the development of culture; they patronized poets known as trouvères. A great university arose in Paris, and its most brilliant twelfth-century teacher Peter Abelard shaped theological disputation into a fine instrument for intellectual analysis.

The gradual elevation of woman's social position was another powerful ferment. Woman had been maligned by the zealous celibates of the early Church, considered the greatest obstacle to salvation, and blamed for causing Adam to be driven out of Paradise. This attitude was summarized by a monk who declared that at the beginning "There was but one woman; yet she had no rest until she succeeded in banishing her husband from the garden of delights and in condemning Christ to the torture of the Cross"—that is, by making it necessary for God to redeem mankind. In practice, however, this attitude could not be maintained, nor was it conducive to morality. The sexual behavior of the new noblemen and kings of Europe was often immoral, if not bestial; and the Church was not unwilling to foster the cult of the Virgin, which arose out of people's need for a gentle intermediary between themselves and Christ. The worship of Mary was expressed in pious poems, in tender legends, and in an entire cycle of French plays, The Miracles of the Virgin.

The later Middle Ages witnessed a marked improvement in woman's status. She was now respected and idealized, and from her new eminence she could exert a wholesome influence. Manners improved, and the entire etiquette of chivalry arose; it may have been excessive and artificial, but it served to counteract barbarism.

Even more important, however, was the social development that arose out of the economic organization of the Middle Ages. In time prosperous trading towns arose on the Baltic, North Sea, and Mediterranean coasts, and these were augmented by cities given over to both trade and industry in northern Italy, France, Flanders, and England. Large urban populations arose in the thirteenth century: Paris had 240,000 people; London 50,000; Florence, Venice, and Milan each had over 100,000. Many merchants were wealthier than the barons and indulged in luxuries envied by the aristocracy. Craftsmen, organized in craft associations known as guilds, became increasingly ingenious and prosperous, acquired pride of class, and struggled successfully with feudal overlords. A new middle class was born, a class that enlarged rapidly and was destined in time to substitute modern capitalist economy and democracy for feudalism. It was in these towns that the medieval theater became a notable institution, popularizing the Bible and secularizing its stories to such a degree that the biblical heroes were represented on the stage as medieval peasants and merchants.

In the twelfth century the medieval institution of serfdom began to collapse. Rumblings of protest stirred, for the serfs' lords were often capricious and selfish, and no allowances were made for bad seasons. Peasant revolts were so frequent that "Beware of the villein"⁴ became a common saying, and so this formerly innocent name for a serf assumed its modern meaning. Great estates were crumbling, for many barons died in the Crusades or bankrupted themselves with their incessant fighting and sold their land to merchants, or allowed serfs to purchase their freedom. Kings, who were beginning to count on commoners for support against the feudal aristocracy, and sympathetic townspeople helped the peasantry win its freedom, with the result that by the close of the thirteenth century large sections of the rural population enjoyed true independence. Within a generation, as a result of dynastic and national conflicts, many freemen were pushed back into serfdom by indebtedness and legalistic trickery. But the heaven of freedom continued to rise. Even when the peasants suffered such disasters as the brutal crushing of Wat Tyler's revolt in England and of the fierce revolt of the French peasantry known as the Jac- querie, their protest and their dream of human freedom and self-respect could not be suppressed. Democratic forces were released and made themselves felt in an increasing middle class and in a class of free farmers. Even in a military sense, the old feudal aristocracy could no longer remain unchallenged after the long-bow of the English yeoman overthrew the panoplied pomp of the French nobility during the Hundred Years War. What remained after the fifteenth century were feudal privileges, but political power passed into the hands of strong monarchs like the Tudors, and economic power into the shops and savings-accounts of the middle class.

This, in brief, is the story of the formative centuries of modern Europe; their literature reflects their diversified and complex life. The main trends of this literature fall into five classifications:

1. The literature of the Church, written in medieval Latin. This we have already considered in The Christian Church.

2. The myths and sagas of the Germanic tribes. These are of remote antiquity; they stem from the pre-Christian stage of the Germanic tribes, although they were written down largely during the Christian period. Much of this literature therefore has Christian elements, but these are largely superficial, and pagan customs and beliefs predominate. The zeal of Christian copyists preserved only a part of this literature; however, this remainder possesses a primitive directness and an epic force.

3. The myths and tales of the Celts, whose exotic literature was later incorporated into the romances of chivalry and transformed in the process. In its pure state, it is pagan and magical.

4. The literature of feudalism and chivalry. Its chief forms are: refined poetry written by courtly poets chiefly on love and woman-worship; such epics of chivalry (chansons de geste) as The Song of Roland; and romances like the numerous stories written about King Arthur and his knights.

5. The literature of the people, consisting of simple songs, ballads, and tales. The latter fall into two classes: pious stories or legends and fabliaux or humorous verse tales, mostly of roguery, which reflect the life of the peasant and merchant. The legends satisfied the hard-pressed commoner's need for religious consolation; the fabliaux, his desire for humor and the kind of release one finds in mockery. The legends were, in a sense, the romances of the downtrodden; the fabliaux, their literature of social protest.

Typical of the legends are the story of St. Hugh, the murdered Christian child who was pieced together and made whole by the Virgin, and the lovely tale of Our Lady's Tumbler. In this legend, a minstrel-acrobat enters a monastery; unable, because of ignorance, to recite the Latin prayers, the simple monk goes into the crypt and leaps and dances in honor of the Virgin, thereby winning sainthood.

Good fabliaux are: The Three Thieves, in which each thief outwits the other; The Divided Horse-cloth, in which an ungrateful son who drives off his aged father is promised similar treatment by his own son who has watched his behavior; and The Ass's Last Will and Testament, written by the French minstrel Rutebeuf who mocks the greed of the clergy.

Fairy tales and the story of Reynard the Fox, showing how cunning and craft may prevail against brute strength such as the nobles possessed, also belong to the literature of the people. In Reynard the Fox, we find the same spirit that animates the democratic fabliaux. Indeed, the democratic spirit even found its way into one of the episodes of so delicate a romance as Aucassin and Nicolette. In another romance of the eleventh century (Roman de Rose) the rebellious peasants who killed the bishop of Laon and burned the castles of their masters, declare: "We are men, we are men even as they are; such limbs as they have we have; as great bodies have we; and we can endure as much. Nothing fails us and we can endure as much. Nothing fails us but heart alone. Let us ally ourselves by oath. Let us defend our own and ourselves. Let us keep together, and if they wish to fight, we have against one knight thirty or forty peasants, vigorous and strong to fight."

Still another form of popular literature is the drama of the Middle Ages, which began in the Church and ended in the market-place. As it emerged out of an early liturgical form and began to be written in the vernaculars, the entire body of miracle plays about saints and the Virgin and "mystery plays" about biblical episodes became permeated with popular elements.

It is necessary to remember that the Middle Ages were no less complex than other eras, and that saga and romance are merely the wild and the cultivated flowers of a vast terrain.

GERMANIC MYTH AND SAGA

THE character of the medieval world was formed by the fusion of three racial elements—the Roman, the Celtic, and Germanic, of which the last was the most vigorous. It is true that the older non-Germanic population in many cases absorbed and transformed the Germanic invaders in western Europe, and that the Church modified their outlook and way of life. However, they did not lose their identity in Germany and Scandinavia, and they continued to harass the rest of Europe and to shape medieval history for many centuries.

Their warlike spirit permeated European life and literature. Their grim humor, violent passions, and glorification of brute courage retreated into the background only after chivalry had completely captivated the nobility, and after the rising middle class had thrust into the foreground the peaceful interests of trade and industry. Even the Teutonic superstitions and pagan rites held their own, in one form or another. They were retained in folk customs such as sword-dances, Christmas mummings, and Maypole dancing; in the widespread belief in demons during the Middle Ages; and in the Church itself, after it had accommodated itself to the traditions of the pagans it had converted. Thus, "the Christian commemoration of the tremendous drama of Calvary took even its name from Eastre, the gracious goddess of spring so well loved that her converted votaries would not have her degraded to the rank of a demon."¹

Germanic mythology managed to survive intact in Scandinavia and Iceland because it was there that Germanic culture remained least modified. Here the myths were regarded by the Christian converts as a great allegory of nature.

We may be grateful that this mythology was not destroyed with the advent of Christianity, for it has given us magnificent stories. The rugged poems that include these tales have the loftiness of the Northern mountain ridges; not merely a "greatness of mere body and gigantic bulk," as Carlyle says, "but a rude greatness of soul." European chivalry may have ignored or even forgotten them, but they remained intact throughout the Middle Ages. They were added to our heritage in the eighteenth century by romanticists like the compiler of British ballads, Bishop Percy, and the poet Thomas Gray.

The myths, so important to the understanding of the Germanic peoples that we include Bulfinch's account of them, were the common property of all the early German nations.

Linguistic scholars divide the Germanic stock into three large groups. The East Germanic or Gothic tribes were important during the final contest with the Roman Empire, but soon ceased to be an active force and eventually lost their identity.

North and west of the Goths were the West Germanic peoples. Of these the High Germanic branch has continued to occupy southern Germany, and its language has gradually spread over the whole of the present German Empire. The Low Germanic peoples are the Low Germans who live in northern Germany;² the old tribes of Angles, Saxons, and Jutes, who migrated to England in the fifth and sixth centuries; the Frisians and Dutch of Holland; and the Flemish inhabitants of Belgium. It should be noted that our English language belongs to this low Germanic branch.

The North Germanic, Norse, or Scandinavian group, consists of the Norwegians, Danes, Swedes, and Icelanders.

From about 900 to 1300, and even somewhat later, the Scandinavians evinced great industry in writing and produced the best Germanic poetry, especially in Iceland, which maintained close cultural contact with Scandinavia. These people, as early as the eighth century, had begun to disturb the peace of Europe. In several great waves of invasion covering some three centuries, they subdued large parts of England and Ireland and left an indelible imprint on Scotland. They settled Normandy in northern France and, after several generations in which they had become good Frenchmen, conquered the Anglo-Saxons in 1066 and took possession of England. Meantime they had occupied Iceland and had begun the development of a vigorous colony in that remote island. By 1000 they were exploring the shores of North America.

The literature produced by the Norse peoples is remarkable for vigor and intensity. It reflects a strong and adventurous race, superstitious, filled with thoughts of doom, and fond of their bard's (or skald's) recitals of actual adventures, to which were added numerous legendary details. They celebrate passion and heroism, are frequently cruel, and describe a world as hard as the northern winter.

Most characteristic of Norse writing are the poems of the *Elder Edda*³ (circa 900-1250). The Elder or Poetic Edda, which was recovered by an Icelandic bishop in 1643, is a collection of numerous poems, heroic legends, and moralistic statements. The poems must have been composed in different periods, since they vary in style and spirit; and many of them have come down to us in a fragmentary state. But they are invariably dignified and exalted, and the verses have one characteristic common to early Germanic poetry, namely, alliteration. There is a correspondence between the sound of words in the two halves of many of the lines, though rhyme is also used. Each line is divided into two halves by a pause (or cæsura), and contains two accented syllables, beginning with the same letter, and three or four unaccented ones.

The Elder Edda appears to have been created between 800 and 1100. It opens with the Völuspá or ¹ E. B. Osborne, The Middle Ages, p. 22. An interesting example of popular medieval mythology combining classic and Teutonic elements is to be found in the Tannhauser story, celebrated in opera by Richard Wagner. The Germanic goddess, Huld, was identified with Venus, who was degraded by medieval Christianity to the rank of a witch or enchantress. It is in this capacity that she seduced the minstrel and knight Tannhauser.

² Called Low Germans because they occupied the countries downstream. "Middle" High German, the literary language of much medieval literature, bears to modern German the same relationship that Chaucer's English (called "Middle English") bears to modern English.

³ The word Edda, which means great-grandmother, suggests the antiquity of the stories.

The Vision of the Prophetess, a kind of Norse Genesis, which describes the beginnings of the world and its doom. Another group of poems, Hávamál or The Sayings of the High One, is a book of proverbs concerning social conduct and morals. A whole cycle of heroic poems contains the old Norse version of the Siegfried story which later appeared in the German poem the Nibelungenlied and in Wagner's operatic cycle, The Ring of the Nibelungs. These are vividly descriptive and show remarkable penetration into human feeling and motivation. Our selections, The Short Lay of Sigurd and The Hell-Ride of Brynhild, correspond to the story told in Wagner's opera Götterdämmerung (The Dusk of the Gods).

A somewhat later type of writing is the court poetry of the skalds or court minstrels. It differs in a number of respects from Eddic verse. It is not anonymous but the work of known poets. The Eddic poems present Norse mythology, heroic love, and ethics; skaldic poetry celebrates kings and chieftains. The former is simple, the other, intricate and full of poetic diction, abounding in far-fetched metaphorical expressions (known as kennings). In the original, the form of the poems is elaborate and complicated, for the skalds were not only master narrators but skilled versifiers.

A third form of Norse literature is the great body of Icelandic sagas (stories), historical and biographical prose narratives, mingled with fiction or entirely fictitious. Written between the twelfth and fifteenth centuries, the sagas were the outgrowth of a long oral tradition. Story-tellers or "saga-men" were popular in Iceland because they furnished the chief form of entertainment, but they did not, as a rule, attach their names to their tales. The sagas are sheer narrative writing, objective instead of moralizing, and admirably concise. The stories are carefully constructed, the characters sharply etched, being revealed through action and speech. Most of the stories are intensely tragic, although one of the best (the Bandamanna) is a rollicking satire on Icelandic political leaders.

Poets in Germany also enriched medieval literature, but their contributions were in no case as original as those made by the Scandinavians. After 1150, German literature began to flourish under the influence of Christianity, chivalry, and French lyricism and romance. Its outstanding epic, the Nibelungenlied (c. 1200), retells the old Norse tale of Sigurd, with Christian and chivalric coloring. The Norse warrior, Sigurd, is here the medieval knight, Sir Siegfried; the Valkyrie Brunhilde (Brynhild in the Norse poems), whom he wooed and abandoned and who encompassed his destruction, is considerably tamed in the German version, and is deprived of all supernatural qualities except her strength. Siegfried's wife Kriemhilde, before his murder makes her vengeful, is a courtly lady.

When these epics came to be written down, Germany was also witnessing the flowering of some folk poetry and of excellent lyric poetry known as Minnesong, written under the influence of the poetry of southern France. This movement produced many lyric poets, among whom there were some who brought freshness and depth to love poetry. Still, it is the epic writings of Germanic peoples that made the greatest impression on English literature, and their pristine spirit is best exemplified by the Norse heroic poems. They are not only the original storehouse of Germanic myth, but a universal poetry, revealing elemental conceptions and passions never wholly absent in man.

STORIES FROM NORSE MYTHOLOGY

Thor's Visit to Jotunheim

One day the god Thor, with his servant Thialfi, and accompanied by Loki, set out on a journey to the giant's country. Thialfi was of all men the swiftest of foot. He bore Thor's wallet, containing their provisions. When night came on they found themselves in an immense forest, and searched on all sides for a place where they might pass the night, and at last came to a very large hall, with an entrance that took the whole breadth of one end of the building. Here they lay down to sleep, but towards midnight were alarmed by an earthquake which shook the whole edifice. Thor, rising up, called on his companions to seek with him a place of safety. On the right they found an adjoining chamber, into which the others entered, but Thor remained at the doorway with his mallet in his hand, prepared to defend himself, whatever might happen. A terrible groaning was heard during the night, and at dawn of day Thor went out and found lying near him a huge giant, who slept and snored in the way that had alarmed them so. It is said that for once Thor was afraid to use his mallet, and as the giant soon waked up, Thor contented himself with simply asking his name.

"My name is Skrymir," said the giant, "but I need not ask thy name, for I know that thou art the god Thor. But what has become of my glove?" Thor then perceived that what they had taken ¹⁰ overnight for a hall was the giant's glove, and the chamber where his two companions had sought refuge was the thumb. Skrymir then proposed that they should travel in company, and Thor consenting, they sat down to eat their breakfast, and when they had done, Skrymir packed all the provisions into one wallet, threw it over his shoulder, and strode on before them, taking such tremendous strides that they were hard put to it to keep up with him. So they traveled the whole day, and ²⁰ at dusk Skrymir chose a place for them to pass the night in under a large oak tree. Skrymir then told them he would lie down to sleep. "But take ye the wallet," he added, "and prepare your supper."

Skrymir soon fell asleep and began to snore strongly; but when Thor tried to open the wallet, he found the giant had tied it up so tight he could not untie a single knot. At last Thor became wroth, and grasping his mallet with both hands he ³⁰ struck a furious blow on the giant's head. Skrymir, awakening, merely asked whether a leaf had not fallen on his head, and whether they had supped and were ready to go to sleep. Thor answered that they were just going to sleep, and so saying went and laid himself down under another tree. But sleep came not that night to Thor, and when Skrymir snored again so loud that the forest re-echoed with the noise, he arose, and grasping his mallet launched it with such force at the giant's ⁴⁰ skull that it made a deep dint in it. Skrymir, awakening, cried out, "What's the matter? Are there any birds perched on this tree? I felt some moss from the branches fall on my head. How fares it with thee, Thor?" But Thor went away hastily, saying that he had just then awoke, and that it was only midnight, there was still time for sleep. He, however, resolved that if he had an opportunity of striking a third blow, it should settle all matters between them. A little before daybreak he ⁵⁰ perceived that Skrymir was again fast asleep, and again grasping his mallet, he dashed it with such violence that it forced its way into the giant's skull up to the handle. But Skrymir sat up, and stroking his cheek said, "An acorn fell on my head. What! Art thou awake, Thor? Methinks it is time for us to get up and dress ourselves; but you have not now a long way before you to the city called Utgard. I have heard you whispering to one another that I am not a man of small dimensions; but if you come to Utgard you will see there many men much taller than I. Wherefore I advise you, when you come there, not to make too much of yourselves, for the followers of Utgard-Loki will not brook the boasting of such little fellows as you are. You must take the road that leads eastward, mine lies northward, so we must part here."

Hereupon he threw his wallet over his shoulders and turned away from them into the forest, and Thor had no wish to stop him or to ask for any more of his company.

Thor and his companions proceeded on their way, and towards noon descried a city standing in the middle of a plain. It was so lofty that they were obliged to bend their necks quite far back on their shoulders in order to see to the top of it. On arriving they entered the city, and seeing a large palace before them with the door wide open, they went in, and found a number of men of prodigious stature, sitting on benches in the hall. Going further, they came before the king, Utgard-Loki, whom they saluted with great respect. The king, regarding them with a scornful smile, said, "If I do not mistake me, that stripling yonder must be the god Thor." Then addressing himself to Thor, he said, "Perhaps thou mayst be more than thou appearest to be. What are the feats that thou and thy fellows deem yourselves skilled in, for no one is permitted to remain here who does not, in some feat or other, excel all other men?"

"The feat that I know," said Loki, "is to eat quicker than anyone else, and in this I am ready to give a proof against anyone here who may choose to compete with me."

"That will indeed be a feat," said Utgard-Loki, "if thou performest what thou promisest, and it shall be tried forthwith."

He then ordered one of his men who was sitting at the farther end of the bench, and whose name was Logi, to come forward and try his skill with Loki. A trough filled with meat having been set on the hall floor, Loki placed himself at one end, and Logi at the other, and each of them began to eat as fast as he could, until they met in the middle of the trough. But it was found that Loki had only eaten the flesh, while his adversary had devoured both flesh and bone, and the trough to boot. All the company therefore adjudged that Loki was vanquished.

Utgard-Loki then asked what feat the young man who accompanied Thor could perform. Thialfi answered that he would run a race with anyone who might be matched against him. The king observed that skill in running was something to boast of, but if the youth would win the match he must display great agility. He then arose and went with all who were present to a plain where there was good ground for running on, and calling a young man named Hugi, bade him run a match with Thialfi. In the first course Hugi so much outstripped his competitor that he turned back and met him not far from the starting place. Then they ran a second and a third time, but Thialfi met with no better success.

Utgard-Loki then asked Thor in what feats he would choose to give proofs of that prowess for which he was so famous. Thor answered that he would try a drinking-match with anyone. Utgard-Loki bade his cupbearer bring the large horn which his followers were obliged to empty when they had trespassed in any way against the law of the feast. The cupbearer having presented it to Thor, Utgard-Loki said, "Whoever is a good drinker will empty that horn at a single draught, though most men make two of it, but the most puny drinker can do it in three."

Thor looked at the horn, which seemed of no extraordinary size though somewhat long; however, as he was very thirsty, he set it to his lips, and without drawing breath, pulled as long and as deeply as he could, that he might not be obliged to make a second draught of it; but when he set the horn down and looked in, he could scarcely perceive that the liquor was diminished.

After taking breath, Thor went to it again with all his might, but when he took the horn from his mouth, it seemed to him that he had drunk rather less than before, although the horn could now be carried without spilling.

"How now, Thor?" said Utgard-Loki; "thou must not spare thyself; if thou meanest to drain the horn at the third draught thou must pull deeply; and I must needs say that thou wilt not be called so mighty a man here as thou art at home if thou showest no greater prowess in other feats than methinks will be shown in this."

Thor, full of wrath, again set the horn to his lips, and did his best to empty it; but on looking in found the liquor was only a little lower, so he resolved to make no further attempt, but gave back the horn to the cupbearer.

"I now see plainly," said Utgard-Loki, "that thou art not quite so stout as we thought thee: but wilt thou try any other feat, though methinks thou art not likely to bear any prize away with thee hence."

"What new trial hast thou to propose?" said Thor.

"We have a very trifling game here," answered Utgard-Loki, "in which we exercise none but children. It consists in merely lifting my cat from the ground; nor should I have dared to mention such a feat to the great Thor if I had not already observed that thou art by no means what we took thee for."

As he finished speaking, a large gray cat sprang on the hall floor. Thor put his hand under the cat's belly and did his utmost to raise him from the floor, but the cat, bending his back, had, notwithstanding all Thor's efforts, only one of his feet lifted up, seeing which Thor made no further attempt.

"This trial has turned out," said Utgard-Loki, "just as I imagined it would. The cat is large, but Thor is little in comparison to our men."

"Little as ye call me," answered Thor, "let me see who among you will come hither now I am in wrath and wrestle with me."

"I see no one here," said Utgard-Loki, looking at the men sitting on the benches, "who would not think it beneath him to wrestle with thee; let somebody, however, call hither that old crone, my nurse Elli, and let Thor wrestle with her if he will. She has thrown to the ground many a man not less strong than this Thor is."

A toothless old woman then entered the hall, and was told by Utgard-Loki to take hold of Thor. The tale is shortly told. The more Thor tightened his hold on the crone the firmer she stood. At length after a very violent struggle Thor began to lose his footing, and was finally brought down upon one knee. Utgard-Loki then told them to desist, adding that Thor had now no occasion to ask anyone else in the hall to wrestle with him, and it was also getting late; so he showed Thor and his companions to their seats, and they passed the night there in good cheer.

The next morning, at break of day, Thor and his companions dressed themselves and prepared for their departure. Utgard-Loki ordered a table to be set for them, on which there was no lack of victuals or drink. After the repast Utgard-Loki led them to the gate of the city, and on parting asked Thor how he thought his journey had turned out, and whether he had met with any men stronger than himself. Thor told him that he could not deny but that he had brought great shame on himself. "And what grieves me most," he added, "is that ye will call me a person of little worth."

"Nay," said Utgard-Loki, "it behooves me to tell thee the truth, now thou art out of the city, which ¹⁰ so long as I live and have my way thou shalt never enter again. And, by my troth, had I known beforehand that thou hadst so much strength in thee, and wouldst have brought me so near to a great mishap, I would not have suffered thee to enter this time. Know then that I have all along deceived thee by my illusions; first in the forest, where I tied up the wallet with iron wire so that thou couldst not untie it. After this thou gavest me three blows with thy mallet; the first, though ²⁰ the least, would have ended my days had it fallen on me, but I slipped aside and thy blows fell on the mountain, where thou wilt find three glens, one of them remarkably deep. These are the dints made by thy mallet. I have made use of similar illusions in the contests you have had with my followers. In the first, Loki, like hunger itself, devoured all that was set before him, but Logi was in reality nothing else than Fire, and therefore consumed not only the meat, but the trough which ³⁰ held it. Hugi, with whom Thialfi contended in running, was Thought, and it was impossible for Thialfi to keep pace with that. When thou in thy turn didst attempt to empty the horn, thou didst perform, by my troth, a deed so marvelous that had I not seen it myself I should never have believed it. For one end of that horn reached the sea, which thou wast not aware of, but when thou comest to the shore thou wilt perceive how much the sea has sunk by thy draughts. Thou didst per- ⁴⁰ form a feat no less wonderful by lifting up the cat, and to tell thee the truth, when we saw that one of his paws was off the floor, we were all of us terror-stricken, for what thou tookest for a cat was in reality the Midgard serpent that encompasseth the earth, and he was so stretched by thee that he was barely long enough to enclose it between his head and tail. Thy wrestling with Elli was also a most astonishing feat, for there was never yet a man, nor ever will be, whom Old Age, for such in ⁵⁰ fact was Elli, will not sooner or later lay low. But now, as we are going to part, let me tell thee that it will be better for both of us if thou never come near me again, for shouldst thou do so, I shall again defend myself by other illusions, so that thou wilt only lose thy labor and get no fame from the contest with me."

On hearing these words Thor in a rage laid hold of his mallet and would have launched it at him, but Utgard-Loki had disappeared, and when Thor would have returned to the city to destroy it, he found nothing around him but a verdant plain.

The Death of Baldur

Baldur the Good, having been tormented with terrible dreams indicating that his life was in peril, told them to the assembled gods, who resolved to conjure all things to avert from him the threatened danger. Then Frigga, the wife of Odin, exacted an oath from fire and water, from iron and all other metals, from stones, trees, diseases, beasts, birds, ¹⁰ poisons, and creeping things, that none of them would do any harm to Baldur. Odin, not satisfied with all this, and feeling alarmed for the fate of his son, determined to consult the prophetess Angerbode, a giantess, mother of Fenris, Hela, and the Midhard serpent. She was dead, and Odin was forced to seek her in Hela's dominions. This Descent of Odin forms the subject of Gray's fine ode beginning:

Uprose the king of men with speed
And saddled straight his coal-black steed.

But the other gods, feeling that what Frigga had done was quite sufficient, amused themselves with using Baldur as a mark, some hurling darts at him, some stones, while others hewed at him with their swords and battle-axes; for do what they would, none of them could harm him. And this became a favorite pastime with them and was regarded as an honor shown to Baldur. But when Loki beheld ¹⁰ the scene he was sorely vexed that Baldur was not hurt. Assuming, therefore, the shape of a woman, he went to Fensalir, the mansion of Frigga. That goddess, when she saw the pretended woman, inquired of her if she knew what the gods were doing at their meetings. She replied that they were throwing darts and stones at Baldur, without being able to hurt him. "Aye," said Frigga, "neither stones, nor sticks, nor anything else can hurt Baldur, for I have exacted an oath from all of ²⁰ them." "What," exclaimed the woman, "have all things sworn to spare Baldur?" "All things," replied Frigga, "except one little shrub that grows on the eastern side of Valhalla, and is called Mistletoe, and which I thought too young and feeble to crave an oath from."

As soon as Loki heard this he went away, and resuming his natural shape, cut off the mistletoe, and repaired to the place where the gods were assembled. There he found Hodur standing apart, without partaking of the sports, on account of his blindness, and going up to him, said, "Why dost thou not also throw something at Baldur?"

"Because I am blind," answered Hodur, "and see not where Baldur is, and have, moreover, nothing to throw."

"Come, then," said Loki, "do like the rest, and show honor to Baldur by throwing this twig at him, and I will direct thy arm towards the place where he stands."

Hodur then took the mistletoe, and under the guidance of Loki, darted it at Baldur, who, pierced through and through, fell down lifeless. Surely never was there witnessed, either among gods or men, a more atrocious deed than this. When Baldur fell, the gods were struck speechless with horror, and then they looked at each other, and all were of one mind to lay hands on him who had done the deed, but they were obliged to delay their vengeance out of respect for the sacred place where they were assembled. They gave vent to their grief by loud lamentations. When the gods came to themselves, Frigga asked who among them wished to gain all her love and good will. "For this," said she, "shall he have who will ride to Hel and offer Hela a ransom if she will let Baldur return to Asgard." Whereupon Hermod, surnamed the Nimble, the son of Odin, offered to undertake the journey. Odin's horse, Sleipnir, which has eight legs and can outrun the wind, was then led forth, on which Hermod mounted and galloped away on his mission. For the space of nine days and as many nights he rode through deep glens so dark that he could not discern anything, until he arrived at the river Gyoll, which he passed over on a bridge covered with glittering gold. The maiden who kept the bridge asked him his name and lineage, telling him that the day before five bands of dead persons had ridden over the bridge, and did not shake it as much as he alone. "But," she added, "thou hast not death's hue on thee; why then ridest thou here on the way to Hel?"

"I ride to Hel," answered Hermod, "to seek Baldur. Hast thou perchance seen him pass this way?"

She replied, "Baldur hath ridden over Gyoll's bridge, and yonder lieth the way he took to the abodes of death."

Hermod pursued his journey until he came to the barred gates of Hel. Here he alighted, girthed his saddle tighter, and remounting clapped both spurs to his horse, who cleared the gate by a tremendous leap without touching it. Hermod then rode on to the palace, where he found his brother Baldur occupying the most distinguished seat in the hall, and passed the night in his company. The next morning he besought Hela to let Baldur ride home with him, assuring her that nothing but lamentations were to be heard among the gods. Hela answered that it should now be tried whether Baldur was so beloved as he was said to be. "If, therefore," she added, "all things in the world, both living and lifeless, weep for him, then shall he return to life; but if any one thing speak against him or refuse to weep, he shall be kept in Hel."

Hermod then rode back to Asgard and gave an account of all he had heard and witnessed.

The gods upon this despatched messengers throughout the world to beg everything to weep in order that Baldur might be delivered from Hel. All things very willingly complied with this request, both men and every other living being, as well as earths, and stones, and trees, and metals, just as we have all seen these things weep when they are brought from a cold place into a hot one. As the messengers were returning they found an old hag named Thaukt sitting in a cavern, and begged her to weep Baldur out of Hel. But she answered:

Thaukt will wail
With dry tears
Baldur's bale-fire.
Let Hela keep her own.

It was strongly suspected that this hag was no other than Loki himself, who never ceased to work evil among gods and men. So Baldur was prevented from coming back to Asgard.

The Funeral of Baldur

The gods took up the dead body and bore it to the seashore where stood Baldur's ship Hringham, which passed for the largest in the world. Baldur's dead body was put on the funeral pile, on board the ship, and his wife Nanna was so struck with grief at the sight that she broke her heart, and her body was burned on the same pile with her husband's. There was a vast concourse of various kinds of people at Baldur's obsequies. First came Odin accompanied by Frigga, the Valkyrior, and his ravens; then Frey in his car drawn by Gullinbursti, the boar; Heimdall rode his horse Gulltopp, and Freya drove in her chariot drawn by cats. There were also a great many Frost giants and giants of the mountain present. Baldur's horse was led to the pile fully caparisoned and consumed in the same flames with his master.

But Loki did not escape his deserved punishment. When he saw how angry the gods were, he fled to the mountain, and there built himself a hut with four doors, so that he could see every approaching danger. He invented a net to catch the fishes, such as fishermen have used since his time. But Odin found out his hiding-place and the gods assembled to take him. He, seeing this, changed himself into a salmon, and lay hid among the stones of the brook. But the gods took his net and dragged the brook, and Loki, finding he must be caught, tried to leap over the net; but Thor caught him by the tail and compressed it, so that salmons ever since have had that part remarkably fine and thin. They bound him with chains and suspended a serpent over his head, whose venom falls upon his face drop by drop. His wife Siguna sits by his side and catches the drops as they fall, in a cup; but when she carries it away to empty it, the venom falls upon Loki, which makes him howl with horror, and twist his body about so violently that the whole earth shakes, and this produces what men call earthquakes.

The Elves

The Edda mentions another class of beings, inferior to the gods, but still possessed of great power; these were called Elves. The white spirits, or Elves of Light, were exceedingly fair, more brilliant than the sun, and clad in garments of a delicate and transparent texture. They loved the light, were kindly disposed to mankind, and generally appeared as fair and lovely children. Their country was called Alfheim, and was the domain of Freyr, the god of the sun, in whose light they were always sporting.

The black or Night Elves were a different kind of creatures. Ugly, long-nosed dwarfs, of a dirty brown color, they appeared only at night, for they avoided the sun as their most deadly enemy, because whenever his beams fell upon any of them they changed them immediately into stones. Their language was the echo of solitudes, and their dwelling-places subterranean caves and clefts. They were supposed to have come into existence as maggots produced by the decaying flesh of Ymir's body, and were afterwards endowed by the gods with a human form and great understanding. They were particularly distinguished for a knowledge of the mysterious powers of nature, and for the runes which they carved and explained. They were the most skillful artificers of all created beings, and worked in metals and in wood. Among their most noted works were Thor's hammer, and the ship Skidbladnir, which they gave to Freyr, and which was so large that it could contain all the deities with their war and household implements, but so skillfully was it wrought that when folded together it could be put into a side pocket.

Ragnarok, the Twilight of the Gods

It was a firm belief of the northern nations that a time would come when all the visible creation, the gods of Valhalla and Niffleheim, the inhabitants of Jotunheim, Alfheim, and Midgard, together with their habitations, would be destroyed. The fearful day of destruction will not, however, be without its forerunners. First will come a triple winter, during which snow will fall from the four corners of the heavens, the frost be very severe, the wind piercing, the weather tempestuous, and the sun impart no gladness. Three such winters will pass away without being tempered by a single summer. Three other similar winters will then follow, during which war and discord will spread over the universe. The earth itself will be frightened and begin to tremble, the sea leave its basin, the heavens tear asunder, and men perish in great numbers, and the eagles of the air feast upon their still quivering bodies. The wolf Fenris will now break his bands, the Midgard serpent rise out of her bed in the sea, and Loki, released from his bonds, will join the enemies of the gods. Amidst the general devastation the sons of Muspelheim will rush forth under their leader Surtur, before and behind whom are flames and burning fire. Onward they ride over Bifrost, the rainbow bridge, which breaks under the horses' hoofs. But they, disregarding its fall, direct their course to the battlefield called Vigrid. Thither also repair the wolf Fenris, the Midgard serpent, Loki with all the followers of Hela, and the Frost giants.

Heimdall now stands up and sounds the Giallar horn to assemble the gods and heroes for the contest. The gods advance, led on by Odin, who engages the wolf Fenris, but falls a victim to the monster, who is, however, slain by Vidar, Odin's son. Thor gains great renown by killing the Midgard serpent, but recoils and falls dead, suffocated with the venom which the dying monster vomits over him. Loki and Heimdall meet and fight till they are both slain. The gods and their enemies having fallen in battle, Surtur, who has killed Freyr, darts fire and flames over the world, and ¹⁰ together.

the whole universe is burned up. The sun becomes dim, the earth sinks into the ocean, the stars fall from heaven, and time is no more.

After this Alfadur (the Almighty) will cause a new heaven and a new earth to arise out of the sea. The new earth filled with abundant supplies will spontaneously produce its fruits without labor or care. Wickedness and misery will no more be known, but the gods and men will live happily

Miscellaneous Norse Mythology

According to the Eddas there was once no heaven above nor earth beneath, but only a bottomless deep, and a world of mist in which flowed a fountain. Twelve rivers issued from this fountain, and when they had flowed far from their source, they froze into ice, and one layer accumulating over another, the great deep was filled up.

Southward from the world of mist was the world of light. From this flowed a warm wind upon the ice and melted it. The vapors rose in the air and ¹⁰ formed clouds, from which sprang Ymir, the Frost giant and his progeny, and the cow Audhumbla, whose milk afforded nourishment and food to the giant. The cow got nourishment by licking the hoar frost and salt from the ice. While she was one day licking the salt stones there appeared at first the hair of a man, on the second day the whole head, and on the third the entire form endowed with beauty, agility, and power. This new being was a god, from whom and his wife, a daughter of ²⁰ the giant race, sprang the three brothers Odin, Vili, and Ve. They slew the giant Ymir, and out of his body formed the earth, of his blood the seas, of his bones the mountains, of his hair the trees, of his skull the heavens, and of his brain clouds, charged with hail and snow. Of Ymir's eyebrows the gods formed Midgard (mid earth), destined to become the abode of man.

Odin then regulated the periods of day and night and the seasons by placing in the heavens the sun ³⁰ and moon, and appointing to them their respective courses. As soon as the sun began to shed its rays upon the earth, it caused the vegetable world to bud and sprout. Shortly after the gods had created the world they walked by the side of the sea, pleased with their new work, but found that it was still incomplete, for it was without human beings. They therefore took an ash tree and made a man out of it, and they made a woman out of an alder, and called the man Aske and the woman Embla. Odin then gave them life and soul, Vili reason and motion, and Ve bestowed upon them the senses, expressive features, and speech. Midgard was then given them as their residence, and they became the progenitors of the human race.

The mighty ash tree Ygdrasil was supposed to support the whole universe. It sprang from the body of Ymir, and had three immense roots, extending one into Asgard (the dwelling of the gods), the other into Jotunheim (the abode of the giants), and the third to Niflheim (the regions of darkness and cold). By the side of each of these roots is a spring, from which it is watered. The root that extends into Asgard is carefully tended by the three Norns, goddesses, who are regarded as the dispensers of fate. They are Urdur (the past), Verdandi (the present), Skuld (the future). The ⁴⁰ spring at the Jotunheim side is Ymir's well, in which wisdom and wit lie hidden, but that of Niflheim feeds the adder Nidhogge (darkness), which perpetually gnaws at the root. Four harts run across the branches of the tree and bite the buds; they represent the four winds. Under the tree lies Ymir, and when he tries to shake off its weight the earth quakes.

Asgard is the name of the abode of the gods, access to which is only gained by crossing the bridge Bifrost (the rainbow). Asgard consists of golden and silver palaces, the dwellings of the gods, but the most beautiful of these is Valhalla, the residence of Odin. When seated on his throne he overlooks all heaven and earth. Upon his shoulders are the ravens Hugin and Munin, who fly every day over the whole world, and on their return report to him all they have seen and heard. At his feet lie his two wolves, Geri and Freki, to whom Odin gives all the meat that is set before him, for he himself stands in no need of food. Mead is for him both food and drink. He invented the Runic characters, and it is the business of the Norns to engrave the runes of fate upon a metal shield. From Odin's name, spelt Woden, as it sometimes is, came Wednesday, the name of the fourth day of the week.

Odin is frequently called Alfdaur (All-father), but this name is sometimes used in a way that shows that the Scandinavians had an idea of a deity superior to Odin, uncreated and eternal.

Of the Joys of Valhalla

Valhalla is the great hall of Odin, wherein he feasts with his chosen heroes, all those who have fallen bravely in battle, for all who die a peaceful death are excluded. The flesh of the boar Schrimnir is served up to them, and is abundant for all. For although this boar is cooked every morning, he becomes whole again every night. For drink the heroes are supplied abundantly with mead from the she-goat Heidrum. When the heroes are not feasting they amuse themselves with fighting. Every day they ride out into the court or field and fight until they cut each other in pieces. This is their pastime; but when meal time comes they recover from their wounds and return to feast in Valhalla.

The Valkyrior

The Valkyrior are warlike virgins, mounted upon horses and armed with helmets and spears. Odin, who is desirous to collect a great many heroes in Valhalla, to be able to meet the giants in a day when the final contest must come, sends down to every battlefield to make choice of those who shall be slain. The Valkyrior are his messengers, and their name means "Choosers of the slain." When they ride forth on their errand, their armor sheds a strange flickering light, which flashes up over the northern skies, making what men call the "Aurora Borealis," or "Northern Lights."¹

Of Thor and the Other Gods

Thor, the thunderer, Odin's eldest son, is the strongest of gods and men, and possesses three very precious things. The first is a hammer, which both the Frost and the Mountain giants know to their cost, when they see it hurled against them in the air, for it has split many a skull of their fathers and kindred. When thrown, it returns to his hand of its own accord. The second rare thing he possesses is called the belt of strength. When he girds it about him his divine might is doubled. The third, also very precious, is his iron gloves, which he puts on whenever he would use his mallet efficiently. From Thor's name is derived our word Thursday.

Frey is one of the most celebrated of the gods. He presides over rain and sunshine and all the fruits of the earth. His sister Freya is the most propitious of the goddesses. She loves music, spring, and flowers, and is particularly fond of the Elves (fairies). She is very fond of love ditties, and all lovers would do well to invoke her.

Bragi is the god of poetry, and his song records the deeds of warriors. His wife, Iduna, keeps in a box the apples which the gods, when they feel old age approaching, have only to taste of to become young again.

²⁰ Heimdall is the watchman of the gods, and is therefore placed on the borders of heaven to prevent the giants from forcing their way over the bridge Bifrost (the rainbow). He requires less sleep than a bird, and sees by night as well as by day a hundred miles around him. So acute is his ear that no sound escapes him, for he can even hear the grass grow and the wool on a sheep's back.

Of Loki and His Progeny

³⁰ There is another deity who is described as the calumniator of the gods and the contriver of all fraud and mischief. His name is Loki. He is handsome and well made, but of a very fickle mood and most evil disposition. He is of the giant race, but forced himself into the company of the gods, and seems to take pleasure in bringing them into difficulties, and in extricating them out of the danger by his cunning, wit and skill. Loki has three children. The first is the wolf Fenris, the second the ⁴⁰ Midgard serpent, the third Hela (Death). The gods were not ignorant that these monsters were growing up, and that they would one day bring much evil upon gods and men. So Odin deemed it advisable to send one to bring them to him. When they came he threw the serpent into that deep ocean by which the earth is surrounded. But the monster had grown to such an enormous size that holding his tail in his mouth he encircles the whole earth. Hela he cast into Niffleheim, and gave her power over nine worlds or regions, into which she distributes those who are sent to her; that is, all who die of sickness or old age. Her hall is called

Elvidner. Hunger is her table, Starvation her knife, Delay her man, Slowness her maid, Precipice her threshold, Care her bed, and Burning Anguish forms the hangings of the apartments. She may easily be recognized, for her body is half flesh color and half blue, and she has a dreadfully stern and forbidding countenance.

The wolf Fenris gave the gods a great deal of trouble before they succeeded in chaining him. He broke the strongest fetters as if they were made of cobwebs. Finally the gods sent a messenger to the mountain spirits, who made for them the chain called Gleipnir. It is fashioned of six things, viz., the noise made by the footfall of a cat, the beards of women, the roots of stones, the breath of fishes, the nerves (sensibilities) of bears, and the spittle of birds. When finished it was as smooth and soft as a silken string. But when the gods asked the wolf to suffer himself to be bound with this apparently slight ribbon, he suspected their design, fearing that it was made by enchantment. He therefore only consented to be bound with it upon condition that one of the gods put his hand in his (Fenris's) mouth as a pledge that the band was to be removed again. Tyr (the god of battles) alone had courage enough to do this. But when the wolf found that he could not break his fetters, and that the gods would not release him, he bit off Tyr's hand, and he has ever since remained one-handed.

THE LAY CALLED THE SHORT LAY OF SIGURD

Sigurd of yore,
Sought the dwelling of Giuki,
As he fared, the young Volsung,¹
After fight won;²

Troth he took
From the two brethren;
Oath swore they betwixt them,
Those bold ones of deed.

A may³ they gave to him
And wealth manifold,
Gudrun the young,
Giuki's daughter:
They drank and gave doom⁴
Many days together,
Sigurd the young,
And the sons of Giuki.

Until they wended
For Brynhild's wooing,
Sigurd a-riding
Amidst their rout;
The wise young Volsung
Who knew of all ways—
Ah! he had wed her,
Had fate so willed it.

Southlander Sigurd
A naked sword,
Bright, well grinded,
Laid betwixt them;
No kiss he won
From the fair woman,

Nor in arms of his
Did the Hun King⁵ hold her,
Since he gat the young maid
For the son of Giuki.

No lack in her life
She wotted⁶ of now,
And at her death-day
No dreadful thing
For a shame indeed
Or a shame in seeming;
But about and betwixt
Went baleful fate.

Alone, abroad,
She sat of an evening,
Of full many things
She fell a-talking:
"O for my Sigurd!
I shall have death,
Or my fair, my lovely,
Laid in mine arms.

"For the word once spoken,
I sorrow sorely—
His queen is Gudrun,
I am wed to Gunnar;
The dread Norns wrought for us
A long while of woe."

Oft with heart deep
In dreadful thoughts,
O'er ice-fields and ice-hills
She fared a-night time,

When he and Gudrun
Were gone to their fair bed,
And Sigurd wrapped
The bed-gear round her.

"Ah! now the Hun King
His queen in arms holdeth,
While love I go lacking,
And all things longed for
With no delight
But in dreadful thought."

These dreadful things
Thrust her toward murder:
—"Listen, Gunnar,
For thou shalt lose
My wide lands,
Yea, me myself!
Never love I my life,
With thee for my lord—

"I will fare back thither
From whence I came,
To my highest kin
And those that know me
There shall I sit
Sleeping my life away,
Unless thou slayest
Sigurd the Hun King,
Making thy might more
E'en than his might was!

"Yea, let the son fare
After the father,

Translated by William Morris and Erik Magnusson. ¹ Sigurd's grandfather was Volsung.
² the fight with the dragon Fafnir. ³ maid. ⁴ judgment. ⁵ Sigurd. ⁶ knew.

And no young wolf
A long while nourish!
For on each man lieth
Vengeance lighter,
And peace shall be surer
If the son live not."

Adrad⁷ was Gunnar,
Heavy-hearted was he,
And in doubtful mood
Day-long he sat.
For naught he wotted,
Nor might see clearly
What was the seemliest
Of deeds to set hand to;
What of all deeds
Was best to be done:
For he minded the vows
Sworn to the Volsung,
And the sore wrong
To be wrought against Sigurd.
Wavered his mind
A weary while,
No wont it was
Of those days worn by,
That queens should flee
From the realms of their kings.

"Brynhild to me
Is better than all,
The child of Budli
Is the best of women.
Yea, and my life
Will I lay down,
Ere I am twinned⁸
From that woman's treasure."

He bade call Hogni
To the place where he bided;
With all the trust that might be,
Trowed⁹ he in him.

"Wilt thou bewray Sigurd
For his wealth's sake?—
Good it is to rule
O'er the Rhine's metal;
And well content
Great wealth to wield,
Biding in peace
And blissful days."

One thing alone Hogni
Had for an answer:

"Such doings for us
Are naught seemly to do;
To rend with sword
Oaths once sworn,
Oaths once sworn,
And troth once plighted.

"Nor know we on mould,
Men of happier days,
The while we four
Rule over the folk;
While the bold in battle,
The Hun King, bides living.

"And no nobler kin
Shall be known afield,
If our five sons
We long may foster;
Yea, a goodly stem
Shall surely wax.
—But I clearly see
In what wise it standeth,
Brynhild's sore urging O'ermuch on thee beareth.

"Guttorm shall we
Get for the slaying,
Our younger brother
Bare of wisdom;
For he was out of
All the oaths sworn,
All the oaths sworn,
And the plighted troth."

Easy to rouse him
Who of naught reckoneth!
—Deep stood the sword
In the heart of Sigurd.
There, in the hall,
Gat the high-hearted vengeance;
For he cast his sword
At the reckless slayer:
Out at Guttorm
Flew Gram the mighty,
The gleaming steel
From Sigurd's hand.

Down fell the slayer
Smitten asunder;
The heavy head
And the hands fell one way,
But the feet and such like
Aback where they stood.

Gudrun was sleeping
Soft in the bed,

Empty of sorrow
By the side of Sigurd:
When she awoke
With all pleasure gone,
Swimming in blood
Of Frey's beloved.

So sore her hands
She smote together,
That the great-hearted
Gat raised in bed;
—"O Gudrun, weep not
So woefully,
Sweet lovely bride,
For thy brethren live for thee!

"A young child have I
For heritor;
Too young to win forth
From the house of his foes.—
Black deeds and ill
Have they been a-doing,
Evil rede¹⁰
Have they wrought at last.

"Late, late, rideth with them
Unto the Thing,¹¹
Such sister's son,
Though seven thou bear,—
—But well I wot
Which way all goeth;
Alone wrought Brynhild
This bale against us.

"That maiden loved me
Far before all men,
Yet wrong to Gunnar
I never wrought;
Brotherhood I heeded
And all bounden oaths,
That none should deem me
His queen's darling."

Weary sighed Gudrun,
As the king gat ending,
And so sore her hands
She smote together,
That the cups arow
Rang out therewith,
And the geese cried on high
That were in the homefield.

Then laughed Brynhild
Budli's daughter,
Once, once only,

⁷ afraid.⁸ separated.⁹ believed¹⁰ counsel.¹¹ assembly place.

From out her heart;
When to her bed
Was borne the sound
Of the sore greeting
Of Giuki's daughter.

Then, quoth Gunnar,
The king, the hawk-bearer,
"Whereas, thou laughest,
O hateful woman,
Glad' on thy bed,
No good it betokeneth:
Why lackest thou else
Thy lovely hue?
Feeder of foul deeds,
Fey¹² do I deem thee,

"Well worthy art thou
Before all women,
That thine eyes should see
Atli¹³ slain of us;
That thy brother's wounds
Thou shouldst see a-bleeding,
That his bloody hurts
Thine hands should bind."

"No man blameth thee, Gunnar,
Thou hast fulfilled death's measure
But naught Atli feareth
All thine ill will;
Life shall he lay down
Later than ye,
And still bear more might Aloft than thy might.

"I shall tell thee, Gunnar,
Though well the tale thou knowest,
In what early days
Ye dealt abroad your wrong:
Young was I then,
Worn with no woe,
Good wealth I had
In the house of my brother!

"No mind had I
That a man should have me,
Or ever ye Giukings,
Rode into our garth;¹⁴
There ye sat on your steeds
Three kings of the people—
—Ah! that that faring¹⁵
Had never befallen!

"Then spake Atli
To me apart,

And said that no wealth
He would give unto me,
Neither gold nor lands
If I would not be wedded;
Nay, and no part
Of the wealth apportioned,
Which in my first days
He gave me duly;
Which in my first days
He counted down.

"Wavered the mind
Within me then,
If to fight I should fall
And the felling of folk,
Bold in byrny¹⁶
Because of my brother;
A deed of fame
Had that been to all folk,
But to many a man
Sorrow of mind.

"So I let all sink
Into peace at the last:
More grew I minded
For the mighty treasure,
The red-shining rings
Of Sigmund's son;
For no man's wealth else
Would I take unto me.

"For myself had I given
To that great king
Who sat amid gold
On the back of Grani;¹⁷
Nought were his eyen
Like to your eyen,
Nor in any wise
Went his visage with yours;
Though ye might deem you
Due kings of men.

"One I loved,
One, and none other,
The gold-decked may
Had no doubtful mind;
Thereof shall Atli
Wot full surely,
When he getteth to know
I am gone to the dead.

"Far be it from me,
Feeble and wavering,
Ever to love

Another's love—
—Yet shall my woe
Be well avenged."

Up rose Gunnar,
The great men's leader,
And cast his arms
About the queen's neck;
And all went nigh
One after other,
With their whole hearts
Her heart to turn.
But then all these
From her neck she thrust,
Of her long journey
No man should let her.

Then called he Hogni
To have talk with him:
"Let all folk go
Forth into the hall,
Thine with mine—
—O need sore and mighty!—
To wot if we yet
My wife's parting may stay.
Till with time's wearing
Some hindrance wax."

One answer Hogni
Had for all;
"Nay, let hard need
Have rule thereover,
And no man let¹⁸ her
Of her long journey!
Never born again,
May she come back thence!

"Luckless she came
To the lap of her mother,
Born into the world
For utter woe,
To many a man
For heart-whole mourning."

Upraised he turned
From the talk and the trouble,
To where the gem-field
Dealt out goodly treasure;
As she looked and beheld
All the wealth that she had,
And the hungry bondmaids,
And maids of the hall.

She donned her gold byrny,
Ere she thrust the sword-point
Through the midst of her body:
On the bolster's far side
Sank she adown,
And, smitten with sword,
Still bethought her of redes.¹⁹

"Let all come forth
Who are fain²⁰ the red gold,
Or things less worthy
To win from my hands;
To each one I give
A necklace gilt over,
Wrought hangings and bed-gear,
And bright woven weed."²¹

All they kept silence,
And thought what to speak,
Then all at once
Answer gave:
"Full enow are death-doomed,
Fain are we to live yet,
Maids of the hall
All meet work winning."

From her wise heart at last
The linen-clad damsel,
The one of few years
Gave forth the word:
"I will that none driven
By hand or by word,
For our sake should lose
Well-loved life.

"Thou on the bones of you
Surely shall burn,

Of the life's ruin
Of thy lightsome bride—

Swim soft and sweetly
For all that I
Lay life adown.

Shall ye make peace with Gudrun,
For the wise woman

Shall lull in the young wife
The hard memory
Of her dead husband.

She shall be Swanhild²³
She shall be Sunbeam.

"Thou shalt give Gudrun

Noble, well-praised
Of the world's folk;
Not with her goodwill,
Or love shalt thou give her;
Yet will Atli
Come to win her,
My very brother,
Born of Budli.

—"Ah! many a memory
Of how ye dealt with me,
How sorely, how evilly
Ye ever beguiled me,
How all pleasure left me
The while my life lasted!—

"Fain wilt thou be
Oddrun to win,
But thy good liking
Shall Atli let;
But in secret wise
Shall ye win together,
And she shall love thee
As I had loved thee,
If in such wise
Fate had willed it.

"But with all ill
Shall Atli sting thee,
Into the strait worm-close²⁴
Shall he cast thee.

"But no long space
Shall slip away
Ere Atli too
All life shall lose.
Yea, all his weal
With the life of his sons,
For a dreadful bed
Dights Gudrun for him,

From a heart sore laden,
With the sword's sharp edge.

"More seemly for Gudrun,
Your very sister,
In death to wend after
Her love first wed;
Had but good rede
To her been given,
Or if her heart
Had been like to my heart.

—"Faint my speech groweth—
But for our sake
Ne'er shall she lose
Her life beloved;
The sea shall have her,
High billows bear her
Forth unto Jonakr's²⁵
Fair land of his fathers.

"There shall she bear sons,
Stays of a heritage,
Stays of a heritage,
Jonakr's sons;
And Swanhild shall she
Send from the land,
That may born of her,
The may born of Sigurd.

"Her shall bite
The rede of Bikki,²⁶
Whereas for no good
Wins Jormunrek life;
And so is clean perished
All the kin of Sigurd,
Yea, and more greeting,
And more for Gudrun.

"And now one prayer
Yet pray I of thee—
The last word of mine
Here in the world—
So broad on the field
Be the burg of the dead
That fair space may be left
For us all to lie down,
All those that died
At Sigurd's death!

"Hang round that burg
Fair hangings and shields,
Web by Gauls woven,

¹⁹ counsels. ²⁰ desirous of. ²¹ clothes. ²² gold. ²³ daughter of Sigurd and Gudrun.
²⁴ the grave. ²⁵ Gudrun's third husband. ²⁶ After Swanhild marries the aged Ermanarich, Bikki accuses her of infidelity and she is punished by being torn to pieces by wild horses.

And folk of the Gauls:
There burn the Hun King
Lying beside me.

"But on the other side
Burn by the Hun King
Those who served me
Strewn with treasure;
Two at the head,
And two at the feet,
Two hounds therewith,
And two hawks moreover:
Then is all dealt
With even dealing.

"Lay there amidst us
The ring-dight metal,

The sharp-edged steel,
That so lay erst;
When we both together
Into one bed went,
And were called by the name
Of man and wife.

"Never, then, belike
Shall clash behind him
Valhall's bright door
With rings bedight:
And if my fellowship
Followeth after,
In no wretched wise
Then shall we wend.

"For him shall follow

My five bondmaids,
My eight bondsmen,
No borel²⁷ folk:
Yea, and my fosterer,
And my father's dower
That Budli of old days
Gave to his dear child.

"Much have I spoken,
More would I speak,
If the sword would give me
Space for speech;
But my words are waning,
My wounds are swelling—
Naught but truth have I told—
—And now make I ending."

THE HELL-RIDE OF BRYNHILD

After the death of Brynhild were made two bales, one for Sigurd, and that was first burned; but Brynhild was burned on the other, and she was in a chariot hung about with goodly hangings.

And so folk say that Brynhild drove in her chariot down along the way to Hell, and passed by an abode where dwelt a certain giantess, and the giantess spake:—

"Nay, with my goodwill
Never goest thou
Through this stone-pillared
Stead of mine!
More seemly for thee
To sit sewing the cloth,
Than to go look on
The love of another.

"What dost thou, going
From the land of the Gauls,
O restless head,
To this mine house?
Golden girl, hast thou not,
If thou listest to hearken,
In sweet wise from thy hands
The blood of men washen?"

BRYNHILD

"Nay, blame me naught,
Bride of the rock-hall,
Though I roved a warring
In the days that were;
The higher of us twain
Shall I ever be holden
When of our kind
Men make account."

²⁷ low-born.

THE GIANT-WOMAN

"Thou, O Brynhild,
Budli's daughter,
Wert the worst ever born
Into the world:
For Giuki's children
Death hast thou gotten,
And turned to destruction
Their goodly dwelling."

BRYNHILD

"I shall tell thee
True tale from my chariot,
O thou who naught wottest,
If thou listest to wot;
How for me they have gotten
Those heirs of Giuki,
A loveless life,
A life of lies.

"Hild under helm,
The Hlymdale people,
E'en those who knew me,
Ever would call me.

"The changeful shapes
Of us eight sisters,

The wise king bade
Under oak-tree to bear:
Of twelve winters was I,
If thou listest to wot,
When I sware to the young lord
Oaths of love.

"Thereafter gat I
Mid the folk of the Goths,
For Helmgunnar the old,
Swift journey to Hell,
And gave to Aud's brother
The young, gain and glory;
Whereof overwrath
Waxed Odin with me.

"So he shut me in shield-wall
In Skata grove,
Red shields and white
Close set around me;
And bade him alone
My slumber to break
Who in no land
Knew how to fear.

"He set round my hall,
Toward the south quarter,

The Hell-Ride of Brynhild, translated by William Morris and Erik Magnússon.

The Bane of all trees
Burning aloft;
And ruled that he only
Thereover should ride
Who should bring me the gold
O'er which Fafnir brooded.

"Then upon Grani rode
The goodly gold-strewer
To where my fosterer
Ruled his fair dwelling.
He who alone there
Was deemed best of all,

The War-lord of the Danes,
Well worthy of men.

"In peace did we sleep
Soft in one bed,
As though he had been
Naught but my brother:
There as we lay
Through eight nights wearing,
No hand in love
On each other we laid.

"Yet thence blamed me, Gudrun,
Giuki's daughter,
That I had slept

In the arms of Sigurd;
And then I wotted
As I fain had not wotted,
That they had bewrayed me
In my betrothals.

"Ah! for unrest
All too long
Are men and women
Made alive!
Yet we twain together
Shall wear through the ages,
Sigurd and I.—
—Sink adown, O giant-wife!"

THE LAY OF THRYM

1. Wild was Vingthor¹ when he awoke,
And when his mighty hammer he missed;
He shook his beard, his hair was bristling
As the son of Jorth about him sought.

2. Hear now the speech that first he spake: 5
"Harken, Loki, and heed my words,
Nowhere on earth is it known to man,
Nor in heaven above: our hammer is stolen."

3. To the dwelling fair of Freyja² went they,
Hear now the speech that first he spake: 10
"Wilt thou, Freyja, thy feather-dress lend
me,
That so my hammer I may seek?"

Freyja spake:

4. "Thine should it be though of silver bright,
And I would give it though 'twere of gold."
Then Loki flew, and the feather-dress
whirred, 15
Till he left behind him the home of the gods,
And reached at last the realm of the giants.

5. Thrym sat on a mound, the giants' master,
Leashes of gold he laid for his dogs,
And stroked and smoothed the manes of his steeds. 20

Thrym spake:

6. "How fare the gods, how fare the elves?
Why comest thou alone to the giants' land?"

Loki spake:

"Ill fare the gods, ill fare the elves!
Hast thou hidden Hlorrithi's hammer?"

Thrym spake:

7. "I have hidden Hlorrithi's hammer, 25
Eight miles down deep in the earth;
And back again shall no man bring it
If Freyja I win not to be my wife."

8. Then Loki flew, and the feather-dress
whirred,
Till he left behind him the home of the giants, 30
And reached at last the realm of the gods.
There in the courtyard Thor he met:
Hear now the speech that first he spake:

9. "Hast thou found tidings as well as trouble?

Thy news in the air shalt thou utter now;
Oft doth the sinner his story forget, 36
And lies he speaks who lays himself down."

Loki spake:

10. "Trouble I have, and tidings as well:
Thrym, king of the giants, keeps thy hammer,
And back again shall no man bring it 40
If Freyja he wins not to be his wife."

11. Freyja the fair then went they to find;
Hear now the speech that first he spake:

The Lay of Thrym. Translated by Henry Adams Bellows. By permission of The American Scandinavian Foundation.

² Norse goddess of Love.

- "Bind on, Freyja, the bridal veil,
For we two must haste to the giants'
home." 45
12. Wrathful was Freyja, and fiercely she snorted,
And the dwelling great of the gods was shaken
And burst was the mighty Brisings' necklace:
"Most lustful indeed should I look to all
If I journeyed with thee to the giants'
home." 50
13. Then were the gods together met,
And the goddesses came and council held,
And the far-famed ones a plan would find,
How they might Hlorrithi's hammer win.
14. Then Heimdall spake, whitest of the gods,
Like the Wanes he knew the future well:
"Bind we on Thor the bridal veil, 57
Let him bear the mighty Brisings' necklace;
15. "Keys around him let there rattle,
And down to his knees hang woman's dress; 60
With gems full broad upon his breast,
And a pretty cap to crown his head."
16. Then Thor the mighty his answer made:
"Me would the gods unmanly call
If I let bind the bridal veil." 65
17. Then Loki spake, the son of Laufey:
"Be silent, Thor, and speak not thus;
Else will the giants in Asgarth³ dwell
If thy hammer is brought not home to thee."
18. Then bound they on Thor the bridal veil,
And next the mighty Brisings' necklace. 71
19. Keys around him let they rattle,
And down to his knees hung woman's dress;
With gems full broad upon his breast,
And a pretty cap to crown his head. 75
20. Then Loki spake, the son of Laufey:
"As thy maid-servant thither I go with thee;
We two shall haste to the giants' home."
21. Then home the goats to the hall were driven,
- They wrenched at the halters, swift were they to run; 80
The mountains burst, earth burned with fire,
And Othin's son sought Jotunheim.⁴
22. Then loud spake Thrym, the giants' leader:
"Bestir ye, giants, put straw on the benches;
Now Freyja they bring to be my bride, 85
The daughter of Njorth out of Noatun.
23. "Gold-horned cattle go to my stables,
Jet-black oxen, the giant's joy;
Many my gems, and many my jewels,
Freyja alone did I lack, methinks." 90
24. Early it was to evening come,
And forth was borne the beer for the giants;
Thor alone ate an ox, and eight salmon,
All the dainties as well that were set for the women;
And drank Sif's mate three tuns of mead. 95
25. Then loud spake Thrym, the giants' leader:
"Who ever saw bride more keenly bite?
I ne'er saw bride with a broader bite,
Nor a maiden who drank more mead than this!"
26. Hard by there sat the serving-maid wise,
So well she answered the giant's words: 101
"From food has Freyja eight nights fasted,
So hot was her longing for Jotunheim."
27. Thrym looked 'neath the veil, for he longed to kiss,
But back he leaped the length of the hall:
"Why are so fearful the eyes of Freyja? 106
Fire, methinks, from her eyes burns forth."
28. Hard by there sat the serving-maid wise,
So well she answered the giant's words:
"No sleep has Freyja for eight nights found, 110
So hot was her longing for Jotunheim."
29. Soon came the giant's luckless sister,
Who feared not to ask the bridal fee:
"From thy hands the rings of red gold take,
If thou wouldst win my willing love, 115
(My willing love and welcome glad.)"

³ Home of the gods.⁴ Home of the giants.

30. Then loud spake Thrym, the giants' leader:
"Bring in the hammer to hallow the bride;

On the maiden's knees let Mjollnir lie, 119
That us both the hand of Vor may bless."

31. The heart in the breast of Hlorrithi laughed
When the hard-souled one his hammer beheld;

First Thrym, the king of the giants, he killed,

Then all the folk of the giants he felled.

32. The giant's sister old he slew, 125
She who had begged the bridal fee;
A stroke she got in the shilling's stead,
And for many rings the might of the hammer.

33. And so his hammer got Othin's son.

CELTIC MYTH AND ROMANCE

The Teutonic poetry of war and passion is a hardy plant, but its appearance is somewhat forbidding, and its nature is essentially premedieval; it reflects a way of life that existed before the Christian and chivalric Middle Ages. The true flower of the medieval world is romance.

In general, romance denotes the literature of chivalry. But it not only represents the customs and ideals of the feudal gentry; it evokes a world of wonder and magic. It is because the medieval tales of knightly love and adventure are steeped in this spirit that they are romances. Knighthood and the unscientific outlook of the Middle Ages favored the development of romance. But it came from much deeper well-springs—from the imagination of the peoples that preceded the Teutons in occupying western Europe—namely, the Celts. Although they had the usual interest in war and heroism, their outlook was magical.

The world they saw was full of marvels; it was exquisite and playful. It was a world not of grim conquerors but of a people who worshiped the loveliness of nature, loved life, and loved love. Sensibility, high spirits, and a romantic temperament characterized these Celts. They were not made to rule the world but to enjoy it. No wonder that, unlike both the Romans and the Teutons, they established no empire and enslaved no nations. No wonder, too, that wherever they were exposed to conquest-bent hordes, they would fight gallantly and recklessly but would be unable in the end to withstand the shock of assault. The juggernaut of the unimaginative, well-organized Roman legions rolled over them. The fury of the Teutonic tribes battered them until they found protection in mountain fastnesses and other areas where nature was their defense.

By A. D. 500 the culture of the classic world was at an end. Surrounded by barbarians, it eventually gave way before the superior weight of the enemy. Besides, it had already decayed. When Emperor Justinian in the sixth century closed the schools of Athens, all life had gone from them. Although in Constantinople the Eastern Roman Empire lived on for a thousand years, it was devoid of vitality and maintained itself precariously. This vestige of the classical world preserved precious manuscripts and works of art, maintained many of the antique forms of grandeur, and served as a bridge between the modern world and the ancient, but it looked only backward and created no new culture. The future lay with the crude but vigorous Germanic barbarians, who were gradually to become civilized. However, there was vitality in the Celtic peoples wherever they were able to maintain their independence. For a period of several centuries, it was their high destiny to carry the torch of culture while the rest of Europe was plunged in darkness, and the torch was especially bright in Ireland.

At the beginning of the Christian era the Celts were an important and numerous people, already well settled in western Europe, probably since the seventh century B.C. They occupied much of France, as every school boy who has read his Cæsar remembers. These Celts of Gaul were entirely absorbed by the Romans and Germans, so that the Gallic language disappeared. In Cæsar's time all the other Celts were in the British Isles. The Britons were in England and Wales, the Picts in Scotland, and the Gaels, or Irish, in Ireland. When in the fifth and sixth centuries the Britons were overcome by the Anglo-Saxons, the Celts moved westward into Wales and Cornwall or crossed the sea to Brittany in northern France. This whole group, the ancient British, the Welsh, the Cornish, and the Breton, is known as Brythonic. The Irish Celts sent out expeditions and settled the Highlands and islands of Scotland. Though this branch of the Celts is considerably mixed with the Brythonic, we speak of both the Irish and the Highland Scotch as Goidelic Celts and their language as Gaelic. The English-speaking person may be interested in a few differences in these languages. For example, the common word for mountain in Gaelic is ben (Ben Nevis), in Welsh it is pen (Penryth). The patronymic ("son of") is Mac in Gaelic, but Map or Ap in Welsh. It is from Wales and Ireland that the artistic and cultural influences have come.

The period of greatest Welsh literary activity came several centuries later than that of Ireland. We cannot date exactly the collection of stories known as the Mabinogion, but it was certainly current in the twelfth century and influenced several of the great romantic legends, like those of King Arthur and Tristram. The Welsh accounts of Arthur and his knights are primitive and grotesque, but they are clearly recognizable as the heroes of continental romance. Before they were courtly knights in the latter, they were characters in Celtic folklore and myth. To the student of European literary tradition, therefore, Welsh literature is of great importance, even though in artistic form it is inferior to the Irish.

Since Ireland was so far removed from the center of the wars of Europe during the unsettled centuries (from the third to the eighth or ninth), while the Roman Empire was tottering and the new nations were being formed, it had the best chance to develop a culture of its own. It also proved a haven for Celtic refugees from Wales and Gaul during the Teutonic invasions, and among these were scholars of Roman culture.

Christianity came into Ireland in the early fifth century with St. Patrick, and during the next two centuries, Ireland was one of the principal centers from which missionaries were sent to convert the rest of Europe. The conversion of Germany and Switzerland and of northern England was primarily a result of their efforts. When in the ninth century Charlemagne gathered about him learned monks to help him revive learning and culture in Europe, one of the most brilliant of these was the Irish philosopher Scotus Erigena.

But before Christianity, Ireland had had a heroic age when the old gods were still in honor. This period, which the later bards and story-tellers celebrated with a profusion of fairy-tale and folklore, probably belongs to the first centuries of the Christian era. The stories of pre-Christian Irish civilization are usually woven about the court of King Conchubar (pronounced Conachoor) at Emain Macha, the ancient capital of Ulster in northern Ireland. One of the most interesting tales is The Feast of Bricriu. It contains the Celtic source for Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, the most famous English romance in verse. (See p. 1021.)

Many of these legends were written down from the eighth to the tenth centuries, and in the last generation were arranged and translated by Lady Gregory in her Cuchulain of Muirthemne. Cuchulain (pronounced Cu-hoolin) is the epic hero of the Irish. His exploits, which began at the age of seven, are fabulous, but he remains a very human character. Perhaps the most famous of these stories is that of Deirdre, which we include in this book. Deirdre and the heroes of her cycle have remained a living tradition among the Irish. These tales are still to be heard from old men in remote parts of western Ireland who have learned them from other story-tellers. Seated about their turf fires on long winter evenings, these old men vie with one another in recounting the adventures of the ancient heroes and demigods. After hearing them, one can no longer have any doubt that the charm of style which Arnold, whose famous essay on Celtic literature is appended as an introduction to the selections, finds in Celtic literature is real; and that it is not confined to learned men or poets, but is the common possession of hundreds of humbler narrators. In late years Irish authors have written much about the story of Deirdre. Indeed, the Irish legends proved an important influence twice in our literature; once in the second half of the eighteenth century, and again in the recent movement led by W. B. Yeats, Lady Gregory, and J. M. Synge, which is known as the Celtic Renaissance.

MATTHEW ARNOLD

On the Study of Celtic Literature

The Celt's quick feeling for what is noble and distinguished gave his poetry style; his indomitable personality gave it pride and passion; his sensibility and nervous exaltation gave it a better gift still, the gift of rendering with wonderful felicity the magical charm of nature. The forest solitude, the bubbling spring, the wild flowers, are everywhere in romance. They have a mysterious life and grace there; they are Nature's own children, and utter her secret in a way which makes them something quite different from the woods, waters, and plants of Greek and Latin poetry. Now of this delicate magic, Celtic romance is so pre-eminent a mistress, that it seems impossible to believe the power did not come into romance from the Celts. Magic is just the word for it,—the magic of nature; not merely the beauty of nature,—that the Greeks and Latins had; not merely an honest smack of the soil, a faithful realism,—that the Germans had; but the intimate life of Nature, her weird power and her fairy charm. As the Saxon names of places, with the pleasant wholesome smack of the soil in them,—Weathersfield, Thaxted, Shalford,—are to the Celtic names of places, with their penetrating, lofty beauty,—Velindra, Tyntagel, Caernarvon,—so is the homely realism of German and Norse nature to the fairy-like loveliness of Celtic nature. Gwydion wants a wife for his pupil: "Well," says Math, "we will seek, I and thou, by charms and illusions, to form a wife for him out of flowers. So they took the blossoms of the oak, and the blossoms of the broom, and the blossoms of the meadow-sweet, and produced from them a maiden, the fairest and most graceful that man ever saw. And they baptized her, and gave her the name of Flower-Aspect." Celtic romance is full of exquisite touches like that, showing the delicacy of the Celt's feeling in these matters, and how deeply Nature lets him come into her secrets. The quick dropping of blood is called "faster than the fall of the dewdrop from the blade of reed-grass upon the earth, when the dew of June is at the heaviest."

And thus is Olwen described: "More yellow was her hair than the flower of the broom, and her skin was whiter than the foam of the wave, and fairer were her hands and her fingers than the blossoms of the wood-anemone amidst the spray of the meadow fountains." For loveliness it would be hard to beat that; and for magical clearness and nearness take the following:—

"And in the evening Peredur entered a valley, and at the head of the valley he came to a hermit's cell, and the hermit welcomed him gladly, and there he spent the night. And in the morning he arose, and when he went forth, behold, a shower of snow had fallen the night before, and a hawk had killed a wild-fowl in front of the cell. And the noise of the horse scared the hawk away, and a raven alighted upon the bird. And Peredur stood and compared the blackness of the raven, and the whiteness of the snow, and the redness of the blood, to the hair of the lady whom best he loved, which was blacker than the raven, and to her skin, which was whiter than the snow, and to her two cheeks, which were redder than the blood upon the snow appeared to be."

And this, which is perhaps less striking, is not less beautiful:—

"And early in the day Geraint and Enid left the wood, and they came to an open country, with meadows on one hand and mowers mowing the meadows. And there was a river before them, and the horses bent down and drank the water. And they went up out of the river by a steep bank, and there they met a slender stripling with a satchel about his neck; and he had a small blue pitcher in his hand, and a bowl on the mouth of the pitcher."

And here the landscape, up to this point so Greek in its clear beauty, is suddenly magicalized by the romance touch:—

"And they saw a tall tree by the side of the river, one-half of which was in flames from the root to the top, and the other half was green and in full leaf."

Magic is the word to insist upon,—a magically vivid and near interpretation of nature; since it is this which constitutes the special charm and power of the effect I am calling attention to, and it is for this that the Celt's sensibility gives him a peculiar aptitude. But the matter needs rather fine handling, and it is easy to make mistakes here in our criticism. In the first place, Europe tends constantly to become more and more one community, and we tend to become Europeans instead of merely Eng-¹⁰lishmen, Frenchmen, Germans, Italians; so whatever aptitude or felicity one people imparts into spiritual work, gets imitated by the others, and thus tends to become the common property of all. Therefore anything so beautiful and attractive as the natural magic I am speaking of, is sure, nowadays, if it appears in the productions of the Celts, or of the English, or of the French, to appear in the productions of the Germans also, or in the productions of the Italians: but there will be a stamp of perfectness and inimitableness about it in the literatures where it is native, which it will not have in the literatures where it is not native. Novalis or Rückert, for instance, have their eye fixed on nature, and have undoubtedly a feeling for natural magic; a rough-and-ready critic easily credits them and the Germans with the Celtic fineness of tact, the Celtic nearness to Nature and her secret; but the question is whether the strokes in the German's picture of nature have ever the in-³⁰definable delicacy, charm, and perfection of the Celt's touch in the pieces I just now quoted, or of Shakspeare's touch in his daffodil, Wordsworth's in his cuckoo, Keats's in his Autumn, Obermann's in his mountain birch-tree or his Easter-daisy among the Swiss farms. To decide where the gift for natural magic originally lies, whether it is properly Celtic or Germanic, we must decide this question.

In the second place, there are many ways of⁴⁰ handling nature, and we are here only concerned with one of them; but a rough-and-ready critic imagines that it is all the same so long as nature is handled at all, and fails to draw the needful distinction between modes of handling her. But these modes are many; I will mention four of them now: there is the conventional way of handling nature, there is the faithful way of handling nature, there is the Greek way of handling nature, there is the magical way of handling na-⁵⁰ture. In all these three last the eye is on the object, but with a difference; in the faithful way of handling nature, the eye is on the object, and that is all you can say; in the Greek, the eye is on the object, but lightness and brightness are added; in the magical, the eye is on the object, but charm and magic are added. In the conventional way of handling nature, the eye is not on the object; what that means we all know, we have only to think of our eighteenth-century poetry:—

As when the moon, refulgent lamp of night—to call up any number of instances. Latin poetry supplies plenty of instances too; if we put this from Propertius's Hylas:—

. . . manus heroum . . .

Mollia composita litora fronde tegit—side by side the line of Theocritus by which it was suggested:—

λειμων γαρ σφιν εκειτο μεγας, στιβαδεσσιν ονειαρ¹

we get at the same moment a good specimen both of the conventional and of the Greek way of handling nature. But from our own poetry we may get specimens of the Greek way of handling nature, as well as of the conventional: for instance, Keats's:—

What little town, by river or seashore,
Or mountain-built with quiet citadel,
Is emptied of its folk, this pious morn?

is Greek, as Greek as a thing from Homer or Theocritus; it is composed with the eye on the object, a radiancy and light clearness being added. German poetry abounds in specimens of the faithful way of handling nature; an excellent example is to be found in the stanzas called Zucignung, prefixed to Goethe's poems; the morning walk, the mist, the dew, the sun, are as faithful as they can be, they are given with the eye on the object, but there the merit of the work, as a handling of nature, stops; neither Greek radiance nor Celtic magic is added; the power of these is not what gives the poem in question its merit, but a power of quite another kind, a power of moral and spiritual emotion. But the power of Greek radiance Goethe could give to his handling of nature, and nobly too, as anyone who will read his Wanderer, —the poem in which a wanderer falls in with a peasant woman and her child by their hut, built out of the ruins of a temple near Cuma,—may see.

Only the power of natural magic Goethe does not, I think, give; whereas Keats passes at will from the Greek power to that power which is, as I say, Celtic; from his:—

What little town, by river or seashore—
to his:—

White hawthorn and the pastoral eglantine,
Fast-fading violets cover'd up in leaves—or his:—

. . . magic casements, opening on the foam
Of perilous seas, in faery lands forlorn—

in which the very same note is struck as in those extracts which I quoted from Celtic romance, and struck with authentic and unmistakable power.

Shakespeare, in handling nature, touches this Celtic note so exquisitely, that perhaps one is inclined to be always looking for the Celtic note in him, and not to recognize his Greek note when it comes. But if one attends well to the difference between the two notes, and bears in mind, to guide one, such things as Virgil's "moss-grown springs and grass softer than sleep:"—

Muscosi fontes et somno mollior herba—as his charming flower-gatherer, who:—

Pallentes violas et summa papavera carpens
Narcissum et florem jungit bene olentis anethi— 30

as his quinces and chestnuts:—

. . . cana legum tenera lanugine mala Castaneasque nuce . . .

then, I think, we shall be disposed to say that in Shakespeare's:—

I know a bank where the wild thyme blows,
Where oxlips and the nodding violet grows,
Quite over-canopied with luscious woodbine,
With sweet musk-roses and with eglantine—

it is mainly a Greek note which is struck. Then, again in his:—

. . . look how the floor of heaven
Is thick inlaid with patines of bright gold!

10 we are at the very point of transition from the Greek note to the Celtic; there is the Greek clearness and brightness, with the Celtic aerialness and magic coming in. Then we have the sheer, inimitable Celtic note in passages like this:—

Met we on hill, in dale, forest or mead,
By paved fountain or by rushy brook,
Or in the beached margent of the sea—

20 or this, the last I will quote:—

The moon shines bright. In such a night as this,
When the sweet wind did gently kiss the trees,
And they did make no noise, in such a night
Troilus, methinks mounted the Trojan walls—

. . . in such a night
Did Thisbe fearfully o'ertrip the dew—

. . . in such a night
Stood Dido, with a willow in her hand,
Upon the wild sea-banks, and waved her love
To come again to Carthage.

And those last lines of all are so drenched and intoxicated with the fairy-dew of that natural magic which is our theme, that I cannot do better than end with them.

DEIRDRE

The Fate of the Sons of Usnach

Now it was one Fedlimid, son of Doll, was harper to King Conchubar, and he had but one child, and this is the story of her birth.

Cathbad the Druid was at Fedlimid's house one day. "Have you got knowledge of the future?" said Fedlimid. "I have a little," said Cathbad. "What is it you are wanting to know?"

"I was not asking to know anything," said

Fedlimid, "but if you know of anything that may be going to happen me, it is as well for you to tell me."

Cathbad went out of the house for a while, and when he came back he said:

"Had you ever any children?" "I never had," said Fedlimid, "and the wife I have had none, and we have no hope ever to have any; there is no one with us but only myself and my wife."

"That puts wonder on me," said Cathbad, "for ¹⁰ I see by Druid signs that it is on account of a daughter belonging to you that more blood will be shed than ever was shed in Ireland since time and race began. And great heroes and bright candles of the Gael will lose their lives because of her."

"Is that the foretelling you have made for me?" said Fedlimid, and there was anger on him, for he thought the Druid was mocking him; "if that is all you can say, you can keep it for yourself; it is little I think of your share of knowledge." "For all ²⁰ that," said Cathbad, "I am certain of its truth, for I can see it all clearly in my own mind."

The Druid went away, but he was not long gone when Fedlimid's wife was found to be with child. And as her time went on, his vexation went on growing, that he had not asked more questions of Cathbad at the time he was talking to him, and he was under a smoldering care by day and by night, for it is what he was thinking, that neither his own sense and understanding, nor the share of ³⁰ friends he had, would be able to save him, or to make a back against the world, if this misfortune should come upon him, that would bring such great shedding of blood upon the earth; and it is the thought that came, that if this child should be born, what he had to do was to put her far away, where no eye would see her, and no ear hear word of her.

The time of the delivery of Fedlimid's wife came on, and it was a girl-child she gave birth to. Fedlimid did not allow any living person to come to the house, or to see his wife but himself alone.

But just after the child was born, Cathbad the Druid came in again, and there was shame on Fedlimid when he saw him, and when he remembered how he would not believe his words. But the Druid looked at the child and he said: "Let Deirdre be her name; harm will come through her. She will be fair, comely, bright-haired; heroes will fight for her, and kings go seeking for her." ⁴⁰

And then he took the child in his arms, and it is what he said: "O Deirdre, on whose account many shall weep, on whose account many women shall be envious, there will be trouble on Ulster for your sake, O fair daughter of Fedlimid.

"Many will be jealous of your face, O flame of beauty. For your sake heroes shall go to exile; for your sake deeds of anger shall be done in Emain. There is harm in your face, for it will bring banishment and death on the sons of kings.

"In your fate, O beautiful child, are wounds, and ill-doings, and shedding of blood.

"You will have a little grave apart to yourself; you will be a tale of wonder forever, Deirdre."

Cathbad went away then, and he sent Levarcham, daughter of Aedh, to the house; and Fedlimid asked her would she take the venture of bringing up the child, far away where no eye would see her, and no ear hear of her. Levarcham said she would do that, and that she would do her best to keep her the way he wished.

So Fedlimid got his men, and brought them away with him to a mountain, wide and waste, and there he bade them to make a little house, by the side of a round green hillock, and to make a garden of apple-trees behind it, with a wall about it. And he bade them put a roof of green sods over the house, the way a little company might live in it, without notice being taken of them.

Then he sent Levarcham and the child there, that no eye might see, and no ear hear of, Deirdre. He put all in good order before them, and he gave them provisions, and he told Levarcham that food and all she wanted would be sent from year to year as long as she lived.

And so Deirdre and her foster-mother lived in the lonely place among the hills, without the knowledge or the notice of any strange person, until Deirdre was fourteen years of age. And Deirdre grew straight and clean like a rush on the bog, and she was comely beyond comparison of all the women of the world, and her movements were like the swan on the wave, or the deer on the hill. She was the young girl of the greatest beauty and of the gentlest nature of all the women of Ireland.

Levarcham, that had charge of her, used to be giving Deirdre every knowledge and skill that she had herself. There was not a blade of grass growing from root, or a bird singing in the wood, or a star shining from heaven, but Deirdre had the name of it. But there was one thing she would not have her know—she would not let her have friendship with any living person of the rest of the world outside their own house.

But one dark night of winter, with black clouds overhead, a hunter came walking the hills, and it is what happened; he missed the track of the hunt, and lost his way and his comrades.

And a heaviness came upon him, and he lay down on the side of the green hillock by Deirdre's house. He was weak with hunger and going, and perished with cold, and a deep sleep came upon him. While he was lying there, a dream came to the hunter, and he thought that he was near the warmth of a house of the Sidhe,¹ and the Sidhe inside making music, and he called out in his dream, "If there is anyone inside, let them bring me in, in the name of the sun and the moon." Deirdre heard the voice, and she said to Levarcham, "Mother, mother, what is that?" But Levarcham said, "It is nothing that matters; it is the birds of the air gone astray, and trying to find one another. But let them go back to the branches of the wood."

Another troubled dream came on the hunter, and he cried out a second time. "What is that?" asked Deirdre again. "It is nothing that matters," said Levarcham. "The birds of the air are looking for one another; let them go past to the branches of the wood."

Then a third dream came to the hunter, and he cried out a third time, if there was anyone in the hill to let him in for the sake of the elements, for he was perished with cold and overcome with hunger. "Oh! what is that, Levarcham?" said Deirdre. "There is nothing there for you to see, my child, but only the birds of the air, and they lost to one another; but let them go past us to the branches of the wood. There is no place or shelter for them here tonight." "Oh, mother," said Deirdre, "the bird asked to come in for the sake of the sun and the moon, and it is what you yourself told me, that anything that is asked like that, it is right for us to give it. If you will not let in the bird that is perished with cold and overcome with hunger, I myself will let it in."

So Deirdre rose up and drew the bolt from the leaf of the door, and let in the hunter. She put a seat in the place for sitting, food in the place for eating, and drink in the place for drinking, for the man who had come into the house. "Come now and eat food, for you are in want of it," said Deirdre. "Indeed it is I was in want of food and drink and warmth when I came into this house; but by my word, I have forgotten that since I saw yourself," said the hunter.

"How little you are able to curb your tongue," said Levarcham. "It is not a great thing for you to keep your tongue quiet when you get the shelter of a house and the warmth of a hearth on a dark winter night." "That is so," said the hunter, "I may do that much, to keep my mouth shut; but I swear by the oath my people swear by, if some others of the people of the world saw this great beauty that is hidden away here, they would not leave her long with you."

"What people are those?" said Deirdre. "I will tell you that," said the hunter; "they are Naoise, son of Usnach, and Ainnle and Ardan, his two brothers."² "What is the appearance of these men, if we should ever see them?" said Deirdre. "This is the appearance that is on those three men," said the hunter: "the color of the raven is on their hair, their skin is like the swan on the wave, their cheeks like the blood of the speckled red calf, and their swiftness and their leap are like the salmon of the stream and like the deer of the gray mountain; and the head and shoulders of Naoise are above all the other men of Ireland." "However they may be," said Levarcham, "get you out from here, and take another road; and by my word, little is my thankfulness to yourself, or to her that let you in." "You need not send him out for telling me that," said Deirdre, "for as to those three men, I myself saw them last night in a dream, and they hunting upon a hill."

The hunter went away, but in a little time after he began to think to himself how Conchubar, High King of Ulster, was used to lie down at night and to rise up in the morning by himself, without a wife or anyone to speak to; and that if he could see this great beauty it was likely he would bring her home to Emain, and that he himself would get the good-will of the king for telling him there was such a queen to be found on the face of the world.

So he went straight to King Conchubar at Emain Macha, and he sent word in to the King that he had news for him, if he would hear it. The King sent for him to come in. "What is the reason of your journey?" he said. "It is what I have to tell you, King," said the hunter, "that I have seen the greatest beauty that ever was born in Ireland, and I am come to tell you of it."

"Who is this great beauty, and in what place is she to be seen, when she was never seen before you saw her, if you did see her?" "I did see her, indeed," said the hunter, "but no other man can see her, unless he knows from me the place where she is living." "Will you bring me to the place where she is, and you will have a good reward?" said the King. "I will bring you there," said the hunter. "Let you stay with my household tonight," said Conchubar, "and I myself and my people will go with you early on the morning of tomorrow." "I will stay," said the hunter, and he stayed that night in the household of King Conchubar.

Then Conchubar sent to Fergus and to the other chief men of Ulster, and he told them of what he was about to do. Though it was early when the songs and the music of the birds began in the woods, it was earlier yet when Conchubar, king of Ulster, rose up with his little company of near friends, in the fresh spring morning of the fresh and pleasant month of May, and the dew was heavy on every bush and flower as they went out toward the green hill where Deirdre was living.

But many a young man of them that had a light, glad, leaping step when they set out, had but a tired, slow, failing step before the end, because of the length and the roughness of the way. "It is down there below," said the hunter, "in the house in that valley, the woman is living, but I myself will not go nearer it than this."

Conchubar and his troop went down then to the green hillock where Deirdre was, and they knocked at the door of the house. Levarcham called out that neither answer nor opening would be given to anyone at all, and that she did not want disturbance put on herself or her house. "Open," said Conchubar, "in the name of the High King of Ulster." When Levarcham heard Conchubar's voice, she knew there was no use trying to keep Deirdre out of sight any longer, and she rose up in haste and let in the King, and as many of his people as could follow him.

When the King saw Deirdre before him, he thought in himself that he never saw in the course of the day, or in the dreams of the night, a creature so beautiful, and he gave her his full heart's weight of love there and then. It is what he did; he put Deirdre up on the shoulders of his men, and she herself and Levarcham were brought away to Emain Macha.

With the love that Conchubar had for Deirdre, he wanted to marry her with no delay, but when her leave was asked, she would not give it, for she was young yet, and she had no knowledge of the duties of a wife, or the ways of a king's house. And when Conchubar was pressing her hard, she asked him to give her a delay of a year and a day. He said he would give her that, though it was hard for him, if she would give him her certain promise to marry him at the year's end. She did that, and Conchubar got a woman teacher for her, and nice, fine, pleasant, modest maidens to be with her at her lying down and at her rising up, to be companions to her. And Deirdre grew wise in the works of a young girl, and in the understanding of a woman; and if anyone at all looked at her face, whatever color she was before that, she would blush crimson red. And it is what Conchubar thought, that he never saw with the eyes of his body a creature that pleased him so well.

One day Deirdre and her companions were out on a hill near Emain Macha, looking around them in the pleasant sunshine, and they saw three men walking together. Deirdre was looking at the men and wondering at them, and when they came near, she remembered the talk of the hunter, and the three men she saw in her dream, and she thought to herself that these were the three sons of Usnach, and that this was Naoise, that had his head and shoulders above all the men of Ireland. The three brothers went by without turning their eyes at all upon the young girls on the hillside, and they were singing as they went, and whoever heard the low singing of the sons of Usnach, it was enchantment and music to them, and every cow that was being milked and heard it, gave two-thirds more of milk. And it is what happened, that love for Naoise came into the heart of Deirdre, so that she could not but follow him. She gathered up her skirt and went after the three men that had gone past the foot of the hill, leaving her companions there after her.

But Ainnle and Ardan had heard talk of the young girl that was at Conchubar's court, and it is what they thought, that if Naoise their brother would see her, it is for himself he would have her, for she was not yet married to the King. So when they saw Deirdre coming after them, they said to one another to hasten their steps, for they had a long road to travel, and the dusk of night coming on. They did so, and Deirdre saw it, and she cried out after them, "Naoise, son of Usnach, are you going to leave me?" "What cry was that came to my ears, that it is not well for me to answer, and not easy for me to refuse?" said Naoise. "It was nothing but the cry of Conchubar's wild ducks," said his brothers; "but let us quicken our steps and hasten our feet, for we have a long road to travel, and the dusk of the evening coming on."

They did so, and they were widening the distance between themselves and her. *

Then Deirdre cried, "Naoise! Naoise! son of Usnach, are you going to leave me?" "What cry was it that came to my ears and struck my heart, that it is not well for me to answer, or easy for me to refuse?" said Naoise. "Nothing but the cry of Conchubar's wild geese," said his brothers; "but let us quicken our steps and hasten our feet, for the darkness of night is coming on." They did so,¹⁰ and were widening the distance between themselves and her.

Then Deirdre cried the third time, "Naoise! Naoise! Naoise! son of Usnach, are you going to leave me?" "What sharp, clear cry was that, the sweetest that ever came to my ears, and the sharpest that ever struck my heart, of all the cries I ever heard?" said Naoise. "What is it but the scream of Conchubar's lake swans," said his brothers. "That was the third cry of some person beyond²⁰ there," said Naoise, "and I swear by my hand of valor," he said, "I will go no farther until I see where the cry comes from." So Naoise turned back and met Deirdre, and Deirdre and Naoise kissed one another three times, and she gave a kiss to each of his brothers. And with the confusion that was on her, a blaze of red fire came upon her, and her color came and went as quickly as the aspen by the stream. And it is what Naoise thought to himself, that he never saw a woman so beautiful³⁰ in his life; and he gave Deirdre, there and then, the love that he never gave to living thing, to vision, or to creature, but to herself alone.

Then he lifted her high on his shoulder, and he said to his brothers to hasten their steps; and they hastened them.

"Harm will come of this," said the young men. "Although there should harm come," said Naoise, "I am willing to be in disgrace while I live. We will go with her to another province, and there is⁴⁰ not in Ireland a king who will not give us a welcome." So they called their people, and that night they set out with three times fifty men, and three times fifty women, and three times fifty greyhounds, and Deirdre in their midst.

They were a long time after that shifting from one place to another all around Ireland, from Essruadh in the South, to Beinn Eatair in the East again, and it is often they were in danger of being destroyed by Conchubar's devices. And one time⁵⁰ the Druids raised a wood before them, but Naoise and his brothers cut their way through it. But at last they got out of Ulster and sailed to the country of Alban,^a and settled in a lonely place; and when hunting on the mountains failed them, they fell upon the cattle of the men of Alban, so that these gathered together to make an end of them. But the sons of Usnach called to the King of Scotland, and he took them into his friendship, and they gave him their help when he went out into battles or to war.

But all this time they had never spoken to the King of Deirdre, and they kept her with themselves, not to let anyone see her, for they were afraid they might get their death on account of her, she being so beautiful.

But it chanced very early, one morning, the King's steward came to visit them, and he found his way into the house where Naoise and Deirdre were, and there he saw them asleep beside one another. He went back then to the King, and he said: "Up to this time there has never been found a woman that would be a fitting wife for you; but there is a woman on the shore of Loch Ness now, is well worthy of you, King of the East. And what you have to do is to make an end of Naoise, for it is of his wife I am speaking." "I will not do that," said the King; "but go to her," he said, "and bid her to come and see me secretly." The steward brought her that message, but Deirdre sent him away, and all that he had said to her, she told it to Naoise afterwards. Then when she would not come to him, the King sent the sons of Usnach into every hard fight, hoping they would get their death, but they won every battle, and came back safe again.

And after a while they went to Loch Eitche, near the sea, and they were left to themselves there for a while in peace and quietness. And they settled and made a dwelling-house for themselves by the side of Loch Ness, and they could kill the salmon of the stream from out their own door, and the deer of the gray hills from out their window. But when Naoise went to the court of the King, his clothes were splendid among the great men of the army of Scotland: a cloak of bright purple, rightly shaped, with a fringe of bright gold; a coat of satin with fifty hooks of silver; a brooch on which were a hundred polished gems; a gold-hilted sword in his hand, two blue-green spears of bright points, a dagger with the color of yellow gold on it, and a hilt of silver. But the two children they had, Gaiair and Aebgreine, they gave into the care of Manannan, Son of the Sea. And he cared them well in Emhain of the Apple Trees, and he brought Bobaras the poet to give learning to Gaiar. And Aebgreine of the Sunny Face he gave in marriage afterwards to Rinn, son of Eochaidh Juil of the Land of Promise.

Now it happened, after a time, that a very great feast was made by Conchubar, in Emain Macha, for all the great among his nobles, so that the whole company were easy and pleasant together. The musicians stood up to play their songs and to give poems, and they gave out the branches of relationship and of kindred. These are the names of the poets that were in Emain at the time: Cathbad the Druid, son of Conall, son of Rudraige; Geanann of the Bright Face, son of Cathbad; Ferceirtne, and Geanann Black-Knee, and many others, and Sencha, son of Ailell.

They were all drinking and making merry until Conchubar, the King, raised his voice and spoke aloud, and it is what he said: "I desire to know from you, did you ever see a better house than this house of Emain, or a hearth better than my hearth in any place you were ever in?" "We did not," they said. "If that is so," said Conchubar, "do you know of anything at all that is wanting to you?" "We know of nothing," said they. "That is not so with me," said Conchubar. "I know of a great want that is on you, the want of the three best candles of the Gael, the three noble sons of Usnach, that ought not to be away from us for the sake of any woman in the world, Naoise, Ainnle, and Ardan; for surely they are the sons of a king, and they would defend the High Kingship against the best men of Ireland."

"If we had dared," said they, "it is long ago we would have said it, and more than that, the province of Ulster would be equal to any other province in Ireland, if there was no Ulsterman in it but those three alone, for it is lions they are in hardness and in bravery."

"If that is so," said Conchubar, "let us send word by a messenger to Alban, and to the dwelling-place of the sons of Usnach, to ask them back again." "Who will go there with the message?" said they all. "I cannot know that," said Conchubar, "for there is geasa,⁴ that is, bonds, on Naoise not to come back with any man only one of the three, Conall Cearnach, or Fergus, or Cuchulain, and I will know now," said he, "which one of those three loves me best."

Then he called Conall to one side, and he asked him, "What would you do with me if I should send you for the sons of Usnach, and if they were destroyed through me—a thing I do not mean to do?" "As I am not going to undertake it," said Conall, "I will say that it is not one alone I would kill, but any Ulsterman I would lay hold of that had harmed them would get shortening of life from me and the sorrow of death." "I see well," said Conchubar, "you are no friend of mine," and he put Conall away from him.

Then he called Cuchulain to him, and asked him the same as he did the other. "I give my word, as I am not going," said Cuchulain, "if you want that of me, and that you think to kill them when they come, it is not one person alone that would die for it, but every Ulsterman I could lay hold of would get shortening of life from me and the sorrow of death." "I see well," said Conchubar, "that you are no friend of mine." And he put Cuchulain from him.

And then he called Fergus to him, and asked him the same question, and Fergus said, "Whatever may happen, I promise your blood will be safe from me, but besides yourself there is no Ulsterman that would try to harm them, and that I would lay hold of, but I would give him shortening of life and the sorrow of death." "I see well," said Conchubar, "is it yourself must go for them, and it is tomorrow you must set out, for it is with you they will come, and when you are coming back to us westward, I put you under bonds to go first to the fort of Borach, son of Cainte, and give me your word now that as soon as you get there, you will send on the sons of Usnach to Emain, whether it be day or night at the time." After that the two of them went in together, and Fergus told all the company how it was under his charge they were to be put.

Then Conchubar went to Borach and asked had he a feast ready prepared for him. "I have," said Borach, "but although I was able to make it ready, I was not able to bring it to Emain." "If that is so," said Conchubar, "give it to Fergus when he comes back to Ireland, for it is geasa on him not to refuse your feast." Borach promised he would do that, and so they wore away that night.

So Fergus set out in the morning, and he brought no guard nor helpers with him, but himself and his two sons, Fair-Haired Iollan, and Rough-Red Buinne, and Cuilleán, the shield-bearer, and the shield itself. They went on till they got to the dwelling-place of the sons of Usnach, and to Loch Eitche in Alba. It is how the sons of Usnach lived: they had three houses; and the house where they made ready the food, it is not there they would eat it, and the house where they would eat it, it is not there they would sleep.

When Fergus came to the harbor he let a great shout out of him. And it is how Naoise and Deirdre were: they had a chessboard between them, and they playing on it. Naoise heard the shout, and he said, "That is the shout of a man of Ireland." "It is not, but the cry of a man of Alban," said Deirdre. She knew at the first it was Fergus gave the shout, but she denied it. Then Fergus let another shout out of him. "That is an Irish shout," said Naoise again. "It is not, indeed," said Deirdre; "let us go on playing." Then Fergus gave the third shout, and the sons of Usnach knew this time it was the shout of Fergus, and Naoise said to Ardan to go out and meet him. Then Deirdre told him that she herself knew at the first shout that it was Fergus. "Why did you deny it, then, Queen?" said Naoise. "Because of a vision I saw last night," said Deirdre. "Three birds I saw coming to us from Emain Macha, and three drops of honey in their mouths, and they left them with us, and three drops of our blood they brought away with them." "What meaning do you put on that, Queen?" said Naoise. "It is," said Deirdre, "Fergus that is coming to us with a message of peace from Conchubar, for honey is not sweeter than a message of peace sent by a lying man." "Let that pass," said Naoise. "Is there anything in it but troubled sleep and the melancholy of woman? And it is a long time Fergus is in the harbor. Rise up, Ardan, to be before him, and bring him with you here."

And Ardan went down to meet him, and gave a fond kiss to himself and to his two sons. And it is what he said: "My love to you, dear comrades." After that he asked news of Ireland, and they gave it to him, and then they came to where Naoise and Ainnle and Deirdre were, and they kissed Fergus and his two sons, and they asked news of Ireland from them. "It is the best news I have for you," said Fergus, "that Conchubar, King of Ulster, has sworn by the earth beneath him, by the high heaven above him, and by the sun that travels to the west, that he will have no rest by day nor sleep by night if the sons of Usnach, his own foster-brothers, will not come back to the land of their home and the country of their birth; and he has sent us to ask you there." "It is better for them to stop here," said Deirdre, "for they have a greater sway in Scotland than Conchubar himself has in Ireland." "One's own country is better than any other thing," said Fergus, "for no man can have any pleasure, however great his good luck and his way of living, if he does not see his own country every day." "That is true," said Naoise, "for Ireland is dearer to myself than Alban, though I would get more in Alban than in Ireland." "It will be safe for you to come with me," said Fergus. "It will be safe indeed," said Naoise, "and we will go with you to Ireland; and though there were no trouble beneath the sun, but a man to be far from his own land, there is little delight in peace and a long sleep to a man that is an exile. It is a pity for the man that is an exile; it is little his honor, it is great his grief, for it is he will have his share of wandering."

It was not with Deirdre's will Naoise said that, and she was greatly against going with Fergus. And she said: "I had a dream last night of the three sons of Usnach, and they bound and put in the grave by Conchubar of the Red Branch." But Naoise said: "Lay down your dream, Deirdre, on the heights of the hills, lay down your dream on the sailors of the sea, lay down your dream on the rough gray stones, for we will give peace and we will get it from the king of the world and from Conchubar." But Deirdre spoke again, and it is what she said: "There is the howling of dogs in my ears; a vision of the night is before my eyes; I see Fergus away from us; I see Conchubar without mercy in his dun; I see Naoise without strength in battle; I see Ainnle without his loud-sounding shield; I see Ardan without shield or breastplate, and the Hill of Atha without delight. I see Conchubar asking for blood; I see Fergus caught with hidden lies; I see Deirdre crying with tears. I see Deirdre crying with tears."

"A thing that is displeasing to me, and that I would never give in to," said Fergus, "is to listen to the howling of dogs and to the dreams of women; and since Conchubar, the High King, has sent a message of friendship, it would not be right for you to refuse it." "It would not be right, indeed," said Naoise, "and we will go with you tomorrow." And Fergus gave his word, and he said, "If all the men of Ireland were against you, it would not profit them, for neither shield nor sword nor a helmet itself would be any help or protection to them against you, and I myself to be with you." "That is true," said Naoise, "and we will go with you to Ireland."

They spent the night there until morning, and then they went where the ships were, and they went on the sea, and a good many of their people with them, and Deirdre looked back on the land of Alban, and it is what she said:

"My love to you, O land to the east, and it goes ill with me to leave you; for it is pleasant are your bays and your harbors and your wide, flowery plains and your green-sided hills; and little need was there for us to leave you." And she made this complaint:

"Dear to me is that land, that land to the east, 20 Alban, with its wonders; I would not have come from it hither but that I came with Naoise.

"Dear to me Dun Fiodhaigh⁵ and Dun Fionn; dear is the dun above them; dear to me Inis Droighnach; dear to me Dun Suibhne.

"O Coill Cuan! O chone! Coil Cuan! where Ainnle used to come. My grief! it was short I thought his stay there with Naoise in Western Alban. Glen Laoi, O Glen Laoi, where I used to sleep under soft coverings; fish and venison and 20 badger's flesh, that was my portion in Glen Laoi.

"Glen Masan, my grief! Glen Masan! high its hart's-tongue, bright its stalks; we were rocked to pleasant sleep over the wooded harbor of Masan.

"Glen Archan, my grief! Glen Archan, the straight valley of the pleasant ridge; never was there a young man more light-hearted than my Naoise used to be in Glen Archan.

"Glen Eitche, my grief! Glen Eitche, it was there I built my first house; beautiful were the woods 30 on our rising; the home of the sun is Glen Eitche.

"Glen-da-Rua, my grief! Glen-da-Rua, my love to every man that belongs to it; sweet is the voice of the cuckoo on the bending branch on the hill above Glen-da-Rua.

"Dear to me is Droighin over the fierce strand; dear are its waters over the clean sand. I would never have come out from it at all but that I came with my beloved!"

After she had made that complaint they came 40 to Dun Borach, and Borach gave three fond kisses to Fergus and to the sons of Usnach along with him. It was then Borach said he had a feast laid out for Fergus, and that it was geasa for him to leave it until he would have eaten it. But Fergus reddened with anger from head to foot, and it is what he said: "It is a bad thing you have done, Borach, laying out a feast for me, and Conchubar to have made me give my word that as soon as I would come to Ireland, whether it would be by 50 day or in the nighttime, I would send on the sons of Usnach to Emain Macha." "I hold you under bonds," said Borach, "to stop and use the feast."

Then Fergus asked Naoise what should he do about the feast. "You must choose," said Deirdre, "whether you will forsake the children of Usnach or the feast, and it would be better for you to refuse the feast than to forsake the sons of Usnach." "I will not forsake them," said he, "for I will send my two sons, Fair-Haired Iollan and Rough-Red Buinne, with them, to Emain Macha." "On my word," said Naoise, "that is a great deal to do for us; for up to this no other person ever protected us but ourselves." And he went out of the place in great anger; and Ainnle, and Ardan, and Deirdre, and the two sons of Fergus followed him, and they left Fergus dark and sorrowful after them. But for all that, Fergus was full sure that if all the provinces of Ireland would go into one council, they would not consent to break the pledge he had given.

As for the sons of Usnach, they went on their way by every short road, and Deirdre said to them, "I will give you a good advice, Sons of Usnach, though you may not follow it." "What is that advice, Queen?" said Naoise. "It is," said she, "to go to Rechrainn, between Ireland and Scotland, and to wait there until Fergus has done with the feast; and that will be the keeping of his word to Fergus, and it will be the lengthening of your lives to you." "We will not follow that advice," said Naoise; and the children of Fergus said it was little trust she had in them, when she thought they would not protect her, though their hands might not be so strong as the hands of the sons of Usnach; and besides that, Fergus had given them his word. "Alas! it is sorrow came on us with the word of Fergus," said Deirdre, "and he to forsake us for a feast"; and she made this complaint:

"It is grief to me that ever I came from the east on the word of the unthinking son of Rogh.⁶ It is only lamentations I will make. Och! it is very sorrowful my heart is!

"My heart is heaped up with sorrow; it is tonight my great hurt is. My grief! my dear companions, the end of your days is come."

And it is what Naoise answered her: "Do not say that in your haste, Deirdre, more beautiful than the sun. Fergus would never have come for us eastward to bring us back to be destroyed."

And Deirdre said, "My grief! I think it too far for you, beautiful sons of Usnach, to have come from Alban of the rough grass; it is lasting will be its lifelong sorrow."

After that they went forward to Finncairn of the watch-tower on sharp-peaked Slieve Fuad, and Deirdre stayed after them in the valley, and sleep fell on her there.

When Naoise saw that Deirdre was left after them, he turned back as she was rising out of her sleep, and he said, "What made you wait after us, Queen?" "Sleep that was on me," said Deirdre; "and I saw a vision in it." "What vision was that?" said Naoise. "It was," she said, "Fair-Haired Iollan that I saw without his head on him, and Rough-Red Buinne with his head on him; and it is without help of Rough-Red Buinne you were, and it is with the help of Fair-Haired Iollan you were." And she made this complaint:

"It is a sad vision has been shown to me, of my four tall, fair, bright companions; the head of each has been taken from him, and no help to be had one from another."

But when Naoise heard this he reproached her, and said, "O fair, beautiful woman, nothing does your mouth speak but evil. Do not let the sharpness and the great misfortune that come from it fall on your friends." And Deirdre answered him with kind, gentle words, and it is what she said: "It would be better to me to see harm come on any other person than upon any one of you three, with whom I have traveled over the seas and over the wide plains; but when I look on you, it is only Buinne I can see safe and whole, and I know that his life will be longest among you; and indeed it is I that am sorrowful tonight."

After that they came forward to the high willows, and it was then Deirdre said: "I see a cloud in the air, and it is a cloud of blood; and I would give you a good advice, Sons of Usnach," she said. "What is that advice?" said Naoise. "To go to Dundéalgan where Cuchulain is, until Fergus has done with the feast, and to be under the protection of Cuchulain, for fear of the treachery of Conchubar." "Since there is no fear on us, we will not follow that advice," said Naoise. And Deirdre complained, and it is what she said:

"O Naoise, look at the cloud I see above us in the air; I see a cloud over green Macha, cold and deep red like blood. I am startled by the cloud that I see here in the air; a thin, dreadful cloud that is like a clot of blood. I give a right advice to the beautiful sons of Usnach not to go to Emain tonight, because of the danger that is over them."

We will go to Dundéalgan, where the Hound of the Smith⁷ is; we will come tomorrow from the south along with the Hound, Cuchulain."

But Naoise said in his anger to Deirdre, "Since there is no fear on us, we will not follow your advice." And Deirdre turned to the grandsons of Rogh, and it is what she said: "It is seldom until now, Naoise, that yourself and myself were not of the one mind. And I say to you, Naoise, that you would not have gone against me like this the day Manannan gave me the cup in the time of his great victory."

After that they went on to Emain Macha. "Sons of Usnach," said Deirdre, "I have a sign by which you will know if Conchubar is going to do treachery on you." "What sign is that?" said Naoise. "If you are let come into the house where Conchubar is, and the nobles of Ulster, then Conchubar is not going to do treachery on you. But if it is in the House of the Red Branch you are put, then he is going to do treachery on you."

After that they came to Emain Macha, and they took the handwood and struck the door, and the doorkeeper asked who was there. They told him that it was the sons of Usnach, and Deirdre, and the two sons of Fergus were there.

When Conchubar heard that, he called his stewards and serving men to him, and he asked them how was the House of the Red Branch for food and for drink. They said that if all the seven armies of Ulster would come there, they would find what would satisfy them. "If that is so," said Conchubar, "bring the sons of Usnach into it."

It was then Deirdre said, "It would have been better for you to follow my advice, and never to have come to Emain, and it would be right for you to leave it, even at this time." "We will not," said Fair-Haired Iollan, "for it is not fear or cowardliness was ever seen on us, but we will go to the house." So they went on to the House of the Red Branch, and the stewards and the serving-men with them, and well-tasting food was served to them, and pleasant drinks, till they were all glad and merry, except only Deirdre and the sons of Usnach; for they did not use much food or drink, because of the length and the greatness of their journey from Dun Borach to Emain Macha. Then Naoise said, "Give the chessboard to us till we go playing." So they gave them the chessboard and they began to play.

It was just at that time Conchubar was asking, "Who will I send that will bring me word of ⁷ The literal meaning of Cuchulain, Irish god and hero.

Deirdre, and that will tell me if she has the same appearance and the same shape she had before, for if she has, there is not a woman in the world has a more beautiful shape or appearance than she has, and I will bring her out with edge of blade and point of sword in spite of the sons of Usnach, good though they be. But if not, let Naoise have her for himself." "I myself will go there," said Levarcham, "and I will bring you word of that." And it is how it was, Deirdre was dearer to her ¹⁰ than any other person in the world; for it was often she went through the world looking for Deirdre and bringing news to her and from her. So Levarcham went over to the House of the Red Branch, and near it she saw a great troop of armed men, and she spoke to them, but they made her no answer, and she knew by that it was none of the men of Ulster were in it, but men from some strange country that Conchubar's messengers had brought to Emain.

And then she went in where Naoise and Deirdre were, and it is how she found them, the polished chessboard between them, and they playing on it; and she gave them fond kisses, and she said: "You are not doing well to be playing; and it is to bring Conchubar word if Deirdre has the same shape and appearance she used to have that he sent me here now; and there is grief on me for the deed that will be done in Emain tonight, treachery that will be done, and the killing of kindred, and the ³⁰ three bright candles of the Gael to be quenched, and Emain will not be the better of it to the end of life and time"; and she made this complaint sadly and wearily:

"My heart is heavy for the treachery that is being done in Emain this night; on account of this treachery, Emain will never be at peace from this out.

"The three that are most king-like today under the sun; the three best of all that live on the earth, ⁴⁰ it is grief to me tonight they to die for the sake of any woman. Naoise and Ainnle, whose deeds are known, and Ardan, their brother; treachery is to be done on the young, bright-faced three; it is not I that am not sorrowful tonight."

When she had made this complaint, Levarcham said to the sons of Usnach and to the children of Fergus to shut close the doors and the windows of the house and to do bravely. "And, oh, sons of Fergus," she said, "defend your charge and your ⁵⁰ care bravely till Fergus comes, and you will have praise and a blessing for it." And she cried with many tears, and she went back to where Conchu-bar was, and he asked news of Deirdre of her. And Levarcham said, "It is good news and bad news I have for you." "What news is that?" said Conchubar. "It is the good news," she said, "the three sons of Usnach to have come to you and to be over there, and they are the three that are bravest and mightiest in form and in looks and in countenance, of all in the world; and Ireland will be yours from this out, since the sons of Usnach are with you; and the news that is worst with me is, the woman that was best of the women of the world in form and in looks, going out of Emain, is without the form and without the appearance she used to have."

When Conchubar heard that, much of his jealousy went backward, and he was drinking and making merry for a while, until he thought on Deirdre again the second time, and on that he asked, "Who will I get to bring me word of ²⁰ Deirdre?" But he did not find anyone would go there. And then he said to Gelban, the merry, pleasant son of the King of Lochlann: "Go over and bring me word if Deirdre has the same shape and the same appearance she used to have, for if she has, there is not on the ridge of the world or on the waves of the earth a woman more beautiful than herself."

So Gelban went to the House of the Red Branch, and he found the doors and the windows of the fort shut, and fear came on him. And it is what he said: "It is not an easy road for anyone that would get to the sons of Usnach, for I think there is very great anger on them." And after that he found a window that was left open by forgetfulness in the house, and he was looking in. Then Deirdre saw him through the window, and when she saw him looking at her, she went into a red blaze of blushes, and Naoise knew that someone was looking at her from the window, and she told him that she saw a young man looking in at them. It is how Naoise was at that time, with a man of the chessmen in his hand, and he made a fair throw over his shoulder at the young man, that put the eye out of his head. The young man went back to where Conchubar was. "You were merry and pleasant going out," said Conchubar, "but you are sad and cheerless coming back." And then Gelban told him the story from beginning to end. "I see well," said Conchubar, "the man that made that throw will be king of the world, unless he has his life shortened. And what appearance is there on Deirdre?" he said. "It is this," said Gelban: "although Naoise put out my eye, I would have wished to stay there looking at her with the other eye, but for the haste you put on me; for there is not in the world a woman is better of shape or of form than herself."

When Conchubar heard that, he was filled with jealousy and with envy, and he bade the men of his army that were with him, and that had been drinking at the feast, to go and attack the place where the sons of Usnach were. So they went forward to the House of the Red Branch, and they gave three great shouts around it, and they put fires and red flames to it. When the sons of Usnach heard the shouts, they asked who those men were that were about the house. "Conchubar and the men of Ulster," they all said together. "Is it the pledge of Fergus you would break?" said Fair-Haired Iollan. "On my word," said Conchubar, "there will be sorrow on the sons of Usnach, Deirdre to be with them." "That is true," said Deirdre; "Fergus has deceived you." "By my oath," said Rough-Red Buinne, "if he betrayed, we will not betray."

It was then Buinne went out and killed three-fifths of the fighting men outside, and put great disturbance on the rest; and Conchubar asked who was there, and who was doing destruction on his men like that. "It is I, myself, Rough-Red Buinne, son of Fergus," said he. "I will give you a good gift if you will leave off," said Conchubar. "What gift is that?" said Rough-Red Buinne. "A hundred of land," said Conchubar. "What besides?" said Rough-Red Buinne. "My own friendship and my counsel," said Conchubar. "I will take that," said Rough-Red Buinne. It was a good mountain that was given him as a reward, but it turned barren in the same night, and no green grew on it again forever, and it used to be called the Mountain of the Share of Buinne.

Deirdre heard what they were saying. "By my word," she said, "Rough-Red Buinne has forsaken you, and, in my opinion, it is like the father the son is." "I give my word," says Fair-Haired Iollan, "that is not so with me; as long as this narrow, straight sword stays in my hand, I will not forsake the sons of Usnach."

After that Fair-Haired Iollan went out, and made three courses around the house, and killed three-fifths of the heroes outside, and he came in again where Naoise was, and he playing chess, and Ainnle with him. So Iollan went out the second time, and made three other courses round the fort, and he brought a lighted torch with him on the lawn, and he went destroying the hosts, so that they dared not come to attack the house. And he was a good son, Fair-Haired Iollan, for he never refused any person on the ridge of the world anything that he had, and he never took wages from any person but only Fergus.

It was then Conchubar said: "What place is my own son, Fiacra the Fair?" "I am here, High Prince," said Fiacra. "By my word," said Conchubar, "it is on the one night yourself and Iollan were born, and as it is the arms of his father he has with him, let you take my arms with you, that is, my shield, the Ochain⁸ my two spears, and my great sword, the Gorm Glas, the Blue Green—and do bravery and great deeds with them."

Then Fiacra took Conchubar's arms, and he and Fair-Haired Iollan attacked one another, and they made a stout fight, one against the other. But however it was, Fair-Haired Iollan put down Fiacra, so that he made him lie under the shelter of his shield, till it roared for the greatness of the strait he was in; for it was the way with the Ochain, the shield of Conchubar, to roar when the person on whom it would be was in danger; and the three chief waves of Ireland, the Wave of Tuagh, the Wave of Cliodna, and the Wave of Rudraige, roared in answer to it.

It was at that time Conall Cearnach was at Dun Sobairce, and he heard the Wave of Tuagh. "True it is," said Conall, "Conchubar is in some danger, and it is not right for me to be here listening to him."

Conall rose up on that, and he put his arms and his armor on him, and came forward to where Conchubar was at Emain Macha, and he found the fight going on on the lawn, and Fiacra, the son of Conchubar, greatly pressed by Fair-Haired Iollan, and neither the King of Ulster nor any other person dared to go between them. But Conall went aside, behind Fair-Haired Iollan, and thrust his sword through him. "Who is it has wounded me behind my back?" said Fair-Haired Iollan. "Whoever did it, by my hand of valor, he would have got a fair fight, face to face, from myself." "Who are you yourself?" said Conall. "I am Iollan, son of Fergus, and are you yourself Conall?" "It is I," said Conall. "It is evil and it is heavy the work you have done," said Iollan, "and the sons of Usnach under my protection." "Is that true?" said Conall. "It is true, indeed," said Iollan. "By my hand of valor," said Conall, "Conchubar will not get his own son alive from me to avenge it," and he gave a stroke of the sword to Fiacra, so that he struck his head off, and he left them so. The clouds of death came upon Fair-Haired Iollan then, and he threw his arms toward the fortress, and called out to Naoise to do bravery, and after that he died.

It is then Conchubar himself came out and nineteen hundred men with him, and Conall said to him: "Go up now to the doorway of the fort, and see where your sister's children are lying on a bed of trouble." And when Conchubar saw them he said: "You are not sister's children to me; it is not the deed of sister's children you have done me, but you have done harm to me with treachery in the sight of all the men of Ireland." And it is what Ainnle said to him: "Although we took well-shaped, soft-handed Deirdre from you, yet we did a little kindness to you at another time, and this is the time to remember it. That day your ship was breaking up on the sea, and it full of gold and silver, we gave you up our own ship, and ourselves went swimming to the harbor."

But Conchubar said: "If you did fifty good deeds to me, surely this would be my thanks: I would not give you peace, and you in distress, but every great want I could put on you."

And then Ardan said: "We did another little kindness to you, and this is the time to remember it; the day the speckled horse failed you on the green of Dundéalgan, it was we gave you the gray horse that would bring you fast on your road."

But Conchubar said: "If you had done fifty good deeds to me, surely this would be my thanks: I would not give you peace, and you in distress, but every great want I could put on you."

And then Naoise said: "We did you another good deed, and this is the time to remember it; we have put you under many benefits; it is strong our right is to your protection."

"The time when Murcael, son of Brian, fought the seven battles at Beinn Etair, we brought you, without fail, the heads of the sons of the King of the Southeast."

But Conchubar said: "If you had done me fifty good deeds, surely this is my thanks: I would not give you peace in your distress, but every great want I could put upon you."

"Your death is not a death to me now, young sons of Usnach, since he that was innocent fell by you, the third best of the horsemen of Ireland."

Then Deirdre said: "Rise up, Naoise, take your sword, good son of a king, mind yourself well, for it is not long that life will be left in your fair body."

It is then all Conchubar's men came about the house, and they put fires and burning to it. Ardan went out then, and his men, and put out the fires and killed three hundred men. And Ainnle went out in the third part of the night, and he killed three hundred, and did slaughter and destruction on them.

And Naoise went out in the last quarter of the night, and drove away all the army from the house.

He came into the house after that, and it is then Deirdre rose up and said to him: "By my word, it is well you won your way; and do bravery and valor from this out; and it was bad advice you took when you ever trusted Conchubar."

As for the sons of Usnach, after that they made a good protection with their shields, and they put Deirdre in the middle and linked the shields around her, and they gave three leaps out over the walls of Emain, and they killed three hundred men in that sally.

When Conchubar saw that, he went to Cathbad the Druid, and said to him: "Go, Cathbad, to the sons of Usnach, and work enchantment on them; for unless they are hindered they will destroy the men of Ulster forever if they go away in spite of them; and I give the word of a true hero, they will get no harm from me, but let them only make agreement with me."

When Cathbad heard that, he agreed, believing him, and he went to the end of his arts and his knowledge to hinder the sons of Usnach, and he worked enchantment on them, so that he put the likeness of a dark sea about them, with hindering waves. And when Naoise saw the waves rising he put up Deirdre on his shoulder, and it is how the sons of Usnach were, swimming on the ground as they were going out of Emain; yet the men of Ulster did not dare to come near them until their swords had fallen from their hands. But after their swords fell from their hands, the sons of Usnach were taken. And when they were taken, Conchubar asked of the children of Durthacht to kill them. But the children of Durthacht said they would not do that. There was a young man with Conchubar whose name was Maine, and his surname Rough-Hand, son of the king of the fair Norwegians, and it is Naoise had killed his father and his two brothers; Athrac and Triathrach were their names. And he said he himself would kill the sons of Usnach. "If that is so," said Ardan, "kill me the first, for I am younger than my brothers, so that I will not see my brothers killed." "Let him not be killed but myself," said Ainnle. "Let that not be done," said Naoise, "for I have a sword that Manannan, son of Lir, gave me, and the stroke of it leaves nothing after it, track nor trace; and strike the three of us together, and we will die at the one time." "That is well," said they all, "and let you lay down your heads," they said. They did that, and Maine gave a strong quick blow of the sword on the three necks together on the block, and struck the three heads off them with one stroke; and the men of Ulster gave three loud sorrowful shouts, and cried aloud about them there.

As for Deirdre, she cried pitifully, wearily, and tore her fair hair, and she was talking on the sons of Usnach and on Alban, and it is what she said:

"A blessing eastward to Alban from me. Good is the sight of her bays and valleys; pleasant was it to sit on the slopes of her hills, where the sons of Usnach used to be hunting.

"One day, when the nobles of Scotland were drinking with the sons of Usnach, to whom they owed their affection, Naoise gave a kiss secretly to the daughter of the lord of Duntreon. He sent her a frightened deer, wild, and a fawn at its foot; and he went to visit her coming home from the host of Inverness. When myself heard that, my head filled full of jealousy; I put my boat on the waves; it was the same to me to live or to die. They followed me swimming, Ainnle and Ardan, that never said a lie; they turned me back again, two that would give battle to a hundred; Naoise gave me his true word, he swore three times, with his arms as witness, he would never put vexation on me again, until he would go from me to the hosts of the dead.

"Och! if she knew tonight, Naoise to be under a covering of clay, it is she would cry her fill, and it is I would cry along with her."

After she had made this complaint, seeing they were all taken up with one another, Deirdre came forward on the lawn, and she was running round and round, up and down, from one to another, and Cuchulain met her, and she told him the story from first to last, how it had happened to the sons of Usnach. It is sorrowful Cuchulain was for that, for there was not in the world a man was dearer to him than Naoise. And he asked who killed him. "Maine Rough-Hand," said Deirdre. Then Cuchulain went away, sad and sorrowful, to Dundee. After that Deirdre lay down by the grave, and they were digging earth from it, and she made this lament after the sons of Usnach:

"Long is the day without the sons of Usnach;

it was never wearisome to be in their company; sons of a king that entertained exiles; three lions of the Hill of the Cave.

"Three darlings of the women of Britain; three hawks of Slieve Cuilenn; sons of a king served by valor, to whom warriors did obedience. The three mighty bears; three lions of the fort of Conrach; three sons of a king who thought well of their praise; three nurslings of the men of Ulster.

"Three heroes not good at homage; their fall is a cause of sorrow; three sons of the sister of a king; three props of the army of Cuailgne.

"Three dragons of Dun Monadh, the three valiant men from the Red Branch; I myself will not be living after them, the three that broke hard battles.

"Three that were brought up by Aoife, to whom lands were under tribute; three pillars in the breach of battle; three pupils that were with Scathach.

"Three pupils that were with Uathach; three champions that were lasting in might; three shining sons of Usnach; it is weariness to be without them.

"The High King of Ulster, my first betrothed, I forsook for love of Naoise; short my life will be after him; I will make keening⁹ at their burial.

"That I would live after Naoise let no one think on the earth; I will not go on living after Ainnle and after Ardan.

"After them I myself will not live; three that would leap through the midst of battle; since my beloved is gone from me I will cry my fill over his grave.

"O young man, digging the new grave, do not make the grave narrow; I will be along with them in the grave, making lamentation and oches.

"Many the hardship I met with along with the three heroes. I suffered want of house, want of fire; it is myself that used not to be troubled.

"Their three shields and their spears made a bed for me often. O young man, put their three swords close over their grave.

"Their three hounds, their three hawks, will be from this time without huntsmen; three helpers of every battle; three pupils of Conall Cearnach.

"The three leashes of those three hounds have brought a sigh from my heart. It is I had the care of them; the sight of them is a cause of grief.

"I was never one day alone to the day of the making of this grave, though it is often that myself and yourselves were in loneliness.

"My sight is gone from me with looking at the grave of Naoise; it is short till my life will leave me, and those who would have keened me do not live.

⁹ Lamentations at the funeral.

"Since it is through me they were betrayed I will be tired out with sorrow; it is a pity I was not in the earth before the sons of Usnach were killed.

"Sorrowful was my journey with Fergus, betraying me to the Red Branch; we were deceived all together with his sweet, flowery words. I left the delights of Ulster for the three heroes that were bravest; my life will not be long, I myself am alone after them.

"I am Deirdre without gladness, and I at the end of my life; since it is grief to be without them, I myself will not be long after them."

After that complaint Deirdre loosed out her hair, and threw herself on the body of Naoise before it was put into the grave and gave three kisses to him, and when her mouth touched his blood, the color of burning sods came into her cheeks, and she rose up like one that had lost her wits, and she went on through the night till she came to where the waves were breaking on the strand. And a fisherman was there and his wife, and they brought her into their cabin and sheltered her, and she neither smiled nor laughed, nor took food, drink, or sleep, nor raised her head from her knees, but was crying always after the sons of Usnach.

But when she could not be found at Emain, Conchubar sent Levarcham to look for her, and to bring her back to his palace, that he might make her his wife. And Levarcham found her in the fisherman's cabin, and she bade her come back to Emain, where she would have protection and riches and all that she would ask. And she gave her this message she brought from Conchubar: "Come up to my house, O branch with the dark eyelashes, and there need be no fear on your fair face, of hatred or of jealousy or of reproach." And Deirdre said: "I will not go up to his house, for it is not land or earth or food I am wanting, or gold or silver or horses, but leave to go to the grave where the sons of Usnach are lying, till I give the three honey kisses to their three white, beautiful bodies." And she made this complaint:

"Make keening for the heroes that were killed on their coming to Ireland; stately they used to be, coming to the house, the three great sons of Usnach.

"The sons of Usnach fell in the fight like three branches that were growing straight and nice, and they destroyed in a heavy storm that left neither bud nor twig of them.

"Naoise, my gentle, well-learned comrade, make no delay in crying him with me; cry for Ardan that killed the wild boars; cry for Ainnle whose strength was great.

"It was Naoise that would kiss my lips, my first man and my first sweetheart; it was Ainnle would pour out my drink; and it was Ardan would lay my pillow.

"Though sweet to you is the mead that is drunk by the soft-living son of Ness,¹⁰ the food of the sons of Usnach was sweeter to me all through my lifetime.

"Whenever Naoise would go out to hunt through the woods or the wide plains, all the meat he would bring back was better to me than honey.

"Though sweet to you are the sounds of pipes and of trumpets, it is truly, I say to the King, I have heard music that is sweeter.

"Delightful to Conchubar, the king, are pipes and trumpets; but the singing of the sons of Usnach was more delightful to me.

"It was Naoise had the deep sound of the waves in his voice; it was the song of Ardan that was good, and the voice of Ainnle toward their green dwelling-place.

"Their birth was beautiful and their blossoming, as they grew to the strength of manhood; sad is the end today, the sons of Usnach to be cut down.

"Dear were their pleasant words, dear their young, high strength; in their going through the plains of Ireland there was a welcome before the coming of their strength.

"Dear their gray eyes that were loved by women; many looked on them as they went. When they went freely searching through the woods, their steps were pleasant on the dark mountain.

"I do not sleep at any time, and the color is gone from my face; there is no sound can give me delight since the sons of Usnach do not come.

"I do not sleep through the night; my senses are scattered away from me; I do not care for food or drink. I have no welcome today for the pleasant drink of nobles, or ease, or comfort, or delight, or a great house, or the palace of a king.

"Do not break the strings of my heart as you took hold of my young youth, Conchubar; though my darling is dead, my love is strong to live. What is country to me, or land, or lordship? What are swift horses? What are jewels and gold? Och! it is I will be lying tonight on the strand like the beautiful sons of Usnach."

So Levarcham went back to Conchubar to tell him what way Deirdre was, and that she would not come with her to Emain Macha.

And when she was gone, Deirdre went out on the strand, and she found a carpenter making an oar for a boat, and making a mast for it, clean and straight, to put up a sail to the wind. And when she saw him making it, she said: "It is a sharp knife you have, to cut the oar so clean and so straight, and if you will give it to me," she said, "I will give you a ring of the best gold in Ireland¹⁰ for it, the ring that belonged to Naoise, and that was with him through the battle and through the fight; he thought much of it in his lifetime; it is pure gold, through and through." So the carpenter took the ring in his hand, and the knife in the other hand, and he looked at them together, and he gave her the knife for the ring, and for her asking and her tears. Then Deirdre went close to the waves, and she said: "Since the other is not with me now, I will spend no more of my lifetime²⁰ without him." And with that she drove the black knife into her side, but she drew it out again and threw it in the sea to her right hand, the way no one would be blamed for her death.

Then Conchubar came down to the strand and five hundred men along with him, to bring Deirdre away to Emain Macha, but all he found before him was her white body on the ground, and it without life. And it is what he said: "A thousand deaths on the time I brought death on my sister's children;³⁰ now I am myself without Deirdre, and they themselves are without life.

"They were my sister's children, the three brothers I vexed with blows, Naoise, and Ainnle, and Ardan; they have died along with Deirdre."

And they took her white, beautiful body, and laid it in a grave, and a flagstone was raised over her grave, and over the grave of the sons of Usnach, and their names were written in Ogham, and keening was made for their burial.

And as to Fergus, son of Rogh, he came on the day after the children of Usnach were killed, to Emain Macha. And when he found they had been killed and his pledge to them broken, he himself, and Cormac Conloingeas, Conchubar's own son, and Dubthach, the Beetle of Ulster, with their men, made an attack on Conchubar's house and men, and a great many were killed by them, and Emain Macha was burned and destroyed.

And after doing that, they went into Connaught,⁵⁰ to Ailell and to Maeve at Cruachan, and they were made welcome there, and they took service with them and fought with them against Ulster because of the treachery that was done by Conchubar. And that is the way Fergus and the others came to be on the side of the men of Connaught in the war for the Brown Bull of Cuailgne.

And Cathbad laid a curse on Emain Macha, on account of that great wrong. And it is what he said, that none of the race of Conchubar should have the kingdom, to the end of life and time.

And that came true, for the most of Conchubar's sons died in his own lifetime, and when he was near his death, he bade the men of Ulster bring back Cormac Conloingeas out of Cruachan, and give him the kingdom.

So they sent messengers to Cormac, and he set out and his three troops of men with him, and he left his blessing with Ailell and with Maeve, and he promised them a good return for all the kind treatment they had given him. And they crossed the river at Athluain, and there they saw a red woman at the edge of the ford, and she washing her chariot and her harness. And after that they met a young girl coming toward them, and a light-green cloak about her, and a brooch of precious stones at her breast. And Cormac asked her was she coming with them, and she said she was not, and it would be better for himself to turn back, for the ruin of his life was come.

And he stopped for the night at the House of the Two Smiths on the hill of Bruighean Mor, the great dwelling-place.

But a troop of the men of Connaught came about the house in the night, for they were on the way home after destroying and robbing a district of Ulster, and they thought to make an end of Cormac before he would get to Emain.

And it chanced there was a great harper, Craiftine, living close by, and his wife, Sceanb, daughter of Scethern, a Druid of Connaught, loved Cormac⁴⁰ Conloingeas, and three times she had gone to meet him at Athluain, and she planted three trees there—Grief, and Dark, and Dumbness.

And there was great hatred and jealousy of Cormac on Craiftine, so when he knew the men of Connaught were going to make an attack on him, he went outside the house with his harp, and played a soft, sleepy tune to him, the way he had not the strength to rouse himself up, and himself and the most of his people were killed. And Amergin, that had gone with the message to him, made his grave and his mound, and the place is called Cluain Duma, the Lawn of the Mound.

SEUMAS MACMANUS

The Amadan of the Dough

There was a king once on a time that had a son that was an Amadan [half-foolish fellow]. The Amadan's mother died, and the king married again.

The Amadan's step-mother was always afraid of him beating her children, he was growing so big and strong. So to keep him from growing and to weaken him, she had him fed on dough made of raw meal and water, and for that he was called "The Amadan of the Dough." But instead of getting weaker, it was getting stronger the Amadan was on this fare, and he was able to thrash all of his step-brothers together.

At length his step-mother told his father that he would have to drive the Amadan away. The father consented to put him away; but the Amadan refused to go till his father would give him a sword—so sharp that it would cut a pack of wool falling on it.

After a great deal of time and trouble the father got such a sword and gave it to the Amadan; and when the Amadan had tried it and found it what he wanted, he bade them all good-by and set off.

For seven days and seven nights he traveled away before him without meeting anything wonderful, but on the seventh night he came up to a great castle. He went in and found no one there, but he found a great dinner spread on the table in the hall. So to be making the most of his time, down the Amadan sat at the table and whacked away.

When he had finished with his dinner, up to the castle came three young princes, stout, strong, able fellows, but very, very tired, and bleeding from wounds all over them.

They struck the castle with a flint, and all at once the whole castle shone as if it were on fire.

The Amadan sprang at the three of them to kill them. He said, "What do you mean by putting the castle on fire?"

"O Amadan," they said, "don't interfere with us, for we are nearly killed as it is. The castle isn't on fire. Every day we have to go out to fight three giants—Slat Mor, Slat Marr, and Slat Beag. We fight them all day long, and just as night is falling we have them killed. But however it comes, in the night they always come to life again, and if they didn't see this castle lit up, they'd come in on top of us and murder us while we slept. So every night, when we come back from the fight, we light up the castle. Then we can sleep in peace until morning, and in the morning go off and fight the giants again."

When the Amadan heard this, he wondered; and he said he would very much like to help them kill the giants. They said they would be very glad to have such a fine fellow's help; and so it was agreed that the Amadan should go with them to the fight next day.

Then the three princes washed themselves and took their supper, and they and the Amadan went to bed.

In the morning all four of them set off, and traveled to the Glen of the Echoes, where they met the three giants.

"Now," says the Amadan, "if you three will engage the two smaller giants, Slat Marr and Slat Beag, I'll engage Slat Mor myself and kill him."

They agreed to this.

Now the smallest of the giants was far bigger and more terrible than anything ever the Amadan had seen or heard of in his life before, so you can fancy what Slat Mor must have been like.

But the Amadan was little concerned at this. He went to meet Slat Mor, and the two of them fell to the fight, and a great, great fight they had. They made the hard ground into soft,¹ and the soft into spring wells; they made the rock into pebbles, and the pebbles into gravel, and the gravel fell over the country like hailstones. All the birds of the air from the lower end of the world to the upper end of the world, and all the wild beasts and tame from the four ends of the earth, came flocking to see the fight; and in the end the Amadan ran Slat Mor through with his sword and laid him down dead.

Then he turned to help the three princes, and very soon he laid the other two giants down dead for them also.

Then the three princes said they would all go home. The Amadan told them to go, but warned them not to light up the castle this night, and said he would sit by the giants' corpses and watch if they came to life again.

The three princes begged of him not to do this, for the three giants would come to life, and then he, having no help, would be killed.

The Amadan was angry with them, and ordered them off instantly. Then he sat down by the giants' corpses to watch. But he was so tired from his great day's fighting that by and by he fell asleep.

After twelve o'clock at night, when the Amadan was sleeping soundly, up comes a cailliach [old hag] and four badachs [unwieldy big fellows], and the cailliach carried with her a feather and a bottle of iocshlainte [ointment of health], with which she began to rub the giants' wounds.

Two of the giants were already alive when the Amadan awoke, and the third was just opening his eyes. Up sprang the Amadan, and at him leaped them all—Slat Mor, Slat Marr, Slat Beag, the cailliach, and the four badachs.

If the Amadan had had a hard fight during the day, this one was surely ten times harder. But a brave and a bold fellow he was, and not to be daunted by numbers or showers of blows. They fought for long and long. They made the hard ground into soft, and the soft into spring wells; they made the rocks into pebbles, and the pebbles into gravel, and the gravel fell over the country like hailstones. All the birds of the air from the lower end of the world to the upper end of the world, and all the wild beasts and tame from the four ends of the earth, came flocking to see the fight; and one after the other of them the Amadan ran his sword through, until he had every one of them stretched on the ground, dying or dead.

And when the old cailliach was dying, she called the Amadan to her and put him under geasa [an obligation that he could not shirk] to lose the power of his feet, of his strength, of his sight, and of his memory if he did not go to meet and fight the Black Bull of the Brown Wood.

When the old hag died outright, the Amadan rubbed some of the iocshlainte to his wounds with the feather, and at once he was as hale and as fresh as when the fight began. Then he took the feather and the bottle of iocshlainte, buckled on his sword, and started away before him to fulfill his geasa.

He traveled for the length of all that lee-long day, and when night was falling, he came to a little hut on the edge of a wood; and the hut had no shelter inside or out but one feather over it, and there was a rough, red woman standing in the door.

"You're welcome," says she, "Amadan of the Dough, the King of Ireland's son. What have you been doing or where are you going?"

"Last night," says the Amadan, "I fought a great fight, and killed Slat Mor, Slat Marr, Slat Beag, the Cailliach of the Rocks, and four badachs. Now I'm under geasa to meet and to fight the Black Bull of the Brown Wood. Can you tell me where to find him?"

"I can that," says she, "but it's now night. Come in and eat and sleep."

So she spread for the Amadan a fine supper, and made a soft bed, and he ate heartily and slept heartily that night.

In the morning she called him early, and she directed him on his way to meet the Black Bull of the Brown Wood. "But my poor Amadan," she said, "no one has ever yet met that bull and come back alive."

She told him that when he reached the place of meeting, the bull would come tearing down the hill like a hurricane. "Here's a cloak," says she, "to throw upon the rock that is standing there. You hide yourself behind the rock, and when the bull comes tearing down, he will dash at the cloak, and blind himself with the crash against the rock. Then you jump on the bull's back and fight for life. If, after the fight, you are living, come back and see me; and if you are dead, I'll go and see you."

The Amadan took the cloak, thanked her, and set off, and traveled on and on until he came to the place of meeting.

When the Amadan came there, he saw the Bull of the Brown Wood come tearing down the hill like a hurricane, and he threw the cloak on the rock and hid behind it, and with the fury of his dash against the cloak the bull blinded himself, and the roar of his fury split the rock.

The Amadan lost no time jumping on his back, and with his sword began hacking and slashing him; but he was no easy bull to conquer, and a great fight the Amadan had. They made the hard ground into soft, and the soft into spring wells; they made the rocks into pebbles, and the pebbles into gravel, and the gravel fell over the country like hailstones. All the birds of the air from the lower end of the world to the upper end of the world, and all the wild beasts and tame from the four ends of the earth, came flocking to see the fight; at length, after a long time, the Amadan ran his sword right through the bull's heart, and the bull fell down dead. But before he died he put the Amadan under geasa to meet and to fight the White Wether of the Hill of the Waterfalls.

Then the Amadan rubbed his own wounds with the iocshlainte, and he was as fresh and hale as when he went into the fight. Then he set out and traveled back again to the little hut that had no shelter without or within, only one feather over it, and the rough, red woman was standing in the door, and she welcomed the Amadan and asked him the news.

He told her all about the fight, and that the Black Bull of the Wood had put him under geasa to meet and to fight the White Wether of the Hill of the Waterfalls.

"I'm sorry for you, my poor Amadan," says she, "for no one ever before met that White Wether and came back alive. But come in and eat and rest anyhow, for you must be both hungry and sleepy."

So she spread him a hearty meal and made him a soft bed, and the Amadan ate and slept heartily; and in the morning she directed him to where he would meet the White Wether of the Hill of the Waterfalls. And she told him that no steel was tougher than the hide of the White Wether, that a sword was never yet made that could go through it, and that there was only one place—a little white spot just over the wether's heart—where he could be killed or sword could cut through. And she told the Amadan that his only chance was to hit this spot.

The Amadan thanked her, and set out. He traveled away and away before him until he came to the Hill of the Waterfalls, and as soon as he reached it he saw the White Wether coming tearing toward him in a furious rage, and the earth he was throwing up with his horns was shutting out the sun.

And when the wether came up and asked the Amadan what great feats he had done that made him impudent enough to dare to come there, the Amadan said: "With this sword I have killed Slat Mor, Slat Marr, Slat Beag, the Cailliach of the Rocks and her four badachs, and likewise the Black Bull of the Brown Wood."

"Then," said the White Wether, "you'll never kill any other." And at the Amadan he sprang.

The Amadan struck at him with his sword, and the sword glanced off as if it might off steel. Both of them fell to the fight with all their hearts, and such a fight never was before or since. They made the hard ground into soft, and the soft into spring wells; they made the rocks into pebbles, and the pebbles into gravel, and the gravel fell over the country like hailstones. All the birds of the air from the lower end of the world to the upper end of the world, and all the wild beasts and tame from the four ends of the earth, came flocking to see the fight. But at length and at last, after a long and terrible fight, the Amadan seeing the little spot above the heart that the red woman had told him of, struck for it and hit it, and drove his sword through the White Wether's heart, and he fell down. And when he was dying, he called the Amadan and put him under a geasa to meet and fight the Beggarman of the King of Sweden.

The Amadan took out his bottle of iocshlainte and rubbed himself with the iocshlainte, and he was as fresh and hale as when he began the fight. Then he set out again, and when night was falling, he reached the hut that had no shelter within or without, only one feather over it, and the rough, red woman was standing in the door.

Right glad she was to see the Amadan coming back alive, and she welcomed him heartily and asked him the news.

He told her of the wonderful fight he had had, and that he was now under geasa to meet and fight the Beggarman of the King of Sweden.

She made him come in and eat and sleep, for he was tired and hungry. And heartily the Amadan ate and heartily he slept; and in the morning she called him early, and directed him on his way to meet the Beggarman of the King of Sweden.

She told him that when he reached a certain hill, the beggarman would come down from the sky in a cloud; and that he would see the whole world between the beggarman's legs and nothing above his head. "If ever he finds himself beaten," she said, "he goes up into the sky in a mist, and stays there to refresh himself. You may let him go up once; but if you let him go up the second time, he will surely kill you when he comes down. Remember that. If you are alive when the fight is over, come to see me. If you are dead, I will go to see you."

The Amadan thanked her, parted with her, and traveled away and away before him until he reached the hill which she had told him of. And when he came there, he saw a great cloud that shot out of the sky, descending on the hill, and when it came down on the hill and melted away, there it left the Beggarman of the King of Sweden standing, and between his legs the Amadan saw the whole world and nothing over his head.

And with a roar and a run the beggarman made for the Amadan, and the roar of him rattled the stars in the sky. He asked the Amadan who he was, and what he had done to have the impudence to come there and meet him.

The Amadan said: "They call me the Amadan of the Dough, and I have killed Slat Mor, Slat Marr, Slat Beag, the Cailliach of the Rocks and her four badachs, the Black Bull of the Brown Wood, and the White Wether of the Hill of the Waterfalls, and before night I'll have killed the Beggarman of the King of Sweden."

"That you never will, you miserable object," says the beggarman. "You're going to die now, and I'll give you your choice to die either by a hard squeeze of wrestling or a stroke of the sword."

"Well," says the Amadan, "if I have to die, I'd sooner die by a stroke of the sword."

"All right," says the beggarman, and drew his sword.

But the Amadan drew his sword at the same time, and both went to it. And if his fights before had been hard, this one was harder and greater and more terrible than the others put together. They made the hard ground into soft, and the soft into spring wells; they made the rocks into pebbles, and the pebbles into gravel, and the gravel fell over the country like hailstones. All the birds of the air from the lower end of the world to the upper end of the world, and all the wild beasts and tame from the four ends of the earth, came flocking to see the fight. And at length the fight was putting so hard upon the beggarman, and he was getting so weak, that he whistled, and the mist came around him, and he went up into the sky before the Amadan knew. He remained there until he refreshed himself, and then came down again, and at it again he went for the Amadan, and fought harder and harder than before, and again it was putting too hard on him, and he whistled as before for the mist to come down and take him up.

But the Amadan remembered what the red woman had warned him; he gave one leap into the air, and coming down, drove the sword through the beggarman's heart, and the beggarman fell dead. But before he died he put geasa on the Amadan to meet and fight the Silver Cat of the Seven Glens.

The Amadan rubbed his wounds with the io-cshlainte, and he was as fresh and hale as when he began the fight; and then he set out, and when night was falling, he reached the hut that had no shelter within or without, only one feather over it, and the rough, red woman was standing in the door.

Right glad she was to see the Amadan coming back alive, and she welcomed him right heartily, and asked him the news.

He told her that he had killed the beggarman, and said he was now under geasa to meet and fight the Silver Cat of the Seven Glens.

"Well," she said, "I'm sorry for you, for no one ever before went to meet the Silver Cat and came back alive. But," she says, "you're both tired and hungry; come in and rest and sleep."

So in the Amadan went, and had a hearty supper and a soft bed; and in the morning she called him up early, and she gave him directions where to meet the cat and how to find it, and she told him there was only one vital spot on that cat, and it was a black speck on the bottom of the cat's stomach, and unless he could happen to run his sword right through this, the cat would surely kill him. She said:

"My poor Amadan, I'm very much afraid you'll not come back alive. I cannot go to help you myself or I would; but there is a well in my garden, and by watching that well I will know how the fight goes with you. While there is honey on top of the well, I will know you are getting the better of the cat; but if the blood comes on top, then the cat is getting the better of you; and if the blood stays there, I will know, my poor Amadan, that you are dead."

The Amadan bade her good-by, and set out to travel to where the Seven Glens met at the Sea. Here there was a precipice, and under the precipice a cave. In this cave the Silver Cat lived, and once a day she came out to sun herself on the rocks.

The Amadan let himself down over the precipice by a rope, and he waited until the cat came out to sun herself.

When the cat came out at twelve o'clock and saw the Amadan, she let a roar out of her that drove back the waters of the sea and piled them up a quarter of a mile high, and she asked him who he was and how he had the impudence to come there to meet her.

The Amadan said: "They call me the Amadan of the Dough, and I have killed Slat Mor, Slat Marr, Slat Beag, the Cailliach of the Rocks and her four badachs, the Black Bull of the Brown Woods, the White Wether of the Hill of the Waterfalls, and the Beggarman of the King of Sweden, and before night I will have killed the Silver Cat of the Seven Glens."

"That you never will," says she, "for a dead man you will be yourself." And at him she sprang.

But the Amadan raised his sword and struck at her, and both of them fell to the fight, and a great, great fight they had. They made the hard ground into soft, and the soft into spring wells; they made the rocks into pebbles, and the pebbles into gravel, and the gravel fell over the country like hailstones. All the birds of the air from the lower end of the world to the upper end of the world, and all the wild beasts and tame from the four ends of the earth, came flocking to see the fight; and if the fights that the Amadan had had on the other days were great and terrible, this one was far greater and far more terrible than all the others put together, and the poor Amadan sorely feared that before night fell he would be a dead man.

The red woman was watching at the well in her garden, and she sorely distressed, for though at one time the honey was uppermost, at another time it was all blood, and again the blood and the honey mixed; so she felt bad for the poor Amadan.

At length the blood and the honey got mixed again, and it remained that way until night; so she cried, for she believed the Amadan himself was dead as well as the Silver Cat.

And so he was. For when the fight had gone on for long and long, the cat, with a great long nail which she had in the end of her tail, tore him open from mouth to his toes; and as she tore the Amadan open and he was about to fall, she opened her mouth so wide that the Amadan saw down to the very bottom of her stomach, and there he saw the black speck that the red woman had told him of. And just before he dropped he drove his sword through this spot, and the Silver Cat, too, fell over dead.

It was not long now till the red woman arrived at the place and found both the Amadan and the cat lying side by side dead. At this the poor woman was frantic with sorrow, but suddenly she saw by the Amadan's side the bottle of iocshlainte and the feather. She took them up and rubbed the Amadan with the iocshlainte, and he jumped to his feet alive and well, and fresh as when he began the fight.

He smothered her with kisses and drowned her with tears. He took the red woman with him, and set out on his journey back, and traveled and traveled on and on till he came to the Castle of Fire.

Here he met the three young princes, who were now living happily with no giants to molest them. They had one sister, the most beautiful young maiden that the Amadan had ever beheld. They gave her to the Amadan in marriage, and gave her half of all they owned for fortune.

The marriage lasted nine days and nine nights. There were nine hundred fiddlers, nine hundred fluters, and nine hundred pipers, and the last day and night of the wedding were better than the first.

FRENCH AND SPANISH ROMANCE

The country in which romance reached full bloom and acquired its characteristic form and style was France. There chivalry first became fashionable, and developed a system of customs, formalities, and obligations. Chivalry gave the nobility self-confidence and an exalted sense of its position; and the vigorous training of aspirants to knighthood and the tournaments in which the knights engaged ensured a "physically fit" ruling class. But chivalry was not regarded as simply utilitarian. It was a code of social behavior that cemented feudal relationships by investing a vassal's loyalty to his lord with dignity and idealism; that raised woman's status in medieval society and gave her an opportunity to exert a civilizing influence on manners; and that gave worldly love, refined of brutish sensuality, a place in the bleak fortresses of the feudal nobility.

Marriage in feudal society was a business affair concerned with joining land to land and matters of inheritance. Romantic feeling found its outlet, not in these marriages of convenience but in the fashionable system of courtly love, under which women could enjoy the attentions of men other than their husbands, and men could form attachments for women other than their wives. These were often innocent, and may be described as a highly formal kind of flirtation, though the formalities could also serve as a cover for genuine passion or actual adultery. But even when entirely "platonic," the idealization of women introduced an element of romantic gratification into the relations of the sexes.

The cultural and literary effect of courtly love can hardly be overestimated. It left an indelible mark on nearly a thousand years of Western civilization. The literature that grew up around romantic love in the age of chivalry virtually began modern literature. Its spirit is found in the many modern poems, plays, stories, and novels that treat the pleasantries or the passions of love, whether the treatment be romantic or realistic, superficial or psychological.

This literature arose in southern France or the Provence. It is called "romance" because it was first composed in the romance languages of France and Italy. The fact that these became a literary medium proved to be of the greatest importance. If we owed nothing more to medieval romance than that it started literature in the new languages of Europe, our debt would be enormous.

Classical Latin is a precise tongue, hemmed in with many grammatical rules and syntactical constructions. But when the Roman legions invaded Gaul and Spain, settled there and intermarried with the natives, the "low Latin" they brought with them was not the Latin of Cicero but Latin dialect. In time accents were shifted and case endings were dropped; the word order, so carefully balanced and so formal, was changed and simplified; words assumed new meanings, and new words were added from Celtic, Germanic, and even Arabic. As a result, the romance languages were born. At first they were little more than a profusion of local dialects; then in each country one dialect became dominant as some province or city became socially and politically supreme. Modern Italian is the dialect of Florence or its province Tuscany, the dialect spoken by Dante; modern French grew out of the dialect of the northern French and their capital, Paris; modern Spanish is derived from the dialect of the kingdom of

The first of the romance tongues to become a literary vehicle was the dialect of Provence. During medieval time two main languages could be distinguished, those of southern and northern France, corresponding to two political and cultural divisions. The former was called langue d'oc, because it used the word oc for "yes," from the Latin word hoc. The latter was called langue d'œil, because the word for "yes" was œil, which ultimately became the modern French oui. Provençal was spoken in France south of the Loire River, and extended into northern Italy and northeastern Spain.

A new civilization, after the fall of Rome, first appeared in the sunny regions of the south—in the Spanish, French, and Italian Riviera—and its center was Provence, so called because it had been the first province conquered by Rome outside Italy. Here, during the Germanic invasions, Roman civilization suffered less destruction than anywhere else. The land was protected by mountains, but was not isolated because it bordered on the Mediterranean, and Marseilles became a thriving seaport. The countryside was fertile and the towns plied many crafts, making leather, cloth, soap and jewelry. Wealth and luxury increased, and with them leisure; and consequently culture could thrive as nowhere else. Contact with Arabian civilization augmented it, and the customary tolerance of a folk engaged in commerce and travel enabled the people of the Provence to assimilate other cultures. The Arabs, then at the peak of their civilization, contributed valuable knowledge, and the Jews actually maintained a university in Montpellier, where they taught philosophy and medicine. The aristocracy was less warlike and caste-conscious than in the North, and even admitted wealthy merchants into its ranks; and both the nobles and the magnates were zealous patrons of art.

Courtly love was the creation of the Provence. As the historian Osborne notes, "It was natural that the conception of love as an art to be practiced for art's sake, should grow up and flourish in this luxurious and leisured society." Courtly love was full of conceits and pleasurable extravagances, with a touch of oriental warmth and luxuriance such as characterized Arabian poetry. A knight, who was conceived to be a man of great spirit, was expected to respond fully to the tender passion; a knight without love was "a husk without grain," according to a poet from Auvergne. A virtual Code became fashionable, and decisions were given on questions of love by arbiters of elegance, mostly ladies of rank, who constituted so-called Courts of Love.

The poets of the Provence, who were called *troubadours*¹ were courtly singers. Many of them were the friends of princes and had social rank; some were princes and kings, like William, the Duke of Anjou, and Richard-the-Lion-Hearted. Some of them had a smattering of Latin literature, particularly of Ovid's verses, but most of them probably could not read or write. They transmitted their songs orally to professional minstrels, known as jongleurs, who spread them from place to place. The troubadours often composed both the words and the music, singing their compositions themselves, or hiring professional singers. They were the first to bring poetic composition to the level of a craft, since they went far beyond the simple, though lovely, lyrics of the common folk, creating elaborate stanzas and making rhyme a characteristic of European lyric verse. Their poems have been called "a fascinating jingle of cunningly disposed rhymes, fleet as the feet of dancing youths, tinkling as silver bells." No wonder that they received many honors, and that their number multiplied so rapidly that more than five hundred poets' names have come down to us. They were the singers of a "gay science" (gaya scienza) for a society that was in its day the least medieval and closest in spirit to the worldly renaissance of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries.

In time, the Provence became decadent, and began to be troubled by civil and religious dissension. Many people in southern France belonged to the Albigensian sect² which held Manichean beliefs. The Church of Rome called a crusade against them, and northern knights took the opportunity to plunder the rich province. The Provence never recovered.

Provençal poetry, however, could not be extinguished, for by now it was the common possession of France, Italy, Germany, and England. Its forms became standard modes of poetic expression. Among these were the chanzo or canzo (chanson, in northern France), whose theme was love; the tenso, a witty debate in dialogue; the alba (in northern France aubade), a song of dawn in which secret lovers are compelled to separate by the approach of day;³ the sirvente, a satire or a comment on political or moral matters; and the planh, a lament for the poet's patron or his lady-love. Greater love poets than the rather superficial troubadours were to come—Dante, Petrarch, Shakespeare, and Heine. Indeed, there was no limit to the variations that were to be played on the Provençal singers' themes, though theirs is the credit for having planted the seed. And in northern France, their fellow-minstrels, the trouvères, began very soon to create romances that had greater scope and interest. The trouvères considered themselves more professional than the troubadours, and were less interested in song than in narration. They started the French toward mastery of the field of fiction.

One of the trouvères, Jean Bodel, divided his fellow-narrators' subject material into three parts—the matter (matière) of France, Bretagne or Britain, and Rome. This does not mean that three main plots were repeated by the minstrels, but that their greatly varied stories fell into one of three cycles or types.

The "matter of Rome" consisted of tales about Alexander the Great and Virgil's and Homer's heroes, to whom were attributed the most fabulous characteristics and events. Everything was treated anachronistically, the poets attributing romantic and feudal details to classic material without the slightest realization that these were ridiculously inappropriate. Most of these romances were inferior to other narratives, but they had a great vogue. (The first book Caxton printed in English was a History of Troy.) They revived some interest in classical tradition, thus preparing the way somewhat for the Renaissance, and they gave to Boccaccio and Chaucer the unstable heroine Cressida. More interesting and productive of better literary work were the "matter of France," which revolved around Charlemagne, and the "matter of Britain," whose central figure was Arthur.

Charlemagne captured the imagination because he was the hero-king of France. By the eleventh century he had become a supernatural figure. Fabulous deeds were attributed to him, and the story-tellers surrounded him with a group of followers, known as paladins, whose accomplishments in war and love were in all respects marvelous. The tales spun around Charlemagne and his circle, known as chansons de geste,⁴ multiplied until there were over seventy of them. They reflect not Charlemagne's times but the age of the poets, being steeped in feudalism, and in crusading zeal against the Mohammedans (called the Saracens). However, they lack the complete trappings of romance. The love element in the most genuine chansons de geste is comparatively simple and unartificial, their spirit and matter are largely epic and patriotic.

These qualities are most pronounced in the best of the poems, the stirring Song of Roland, based on a historical event but romantically elaborated. In an attack on Charlemagne's rearguard by the Basques in a Pyrenean mountain pass, the entire force was wiped out, and among the dead was a certain Hruodlandus. Out of these simple facts later poets created the hero Roland, who became the ideal knight by virtue of his courage and loyalty to king and country. Roland is a far more patriotic, vigorous, and far less ornate figure than the heroes of the true romances; he belongs more to epic literature. It is only later that the "matter of France" became true romance.

In style and verse form, too, the Song of Roland has a hardy quality that distinguishes it from the later romances, which were written in rhymed lines or in ornate prose. It consists of stanzas (called laissez) composed in lines of ten syllables, and the same vowel sound appears in the final stressed syllable of each line in the stanza, a device known as assonance. Assonance, which was soon supplanted by rhyme, has been recently brought back into favor by ultra-modern English poets as a means of avoiding jingling effects. But in all except the most inspired kind of writing, assonance still seems crude, and the translation used in our selection from the poem employs rhyme.

If The Song of Roland is an epic colored by romance, the "matter of Britain" is romance in full bloom. Originally national in its roots, in so far as the historical Arthur was a Celtic chieftain who fought the Anglo-Saxon invaders of England, the Arthurian theme was quickly transformed into legend by the Celtic imagination.

The Arthurian poets aimed at artistic perfection, grace, and delicacy, and their poems were intended for the most cultivated medieval audiences. The twelfth-century French masters of Arthurian romance, who were followed by writers in other countries, were Marie de France and Chrétien de Troyes.

Marie de France, a well-born lady, was the ablest author of short narrative poems known as lais or lays. Though she lived and wrote in England, she was French by birth and composed in French. Marie de France wrote on a variety of subjects, but the perfection she gave to her treatment of Arthurian tales made her important in the development of "the matter of Britain."

Chrétien (or Chrestien) de Troyes treated the Celtic tales at more length, and gave them their greatest popularity at the medieval courts. It is with good reason that his work served as a foundation for later prose romances, which were finally incorporated in Malory's compilation of Arthurian matter, Le Morte d'Arthur (see page 1052). Chrétien lived at the court of Champagne in the second half of the twelfth century. Basing his work on older French versions, he took from the Celtic matter only that which could be interpreted in terms of medieval feudalism. However, the English reader does not have to turn to him when he has in his own language the delightful anonymous metrical romance Sir Gauvain and the Green Knight (see page 1021) and Malory's fascinating Le Morte d'Arthur. The Arthurian "matter" indeed constitutes a vast literature, and it has been increased in modern times by the composer Wagner and by such poets as Tennyson (Idylls of the King), Swinburne, and E. A. Robinson.

Medieval romance also found expression in other tales. Some of them are crude, but one of them, the twelfth-century Aucassin and Nicolette, is a masterpiece of fragile charm. Its story belongs to a special class of romances in which the Orient figures in some way. In them we generally find a Christian knight in love with a Saracen maiden, although in Aucassin and Nicolette the heroine turns out to be a Christian girl. This work is, moreover, interesting as an example of a unique literary form, the cante-fable or "song-story," in which the tale is told in prose but is embroidered with passages of verse sung by the minstrel.

Aucassin and Nicolette is a plainly naïve narrative. Its author even introduced folklore, in the episode of the king who took to his bed because he fancied himself with child—a custom familiar to students of primitive peoples. The story concerns moonstruck adolescents, and the young lovers are indeed the Romeo and Juliet of medieval romance. However, it is in this delicate and fanciful tale that we are unexpectedly reminded that a critical spirit was beginning to intrude into the medieval world and its romantic outlook. Whether because the author stemmed from the common people or felt sympathy for them, he allowed them to have their say in the memorable conversation between the love-sick Aucassin, who pretends to be weeping because he has lost a white hound, and a hard-pressed, coarsely dressed peasant who is outraged at the triviality of the youth's complaint and proceeds to tell him of his own bitter plight.

The intellectual spirit was most evident in the brilliant Abelard (died 1142) who was both a bold philosopher and an ardent lover. Although a medieval thinker in the sense that he expended his mental endowment on religious dogma, he anticipated the intellectual awakening of Europe by several centuries. He contended that unquestioning faith is an impediment to the discovery of truth, that doubt was actually a means whereby the truth could be ascertained—a thought that seemed so radical that he was forbidden to teach it. He began early to challenge the teachings of his masters in Paris, and attracted hundreds of students when he became a lecturer. His method was to demonstrate the illogicality and inconsistencies of the authorities of his time, and his dialectic skill in these demonstrations was remarkable.

Abelard, however, is best remembered for the stormy passion to which he succumbed. In the opinion of the noted scholar H. O. Taylor, "There has never been a passion between a man and woman more famous than that which brought happiness and sorrow to the lives of Abelard and Heloise."⁵ Centuries after their death, flowers and wreaths were still being laid on the tomb of the lovers in the Père-Lachaise cemetery in Paris. The great intellectual of his day, it is well to remember, was a native of Brittany, one of the fountainheads of medieval romance. When he was thirty-eight he met the beautiful and intelligent girl, who was then seventeen. Her uncle, Canon Fulbert, engaged Abelard as tutor, gave him a place in his home, and authorized him to punish his pupil whenever necessary. Before long the learned man, then occupying the highest academic position in Europe as professor in the Episcopal School or university in Paris, found himself madly in love with Heloise. Their love had none of the trappings of the courts of love, but it was more truly a distillation of the spirit of romance than any courtly affair.

"I saw," he wrote, "that she possessed every attraction that lovers seek; nor did I regard my success as doubtful, when I considered my fame and my goodly person, and also her love of letters. Our hours of study were given to love. The books lay open, but our words were of love rather than philosophy; there were more kisses than aphorisms. To avert suspicion I struck her occasionally—very gentle blows of love."

Tragedy came in the wake of their passion. They were discovered, and they fled to Brittany where a child was born to them. Heloise denied having married Abelard because she feared that it would hinder his advancement in the clerical world. Her uncle became so furious at the shame to his honor that he hired ruffians to invade Abelard's apartment and emasculate him. Abelard entered a monastery, and Heloise became a nun. After many years she sent him a letter, to which he replied. Their meager correspondence in Latin is the tragic climax to the Middle Ages' most famous and most authentic romance; it also contains some of the greatest letters of all time.

In culture, Christian Spain was a part of France, and there were many correspondences between Spanish and French writing. There were troubadours in the northern part of the Spanish peninsula, among them being a king, Alfonso, known as the "Learned." Corresponding to the Song of Roland, the Spaniards had their long heroic Poem of the Cid, based on the life of a doughty eleventh-century warrior, Ruy Diaz de Bivar, whose title "Cid" is the Arabic word for "Lord." Banished in 1081 from Castile, he became an outlaw, found refuge among the Moors in Spain, captured Valencia in 1094, and won control over a small state. In time extravagant exploits were attributed to him in numerous ballads and tales. The Poem of the Cid, which was based on them, is a spirited work, but less polished and appealing than the work of the best French writers.

The Spanish poets, moreover, turned their talent to the composition of ballads. These are remarkably vivacious, and though some of them are doggerel the Spanish ballads evoke a vivid and strenuous world, a world in which Christians and Saracens lived in adjacent territories and engaged in rivalries and bitter struggles. Since, moreover, the Spaniards loved gallantry and sentiment, and the wealth and splendor of the Moorish cities evoked wonder, Spanish balladry was exuberantly romantic. The ballads included in this section are examples of a truly profuse balladry, popular among the common people as well as the aristocracy.

THE SONG OF ROLAND

[The most important Old French epic poem, The Song of Roland, is based on a song in celebration of an engagement between Charlemagne and the Basques in 778. By the eleventh century the story has assumed epic proportions. The hero, Roland, has come to be typical for his bravery, his friend Olivier for his wisdom, and Ganelon for his treachery. In the epic, Roland is attacked by the Saracen king on the advice of Ganelon. Roland refuses to summon aid until too late to save himself and his army. Then he blows his horn and Charlemagne comes to the rescue and punishes Ganelon and the Moors. The passage below is the conclusion of Part II of the poem.]

When Roland saw that life had fled,
And with face to earth his comrade dead,
He thus bewept him, soft and still:
"Ah, friend, thy prowess wrought thee ill!

So many days and years gone by 5
We lived together, thou and I:
And thou hast never done me wrong,
Nor I to thee, our lifetime long.
Since thou art dead, to live is pain.”
He swooned on Veillantif again, 10
Yet may not unto earth be cast,
His golden stirrups held him fast.

When passed away had Roland's swoon,
With sense restored, he saw full soon
What ruin lay beneath his view. 15
His Franks have perished all save two—
The archbishop and Walter of Hum alone.
From the mountain-side hath Walter flown,
Where he met in battle the bands of Spain,
And the heathen won and his men were slain 20

In his own despite to the vale he came;
 Called unto Roland, his aid to claim.
 "Ah, count! brave gentleman, gallant peer!
 Where art thou? With thee I know not fear.
 I am Walter, who vanquished Maelgut of yore,
 Nephew to Drouin, the old and hoar. 26
 For knightly deeds I was once thy friend.
 I fought the Saracen to the end;
 My lance is shivered, my shield is cleft,
 Of my broken mail are but fragments left. 30
 I bear in my body eight thrusts of spear;
 I die, but I sold my life right dear."
 Count Roland heard as he spake the word,
 Pricked his steed, and anear him spurred.

"Walter," said Roland, "thou hadst affray
 With the Saracen foe on the heights today.
 Thou wert wont a valorous knight to be:
 A thousand horsemen gave I thee;
 Render them back, for my need is sore."
 "Alas, thou seest them never more!
 Stretched they lie on the dolorous ground,
 Where myriad Saracen swarms we found,—
 Armenians, Turks, and the giant brood
 Of Balisa, famous for hardihood,
 Bestriding their Arab Coursers fleet, 45
 Such host in battle 'twas ours to meet;
 Nor vaunting thence shall the heathen go,—
 Full sixty thousand on earth lie low.
 With our brands of steel we avenged us well,
 But every Frank by the foeman fell. 50
 My hauberk plates are riven wide,
 And I bear such wounds in flank and side,
 That from every part the bright blood flows,
 And feebler ever my body grows.
 I am dying fast, I am well aware:
 Thy liegeman I, and claim thy care.
 If I fled perforce, thou wilt forgive,
 And yield me succor while thou dost live."
 Roland sweated with wrath and pain,
 Tore the skirts of his vest in twain,
 Bound Walter's every bleeding vein.

In Roland's sorrow his wrath arose,
 Hotly he struck at the heathen foes,
 Nor left he one of a score alive;
 Walter slew six, the archbishop five.
 The heathens cry, "What a felon three!
 Look to it, lords, that they shall not flee.
 Dastard is he who confronts them not;
 Craven, who lets them depart this spot."
 Their cries and shoutings begin once more, 70
 And from every side on the Franks they pour.

Count Roland in sooth is a noble peer;
 Count Walter, a valorous cavalier;
 The archbishop, in battle proved and tried,
 Each struck as if knight there were none beside.
 From their steeds a thousand Saracens leap, 76
 Yet forty thousand their saddles keep;
 I trow they dare not approach them near,
 But they hurl against them lance and spear,
 Pike and javelin, shaft and dart. 80
 Walter is slain as the missiles part;
 The archbishop's shield in pieces shred,
 Riven his helm, and pierced his head;
 His corselet of steel they rent and tore;
 Wounded his body with lances four; 85
 His steed beneath him dropped withal:
 What woe to see the archbishop fall!

When Turpin felt him flung to ground,
 And four lance wounds within him found,
 He swiftly rose, the dauntless man, 90
 To Roland looked, and nigh him ran.
 Spake but, "I am not overthrown—
 Brave warrior yields with life alone."
 He drew Almace's burnished steel,
 A thousand ruthless blows to deal. 95
 In after time, the Emperor said
 He found four hundred round him spread,—
 Some wounded, others cleft in twain;
 Some lying headless on the plain.
 So Giles the saint, who saw it, tells, 100
 For whom High God wrought miracles.
 In Laon cell the scroll he wrote;
 He little weets who knows it not.

Count Roland combateth nobly yet,
 His body burning and bathed in sweat; 105
 In his brow a mighty pain, since first,
 When his horn he sounded, his temple burst;
 But he yearns of Karl's approach to know,
 And lifts his horn once more—but oh!
 How faint and feeble a note to blow! 110
 The Emperor listened, and stood full still.
 "My lords," he said, "we are faring ill.
 This day is Roland my nephew's last;
 Like dying man he winds that blast.
 On! Who would aid, for life must press. 115
 Sound every trump our ranks possess."
 65 Peal sixty thousand clarions high,
 The hills re-echo, the vales reply.
 It is now no jest for the heathen band.
 "Karl!" they cry, "it is Karl at hand!" 120

They said, "'Tis the Emperor's advance,
 We hear the trumpets resound of France.

If he assail us, hope in vain;
 If Roland live, 'tis war again,
 And we lose for aye the land of Spain."
 125 Four hundred in arms together drew,
 The bravest of the heathen crew;
 With serried power they on him press,
 And dire in sooth is the count's distress.

When Roland saw his coming foes,
 130 All proud and stern his spirit rose;
 Alive he shall never be brought to yield:
 Veillantif spurred he across the field,
 With golden spurs he pricked him well,
 To break the ranks of the infidel;
 135 Archbishop Turpin by his side.
 "Let us flee, and save us," the heathen cried;
 "These are the trumpets of France we hear—
 It is Karl, the mighty Emperor, near."

Count Roland never hath loved the base,
 140 Nor the proud of heart, nor the dastard race,—
 Nor knight, but if he were vassal good,—
 And he spake to Turpin, as there he stood;
 "On foot are you, on horseback I;
 For your love I halt, and stand you by.
 145 Together for good and ill we hold;
 I will not leave you for man of mold.
 We will pay the heathen their onset back,
 Nor shall Durindana of blows be slack."
 "Base," said Turpin, "who spares to smite:
 150 When the Emperor comes, he will all requite."

The heathens said, "We were born to shame.
 This day for our disaster came:
 Our lords and leaders in battle lost,
 And Karl at hand with his marshaled host;
 155 We hear the trumpets of France ring out,
 And the cry 'Montjoie!' their rallying shout.
 Roland's pride is of such a height,
 Not to be vanquished by mortal wight;
 Hurl we our missiles, and hold aloof."
 160 And the word they spake, they put in proof,—
 They flung, with all their strength and craft,
 Javelin, barb, and plumed shaft.
 Roland's buckler was torn and frayed,
 165 His cuirass broken and disarrayed,
 Yet entrance none to his flesh they made.
 From thirty wounds Veillantif bled,
 Beneath his rider they cast him, dead;
 Then from the field have the heathen flown:
 Roland remaineth, on foot, alone.
 170

The heathens fly in rage and dread;
 To the land of Spain have their footsteps sped;

Nor can Count Roland make pursuit—
 Slain is his steed, and he rests afoot;
 175 To succor Turpin he turned in haste,
 The golden helm from his head unlaced,
 Ungirt the corselet from his breast,
 In stripes divided his silken vest;
 The archbishop's wounds hath he staunch'd and
 bound,

His arms around him softly wound;
 180 On the green sward gently his body laid,
 And, with tender greeting, thus him prayed:
 "For a little space, let me take farewell;
 Our dear companions, who round us fell,
 185 I go to seek; if I haply find,
 I will place them at thy feet reclined."
 "Go," said Turpin; "the field is thine—
 To God the glory, 'tis thine and mine."

Alone seeks Roland the field of fight,
 He searcheth vale, he searcheth height.
 190 Ivon and Ivor he found, laid low,
 And the Gascon Engelier of Bordeaux,
 Gerein and his fellow in arms, Gerier;
 Otho he found, and Berengier;
 195 Samson the duke, and Anseis bold,
 Gerard of Roussillon, the old.
 Their bodies, one after one, he bore,
 And laid them Turpin's feet before.
 The archbishop saw them stretched arow,
 Nor can he hinder the tears that flow;
 200 In benediction his hands he spread:
 "Alas! for your doom, my lords," he said,
 "That God in mercy your souls may give,
 On the flowers of Paradise to live;
 205 Mine own death comes, with anguish sore
 That I see mine Emperor never more."

Once more to the field doth Roland wend,
 Till he findeth Olivier, his friend;
 The lifeless form to his heart he strained,
 Bore him back with what strength remained,
 210 On a buckler laid him, beside the rest,
 The archbishop assoiled them all, and blessed
 Their dole and pity anew find vent,
 And Roland maketh his fond lament:
 "My Olivier, my chosen one,
 215 Thou wert the noble Duke Renier's son,
 Lord of the March unto River vale.
 To shiver lance and shatter mail,
 The brave in council to guide and cheer,
 To smite the miscreant foe with fear,—
 220 Was never on earth such cavalier."

Dead around him his peers to see,
 And the man he loved so tenderly,
 Fast the tears of Count Roland ran,
 His visage discolored became, and wan,
 He swooned for sorrow beyond control.
 "Alas," said Turpin, "how great thy dole!"

To look on Roland swooning there,
 Surpassed all sorrow he ever bare;
 He stretched his hand, the horn he took,— 230
 Through Roncesvalles there flowed a brook,—
 A draught to Roland he thought to bring;
 But his steps were feeble and tottering,
 Spent his strength, from waste of blood,—
 He struggled on for scarce a rood, 235
 When sank his heart, and drooped his frame,
 And his mortal anguish on him came.

Roland revived from his swoon again;
 On his feet he rose, but in deadly pain;
 He looked on high, and he looked below, 240
 Till, a space his other companions fro,
 He beheld the baron, stretched on sward,
 The archbishop, vicar of God our Lord.
 Mea Culpa was Turpin's cry,
 While he raised his hands to heaven on high, 245
 Imploring Paradise to gain.
 So died the soldier of Carlemaine,—
 With word or weapon, to preach or fight,
 A champion ever of Christian right,
 And a deadly foe of the infidel. 250
 God's benediction within him dwell!

When Roland saw him stark on earth
 (His very vitals were bursting forth,
 And his brain was oozing from out his head),
 He took the fair white hands outspread, 255
 Crossed and clasped them upon his breast,
 And thus plaint to the dead addressed,—
 So did his country's law ordain:—
 "Ah, gentleman of noble strain,
 I trust thee unto God the True, 260
 Whose service never man shall do
 With more devoted heart and mind:
 To guard the faith, to win mankind,
 From the apostles' day till now,
 Such prophet never rose as thou. 265
 Nor pain or torment thy soul await,
 But of Paradise the open gate."

Roland feeleth his death is near,
 His brain is oozing by either ear.
 For his peers he prayed—God keep them well;
 Invoked the angel Gabriel. 271

That none reproach him, his horn he clasped;
 His other hand Durindana grasped;
 Then, far as quarrel from crossbow sent,
 Across the march of Spain he went, 275
 Where, on a mound, two trees between,
 Four flights of marble steps were seen;
 Backward he fell, on the field to lie;
 And he swooned anon, for the end was nigh.

High were the mountains and high the trees, 280
 Bright shone the marble terraces;
 On the green grass Roland hath swooned away.
 A Saracen spied him where he lay:
 Stretched with the rest he had feigned him dead,
 His face and body with blood bespread. 285
 To his feet he sprang, and in haste he hied,—
 In pride and wrath he was overbold,—
 And on Roland, body and arms, laid hold.
 "The nephew of Karl is overthrown!
 To Araby bear I this sword, mine own." 290
 He stooped to grasp it, but as he drew,
 Roland returned to his sense anew.

He saw the Saracen seize his sword;
 His eyes he oped, and he spake one word—
 "Thou art not one of our band, I trow," 295
 And he clutched the horn he would ne'er forego;
 On the golden crest he smote him full,
 Shattering steel and bone and skull,
 Forth from his head his eyes he beat,
 And cast him lifeless before his feet. 300
 "Miscreant, makest thou then so free,
 As, right or wrong, to lay hold on me?
 Who hears it will deem thee a madman born;
 Behold the mouth of mine ivory horn
 Broken for thee, and the gems and gold 305
 Around its rim to earth are rolled."

Roland feeleth his eyesight reft,
 Yet he stands erect with what strength is left;
 From his bloodless cheek is the hue dispelled,
 But his Durindana all bare he held. 310
 In front a dark brown rock arose—
 He smote upon it ten grievous blows.
 Grated the steel as it struck the flint,
 Yet it brake not, nor bore its edge one dint.
 "Mary, Mother, be thou mine aid! 315
 Ah, Durindana, my ill-starred blade,
 I may no longer thy guardian be!
 What fields of battle I won with thee!
 What realms and regions 'twas ours to gain, 320
 Now the lordship of Carlemaine!
 Never shalt thou possessor know
 Who would turn from face of mortal foe;

A gallant vassal so long thee bore,
Such as France the free shall know no more."

He smote anew on the marble stair. 325
It grated, but breach nor notch was there.
When Roland found that it would not break,
Thus began he his plaint to make.
"Ah, Durindana, how fair and bright
Thou sparklest, flaming against the light! 330
When Karl in Maurienne valley lay,
God sent his angel from heaven to say—
'This sword shall a valorous captain's be,'
And he girt it, the gentle king, on me.
With it I vanquished Poitou and Maine, 335
Provence I conquered and Aquitaine;
I conquered Normandy the free,
Anjou, and the marches of Brittany;
Romagna I won, and Lombardy,
Bavaria, Flanders from side to side, 340
And Burgundy, and Poland wide;
Constantinople affianced vowed,
And the Saxon soil to his bidding bowed;
Scotia, and Wales, and Ireland's plain,
Of England made he his own domain. 345
What mighty regions I won of old,
For the hoary-headed Karl to hold!
But there presses on me a grievous pain,
Lest thou in heathen hands remain.
O God our Father, keep France from stain!" 350

His strokes once more on the brown rock fell,
And the steel was bent past words to tell;
Yet it brake not, nor was notched the grain,
Erect it leaped to the sky again.
When he failed at the last to break his blade, 355
His lamentation he inly made.
"Oh, fair and holy, my peerless sword,
What relics lie in thy pommel stored!
Tooth of Saint Peter, Saint Basil's blood,
Hair of Saint Denis beside them strewed, 360
Fragment of holy Mary's vest.
'Twere shame that thou with the heathen rest;
Thee should the hand of a Christian serve
One who would never in battle swerve.
What regions won I with thee of yore, 365
The empire now of Karl the hoar!
Rich and mighty is he therefore."

That death was on him he knew full well;
Down from his head to his heart it fell.
On the grass beneath a pine-tree's shade, 370
With face to earth, his form he laid,
Beneath him placed he his horn and sword,
And turned his face to the heathen horde.
Thus hath he done the sooth to show,
That Karl and his warriors all may know, 375
That the gentle count a conqueror died.
Mea Culpa full oft he cried;
And, for all his sins, unto God above,
In sign of penance, he raised his glove.

Roland feeleth his hour at hand; 380
On a knoll he lies towards the Spanish land.
With one hand beats he upon his breast:
"In thy sight, O God, be my sins confessed.
From my hour of birth, both the great and small, 385
Down to this day, I repent of all."
As his glove he raised to God on high,
Angels of heaven descend him nigh.

Beneath a pine was his resting-place,
To the land of Spain hath he turned his face,
On his memory rose full many a thought— 390
Of the lands he won and the fields he fought;
Of his gentle France, of his kin and line;
Of his nursing father, King Karl benign;—
He may not the tear and sob control, 395
Nor yet forgets he his parting soul.
To God's compassion he makes his cry:
"O Father true, who canst not lie,
Who didst Lazarus raise unto life agen,
And Daniel shield in the lions' den;
Shield my soul from its peril, due 400
For the sins I sinned my lifetime through."
He did his right-hand glove uplift—
Saint Gabriel took from his hand the gift;
Then drooped his head upon his breast,
And with clasped hands he went to rest. 405
God from on high sent down to him
One of his angel Cherubim—
Saint Michael of Peril of the sea,
Saint Gabriel in company—
From heaven they came for that soul of price, 410
And they bore it with them to Paradise.

BERNARD DE VENTADOUR

No Marvel Is It

No marvel is it if I sing
 Better than other minstrels all:
 For more than they I am Love's thrall,
 And all myself therein I fling,—
 Knowledge and sense, body and soul,
 And whatso power I have beside;
 The rein that doth my being guide
 Impels me to this only goal.

His heart is dead whence did not spring
 Love's odor, sweet and magical;
 His life doth ever on him pall
 Who knoweth not that blessed thing;
 Yea! God, who doth my life control,
 Were cruel did he bid me bide
 A month, or even a day, denied
 The love whose rapture I extol.

How keen, how exquisite the sting
 Of that sweet odor! At its call
 An hundred times a day I fall
 And faint, an hundred rise and sing.
 So fair the semblance of my dole,
 'Tis lovelier than another's pride:
 If such the ill doth me betide,
 Good hap were more than I could thole.

Yet haste, kind heaven! the sundering
 True swains from false, great hearts from small!
 The traitor in the dust bid crawl!
 The faithless to confession bring!
 Ah! if I were the master sole
 Of all earth's treasures multiplied,
 To see my Lady satisfied
 Of my pure faith, I'd give the whole.

GUILLAUME DE POITIERS

Behold the Meads

Behold, the meads are green again,
 The orchard-bloom is seen again,
 Of sky and stream the mien again
 Is mild, is bright!

French Troubadour Songs. The first two are translated by Harriet Waters Preston, the last by Stanley Burnshaw.

Now should each heart that loves obtain
 Its own delight.

But I will say no ill of Love,
 However slight my guerdon prove:
 Repining doth not me behave:
 And yet—to know
 How lightly she I fain would move
 Might bliss bestow!

There are who hold my folly great,
 Because with little hope I wait;
 But one old saw doth animate
 And me assure:
 Their hearts are high, their might is great,
 Who will endure.

Anonymous Alba

Sheltered beneath white hawthorn boughs,
 A lady held her loved one close
 In her arms, till the watchman cried abroad:
God! It is dawn! How soon it's come!

"How wildly have I wished that the night
 Would never end, and that my love
 Could stay, and the watchman never cry
God! It is dawn! How soon it's come!

"My gentle love, let us kiss once more
 Here in this field where the small birds sing;
 Let us defy their jealous throats—
God! It is dawn! How soon it's come!

"Still one more touch, my tender love,
 Here in our field where the small birds sing,
 Till the watchman blow his reedy strain—
God! It is dawn! How soon it's come!

"From the wind from below where my love has gone
 Thoughtful and happy, I have drunk
 A long sweet draught of his breath—O God,
God! It is dawn! How soon it's come!"

ENVOI

Flowing with grace and charm is she;
 Her loveliness draws many eyes,
 Whose full heart throbs with a true love:
God! It is dawn! How soon it's come!

Would I Might Go Far Over Sea

Would I might go far over sea,
 My Love, or high above the air,
 And come to land or heaven with thee,
 Where no law is, and none shall be.
 Against beholding the most rare
 Strange beauty that thou hast for me.
 Alas, for, in this bitter land,
 Full many a written curse doth stand
 Against the kiss thy lips should bear;
 Against the sweet gift of thy hands;
 Against the knowing that thou art fair,
 And too fond loving of thy hair.

The Lay of the Honeysuckle

With a glad heart and right good mind will I tell the Lay that men call Honeysuckle; and that the truth may be known of all it shall be told as many a minstrel has sung it to my ear, and as the scribe hath written it for our delight. It is of Tristan and Isoude, the Queen. It is of a love which passed all other love, from whence came wondrous sorrow, and whereof they died together the selfsame day.

King Mark was sorely wroth with Tristan, his sister's son, and bade him avoid his realm, by reason of the love he bore the Queen. So Tristan repaired to his own land, and dwelt for a full year in South Wales, where he was born. Then since he might not come where he would be, Tristan took no heed to his ways, but let his life run waste to Death. Marvel not overmuch thereat, for he who loves beyond measure must ever be sick in heart and hope, when he may not win according to his wish. So sick in heart and mind was Tristan that he left his kingdom, and returned straight to the realm of his banishment, because that in Cornwall dwelt the Queen. There he hid privily in the deep forest, withdrawn from the eyes of men; only when the evening was come, and all things sought their rest, he prayed the peasant and other mean folk of that country, of their charity to grant him shelter for the night. From the serfs he gathered tidings of the King. These gave again to him what they, in turn, had taken from some outlawed knight. Thus Tristan learned that when Pentecost was come
 King Mark purposed to hold high court at Tintagel;
 moreover that thither would ride Isoude, the Queen.

When Tristan heard this thing he rejoiced greatly, since the Queen might not adventure through the forest, except he saw her with his eyes.

After the King had gone his way, Tristan entered within the wood, and sought the path by which the Queen must come. There he cut a wand from out a certain hazel-tree, and having trimmed and peeled it of its bark, with his dagger he carved his name upon the wood. This he placed upon her road, for well he knew that should the Queen but mark his name she would bethink her of her friend. Thus had it chanced before. For this was the sum of the writing set upon the wand, for Queen Isoude's heart alone: how that in this wild place Tristan had lurked and waited long, so that he might look upon her face, since without her he was already dead. Was it not with them as with the Honeysuckle and the Hazel tree she was passing by! So sweetly laced were they in one close embrace, that thus they might remain whilst life endured. But should rough hands part so fond a clasping, the hazel would wither at the root, and the honeysuckle must fail. Fair friend, thus is the case with us, nor you without me, nor I without you.

Now the Queen fared at adventure down the forest path. She spied the hazel wand set upon her road, and well she remembered the letters and the name. She bade the knights of her company to draw rein, and dismount from their palfreys, so that they might refresh themselves a little. When her commandment was done she withdrew from them a space, and called to her Brangwaine, her maiden, and own familiar friend. Then she hastened within the wood, to come on him whom more she loved than any living soul. How great the joy between these twain, that once more they might speak together softly, face to face. Isoude showed him her delight. She showed in what fashion she strove to bring peace and concord betwixt Tristan and the King, and how grievously his banishment had weighed upon her heart. Thus sped the hour, till it was time for them to part;
 but when these lovers freed them from the other's arms, the tears were wet upon their cheeks. So Tristan returned to Wales, his own realm, even as his uncle bade. But for the joy that he had had of her, his friend, for her sweet face, and for the tender words that she had spoken, yea, and for that writing upon the wand, to remember all these things, Tristan, that cunning harper, wrought a new Lay, as shortly I have told you. Goatleaf, men call this song in English. Chèvrefeuille it is named in French; but Goatleaf or Honeysuckle, here you have the very truth in the Lay that I have spoken.

"Would I Might Go Far Over Sea" translated by Arthur O'Shaughnessy; "The Lay of the Honeysuckle," by Eugene Mason.

AUCASSIN AND NICOLETE

'Tis of Aucassin and Nicolette.
 Who would list to the good lay
 Gladness of the captive gray?
 'Tis how two young lovers met,
 Aucassin and Nicolette,
 Of the pains the lover bore
 And the sorrows he outwore,
 For the goodness and the grace,
 Of his love, so fair of face.

Sweet the song, the story sweet,
 There is no man hearkens it,
 No man living 'neath the sun,
 So outwearied, so foredone,
 Sick and woeful, worn and sad,
 But is healed, but is glad,

'Tis so sweet.

So say they, speak they, tell they the Tale:

How the Count Bougars de Valence made war on Count Garin de Biaucaire, war so great, and so marvelous, and so mortal that never a day dawned²⁰ but alway he was there, by the gates and walls, and barriers of the town with a hundred knights, and ten thousand men at arms, horsemen and footmen: so burned he the Count's land, and spoiled his country, and slew his men. Now the Count Garin de Biaucaire was old and frail, and his good days were gone over. No heir had he, neither son nor daughter, save one young man only; such an one as I shall tell you. Aucassin was the name of the damoiseau: fair was he, goodly, and great, and³⁰ featly fashioned of his body, and limbs. His hair was yellow, in little curls, his eyes blue and laughing, his face beautiful and shapely, his nose high and well set, and so richly seen was he in all things good, that in him was none evil at all. But so suddenly overtaken was he of Love, who is a great master, that he would not, of his will, be dubbed knight, nor take arms, nor follow tourneys, nor do whatsoever him beseemed. Therefore his father and mother said to him:

"Son, go take thine arms, mount thy horse, and hold thy land, and help thy men, for if they see thee among them, more stoutly will they keep in battle their lives, and lands, and thine, and mine."

"Father," said Aucassin, "I marvel that you will be speaking. Never may God give me aught of my desire if I be made knight, or mount my horse, or face stour and battle wherein knights smite and are smitten again, unless thou give me Nicolette, my true love, that I love so well."

"Son," said the father, "this may not be. Let Nicolette go, a slave girl she is, out of a strange land, and the captain of this town bought her of the Saracens, and carried her hither, and hath reared her and let christen the maid, and took her for his daughter in God, and one day will find a¹⁰ young man for her, to win her bread honorably. Herein hast thou nought to make or mend, but if a wife thou wilt have, I will give thee the daughter of a King, or a Count. There is no man so rich in France, but if thou desire his daughter, thou shalt have her."

"Faith! my father," said Aucassin, "tell me where is the place so high in all the world, that Nicolette, my sweet lady and love, would not grace it well? If she were Empress of Constantinople or of Germany, or Queen of France or England, it were little enough for her; so gentle is she and courteous, and debonaire, and compact of all good qualities."

Here singeth one:

Aucassin was of Biaucaire
 Of a goodly castle there,
 But from Nicolette the fair
 None might win his heart away
 Though his father, many a day,
 And his mother said him nay,
 "Ha! fond child, what wouldest thou?
 Nicolette is glad enow!
 Was from Carthage cast away,
 Paynims sold her on a day!
 Wouldst thou win a lady fair
 Choose a maid of high degree
 Such an one is meet for thee."
 "Nay of these I have no care,
 Nicolette is debonaire,
 Her body sweet and the face of her
 Take my heart as in a snare,
 Loyal love is but her share
 That is so sweet."

Then speak they, say they, tell they the Tale:

When the Count Garin de Biaucaire knew that he would avail not to withdraw Aucassin his son from the love of Nicolette, he went to the Captain of the city, who was his man, and spake to him saying:

"Sir Count; away with Nicolette thy daughter in God; cursed be the land whence she was brought into this country, for by reason of her do I lose Aucassin, that will neither be dubbed knight, nor do ought of the things that fall to him to be done. And wit ye well," he said, "that if I might have her at my will, I would burn her in a fire, and yourself might well be sore adread."

"Sir," said the Captain, "this is grievous to me that he comes and goes and hath speech with her. I had bought the maiden at mine own charges, and nourished her, and baptized, and made her my daughter in God. Yea, I would have given her to a young man that should win her bread honorably. With this had Aucassin thy son nought to make or mend. But, sith it is thy will and thy pleasure, I will send her into that land and that country where never will he see her with his eyes."

"Have a heed to thyself," said the Count Garin, "thence might great evil come on thee."

So parted they from each other. Now the Captain was a right rich man: so had he a rich palace with a garden in face of it; in an upper chamber thereof he let place Nicolette with one old woman to keep her company, and in that chamber put bread and meat and wine and such things as were needful. Then he let seal the door, that none might come in or go forth, save that there was one window, over against the garden, and strait enough, where through came to them a little air.

Here singeth one:

Nicolette as ye heard tell
Prisoned is within a cell
That is painted wondrously
With colors of a far countrie,
And the window of marble wrought,
There the maiden stood in thought,
With straight brows and yellow hair
Never saw ye fairer fair!
On the wood she gazed below,
And she saw the roses blow,
Heard the birds sing loud and low,
Therefore spoke she woefully:
"Ah me, wherefore do I lie
Here in prison wrongfully:
Aucassin, my love, my knight,
Am I not thy heart's delight,
Thou that lovest me aright!
'Tis for thee that I must dwell
In the vaulted chamber cell,
Hard beset and all alone!

By our Lady Mary's Son
Here no longer will I wonn,
If I may flee!"

Then speak they, say they, tell they the Tale:

Nicolette was in prison, as ye have heard soothly, in the chamber. And the noise and bruit of it went through all the country and all the land, how that Nicolette was lost. Some said she had fled the country, and some that the Count Garin de Biaucaire had let slay her. Whosoever had joy thereof, Aucassin had none, so he went to the Captain of the town and spoke to him, saying:

"Sir Captain, what hast thou made of Nicolette, my sweet lady and love, the thing that best I love in all the world? Hast thou carried her off or ravished her away from me? Know well that if I die of it, the price shall be demanded of thee, and that will be well done, for it shall be even as if thou hadst slain me with thy two hands, for thou hast taken from me the thing that in this world I loved the best."

"Fair Sir," said the Captain, "let these things be. Nicolette is a captive that I did bring from a strange country. Yea, I bought her at my own charges of the Saracens, and I bred her up and baptized her, and made her my daughter in God. And I have cherished her, and one of these days I would have given her a young man, to win her bread honorably. With this thou hast naught to make, but do thou take the daughter of a King or a Count. Nay more, what wouldst thou deem thee to have gained, hadst thou made her thy leman, and taken her to thy bed? Plentiful lack of comfort hadst thou got thereby, for in Hell would thy soul have lain while the world endures, and into Paradise wouldst thou have entered never."

"In Paradise what have I to win? Therein I seek not to enter, but only to have Nicolette, my sweet lady that I love so well. For into Paradise go none but such folk as I shall tell thee now. Thither go these same old priests, and halt old men and maimed, who all day and night cower continually before the altars, and in the crypts; and such folk as wear old amices and old clouted frocks, and naked folk and shoeless, and covered with sores, perishing of hunger and thirst, and of cold, and of little ease. These be they that go into Paradise, with them have I naught to make. But into Hell would I fain go; for into Hell fare the goodly clerks, and goodly knights that fall in tourneys and great wars, and stout men at arms, and all men noble. With these would I liefly go. And thither pass the sweet ladies and courteous that have two lovers, or three, and their lords also thereto. Thither goes the gold, and the silver, and cloth of vair, and cloth of gris, and harpers, and makers, and the princes of this world. With these I would gladly go, let me but have with me Nicolete, my sweetest lady."

"Certes," quoth the Captain, "in vain wilt thou speak thereof, for never shalt thou see her; and if thou hadst word with her, and thy father knew it, ¹⁰ he would let burn in a fire both her and me, and thyself might well be sore adread."

"That is even what irketh me," quoth Aucassin. So he went from the Captain sorrowing.

Here singeth one:

Aucassin did so depart
Much in dole and heavy at heart
For his love so bright and dear,
None might bring him any cheer,
None might give good words to hear.
To the palace doth he fare
Climbeth up the palace-stair,
Passeth to a chamber there,
Thus great sorrow doth he bear,
For his lady and love so fair.
"Nicolete how fair art thou,
Sweet thy foot-fall, sweet thine eyes,
Sweet the mirth of thy replies,
Sweet thy laughter, sweet thy face,
Sweet thy lips and sweet thy brow,
And the touch of thine embrace,
All for thee I sorrow now,
Captive in an evil place,
Whence I ne'er may go my ways
Sister, sweet friend!"

So say they, speak they, tell they the Tale:

While Aucassin was in the chamber sorrowing for Nicolete his love, even then the Count Bougars de Valence, that had his war to wage, forgot it no wit, but had called up his horsemen and his foot-⁴⁰ men, so made he for the castle to storm it. And the cry of battle arose, and the din, and knights and men at arms busked them, and ran to walls and gates to hold the keep. And the townsfolk mounted to the battlements, and cast down bolts and pikes. Then while the assault was great and even at its height, the Count Garin de Biaucaire came into the chamber where Aucassin was making lament, sorrowing for Nicolete, his sweet lady that he loved so well.

"Ha! son," quoth he, "how caitiff art thou, and cowardly, that canst see men assail thy goodliest castle and strongest. Know thou that if thou lose it, thou lovest all. Son, go to, take arms, and mount thy horse, and defend thy land, and help thy men and fare into the stour. Thou needst not smite nor be smitten. If they do but see thee among them, better will they guard their substance, and their lives, and thy land and mine. And thou art so great, and hardy of thy hands, that well mightst thou do this thing, and to do it is thy devoir."

"Father," said Aucassin, "what is this thou sayest now? God grant me never aught of my desire, if I be dubbed knight, or mount steed, or go into the stour where knights do smite and are smitten, if thou givest me not Nicolete, my sweet lady, whom I love so well."

"Son," quoth his father, "this may never be: rather would I be quite disinherited and lose all that is mine, than that thou shouldst have her to thy wife, or to love par amours."

So he turned him about. But when Aucassin saw ²⁰ him going he called to him again saying,

"Father, go to now, I will make with thee fair covenant."

"What covenant, fair son?"

"I will take up arms, and go into the stour, on this covenant, that, if God bring me back sound and safe, thou wilt let me see Nicolete my sweet lady, even so long that I may have of her two words or three, and one kiss."

"That will I grant," said his father.

³⁰ At this was Aucassin glad.

Here one singeth:

Of the kiss heard Aucassin
That returning he shall win.
None so glad would he have been
Of a myriad marks of gold
Of a hundred thousand told.
Called for raiment brave of steel,
Then they clad him, head to heel,
Twyfold hauberk doth he don,
Firmly braced the helmet on.
Girt the sword with hilt of gold,
Horse doth mount, and lance doth wield,
Looks to stirrups and to shield,
Wondrous brave he rode to field.
Dreaming of his lady dear
Setteth spurs to the destrere,
Rideth forward without fear,
Through the gate and forth away
To the fray.

⁵⁰ So speak they, say they, tell they the Tale:

Aucassin was armed and mounted as ye have heard tell. God! how goodly sat the shield on his shoulder, the helm on his head, and the baldric on his left haunch! And the damoiseau was tall, fair, featly fashioned, and hardy of his hands, and the horse whereon he rode swift and keen, and straight had he spurred him forth of the gate. Now believe ye not that his mind was on kine, nor cattle of the booty, nor thought he how he might strike a knight, nor be stricken again: nor no such thing. Nay, no memory had Aucassin of aught of these; rather he so dreamed of Nicolete, his sweet lady, that he dropped his reins, forgetting all there was to do, and his horse that had felt the spur, bore him into the press and hurled among the foe, and they laid hands on him all about, and took him captive, and seized away his spear and shield, and straightway they led him off a prisoner, and were even now discoursing of what death he should die.

And when Aucassin heard them,

"Ha! God," said he, "sweet Savior. Be these 20 my deadly enemies that have taken me, and will soon cut off my head? And once my head is off, no more shall I speak with Nicolete, my sweet lady, that I love so well. Natheless have I here a good sword, and sit a good horse unwearied. If now I keep not my head for her sake, God help her never, if she love me more!"

The damoiseau was tall and strong, and the horse whereon he sat was right eager. And he laid hand to sword, and fell a-smiting to right and left, 30 and smote through helm and nasal, and arm and clenched hand, making a murder about him, like a wild boar when hounds fall on him in the forest, even till he struck down ten knights, and seven he hurt, and straightway he hurled out of the press, and rode back again at full speed, sword in hand. The Count Bougars de Valence heard say they were about hanging Aucassin, his enemy, so he came into that place and Aucassin was ware of him, and gat his sword into his hand, and lashed 40 at his helm with such a stroke that he drave it down on his head, and he being stunned, fell groveling. And Aucassin laid hands on him, and caught him by the nasal of his helmet, and gave him to his father.

"Father," quoth Aucassin, "lo here is your mortal foe, who hath so warred on you with all malengin. Full twenty years did this war endure, and might not be ended by man."

"Fair son," said his father, "thy feats of youth 50 shouldst thou do, and not seek after folly."

"Father," said Aucassin, "sermon me no sermons, but fulfill my covenant."

"Ha! what covenant, fair son?"

"What, father, hast thou forgotten it? By mine own head, whosoever forgets, will I not forget it, so much it hath me at heart. Didst thou not covenant with me when I took up arms, and went into the stour, that if God brought me back safe and sound, thou wouldst let me see Nicolete, my sweet lady, even so long that I may have of her two words or three, and one kiss? So didst thou covenant, and my mind is that thou keep thy word."

"I!" quoth the father, "God forsake me when I keep this covenant! Nay, if she were here I would let her burn in the fire, and thyself shouldst be sore adread."

"Is this thy last word?" quoth Aucassin.

"So help me God," quoth his father, "yea!"

"Certes," quoth Aucassin, "this is a sorry thing meseems, when a man of thine age lies!"

"Count of Valence," quoth Aucassin, "I took thee?"

"In sooth, Sir, didst thou," saith the Count.

"Give me thy hand," saith Aucassin.

"Sir, with good will."

So he set his hand in the other's.

"Now givest thou me thy word," saith Aucassin, "that never whiles thou art living man wilt thou avail to do my father dishonor, or harm him in body, or in goods, but do it thou wilt?"

"Sir, in God's name," saith he, "mock me not, but put me to my ransom; ye cannot ask of me gold nor silver, horses nor palfreys, vair nor gris, hawks nor hounds, but I will give you them."

"What?" quoth Aucassin. "Ha, knowest thou not it was I that took thee?"

"Yea, sir," quoth the Count Bougars.

"God help me never, but I will make thy head fly from thy shoulders, if thou makest not truth," said Aucassin.

"In God's name," said he, "I make what promise thou wilt."

So they did the oath, and Aucassin let mount him on a horse, and took another and so led him back till he was all in safety.

Here one singeth:

When the Count Garin doth know
That his child would ne'er forego
Love of her that loved him so,
Nicolete, the bright of brow,
In a dungeon deep below
Childe Aucassin did he throw.
Even there the Childe must dwell
In a dun-walled marble cell.
There he waileth in his woe

Crying thus as ye shall know.
 "Nicolete, thou lily white,
 My sweet lady, bright of brow,
 Sweeter than the grape art thou,
 Sweeter than sack posset good
 In a cup of maple wood!
 Was it not but yesterday
 That a palmer came this way,
 Out of Limousin came he,
 And at ease he might not be,
 For a passion him possessed
 That upon his bed he lay,
 Lay, and tossed, and knew not rest
 In his pain discomforted.
 But thou camest by the bed,
 Where he tossed amid his pain,
 Holding high thy sweeping train,
 And thy kirtle of ermine,
 And thy smock of linen fine,
 Then these fair white limbs of thine,
 Did he look on, and it fell
 That the palmer straight was well,
 Straight was hale—and comforted,
 And he rose up from his bed,
 And went back to his own place,
 Sound and strong, and full of face!
 My sweet lady, lily white,
 Sweet thy footfall, sweet thine eyes,
 And the mirth of thy replies.
 Sweet thy laughter, sweet thy face,
 Sweet thy lips and sweet thy brow,
 And the touch of thine embrace.
 Who but doth in thee delight?
 I for love of thee am bound
 In this dungeon underground,
 All for loving thee must lie
 Here where loud on thee I cry,
 Here for loving thee must die
 For thee, my love."

Then say they, speak they, tell they the Tale:

Aucassin was cast into prison as ye have heard tell, and Nicolete, of her part, was in the chamber. Now it was summer time, the month of May, ⁴⁰ when days are warm, and long, and clear, and the night still and serene. Nicolete lay one night on her bed, and saw the moon shine clear through a window, yea, and heard the nightingale sing in the garden, so she minded her of Aucassin her lover whom she loved so well. Then fell she to thoughts of Count Garin de Biaucaire, that hated her to the death; therefore deemed she that there she would no longer abide, for that, if she were told of, and the Count knew whereas she lay, an ill death ⁵⁰ would he make her die. Now she knew that the old woman slept who held her company. Then she arose, and clad her in a mantle of silk she had by her, very goodly, and took napkins, and sheets of the bed, and knotted one to the other, and made therewith a cord as long as she might, so knitted it to a pillar in the window, and let herself slip down into the garden, then caught up her raiment in both hands, behind and before, and kilted up her kirtle, because of dew that she saw lying deep on the grass, and so went her way down through the garden.

²⁰ Her locks were yellow and curled, her eyes blue and smiling, her face featly fashioned, the nose high and fairly set, the lips more red than cherry or rose in time of summer, her teeth white and small; her breasts so firm that they bore up the folds of her bodice as they had been two apples; so slim she was in the waist that your two hands might have clipped her, and the daisy flowers that brake beneath her as she went tip-toe, and that bent above her instep, seemed black against her ³⁰ feet, so white was the maiden. She came to the postern gate, and unbarred it, and went out through the streets of Biaucaire, keeping always on the shadowy side, for the moon was shining right clear, and so wandered she till she came to the tower where her lover lay. The tower was flanked with buttresses, and she cowered under one of them, wrapped in her mantle. Then thrust she her head through a crevice of the tower that was old and worn, and so heard she Aucassin wailing ³⁰ within, and making dole and lament for the sweet lady he loved so well. And when she had listened to him she began to say:

Here one singeth:

Nicolete the bright of brow
 On a pillar leanest thou,
 All Aucassin's wail dost hear
 For his love that is so dear,
 Then thou spakest, shrill and clear,
 "Gentle knight withouten fear
 Little good befaller thee,
 Little help of sigh or tear,
 Ne'er shalt thou have joy of me.
 Never shalt thou win me; still Am I held in evil will
 Of thy father and thy kin,
 Therefore must I cross the sea,
 And another land must win."
 Then she cut her curls of gold,
 Cast them in the dungeon hold,
 Aucassin doth clasp them there,
 Kissed the curls that were so fair,
 Them doth in his bosom bear,
 Then he wept, even as of old,
 All for his love!

Then say they, speak they, tell they the Tale:

When Aucassin heard Nicolete say that she would pass into a far country, he was all in wrath.

"Fair sweet friend," quoth he, "thou shalt not go, for then wouldst thou be my death. And the first man that saw thee and had the might withal, would take thee straightway into his bed to be his leman. And once thou camest into a man's bed and that bed not mine, wit ye well that I would not tarry till I had found a knife to pierce my heart and slay myself. Nay, verily, wait so long I would not; but would hurl myself on it so soon as I could find a wall, or a black stone, thereon would I dash my head so mightily, that the eyes would start, and my brain burst. Rather would I die even such a death, than know thou hadst lain in a man's bed, and that bed not mine."

"Aucassin," she said, "I trow thou lovest me not as much as thou sayest, but I love thee more than thou lovest me."

"Ah, fair sweet friend," said Aucassin, "it may not be that thou shouldst love me even as I love thee. Woman may not love man as man loves woman, for a woman's love lies in the glance of her eye, and the bud of her breast, and her foot's tip-toe, but the love of man is in his heart planted, whence it can never issue forth and pass away."

Now while Aucassin and Nicolete held this parley together, the town's guards came down a street, with swords drawn beneath their cloaks, for the Count Garin had charged them that if they could take her they should slay her. But the sentinel that was on the tower saw them coming, and heard them speaking of Nicolete as they went, and threatening to slay her.

"God!" quoth he, "this were great pity to slay so fair a maid! Right great charity it were if I could say aught to her, and they perceive it not, and she should be on her guard against them, for if they slay her, then were Aucassin, my damoiseau, dead, and that were great pity."

Here one singeth:

Valiant was the sentinel,
Courteous, kind, and practiced well,
So a song did sing and tell
Of the peril that befell.
"Maiden fair that lingerest here,
Gentle maid of merry cheer,
Hair of gold, and eyes as clear
As the water in a mere,
Thou, meseems, hast spoken word
To thy lover and thy lord,

That would die for thee, his dear;
Now beware the ill accord,
Of the cloaked men of the sword,
These have sworn and keep their word,
They will put thee to the sword
Save thou take heed!"

Then speak they, say they, tell they the Tale:

"Ha!" quoth Nicolete, "be the soul of thy father and the soul of thy mother in the rest of Paradise, so fairly and so courteously hast thou spoken me! Please God, I will be right ware of them, God keep me out of their hands."

So she shrank under her mantle into the shadow of the pillar till they had passed by, and then took she farewell of Aucassin, and so fared till she came unto the castle wall. Now that wall was wasted and broken, and some deal mended, so she clomb thereon till she came between wall and fosse, and so looked down, and saw that the fosse was deep and steep, whereat she was sore adread.

"Ah, God," saith she, "sweet Savior! If I let myself fall hence, I shall break my neck, and if here I abide, tomorrow they will take me and burn me in a fire. Yet liefer would I perish here than that tomorrow the folk should stare on me for a gazing-stock."

Then she crossed herself, and so let herself slip into the fosse, and when she had come to the bottom, her fair-feet, and fair hands that had not custom thereof, were bruised and frayed, and the blood springing from a dozen places, yet felt she no pain nor hurt, by reason of the great dread wherein she went. But if she were in cumber to win there, in worse was she to win out. But she deemed that there to abide was of none avail, and she found a pike sharpened, that they of the city had thrown out to keep the hold. Therewith made she one stepping place after another, till, with much travail, she climbed the wall. Now the forest lay within two crossbow shots, and the forest was of thirty leagues this way and that. Therein also were wild beasts, and beasts serpentine, and she feared that if she entered there they would slay her. But anon she deemed that if men found her there they would hale her back into the town to burn her.

Here one singeth:

Nicolete, the fair of face,
Climbed upon the coping stone,
There made she lament and moan
Calling on our Lord alone
For his mercy and his grace.

"Father, king of Majesty,
 Listen, for I nothing know
 Where to flee or whither go.
 If within the wood I fare,
 Lo, the wolves will slay me there,
 Boars and lions terrible,
 Many in the wild wood dwell,
 But if I abide the day,
 Surely worse will come of it,
 Surely will the fire be lit
 That shall burn my body away,
 Jesus, lord of Majesty,
 Better seemeth it to me,
 That within the wood I fare,
 Though the wolves devour me there
 Than within the town to go,
 Ne'er be it so!"

Then speak they, say they, tell they the Tale:

Nicolette made great moan, as ye have heard;
 then commended she herself to God, and anon ²⁰ fared till she came unto the forest. But to go deep in it she dared not, by reason of the wild beasts, and beasts serpentine. Anon crept she into a little thicket, where sleep came upon her, and she slept till prime next day, when the shepherds issued forth from the town and drove their bestial between wood and water. Anon came they all into one place by a fair fountain which was on the fringe of the forest, thereby spread they a mantle, and thereon set bread. So while they were eating, ³⁰ Nicolette wakened, with the sound of the singing birds, and the shepherds, and she went unto them, saying, "Fair boys, our Lord keep you!"

"God bless thee," quoth he that had more words to his tongue than the rest.

"Fair boys," quoth she, "know ye Aucassin, the son of Count Garin de Biaucaire?"

"Yea, well we know him."

"So may God help you, fair boys," quoth she,
 "tell him there is a beast in this forest, and bid ⁴⁰ him come chase it, and if he can take it, he would not give one limb thereof for a hundred marks of gold, nay, nor for five hundred, nor for any ransom."

Then looked they on her, and saw her so fair that they were all astonished.

"Will I tell him thereof?" quoth he that had more words to his tongue than the rest; "foul fall him who speaks of the thing or tells him the tidings. These are but visions ye tell of, for there is ⁵⁰ no beast so great in this forest, stag, nor lion, nor boar, that one of his limbs is worth more than two deniers, or three at the most, and ye speak of such great ransom. Foul fall him that believes your word, and him that telleth Aucassin. Ye be a Fairy, and we have none liking for your company, nay, hold on your road."

"Nay, fair boys," quoth she, "nay, ye will do my bidding. For this beast is so mighty of medicine that thereby will Aucassin be healed of his torment. And lo! I have five sols in my purse, take them, and tell him: for within three days must he ¹⁰ come hunting it hither, and if within three days he find it not, never will he be healed of his torment."

"My faith," quoth he, "the money will we take,
 and if he come hither we will tell him, but seek him we will not."

"In God's name," quoth she; and so took farewell of the shepherds, and went her way.

Here one singeth:

Nicolette the bright of brow
 From the shepherds doth she pass
 All below the blossomed bough
 Where an ancient way there was,
 Overgrown and choked with grass,
 Till she found the cross-roads where
 Seven paths do all way fare,
 Then she deemeth she will try,
 Should her lover pass thereby,
 • If he love her loyally.
 So she gathered white lilies,
 Oak-leaf, that in green wood is,
 Leaves of many a branch I wis,
 Therewith built a lodge of green,
 Goodlier was never seen,
 Swore by God who may not lie,
 "If my love the lodge should spy,
 He will rest awhile thereby
 If he love me loyally."
 Thus his faith she deemed to try,
 "Or I love him not, not I,
 Nor he loves me!"

Then speak they, say they, tell they the Tale:

Nicolette built her lodge, of boughs, as ye have heard, right fair and featously, and wove it well, within and without, of flowers and leaves. So lay she hard by the lodge in a deep coppice to know what Aucassin will do. And the cry and the bruit went abroad through all the country and all the land, that Nicolette was lost. Some told that she had fled, and some that the Count Garin had let slay her. Whosoever had joy thereof, no joy had Aucassin. And the Count Garin, his father, had taken him out of prison, and had sent for the knights of that land, and the ladies, and let make a right great feast, for the comforting of Aucassin his son. Now at the high time of the feast, was Aucassin leaning from the gallery, all woeful and discomforted. Whatsoever men might devise of mirth, Aucassin had no joy thereof, nor no desire, for he saw not her that he loved. Then a knight looked on him, and came to him, and said:

"Aucassin, of that sickness of thine have I been sick, and good counsel will I give thee, if thou wilt hearken to me—"

"Sir," said Aucassin, "gramercy, good counsel would I fain hear."

"Mount thy horse," quoth he, "and go take thy pastime in yonder forest, there wilt thou see the good flowers and grass, and hear the sweet birds sing. Perchance thou shalt hear some word, whereby thou shalt be the better."

"Sir," quoth Aucassin, "gramercy, that will I do."

He passed out of the hall, and went down the stairs, and came to the stable where his horse was. He let saddle and bridle him, and mounted, and rode forth from the castle, and wandered till he came to the forest, so rode till he came to the fountain and found the shepherds at point of noon. And they had a mantle stretched on the grass, and were eating bread, and making great joy.

Here singeth one:

There were gathered shepherds all,
Martin, Esmeric, and Hal,
Aubrey, Robin, great and small.
Saith the one, "Good fellows all,
God keep Aucassin the fair,
And the maid with yellow hair,
Bright of brow and eyes of vair.
She that gave us gold to ware.
Cakes therewith to buy ye know,
Goodly knives and sheaths also.
Flutes to play, and pipes to blow,
May God him heal!"

Here speak they, say they, tell they the Tale:

When Aucassin heard the shepherds, anon he bethought him of Nicolette, his sweet lady he loved so well, and he deemed that she had passed thereby; then set he spurs to his horse, and so came to the shepherds.

"Fair boys, God be with you."

"God bless you," quoth he that had more words to his tongue than the rest.

"Fair boys," quoth Aucassin, "say the song again that anon ye sang."

"Say it we will not," quoth he that had more words to his tongue than the rest, "foul fall him who will sing it again for you, fair sir!"

"Fair boys," quoth Aucassin, "know ye me not?"

"Yea, we know well that you are Aucassin, our damoiseau, natheless we be not your men, but the Count's."

"Fair boys, yet sing it again, I pray you."

"Hearken! by the Holy Heart," quoth he, "wherefore should I sing for you, if it likes me not? Lo, there is no such rich man in this country, saving the body of Garin the Count, that dare drive forth my oxen, or my cows, or my sheep, if he finds them in his fields, or his corn, lest he lose his eyes for it, and wherefore should I sing for you, if it likes me not?"

"God be your aid, fair boys, sing it ye will, and take ye these ten sols I have here in a purse."

"Sir, the money will we take, but never a note will I sing, for I have given my oath, but I will tell thee a plain tale, if thou wilt."

"By God," saith Aucassin, "I love a plain tale better than naught."

"Sir, we were in this place, a little time ago, between prime and tierce, and were eating our bread by this fountain, even as now we do, and a maid came past, the fairest thing in the world, whereby we deemed that she should be a fay, and all the wood shone round about her. Anon she gave us of that she had, whereby we made covenant with her, that if ye came hither we would bid you hunt in this forest, wherein is such a beast that, an ye might take him, ye would not give one limb of him for five hundred marks of silver, nor for no ransom; for this beast is so mighty of medicine, that, an ye could take him, ye should be healed of your torment, and within three days must ye take him, and if ye take him not then, never will ye look on him. So chase ye the beast, an ye will, or an ye will let be, for my promise have I kept with her."

"Fair boys," quoth Aucassin, "ye have said enough. God grant me to find this quarry."

Here singeth one:

Aucassin when he had heard,
Sore within his heart was stirred,
Left the shepherds on that word,
Far into the forest spurred
Rode into the wood; and fleet
Fled his horse through paths of it,
Three words spake he of his sweet,
"Nicolette the fair, the dear,
'Tis for thee I follow here

Track of boar, nor slot of deer,
But thy sweet body and eyes so clear,
All thy mirth and merry cheer,
That my very heart have slain,
So please God to me maintain
I shall see my love again,
Sweet sister, friend!"

Then speak they, say they, tell they the Tale:

Aucassin fared through the forest from path to path after Nicolete, and his horse bare him furiously. Think ye not that the thorns him spared, nor the briars, nay, not so, but tare his raiment, that scarce a knot might be tied with the soundest part thereof, and the blood sprang from his arms, and flanks, and legs, in forty places, or thirty, so that behind the Childe men might follow on the track of his blood in the grass. But so much he went in thoughts of Nicolete, his lady sweet, that he felt no pain nor torment, and all the day hurled through the forest in this fashion nor heard no word of her. And when he saw Vespers draw nigh, he began to weep for that he found her not. All down an old road, and grassgrown he fared, when anon, looking along the way before him, he saw such an one as I shall tell you. Tall was he, and great of growth, laidly and marvelous to look upon: his head huge, and black as charcoal, and more than the breadth of a hand between his two eyes, and great cheeks, and a big nose and broad, big nostrils and ugly, and thick lips redder than a collop, and great teeth yellow and ugly, and he was shod with hosen and shoon of bull's hide, bound with cords of bark over the knee, and all about him a great cloak twyfold, and he leaned on a grievous cudgel, and Aucassin came unto him, and was afraid when he beheld him.

"Fair brother, God aid thee."

"God bless you," quoth he.

"As God he helpeth thee, what makest thou here?"

"What is that to thee?"

"Nay, naught, naught," saith Aucassin, "I ask but out of courtesy."

"But for whom weepest thou," quoth he, "and makest such heavy lament? Certes, were I as rich a man as thou, the whole world should not make me weep."

"Ha! know ye me?" saith Aucassin.

"Yea, I know well that ye be Aucassin, the son of the Count, and if ye tell me for why ye weep, then will I tell you what I make here."

"Certes," quoth Aucassin, "I will tell you right gladly. Hither came I this morning to hunt in this forest; and with me a white hound, the fairest in the world; him have I lost, and for him I weep."

"By the Heart our Lord bare in his breast," quoth he, "are ye weeping for a stinking hound? Foul fall him that holds thee high henceforth! for there is no such rich man in the land, but if thy father asked it of him, he would give thee ten, or fifteen, or twenty, and be the gladder for it. But I have cause to weep and make dole."

"Wherefore so, brother?"

"Sir, I will tell thee. I was hireling to a rich villain, and drove his plow; four oxen had he. But three days since came on me great misadventure, whereby I lost the best of mine oxen, Roger, the best of my team. Him go I seeking, and have neither eaten nor drunken these three days, nor may I go to the town, lest they cast me into prison, seeing that I have not wherewithal to pay. Out of all the wealth of the world have I no more than ye see on my body. A poor mother bare me, that had no more but one wretched bed; this have they taken from under her, and she lies in the very straw. This ails me more than mine own case, for wealth comes and goes; if now I have lost, another tide will I gain, and will pay for mine ox whenas I may; never for that will I weep. But you weep for a stinking hound. Foul fall whoso thinks well of thee!"

"Certes thou art a good comforter, brother, blessed be thou! And of what price was thine ox?"

"Sir, they ask me twenty sols for him, whereof I cannot abate one doit."

"Nay, then," quoth Aucassin, "take these twenty sols I have in my purse, and pay for thine ox."

"Sir," saith he, "gramercy. And God give thee to find that thou seekest."

So they parted each from other, and Aucassin rode on: the night was fair and still, and so long he went that he came to the lodge of boughs, that Nicolete had builded and woven within and without, over and under, with flowers, and it was the fairest lodge that might be seen. When Aucassin was ware of it, he stopped suddenly, and the light of the moon fell therein.

"God!" quoth Aucassin, "here was Nicolete, my sweet lady, and this lodge builded she with her fair hands. For the sweetness of it, and for love of her, will I alight, and rest here this night long."

He drew forth his foot from the stirrup to alight, and the steed was great and tall. He dreamed so much on Nicolete his right sweet lady, that he slipped on a stone, and drave his shoulder out of its place. Then knew he that he was hurt sore, nathless he bore him with what force he might, and fastened with the other hand the mare's son to a thorn. Then turned he on his side, and crept backwise into the lodge of boughs. And he looked through a gap in the lodge and saw the stars in heaven, and one that was brighter than the rest; so began he to say:

Here one singeth:

"Star, that I from far behold,
Star, the Moon calls to her fold,
Nicolete with thee doth dwell,
My sweet love with locks of gold,
God would have her dwell afar,
Dwell with him for evening star,
Would to God, whate'er befell,
Would that with her I might dwell.
I would clip her close and strait,
Nay, were I of much estate,
Some king's son desirable,
Worthy she to be my mate,
Me to kiss and clip me well,
Sister, sweet friend!"

So speak they, say they, tell they the Tale:

When Nicolete heard Aucassin, right so came she unto him, for she was not far away. She passed within the lodge, and threw her arms about his neck, and clipped and kissed him.

"Fair sweet friend, welcome be thou."

"And thou, fair sweet love, be thou welcome."

So either kissed and clipped the other, and fair joy was them between.

"Ha! sweet love," quoth Aucassin, "but now was I sore hurt, and my shoulder wried, but I take no force of it, nor have no hurt therefrom since I have thee."

Right so felt she his shoulder and found it was wried from its place. And she so handled it with her white hands, and so wrought in her surgery, that by God's will who loveth lovers, it went back into its place. Then took she flowers, and fresh grass, and leaves green, and bound these herbs on the hurt with a strip of her smock, and he was all healed.

"Aucassin," saith she, "fair sweet love, take counsel what thou wilt do. If thy father let search this forest tomorrow, and men find me here, they will slay me, come to thee what will."

"Certes, fair sweet love, therefore should I sorrow heavily, but, an if I may, never shall they take thee."

Anon gat he on his horse, and his lady before him, kissing and clipping her, and so rode they at adventure.

Here one singeth:

Aucassin the frank, the fair,
Aucassin of the yellow hair,
Gentle knight, and true lover,
From the forest doth he fare,
Holds his love before him there,
Kissing cheek, and chin, and eyes,
But she spake in sober wise,
"Aucassin, true love and fair,
To what land do we repair?"
Sweet my love, I take no care,
Thou art with me everywhere!
So they pass the woods and downs,
Pass the villages and towns,
Hills and dales and open land,
Came at dawn to the sea sand,
Lighted down upon the strand,
Beside the sea.

Then say they, speak they, tell they the Tale:

Aucassin lighted down and his love, as ye have heard sing. He held his horse by the bridle, and his lady by the hands; so went they along the sea shore, and on the sea they saw a ship, and he called unto the sailors, and they came to him. Then held he such speech with them, that he and his lady were brought aboard that ship, and when they were on the high sea, behold a mighty wind and tyrannous arose, marvelous and great, and drave them from land to land, till they came unto a strange country, and won the haven of the castle of Torclore. Then asked they what this land might be, and men told them that it was the country of the King of Torelore. Then he asked what manner of man was he, and was there war afoot, and men said,

"Yea, and mighty!"

Therewith took he farewell of the merchants, and they commended him to God. Anon Aucassin mounted his horse, with his sword girt, and his lady before him, and rode at adventure till he was come to the castle. Then asked he where the King was, and they said that he was in childbed.

"Then where is his wife?"

And they told him she was with the host, and had led with her all the force of that country.

Now when Aucassin heard that saying, he made great marvel, and came into the castle, and lighted down, he and his lady, and his lady held his horse. Right so went he up into the castle, with his sword girt, and fared hither and thither till he came to the chamber where the King was lying.

Here one singeth:

Aucassin the courteous knight
To the chamber went forthright,
To the bed with linen dight
Even where the King was laid.
There he stood by him and said:
"Fool, what makst thou here abed?"
Quoth the King: "I am brought to bed
Of a fair son, and anon
When my month is over and gone,
And my healing fairly done,
To the Minister will I fare
And will do my churching there,
As my father did repair.
Then will sally forth to war,
Then will drive my foes afar
From my countrie!"

Then speak they, say they, tell they the Tale:

When Aucassin heard the King speak on this wise, he took all the sheets that covered him, and threw them all abroad about the chamber. Then saw he behind him a cudgel, and caught it into his hand, and turned, and took the King, and beat him till he was well-nigh dead.

"Ha! fair sir," quoth the King, "what would you with me? Art thou beside thyself, that beatest me in mine own house?"

"By God's heart," quoth Aucassin, "thou ill son of an ill wench, I will slay thee if thou swear not that never shall any man in all thy land lie in of child henceforth for ever."

So he did that oath, and when he had done it,

"Sir," said Aucassin, "bring me now where thy wife is with the host."

"Sir, with good will," quoth the King.

He mounted his horse, and Aucassin gat on his own, and Nicolette abode in the Queen's chamber. ⁴⁰ Anon rode Aucassin and the King even till they came to that place where the Queen was, and lo! men were warring with baked apples, and with eggs, and with fresh cheeses, and Aucassin began to look on them, and made great marvel.

Here singeth one:

Aucassin his horse doth stay,
From the saddle watched the fray,
All the stour and fierce array;
Right fresh cheeses carried they,
⁵⁰ Apples baked, and mushrooms gray,
Whoso splasheth most the ford

He is master called and lord.
Aucassin doth gaze awhile,
Then began to laugh and smile
And made game.

Then speak they, say they, tell they the Tale:

When Aucassin beheld these marvels, he came to the King, and said, "Sir, be these thine enemies?"

¹⁰ "Yea, Sir," quoth the King.

"And will ye that I should avenge you of them?"

"Yea," quoth he, "with all my heart."

Then Aucassin put hand to sword, and hurled among them, and began to smite to the right hand and the left, and slew many of them. And when the King saw that he slew them, he caught at his bridle and said,

"Ha! fair sir, slay them not in such wise."

²⁰ "How," quoth Aucassin, "will ye not that I should avenge you of them?"

"Sir," quoth the King, "over-much already hast thou avenged me. It is nowise our custom to slay each other."

Anon turned they and fled. Then the King and Aucassin betook them again to the castle of Torelore, and the folk of that land counseled the King to put Aucassin forth, and keep Nicolette for his son's wife, for that she seemed a lady high of lineage. ³⁰ And Nicolette heard them and had no joy of it, so began to say:

Here singeth one:

Thus she spake the bright of brow:
"Lord of Torelore and king,
Thy folk deem me a light thing,
When my love doth me embrace,
Fair he finds me, in good case,
Then am I in such derray,
Neither harp, nor lyre, nor lay,
Dance nor game, nor rebeck play
Were so sweet."

Then speak they, say they, tell they the Tale:

Aucassin dwelt in the castle of Torelore, in great ease and great delight, for that he had with him Nicolette his sweet love, whom he loved so well. Now while he was in such pleasure and such delight, came a troop of Saracens by sea, and laid siege to the castle and took it by main strength. ⁵⁰ Anon took they the substance that was therein and carried off the men and maidens captives. They seized Nicolette and Aucassin, and bound Aucassin hand and foot, and cast him into one ship, and Nicolete into another. Then rose there a mighty wind over sea, and scattered the ships. Now that ship wherein was Aucassin, went wandering on the sea, till it came to the castle of Biaucaire, and the folk of the country ran together to wreck her, and there found they Aucassin, and they knew him again. So when they of Biaucaire saw their damoiseau, they made great joy of him, for Aucassin had dwelt full three years in the castle of Torelore, and his father and mother were dead. So the people took him to the castle of Biaucaire, and there were they all his men. And he held the land in peace.

Now leave we Aucassin, and speak we of Nicolete. The ship wherein she was cast pertained to the King of Carthage, and he was her father, and she had twelve brothers, all princes or kings. When they beheld Nicolete, how fair she was, they did her great worship, and made much joy of her, and many times asked her who she was, for surely seemed she a lady of noble line and high parentry. But she might not tell them of her lineage, for she was but a child when men stole her away. So sailed they till they won the City of Carthage, and when Nicolete saw the walls of the castle, and the country-side, she knew that there had she been nourished and thence stolen away, being but a child. Yet was she not so young a child but that well she knew she had been daughter of the King of Carthage; and of her nurture in that City.

Here one singeth:

Nicolete the good and true
To the land hath come anew,
Sees the palaces and walls,
And the houses and the halls!
Then she spake and said, "Alas!
That of birth so great I was,
Cousin of the Amiral
And the very child of him
Carthage counts King of Paynim,
Wild folk hold me here withal;
Nay, Aucassin, love of thee
Gentle knight, and true, and free,
Burns and wastes the heart of me.
Ah, God grant it of his grace,
That thou hold me, and embrace,
That thou kiss me on the face
Love and lord!"

Then speak they, say they, tell they the Tale: 50

When the King of Carthage heard Nicolete speak in this wise, he cast his arms about her neck.

"Fair sweet love," saith he, "tell me who thou art, and be not adread of me."

"Sir," said she, "I am daughter to the King of Carthage, and was taken, being then a little child, it is now fifteen years gone."

When all they of the court heard her speak thus, they knew well that she spake sooth: so made they great joy of her, and led her to the castle in great honor, as the King's daughter. And they would have given her to her lord a King of Paynim, but she had no mind to marry. There dwelt she three days or four. And she considered by that means she might seek for Aucassin. Then she got her a viol, and learned to play on it, till they would have married her on a day to a great King of Paynim, and she stole forth by night, and came to the seaport, and dwelt with a poor woman thereby. Then took she a certain herb, and therewith smeared her head and her face, till she was all brown and stained. And she let make coat, and mantle, and smock, and hose, and attired herself as if she had been a harper. So took she the viol and went to a mariner, and so wrought on him that he took her aboard his vessel. Then hoisted they sail, and fared on the high seas even till they came to the land of Provence. And Nicolete went forth and took the viol, and went playing through all that country, even till she came to the castle of Biaucaire, where Aucassin lay.

Here one singeth:

At Biaucaire below the tower
Sat Aucassin, on an hour,
Heard the bird, and watched the flower,
With his barons him beside,
Then came on him in that tide,
The sweet influence of love
And the memory thereof;
Thought of Nicolete the fair,
And the dainty face of her
He had loved so many years,
Then was he in dule and tears!
Even then came Nicolete
On the stair a foot she set,
And she drew the viol bow
Through the strings and chanted so;
'Listen, lords and knights, to me,
Lords of high or low degree,
To my story list will ye
All of Aucassin and her
That was Nicolete the fair?
And their love was long to tell
Deep woods through he sought her well,
Paynims took them on a day
In Torelore and bound they lay.

Of Aucassin naught know we,
 But fair Nicolete the free
 Now in Carthage doth she dwell,
 There her father loves her well,
 Who is king of that countrie.
 Her a husband hath he found,
 Paynim lord that serves Mahound!
 Ne'er with him the maid will go,
 For she loves a damoiseau,
 Aucassin, that ye may know,
 Swears to God that never mo
 With a lover she will go
 Save with him she loveth so
 In long desire."

So speak they, say they, tell they the Tale:

When Aucassin heard Nicolete speak in this wise, he was right joyful, and drew her on one side, and spoke, saying:

"Sweet fair friend, know ye nothing of this Nicolete, of whom ye have thus sung?"

"Yea, Sir, I know her for the noblest creature, and the most gentle, and the best that ever was born on ground. She is daughter to the King of Carthage that took her there where Aucassin was taken, and brought her into the city of Carthage, till he knew that verily she was his own daughter, whereon he made right great mirth. Anon wished he to give her for her lord one of the greatest kings of all Spain, but she would rather let herself be hanged or burned, than take any lord. how great 30 soever."

"Ha! fair sweet friend," quoth the Count Aucassin, "if thou wilt go into that land again, and bid her come and speak to me, I will give thee of my substance, more than thou wouldst dare to ask or take. And know ye, that for the sake of her, I have no will to take a wife, howsoever high her lineage. So wait I for her, and never will I have a wife, but her only. And if I knew where to find her, no need would I have to seek her." 40

"Sir," quoth she, "if ye promise me that, I will go in quest of her for your sake, and for hers, that I love much."

So he sware to her, and anon let give her twenty livres, and she departed from him, and he wept for the sweetness of Nicolete. And when she saw him weeping, she said:

"Sir, trouble not thyself so much withal. For in a little while shall I have brought her into this city, and ye shall see her." 50

When Aucassin heard that, he was right glad thereof. And she departed from him, and went into the city to the house of the Captain's wife, for the Captain her father in God was dead. So she dwelt there, and told all her tale; and the Captain's wife knew her, and knew well that she was Nicolete that she herself had nourished. Then she let wash and bathe her, and there rested she eight full days. Then took she an herb that was named 10 Eyebright and anointed herself therewith, and was as fair as ever she had been all the days of her life. Then she clothed herself in rich robes of silk whereof the lady had great store, and then sat herself in the chamber on a silken coverlet, and called the lady and bade her go and bring Aucassin her love, and she did even so. And when she came to the Palace she found Aucassin weeping, and making lament for Nicolete his love, for that she delayed so long. And the lady spake unto him and 20 said:

"Aucassin, sorrow no more, but come thou on with me, and I will shew thee the thing in the world that thou lovest best; even Nicolete thy dear love, who from far lands hath come to seek of thee." And Aucassin was right glad.

Here singeth one:

When Aucassin heareth now
 That his lady bright of brow
 Dwelleth in his own countrie,
 Never man was glad as he.
 To her castle doth he hie
 With the lady speedily,
 Passeth to the chamber high,
 Findeth Nicolete thereby.
 Of her true love found again
 Never maid was half so fain.
 Straight she leaped upon her feet;
 When his love he saw at last,
 Arms about her did he cast,
 Kissed her often, kissed her sweet
 Kissed her lips and brows and eyes.
 Thus all night do they devise,
 Even till the morning white.
 Then Aucassin wedded her,
 Made her Lady of Biaucaire.
 Many years abode they there,
 Many years in shade or sun,
 In great gladness and delight.
 Ne'er hath Aucassin regret
 Nor his lady Nicolete.
 Now my story all is done,
 Said and sung!

ABELARD AND HELOISE

Heloise to Abelard

To her Lord, her Father, her Husband, her Brother; his Servant, his Child, his Wife, his Sister, and to express all that is humble, respectful and loving to her Abelard, Heloise writes this.

A consolatory letter of yours to a friend happened some days since to fall into my hands; my knowledge of the writing and my love of the hand gave me the curiosity to open it. In justification of the liberty I took, I flattered myself I might claim a sovereign privilege over everything which came from you. Nor was I scrupulous to break through the rules of good breeding when I was to hear news of Abelard. But how dear did my curiosity cost me! What disturbance did it occasion, and how surprised I was to find the whole letter filled with a particular and melancholy account of our misfortunes! I met with my name a hundred times; I never saw it without fear—some heavy calamity always followed it. I saw yours too, equally unhappy.

These mournful but dear remembrances put my heart into such violent motion that I thought it was too much to offer comfort to a friend for a few slight disgraces, but such extraordinary means as the representation of our sufferings and revolutions. What reflections did I not make! I began to consider the whole afresh, and perceived myself pressed with the same weight of grief as when we first began to be miserable. Though length of time ought to have closed up my wounds, yet the seeing them described by your hand was sufficient to make them all open and bleed afresh. . . .

My tears, which I could not restrain, have blotted half your letter; I wish they had effaced the whole, and that I had returned it to you in that condition; I should then have been satisfied with the little time I kept it; but it was demanded of me too soon.

I must confess I was much easier in my mind before I read your letter. Surely all the misfortunes of lovers are conveyed to them through the eyes: upon reading your letter I feel all mine renewed. I reproached myself for having been so long without venting my sorrows, when the rage of our unrelenting enemies still burns with the same fury.

Since length of time, which disarms the strongest hatred, seems but to aggravate theirs; since it is decreed that your virtue shall be persecuted till it takes refuge in the grave—and even then, perhaps, your ashes will not be allowed to rest in peace!—let me always meditate on your calamities, let me publish them through all the world, if possible, to shame an age that has not known how to value you. . . .

Let me have a faithful account of all that concerns you; I would know everything, be it ever so unfortunate. Perhaps by mingling my sighs with yours I may make your sufferings less, for it is said that all sorrows divided are made lighter.

Tell me not by way of excuse you will spare me tears; the tears of women shut up in a melancholy place and devoted to penitence are not to be spared. And if you wait for an opportunity to write pleasant and agreeable things to us, you will delay writing too long. Prosperity seldom chooses the side of the virtuous, and fortune is so blind that in a crowd in which there is perhaps but one wise and brave man it is not to be expected that she should single him out. Write to me then immediately and wait not for miracles; they are too scarce, and we too much accustomed to misfortunes to expect a happy turn. I shall always have this, if you please, and this will always be agreeable to me, that when I receive any letter from you I shall know you still remember me. . . .

I have your picture in my room; I never pass it without stopping to look at it; and yet when you are present with me I scarce ever cast my eyes on it. If a picture, which is but a mute representation of an object, can give such pleasure, what cannot letters inspire? They have souls; they can speak; they have in them all that force which expresses the transports of the heart; they have all the fire of our passions, they can raise them as much as if the persons themselves were present; they have all the tenderness and the delicacy of speech, and sometimes even a boldness of expression beyond it.

We may write to each other; so innocent a pleasure is not denied us. Let us not lose through negligence the only happiness which is left us, and the only one perhaps which the malice of our enemies can never ravish from us. I shall read that you are my husband and you shall see me sign myself your wife. In spite of all our misfortunes you may be what you please in your letter. Letters were first invented for consoling such solitary wretches as myself. Having lost the substantial pleasures of seeing and possessing you, I shall in some measure compensate this loss by the satisfaction I shall find in your writing. There I shall read your most sacred thoughts; I shall carry them always about with me, I shall kiss them every moment; if you can be capable of any jealousy let it be for the fond caresses I shall bestow upon your letters, and envy only the happiness of those rivals.

That writing may be no trouble to you, write always to me carelessly and without study; I had rather read the dictates of the heart than of the brain. I cannot live if you will not tell me that you still love me; but that language ought to be so natural to you, that I believe you cannot speak otherwise to me without violence to yourself. And since by this melancholy relation to your friend you have awakened all my sorrows, 'tis but reasonable you should allay them by some tokens of your unchanging love. . . .

You cannot but remember (for lovers cannot forget) with what pleasure I have passed whole days in hearing your discourse. How when you were absent I shut myself from everyone to write to you; how uneasy I was till my letter had come to your hands; what artful management it required to engage messengers. This detail perhaps surprises you, and you are in pain for what may follow. But I am no longer ashamed that my passion had no bounds for you, for I have done more than all this. I have hated myself that I might love you. I came hither to ruin myself in a perpetual imprisonment that I might make you live quietly and at ease.

Nothing but virtue, joined to a love perfectly disengaged from the senses, could have produced such effects. Vice never inspires anything like this: it is too much enslaved to the body. When we love pleasures we love the living and not the dead. We leave off burning with desire for those who can no longer burn for us. This was my cruel uncle's notion; he measured my virtue by the frailty of my sex, and thought it was the man and not the person I loved. But he has been guilty to no purpose. I love you more than ever; and so revenge myself on him. I will still love you with all the tenderness of my soul till the last moment of my life. If, formerly, my affection for you was not so pure, if in those days both mind and body loved you, I often told you even then that I was more pleased with possessing your heart than with any other happiness, and the man was the thing I least valued in you.

You cannot but be entirely persuaded of this by the extreme unwillingness I showed to marry you, though I knew that the name of wife was honorable in the world and holy in religion; yet the name of your mistress had greater charms because it was more free. The bonds of matrimony, however honorable, still bear with them a necessary engagement, and I was very unwilling to be necessitated to love always a man who would perhaps not always love me. I despised the name of wife that I might live happy with that of mistress; and I find by your letter to your friend you have not forgot that delicacy of passion which loved you always with the utmost tenderness—and yet wished to love you more!

You have very justly observed in your letter that I esteemed those public engagements insipid which form alliances only to be dissolved by death, and which put life and love under the same unhappy necessity. But you have not added how often I have protested that it was infinitely preferable to me to live with Abelard as his mistress than with any other as Empress of the World. I was more happy in obeying you than I should have been as lawful spouse of the King of the Earth. Riches and pomp are not the charm of love. True tenderness makes us separate the lover from all that is external to him, and setting aside his position, fortune, or employments, consider him merely as himself. . . .

It is not love, but the desire of riches and position which makes a woman run into the embraces of an indolent husband. Ambition, and not affection, forms such marriages. I believe indeed they may be followed with some honors and advantages, but I can never think that this is the way to experience the pleasures of affectionate union, nor to feel those subtle and charming joys when hearts long parted are at last united. These martyrs of marriage pine always for larger fortunes which they think they have missed. The wife sees husbands richer than her own, and the husband wives better portioned than his. Their mercenary vows occasion regret, and regret produces hatred. Soon they part—or else desire to. This restless and tormenting passion for gold punishes them for aiming at other advantages by love than love itself.

If there is anything that may properly be called happiness here below, I am persuaded it is the union of two persons who love each other with perfect liberty, who are united by a secret inclination, and satisfied with each other's merits. Their hearts are full and leave no vacancy for any other passion; they enjoy perpetual tranquillity because they enjoy content. . . .

What rivalries did your gallantries of this kind occasion me! How many ladies lay claim to them? 'Twas a tribute their self-love paid to their beauty. How many have I seen with sighs declare their passion for you when, after some common visit you had made them, they chanced to be complimented for the Sylvia of your poems. Others in despair and envy have reproached me that I had no charms but what your wit bestowed on me, nor in anything the advantage over them but in being beloved by you. Can you believe me if I tell you, that notwithstanding my sex, I thought myself peculiarly happy in having a lover to whom I was obliged for my charms; and took a secret pleasure in being admired by a man who, when he pleased, could raise his mistress to the character of a goddess. Pleased with your glory only, I read with delight all those praises you offered me, and without reflecting how little I deserved, I believed myself such as you described, that I might be more certain that I pleased you.

But oh! where is that happy time? I now lament my lover, and of all my joys have nothing but the painful memory that they are past. Now learn, all you my rivals who once viewed my happiness with jealous eyes, that he you once envied me can never more be mine. I loved him; my love was his crime and the cause of his punishment. My beauty once charmed him; pleased with each other, we passed our brightest days in tranquillity and happiness. If that were a crime, 'tis a crime I am yet fond of, and I have no other regret save that against my will I must now be innocent.

But what do I say? My misfortune was to have cruel relatives whose malice destroyed the calm we enjoyed; had they been reasonable I had now been happy in the enjoyment of my dear husband. Oh! how cruel were they when their blind fury urged a villain to surprise you in your sleep! Where was I—where was your Heloise then? What joy should I have had in defending my lover; I would have guarded you from violence at the expense of my life. Oh! whither does this excess of passion hurry me? Here love is shocked and modesty deprives me of words.

But tell me whence proceeds your neglect of me since my being professed? You know nothing moved me to it but your disgrace, nor did I give my consent, but yours. Let me hear what is the occasion of your coldness, or give me leave to tell you now my opinion. Was it not the sole thought of pleasure which engaged you to me? And has not my tenderness, by leaving you nothing to wish for, extinguished your desires?

Wretched Heloise! you could please when you wished to avoid it; you merited incense when you could remove to a distance the hand that offered it: but since your heart has been softened and has yielded, since you have devoted and sacrificed yourself, you are deserted and forgotten!

I am convinced by a sad experience that it is natural to avoid those to whom we have been too much obliged, and that uncommon generosity causes neglect rather than gratitude. My heart surrendered too soon to gain the esteem of the conqueror; you took it without difficulty and threw it aside with ease. But ungrateful as you are I am no consenting party to this, and though I ought not to retain a wish of my own, yet I still preserve secretly the desire to be loved by you.

When I pronounced my sad vow I then had about me your last letters in which you protested your whole being wholly mine, and would never live but to love me. It is to you therefore I have offered myself; you had my heart and I had yours; do not demand anything back. You must bear with my passion as a thing which of right belongs to you, and from which you can be no ways disengaged.

Alas! what folly it is to talk in this way! I see nothing here but marks of the Deity, and I speak of nothing but man! You have been the cruel occasion of this by your conduct, unfaithful one! Ought you at once to break off loving me! Why did you not deceive me for a while rather than immediately abandon me? If you had given me at least some faint signs of a dying passion I would have favored the deception. But in vain do I flatter myself that you could be constant; you have left no vestige of an excuse for you. I am earnestly desirous to see you, but if that be impossible I will content myself with a few lines from your hand.

Is it so hard for one who loves to write? I ask for none of your letters filled with learning and writ for your reputation; all I desire is such letters as the heart dictates, and which the hand cannot transcribe fast enough. How did I deceive myself with hopes that you would be wholly mine when I took the veil, and engaged myself to live forever under your laws? For in being professed I vowed no more than to be yours only, and I forced myself voluntarily to a confinement which you desired for me. Death only then can make me leave the cloister where you have placed me; and then my ashes shall rest here and wait for yours in order to show to the very last my obedience and devotion to you.

Why should I conceal from you the secret of my call? You know it was neither zeal nor devotion that brought me here. Your conscience is too faithful a witness to permit you to disown it. Yet here I am, and here I will remain; to this place an unfortunate love and a cruel relation have condemned me. But if you do not continue your concern for me, if I lose your affection, what have I gained by my imprisonment? What recompense can I hope for? The unhappy consequences of our love and your disgrace have made me put on the habit of chastity, but I am not penitent of the past. Thus I strive and labor in vain. Among those who are wedded to God I am wedded to a man; among the heroic supporters of the Cross I am the slave of a human desire; at the head of a religious community I am devoted to Abelard alone.

What a monster am I! Enlighten me, O Lord, for I know not if my despair of Thy grace draws these words from me! I am, I confess, a sinner, but one who, far from weeping for her sins, weeps only for her lover; far from abhorring her crimes, longs only to add to them; and who, with a weakness unbecoming my state, please myself continually with the remembrance of past delights when it is impossible to renew them.

Good God! What is all this? I reproach myself for my own faults, I accuse you for yours, and to what purpose? Veiled as I am, behold in what a disorder you have plunged me! How difficult it is to fight for duty against inclination. I know what obligations this veil lays upon me, but I feel more strongly what power an old passion has over my heart. . . .

Oh, for pity's sake help a wretch to renounce her desires—her self—and if possible even to renounce you! If you are a lover—a father, help a mistress, comfort a child! These tender names must surely move you; yield either to pity or to love. If you gratify my request I shall continue a religious, and without longer profaning my calling.

I am ready to humble myself with you to the wonderful goodness of God, who does all things for our sanctification, who by His grace purifies all that is vicious and corrupt, and by the great riches of His mercy draws us against our wishes, and by degrees opens our eyes to behold His bounty which at first we could not perceive. . . .

A heart which has loved as mine cannot soon be indifferent. We fluctuate long between love and hatred before we can arrive at tranquillity, and we always flatter ourselves with some forlorn hope that we shall not be utterly forgotten.

Yes, Abelard, I conjure you by the chains I bear here to ease the weight of them, and make them as agreeable as I would they were to me. Teach me the maxims of Divine Love; since you have forsaken me I would glory in being wedded to Heaven. My heart adores that title and disdains any other; tell me how this Divine Love is nourished, how it works, how it purifies.

When we were tossed on the ocean of the world we could hear of nothing but your verses, which published everywhere our joys and pleasures. Now we are in the haven of grace is it not fit you should discourse to me of this new happiness, and teach me everything that might heighten or improve it? Show me the same complaisance in my present condition as you did when we were in the world. Without changing the ardor of our affections let us change their objects; let us leave our songs and sing hymns; let us lift up our hearts to God and have no transports but for His glory!

I expect this from you as a thing you cannot refuse me. God has a peculiar right over the hearts of great men He has created. When He pleases to touch them He ravishes them, and lets them not speak nor breathe but for His glory. Till that moment of grace arrives, O think of me—do not forget me—remember my love and fidelity and constancy: love me as your mistress, cherish me as your child, your sister, your wife! Remember I still love you, and yet strive to avoid loving you. What a terrible saying is this! I shake with horror, and my heart revolts against what I say. I shall blot all my paper with tears. I end my long letter wishing you, if you desire it (would to Heaven I could!), forever adieu!

Abelard to Heloise

Could I have imagined that a letter not written to yourself would fall into your hands, I had been more cautious not to have inserted anything in it which might awaken the memory of our past misfortunes. I described with boldness the series of my disgraces to a friend, in order to make him less sensible to a loss he had sustained.

If by this well-meaning device I have disturbed you, I purpose now to dry up those tears which the sad description occasioned you to shed; I intend to mix my grief with yours, and pour out my heart before you: in short, to lay open before your eyes all my trouble, and the secret of my soul, which my vanity has hitherto made me conceal from the rest of the world, and which you now force from me, in spite of my resolutions to the contrary.

It is true, that in a sense of the afflictions which have befallen us, and observing that no change of our condition could be expected; that those prosperous days which had seduced us were now past, and there remained nothing but to erase from our minds, by painful endeavors, all marks and remembrances of them. I had wished to find in philosophy and religion a remedy for my disgrace; I searched out an asylum to secure me from love. I was come to the sad experiment of making vows to harden my heart.

But what have I gained by this? If my passion has been put under a restraint my thoughts yet run free. I promise myself that I will forget you, and yet cannot think of it without loving you. My love is not at all lessened by those reflections I make in order to free myself. The silence I am surrounded by makes me more sensible to its impressions, and while I am unemployed with any other things, this makes itself the business of my whole vocation. Till after a multitude of useless endeavors I begin to persuade myself that it is a superfluous trouble to strive to free myself; and that it is sufficient wisdom to conceal from all but you how confused and weak I am.

I remove to a distance from your person with an intention of avoiding you as an enemy; and yet I incessantly seek for you in my mind; I recall your image in my memory, and in different disquietudes I betray and contradict myself. I hate you! I love you! Shame presses me on all sides.

I am at this moment afraid I should seem more indifferent than you fare, and yet I am ashamed to discover my trouble. How weak are we in ourselves if we do not support ourselves on the Cross of Christ. Shall we have so little courage, and shall that uncertainty of serving two masters which afflicts your heart affect mine too? You see the confusion I am in, how I blame myself and how I suffer.

Religion commands me to pursue virtue since I have nothing to hope for from love. But love still preserves its dominion over my fancies and entertains itself with past pleasures. Memory supplies the place of a mistress. Piety and duty are not always the fruits of retirement; even in deserts, when the dew of heaven falls not on us, we love what we ought no longer to love.

The passions, stirred up by solitude, fill these regions of death and silence; it is very seldom that what ought to be is truly followed here and that God only is loved and served. Had I known this before, I had instructed you better. You call me your master; it is true you were entrusted to my care. I saw you, I was earnest to teach you vain sciences; it cost you your innocence and me my liberty.

Your uncle, who was fond of you, became my enemy and revenged himself on me. If now having lost the power of satisfying my passion I had also lost that of loving you, I should have some consolation. My enemies would have given me that tranquillity which Origen¹ purchased with a crime. How miserable am I! I find myself much more guilty in my thoughts of you, even amidst my tears, than in possessing you when I was in full liberty. I continually think of you; I continually call to mind your tenderness.

In this condition, O Lord! if I run to prostrate myself before your altar, if I beseech you to pity me, why does not the pure flame of the Spirit consume the sacrifice that is offered? Cannot this habit of penitence which I wear interest Heaven to treat me more favorably? But Heaven is still inexorable, because my passion still lives in me; the fire is only covered over with deceitful ashes, and cannot be extinguished but by extraordinary grace. We deceive men, but nothing is hid from God.

You tell me that it is for me you live under that veil which covers you; why do you profane your vocation with such words? Why provoke a jealous God with a blasphemy? I hoped after our separation you would have changed your sentiments; I hoped too that God would have delivered me from the tumult of my senses. We commonly die to the affections of those we see no more, and they to ours; absence is the tomb of love. But to me absence is an unquiet remembrance of what I once loved which continually torments me. I flattered myself that when I should see you no more you would rest in my memory without troubling my mind; that Brittany and the sea would suggest other thoughts; that my fasts and studies would by degrees delete you from my heart. But in spite of severe fasts and redoubled studies, in spite of the distance of three hundred miles which separates us, your image, as you describe yourself in your veil, appears to me and confounds all my resolutions.

What means have I not used! I have armed my hands against myself; I have exhausted my strength in constant exercises; I comment upon Saint Paul; I contend with Aristotle: in short, I do all I used to do before I loved you, but all in vain; nothing can be successful that opposes you. Oh! do not add to my miseries by your constancy. . . Why use your eloquence to reproach me for my flight and for my silence? Spare the recital of our assignations and your constant exactness to them; without calling up such disturbing thoughts I have enough to suffer. What great advantages would philosophy give us over other men, if by studying it we could learn to govern our passions? What efforts, what relapses, what agitations do we undergo! And how long are we lost in this confusion, unable to exert our reason, to possess our souls, or to rule our affections? . . .

How can I separate from the person I love, the passion I should detest? Will the tears I shed be sufficient to render it odious to me? I know not how it happens, there is always a pleasure in weeping for a beloved object. It is difficult in our sorrow to distinguish penitence from love. The memory of the crime and the memory of the object which has charmed us are too nearly related to be immediately separated. And the love of God in its beginning does not wholly annihilate the love of the creature.

But what excuses could I not find in you if the crime were excusable? Unprofitable honor, troublesome riches, could never tempt me: but those charms, that beauty, that air, which I yet behold at this instant, have occasioned my fall. Your looks were the beginning of my guilt; your eyes, your discourse, pierced my heart; and in spite of that ambition and glory which tried to make a defense, love was soon the master.

God, in order to punish me, forsook me. You are no longer of the world; you have renounced it: I am a religious devoted to solitude; shall we not take advantage of our condition? Would you destroy my piety in its infant state? Would you have me forsake the abbey into which I am but newly entered? Must I renounce my vows? I have made them in the presence of God; whither shall I fly from His wrath should I violate them? Suffer me to seek ease in my duty. . . .

Regard me no more, I entreat you, as a founder or any great personage; your praises ill agree with my many weaknesses. I am a miserable sinner, prostrate before my Judge, and with my face pressed to the earth I mix my tears with the earth. Can you see me in this posture and solicit me to love you? Come, if you think fit, and in your holy habit thrust yourself between my God and me, and be a wall of separation. Come and force from me those sighs and thoughts and vows I owe to Him alone. Assist the evil spirits and be the instrument of their malice. What cannot you induce a heart to do whose weakness you so perfectly know?

Nay, withdraw yourself and contribute to my salvation. Suffer me to avoid destruction, I entreat you by our former tender affection and by our now common misfortune. It will always be the highest love to show none; I here release you from all your oaths and engagements. Be God's wholly, to whom you are appropriated; I will never oppose so pious a design. How happy shall I be if I thus lose you! Then shall I indeed be a religious and you a perfect example of an abbess.

Make yourself amends by so glorious a choice; make your virtue a spectacle worthy of men and angels. Be humble among your children, assiduous in your choir, exact in your discipline, diligent in your reading; make even your recreations useful.

Have you purchased your vocation at so light a rate that you should not turn it to the best advantage? Since you have permitted yourself to be abused by false doctrine and criminal instruction, resist not those good counsels which grace and religion inspire me with.

I will confess to you I have thought myself hitherto an abler master to instill vice than to teach virtue. My false eloquence has only set off false good. My heart, drunk with voluptuousness, could only suggest terms proper and moving to recommend that. The cup of sinners overflows with so enchanting a sweetness, and we are naturally so much inclined to taste it, that it needs only to be offered to us.

On the other hand the chalice of saints is filled with a bitter draught and nature starts from it. And yet you reproach me with cowardice for giving it to you first. I willingly submit to these accusations. I cannot enough admire the readiness you showed to accept the religious habit; bear therefore with courage the Cross you so resolutely took up. Drink of the chalice of saints, even to the bottom, without turning your eyes with uncertainty upon me; let me remove far from you and obey the Apostle who hath said "Fly!"

You entreat me to return under a pretense of devotion. Your earnestness in this point creates a suspicion in me and makes me doubtful how to answer you. Should I commit an error here my words would blush, if I may say so, after the history of our misfortunes. The Church is jealous of its honor, and commands that her children should be induced to the practice of virtue by virtuous means. When we approach God in a blameless manner then we may with boldness invite others to Him.

But to forget Heloise, to see her no more, is what Heaven demands of Abelard; and to expect nothing from Abelard, to forget him even as an idea, is what Heaven enjoins on Heloise. To forget, in the case of love, is the most necessary penance, and the most difficult. It is easy to recount our faults; how many, through indiscretion, have made themselves a second pleasure of this instead of confessing them with humility. The only way to return to God is by neglecting the creature we have adored, and adoring the God whom we have neglected. This may appear harsh, but it must be done if we would be saved.

To make it more easy consider why I pressed you to your vow before I took mine; and pardon my sincerity and the design I have of meriting your neglect and hatred if I conceal nothing from you. When I saw myself oppressed by my misfortune I was furiously jealous, and regarded all men as my rivals. Love has more of distrust than assurance. I was apprehensive of many things because of my many defects, and being tormented with fear because of my own example I imagined your heart so accustomed to love that it could not be long without entering on a new engagement. Jealousy can easily believe the most terrible things.

I was desirous to make it impossible for me to doubt you. I was very urgent to persuade you that propriety demanded your withdrawal from the eyes of the world; that modesty and our friendship required it; and that your own safety obliged it. After such a revenge taken on me you could expect to be secure nowhere but in a convent.

I will do you justice, you were very easily persuaded. My jealousy secretly rejoiced in your innocent compliance; and yet, triumphant as I was, I yielded you up to God with an unwilling heart. I still kept my gift as much as was possible, and only parted with it in order to keep it out of the power of other men. I did not persuade you to religion out of any regard to your happiness, but condemned you to it like an enemy who destroys what he cannot carry off. And yet you heard my discourses with kindness, you sometimes interrupted me with tears, and pressed me to acquaint you with those convents I held in the highest esteem. What a comfort I felt in seeing you shut up. I was now at ease and took a satisfaction in considering that you continued no longer in the world after my disgrace, and that you would return to it no more.

But still I was doubtful. I imagined women were incapable of steadfast resolutions unless they were forced by the necessity of vows. I wanted those vows, and Heaven itself for your security, that I might no longer distrust you. Ye holy mansions and impenetrable retreats! from what innumerable apprehensions have ye freed me? Religion and piety keep a strict guard around your grates and walls. What a haven of rest this is to a jealous mind! And with what impatience did I endeavor after it!

I went every day trembling to exhort you to this sacrifice; I admired, without daring to mention it then, a brightness in your beauty which I had never observed before. Whether it was the bloom of a rising virtue, or an anticipation of the great loss I was to suffer, I was not curious in examining the cause, but only hastened your being professed. I engaged your prioress in my guilt by a criminal bribe with which I purchased the right of burying you. The professed of the house were alike bribed and concealed from you, at my directions, all their scruples and disgusts. I omitted nothing, either little or great; and if you had escaped my snares I myself would not have retired; I was resolved to follow you everywhere. The shadow of myself would always have pursued your steps and continually have occasioned either your confusion or your fear, which would have been a sensible gratification to me.

But, thanks to Heaven, you resolved to take the vows. I accompanied you to the foot of the altar, and while you stretched out your hand to touch the sacred cloth I heard you distinctly pronounce those fatal words that forever separated you from man. Till then I thought your youth and beauty would foil my design and force your return to the world. Might not a small temptation have changed you? Is it possible to renounce oneself entirely at the age of two-and-twenty? At an age which claims the utmost liberty could you think the world no longer worth your regard? How much did I wrong you, and what weakness did I impute to you? You were in my imagination both light and inconstant. Would not a woman at the noise of the flames and the fall of Sodom involuntarily look back in pity on some person? I watched your eyes, your every movement, your air; I trembled at everything. You may call such self-interested conduct treachery, perfidy, murder. A love so like to hatred should provoke the utmost contempt and anger.

It is fit you should know that the very moment when I was convinced of your being entirely devoted to me, when I saw you were infinitely worthy of all my love, I imagined I could love you no more. I thought it time to leave off giving you marks of my affection, and I considered that by your Holy Espousals you were now the peculiar care of Heaven, and no longer a charge on me as my wife. My jealousy seemed to be extinguished. When God only is our rival we have nothing to fear; and being in greater tranquillity than ever before I even dared to pray to Him to take you away from my eyes.

But it was not a time to make rash prayers, and my faith did not warrant them being heard. Necessity and despair were at the root of my proceedings, and thus I offered an insult to Heaven rather than a sacrifice. God rejected my offering and my prayer, and continued my punishment by suffering me to continue my love. Thus I bear alike the guilt of your vows and of the passion that preceded them, and must be tormented the rest of my life.

If God spoke to your heart as to that of a religious whose innocence had first asked Him for favors, I should have matter of comfort; but to see both of us the victims of a guilty love, to see this love insult us in our very habits and spoil our devotions, fills me with horror and trembling. Is this a state of reprobation? Or are these the consequences of a long drunkenness in profane love?

We cannot say love is a poison and a drunkenness till we are illuminated by grace; in the meantime it is an evil we dote on. When we are under such a mistake, the knowledge of our misery is the first step towards amendment. Who does not know that 'tis for the glory of God to find no other reason in man for His mercy than man's very weakness? When He has shown us this weakness and we have bewailed it, He is ready to put forth His omnipotence and assist us. Let us say for our comfort that what we suffer is one of those terrible temptations which have sometimes disturbed the vocations of the most holy.

God can grant His presence to men in order to soften their calamities whenever He shall think fit. It was His pleasure when you took the veil to draw you to Him by His grace. I saw your eyes, when you spoke your last farewell, fixed upon the Cross. It was more than six months before you wrote me a letter, nor during all that time did I receive a message from you, I admired this silence, which I durst not blame, but could not imitate. I wrote to you, and you returned me no answer: your heart was then shut, but this garden of the spouse is now opened; He is withdrawn from it and has left you alone.

By removing from you He has made trial of you; call Him back and strive to regain Him. We must have the assistance of God, that we may break our chains; we are too deeply in love to free ourselves.

Our follies have penetrated into the sacred places; our amours have been a scandal to the whole kingdom. They are read and admired; love which produced them has caused them to be described. We shall be a consolation to the failings of youth forever; those who offend after us will think themselves less guilty. We are criminals whose repentance is late; oh, let it be sincere! Let us repair as far as is possible the evils we have done, and let France, which has been the witness of our crimes, be amazed at our repentance. Let us confound all who would imitate our guilt; let us take the side of God against ourselves, and by so doing prevent His judgment.

Our former lapses require tears, shame, and sorrow to expiate them. Let us offer up these sacrifices from our hearts, let us blush and let us weep. If in these feeble beginnings, O Lord, our hearts are not entirely Thine, let them at least feel that they ought to be so.

Deliver yourself, Heloise, from the shameful remains of a passion which has taken too deep root. Remember that the least thought for any other than God is an adultery. If you could see me here with my meager face and melancholy air, surrounded with numbers of persecuting monks, who are alarmed at my reputation for learning and offended at my lean visage, as if I threatened them with a reformation, what would you say of my base sighs and of those unprofitable tears which deceive these credulous men? Alas! I am humbled under love, and not under the Cross. Pity me and free yourself. If your vocation be, as you say, my work, deprive me not of the merit of it by your continual inquietudes.

Tell me you will be true to the habit which covers you by an inward retirement. Fear God, that you may be delivered from your frailties; love Him that you may advance in virtue. Be not restless in the cloister, for it is the peace of saints. Embrace your bands, they are the chains of Christ Jesus; He will lighten them and bear them with you, if you will but accept them with humility.

Without growing severe to a passion that still possesses you, learn from your misery to succor your weak sisters; pity them upon consideration of your own faults. And if any thoughts too natural should importune you, fly to the foot of the Cross and there beg for mercy.

At the head of a religious society be not a slave, and having rule over queens, begin to govern yourself. Blush at the least revolt of your senses. Remember that even at the foot of the altar we often sacrifice to lying spirits, and that no incense can be more agreeable to them than the earthly passion that still burns in the heart of a religious.

If during your abode in the world your soul has acquired a habit of loving, feel it now no more save for Jesus Christ. Repent of all the moments of your life which you have wasted in the world and on pleasure; demand them of me, 'tis a robbery of which I am guilty; take courage and boldly reproach me with it.

I have been indeed your master, but it was only to teach sin. You call me your father; before I had any claim to the title, I deserved that of parricide. I am your brother, but it is the affinity of sin that brings me that distinction. I am called your husband, but it is after a public scandal.

If you have abused the sanctity of so many holy terms in the superscription of your letter to do me honor and flatter your own passion, blot them out and replace them with those of murderer, villain, and enemy, who has conspired against your honor, troubled your quiet, and betrayed your innocence. You would have perished through my means but for an extraordinary act of grace, which, that you might be saved, has thrown me down in the middle of my course.

This is the thought you ought to have of a fugitive who desires to deprive you of the hope of ever seeing him again. But when love has once been sincere how difficult it is to determine to love no more! 'Tis a thousand times more easy to renounce the world than love. I hate this deceitful, faithless world; I think no more of it; but my wandering heart still eternally seeks you, and is filled with anguish at having lost you, in spite of all the powers of my reason. In the meantime, though I should be so cowardly as to retract what you have read, do not suffer me to offer myself to your thoughts save in this last fashion.

Remember my last worldly endeavors were to seduce your heart; you perished by my means and I with you: the same waves swallowed us up. We waited for death with indifference, and the same death had carried us headlong to the same punishments. But Providence warded off the blow, and our shipwreck has thrown us into a haven.

There are some whom God saves by suffering. Let my salvation be the fruit of your prayers; let me owe it to your tears and your exemplary holiness. Though my heart, Lord, be filled with the love of Thy creature, Thy hand can, when it pleases, empty me of all love save for Thee.

To love Heloise truly is to leave her to that quiet which retirement and virtue afford. I have resolved it: this letter shall be my last fault. Adieu.

If I die here I will give orders that my body be carried to the house of the Paraclete. You shall see me in that condition, not to demand tears from you, for it will be too late; weep rather for me now and extinguish the fire which burns me.

You shall see me in order that your piety may be strengthened by horror of this carcass, and my death be eloquent to tell you what you brave when you love a man. I hope you will be willing, when you have finished this mortal life, to be buried near me. Your cold ashes need then fear nothing, and my tomb shall be the more rich and renowned.

SPANISH BALLADS

Abenamar, Abenamar

O thou Moor of Moreria,
There were mighty signs and aspects
On the day when thou wert born,
Calm and lovely was the ocean,
Bright and full the moon above.
Moor, the child of such an aspect
Never ought to answer falsely.
Then replied the Moorish captive,
(You shall hear the Moor's reply):
Nor will I untruly answer,
Though I died for saying truth.
I am son of Moorish sire.

5

My mother was a Christian slave.
In my childhood, in my boyhood,
Often would my mother bid me
Never know the liar's shame.
Ask thou, therefore, King, thy question.
Truly will I answer thee.

15

Thank thee, thank thee, Abenamar,
For thy gentle answer, thanks.
What are yonder lofty castles,
Those that shine so bright on high?

20

That, O King, is the Alhambra,
Yonder is the Mosque of God.

There you see the Alixares,
 Works of skill and wonder they;
 Ten times ten doubloons the builder
 Daily for his hire received;
 If an idle day he wasted
 Ten times ten doubloons he paid.
 Farther is the Generalife,
 Peerless are its garden groves.
 Those are the Vermilion Towers,
 Far and wide their fame is known.

Then spake up the King Don Juan
 (You shall hear the Monarch's speech):
 Wouldst thou marry me Granada,
 Gladly would I for thy dowry
 Cordoba and Seville give.

I am married, King Don Juan.
 King, I am not yet a widow.
 Well I love my noble husband.
 Well my wedded Lord loves me.

The Lamentation for Celin

At the gate of old Granada, when all its bolts are barred,

At twilight, at the Vega-gate, there is a trampling
 heard;

There is a trampling heard, as of horses treading slow,

And a weeping voice of women, and a heavy sound of woe!—

"What tower is fallen? what star is set; what chief come these bewailing?"

"A tower is fallen! a star is set!—Alas! alas for Celin!"

Three times they knock, three times they cry,—and wide the doors they throw;

Dejectedly they enter, and mournfully they go;
 In gloomy lines they mustering stand beneath the hollow porch,

Each horseman grasping in his hand a black and flaming torch;

Wet is each eye as they go by, and all around is wailing,—

For all have heard the misery,—“Alas! alas for Celin!”

Him yesterday a Moor did slay, of Bencerrage's blood,—

'Twas at the solemn jousting,—around the nobles stood;

The nobles of the land were by, and ladies bright and fair

25 Looked from their latticed windows, the haughty sight to share:

But now the nobles all lament,—the ladies are bewailing,—

30 For he was Granada's darling knight,—“Alas! alas
 for Celin!”

Before him ride his vassals, in order two by two,
 With ashes on their turbans spread, most pitiful to view;

35 Behind him his four sisters, each wrapped in sable veil,

Between the tambour's dismal strokes take up their doleful tale;

When stops the muffled drum, ye hear their brotherless bewailing,

40 And all the people, far and near, cry,—“Alas! alas
 for Celin!”

O, lovely lies he on the bier, above the purple pall,
 The flower of all Granada's youth, the loveliest of them all!

His dark, dark eyes are closed, his rosy lip is pale,
 The crust of blood lies black and dim upon his burnished mail;

And evermore the hoarse tambour breaks in upon their wailing,—

Its sound is like no earthly sound,—“Alas! alas for Celin!”

The Moorish maid at the lattice stands,—the Moor stands at his door;

One maid is wringing of her hands, and one is weeping sore;

Down to the dust men bow their heads, and ashes
 black they strew

Upon their brodered garments, of crimson, green, and blue;

Before each gate the bier stands still,—then bursts
 the loud bewailing,

35 From door and lattice, high and low,—“Alas! alas
 for Celin!”

An old, old woman cometh forth, when she hears the people cry,—

Her hair is white as silver, like horn her glazed eye;

'Twas she that nursed him at her breast,—that nursed him long ago:

She knows not whom they all lament, but soon she well shall know!

40 With one deep shriek, she through doth break, when her ears receive their wailing,—

“Let me kiss my Celin, ere I die!—Alas! alas for Celin!”

PART FOUR

THE RENAISSANCE AND MODERN WORLD

ITALY AND THE RENAISSANCE

It is not too much to say that the modern world was born in Italy. For three hundred years, from about 1300 to 1600, an intellectually awakened Italy exercised a powerful influence on the rest of Europe in thought, art, and literature, shaping modern outlooks in each of these fields. This period, which we call the Renaissance, has been aptly defined by John Addington Symonds, author of the monumental Renaissance in Italy, as "the Middle Ages in dissolution," for the age was transitional. Feudalism was giving way to the modern capitalistic system of free labor, trade, banking, and industrialism. The medieval Church was beginning to lose its hold on the people. As an institution, it was becoming the object of criticism, until even its dogmas were defiantly questioned and large sections of Europe adopted Protestantism. Worldliness replaced the other-worldliness fostered by medieval Catholicism, so that even the papacy was permeated with individualism, the love of splendor, and tolerance of free inquiry. Only when put on the defensive by the Protestant reformation did the Church adopt the policy of reaction and suppression as part of its Counter-Reformation. Men came to be consumed with a passion for self-realization, self-advancement, comfort, luxury, pleasure in themselves, and love of beauty in behavior, costume, art, and literature.

In this spirit, men started to expand the boundaries of the knowable; as early as the thirteenth century travelers to the East, like the famous Marco Polo, began bringing knowledge of remote civilizations, and in the fifteenth century discoverers and conquerors like Columbus and Cortez began annexing a new world to the old. By the fourteenth century, moreover, the men of the Renaissance were turning to classic culture as the repository of the worldly outlook and the free intellect. A new continent of the mind and spirit was zealously recovered by scholars appropriately called Humanists because the literature they explored dealt with human rather than other-worldly experience and aspiration.

The land in which these developments first occurred was politically bewildering. It was divided into numerous principalities and cities, many of them ruled by upstart despots, some of them republics dominated by a mercantile or financial aristocracy like the Medicis of Florence. It was an age of continual struggles and numerous contradictions. But it was essentially favorable to the expansion of the human spirit. The Italian states grew rapidly in wealth and came in frequent contact with the Byzantine world and the East. The political struggles of the period encouraged enterprise and individual self-assertion, the rewards for which were power and wealth. An unstable world could no longer keep men in their place, could no longer fix behavior and thought in a rigid mold, so that new ideas and ventures in art and science began to run riot. Finally, the upstart despots' thirst for fame and desire to display their wealth, along with their effort to publicize themselves, made them patrons of the arts. They built magnificent palaces, commissioned sculptors to glorify them in stone, and painters to immortalize them on canvas, and they attracted scholars and poets to their courts. The leaders of the republics of Venice and Florence, as well as the Popes, were equally affected by this interest in art as a means of enriching life and gratifying the senses.

There arose a cosmopolitan outlook which was well expressed by Dante when he wrote, "My country is the whole world," and by a sixteenth-century minor humanist who declared "Wherever a learned man fixes his seat, there is his home." The idea of progress became a driving force, and the belief in the perfectibility of man filled men with optimism and self-confidence. Men considered themselves capable of unlimited development, and of mastery over every subject: "Men can do all things if they will." Thus was born the "all-sided man" or l'uomo universale of Italy so brilliantly exemplified by Leonardo da Vinci, who made all knowledge his province and anticipated many of the achievements of modern science. The age began to recognize a new aristocracy of the intellect, an aristocracy of men whose claim to prominence was not noble birth or piety but good manners and varied accomplishments.

The ferment of this Renaissance was felt in all fields. All the arts began to flourish mightily, until Italy's architects, sculptors, painters, goldsmiths, and musicians took first rank in the modern world. In the history of art few names are as memorable as those of Giotto, Botticelli, Leonardo da Vinci, Michelangelo, Raphael, Titian, and many others. But the men of the age were also remarkably articulate, and created a powerful literature which in turn left its mark on all the modern literatures.

At the crossroads of the medieval and the Renaissance worlds stands the imposing figure of the Florentine poet Dante Alighieri (1265-1321). He was, first and foremost, the child of the medieval world, its greatest poet, and the one writer in whom we find a synthesis of its outlook. In reading his greatest work, The Divine Comedy, we take our farewell from the Middle Ages when they are at the peak of their spiritual and creative possibilities. Although he is sensible of the greatness of the classic poets and thinkers, in so far as medieval knowledge enabled him to know their work, he reluctantly relegates them to his Inferno or Hell because they did not die in the true faith. Because they were good men, Homer, Horace, Virgil, Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, and the rest live on without torment in the nether regions, but because they lived before the coming of Christianity they are lost through all eternity. Even less enviable is the fate of those Christians who indulged in worldly gratifications; even the pathetic lovers Paolo and Francesca, to whom a modern poet would be very indulgent, are doomed because their passion was illicit. In Dante's lyric verse, the beautiful Vita Nuova (New Life), he continues the troubadour tradition of love poetry and indeed brings it to its ultimate perfection. Although, too, the object of his love is a real person, Bice (Beatrice) Portinari, whom he first met at the age of nine and who died in 1290, his earthly passion is sublimated in a mystic, medieval longing of the soul. He turns from worldly love to "the Love which moves the sun and the other stars." This is Dante's point of view in his Vita Nuova, and it is the keystone of the stupendous arch of his major work, The Divine Comedy, in which Beatrice leads him through Purgatory and Paradiso to the highest heaven and the presence of God. Dante finds the final happiness of love in heaven, whereas his successors were to seek it on earth.

Dante's theology is thoroughly medieval. His Divine Comedy is an allegory of man's struggle for salvation, which is still for Dante the primary purpose of the human race. The sense of sin and the necessity for purgation weigh heavily upon his soul, and he considers all human conduct with reference to man's life in another world. According to man's conduct and faith during his brief interlude on earth he reaches Hell, Purgatory, or Paradise, and God's justice is terrible to sinners.

The journey that the poet takes is also typically medieval in its cosmology. The world consists of concentric spheres. The earth is the center of the universe, and around it move nine spheres or heavens at increasing speeds in proportion to their distance. Man is thus the center of the created world and of the divine scheme. The ninth sphere, the Primum Mobile, is a crystalline sphere and imparts movement to the other spheres. Encircling them all is the motionless, timeless, and infinite Empyrean, which is the seat of God. The fall of Lucifer produced a cone-shaped cavity in the earth with its apex at the center of the planet. This is Hell, divided into nine circles, each reserved for different types of sinners, who are nearer to Satan at the apex in proportion to the gravity of their sins. When Hell was created, the displaced mass of earth formed a mountain—the mountain of Purgatory, arranged in seven circles, on top of which is the Earthly Paradise that Adam and Eve inhabited before their fall. On this mountain penitent sinners, who have been spared the fires of Hell, are cleansed of their sins by the fires of Purgatory until they are ready to enter Heaven, which is divided into various spheres of ascending sublimity until one reaches the Empyrean.

In its literary form, too, the Divine Comedy belongs to the Middle Ages. It is an allegorical poem, making use of such medieval devices as the dream vision, symbolical figures, and mystic number. The work consists of one hundred cantos or chapters, thirty-four in the Inferno and thirty-three in both the Purgatorio and the Paradiso. Since the first canto of the Inferno is an introduction to the entire work, there are ninety-nine cantos for the three divisions. Ninety-nine is a multiple of the two mystic numbers, nine and three. Dante's verse form, too, has a mystic attribute; the poem is written in a meter of three linked lines, known as terza rima. The Middle Ages are, thus, commemorated in a Christian epic, august, severe, and mystical. The Divine Comedy takes one's breath away with its solemn and remote majesty.

However, Dante stood at the dividing of the ways and was a dual personality. In the very process of immortalizing the medieval outlook, he could not avoid reflecting the slowly rising new world. Dante, the son of a noble family, received an excellent worldly education, mastered the accomplishments of a gentleman, and led the life of a gallant rather than an ascetic, even succumbing to debauchery that he regretted in later years. He lived in the most thriving and progressive of the Italian states, and the Florence he knew was replete with worldly interests and political struggles. So was the whole of Italy, then torn between the faction known as the Neri, or Blacks, which defended the temporal power of the Pope, and the Bianchi, or Whites, who championed the rule of a strong emperor. The poet of the transitional world-view joined the Bianchi, and became so involved in his cause, fighting in two crucial battles, that he was exiled from Florence in 1301 when his party was defeated. He spent the rest of his life wandering from city to city, eating, as he said, the bread of strangers, but being treated with honor especially by the ruler of Ravenna, who even sent him on an embassy to Venice. Dante therefore saw a great deal of a life remote from both medieval monasticism and romantic chivalry. It was this life, refracted by his intensely partisan temperament, that he poured into his Divine Comedy, especially into the Inferno, dooming the politicians and popes he disliked to perdition and describing countless personalities and worldly conduct with vivid power.

For a mystic poem, Dante's masterpiece is remarkably full of the business and passions of the world. These may be condemned by the author, but he is deeply involved with them. No poet was more sensible of the struggle for worldly power and for personal gratification, and he draws not types but individuals in his gallery of sinners. His interest in the world even led him to write a Latin book on the nature of government, De Monarchia, in which he proposed to limit the power of the papacy to the spiritual sphere. It is also significant that he paid such reverence to a classic, pagan author when he called Virgil his master and made him his guide in the Inferno.

The beginnings of the Renaissance are also strongly present in Dante's attitude toward literary language and style. At a time when Latin was still regarded as the only proper language for dignified letters, he became the champion and leading exponent of the Italian language. He defended its use for all important literary work in his Latin treatise De Vulgari Eloquentia, and set his fellow-writers the all-important example of writing a work of such high seriousness as The Divine Comedy in Italian. By devoting himself to the creation of a pleasurable, sweet new style, he foreshadowed, in addition, the Renaissance love of fine artistry.

When Dante died in exile and a professorship was established in Florence for the study of his work, a post first held by none other than Boccaccio, he was honored not as a medieval figure but as the father of Italian literature. Moreover, the two men who were his immediate successors, Petrarch and Boccaccio, quickly made themselves leaders of the new age.

Francesco Petrarca, or Petrarch (1304-1374), became the first Humanist. His father was one of the men who were exiled from Florence when Dante was banished, and moved to Avignon in Southern France. Petrarch grew up in Southern France and studied at Montpellier and Bologna. Later, finding himself penniless he entered the Church, but this was a formality rather than an act of piety. He became a man of affairs, went on diplomatic missions, and later was involved in patriotic activities. His interest in the classic world and pagan culture made him dream of the resurrection of Rome.

Petrarch turned hungrily to the classics, and his uniqueness lay in his seeking in them esthetic gratifications and human values instead of material for theological disputation; it is this attitude that distinguishes him from medieval scholars. He began a search for Greek and Latin manuscripts, making frequent and arduous journeys for this purpose. Cicero was his special delight, and he actually recovered some of the letters to Atticus. Moreover, he was the first to realize the importance of Greece, to recognize fully that Greek culture underlay Roman. He bought a copy of the Iliad from a Greek traveler, but was unable to read it, and was distressed to find that there were no grammars and dictionaries to which one could resort. Thereupon he prevailed upon his wealthy friend Boccaccio to take a Greek into his household in Florence and employ him to translate the Iliad into Latin. It was a very poor translation, but it was a move toward the recovery of Hellenic culture, and Petrarch became indefatigable in promoting humanist studies and prevailing upon Italian princes to foster them. Numerous Greek and Roman manuscripts were gradually recovered and edited after his death. Soon, too, classic scholarship was vastly improved by Greek scholars who found hospitality in Italy and refuge there after Constantinople fell to the Turks in 1453. It was not long before many Italians set themselves up as missionaries of the recovered culture.

Petrarch overrated his Latin epic Africa and wished to be remembered as a humanist and scholar. He attached less importance to his writings in Italian, but it is these that ensure him his lasting fame. At the age of twenty-three, in Avignon he fell in love with a young married woman, immortalized by him under the name of Laura. His absorption in this attachment became a veritable obsession, and he continued to nurse an unrequited passion for her for many years, always returning to Avignon from his numerous travels during Laura's lifetime. The gain to all literature was considerable, for Laura became the subject of over three hundred Italian sonnets of remarkable purity and perfection, as well as other short lyrics and one long poem written by Petrarch in imitation of The Divine Comedy.

The sonnet form which Petrarch perfected and popularized became the chief lyric form of the Renaissance in Europe. In Shakespeare's England it was altered, but in its new shape it became the mold for the finest lyric expression of the Elizabethan poets.¹ Petrarch's uses of conceits and his idealization of an unapproachable married woman belonged to the medieval convention. But the frequent naturalness of his expression was a new quality, and he used Laura as the focus of a great delight in beauty.

Even more typically a man of the Renaissance was Petrarch's friend Boccaccio (1313-1375): Petrarch sought seclusion, retiring in his last years, dreaming of a humanist monastery, and becoming religious after the death of Laura. He did not take wholeheartedly to the creation of a literature in the vernacular, and treated love with fervid idealization as did Dante. Boccaccio was wholly of this world. The love-child of a French mother and a Florentine banker-father who tried to dissuade him from the pursuit of letters, Boccaccio became a gay and reckless youth, and won the love of the married woman and natural daughter of King Robert of Naples whom he celebrated under the name of Fiammeta.

After his father's death in the plague of 1348, Boccaccio began to write steadily and freely and threw himself into the humanist movement, joining his friend Petrarch in the zealous search for manuscripts and the promotion of Greek studies.

Boccaccio's literary work expressed his exuberance, his enjoyment of pleasure and love, and the insight he acquired into the manners and character of men and women. In his writings we can observe medieval interests receding steadily. His first work, the prose tale Filippo, was a knightly romance, and his next, the Teseide, the story of Palamon and Arcite which Chaucer imitated in The Knight's Tale, is still essentially medieval. Although his poem Filostrato, which recounts the story of Troilus and Cressida, is more modern in spirit, it is fairly conventional, and is best remembered as Chaucer's source for Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde. But Boccaccio's Fiammeta, in which he tells the story of his very mundane love, has been properly called "the first novel of psychology ever written in Europe"; and climaxing Boccaccio's development, his Decameron, which appeared in ¹ See p. 1139 for a discussion of the two principal sonnet forms, the Italian, or Petrarchan, and the Shakespearean. All sonnets have 14 lines of iambic pentameter. The Italian has a rhyme scheme of a b b a a b b a for the first 8 lines (octave) and a variety of orders for the last 6. Usually there is a thought division at the end of the octave.

1353, is Europe's first truly modern prose narrative.

This collection of one hundred stories is tied together by a frame, such as Chaucer employed in The Canterbury Tales. To escape the plague in Florence, three young men and seven young women seclude themselves in a villa in the country, and entertain themselves for ten days by telling stories. Drawn from a variety of sources, from the realistic and satirical fabliaux, folk material, and current anecdotes, the work is a veritable panorama of life. Whether the stories deal with love, philandering, or adventure, they are invariably well turned and full of keen observation. Many of them are light-hearted, mocking, and irreverent, reflecting a young world that is taking flight from the Middle Ages. Although there is pathos in some of the tales, there is no medieval gloom in them. The spirit of the whole work is fresh, kindly, and genial.

The influence of this book cannot be overestimated. It made its way into France, Germany, Spain, and England; and many Italian writers followed Boccaccio in composing and grouping short stories. These were called novellas, from which we derived the word "novel." Some fifty writers of novellas appeared in Italy after Boccaccio. Many Elizabethan playwrights, including Shakespeare, became indebted to them for their plots.

About a century of humanist activity had to be consumed by the literati before important literary figures again arose in Italy, and indeed even the fifteenth and the sixteenth centuries brought forth no writers of such world-wide significance as Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio. The two excellent poets Ludovico Ariosto (1474-1533), author of the knightly romance Orlando Furioso, and Torquato Tasso (1544-1595), author of a romance about the Crusades, Jerusalem Delivered, did not reflect the vital aspects of their period. The latter part of the Italian Renaissance was given over largely to politics, the fine arts, and scientific beginnings.

Niccolò Machiavelli (1469-1527), being a rounded personality, wrote verses, a History of Florence, a brilliant satirical story Belphagor, and several plays, including the clever and obscene Mandragola which is the best comedy of the Italian Renaissance. But it is as a political theorist that he shone most brightly and exerted the greatest influence. He served the republic of Florence for eight years until he was dismissed from office when the Medicis returned to power in 1512. An ardent patriot, he dreamed of the unification of all Italy under a strong leader. He thought he found such a man in the notorious Cesare Borgia, whose ruthless methods were for a time effective in unifying portions of Italy.

Cesare's methods did not appall Machiavelli, because like most men of his time he believed that the end justified the means, and because he prided himself on his realism. In The Prince, Machiavelli set himself the task of recording with complete objectivity the political policies that got the best results. He recommended nothing that was not being practiced in Italy. Unfortunately, there have been leaders since his day who have applied his theories only too literally, without intending or achieving the benefits he expected. The truth is that his range of observation was too narrow to enable him to find other methods than those he recorded. Moreover, in the Prince, as the liberal historian Macaulay noted, "The great principle, that societies and laws exist only for the purpose of increasing the sum of private happiness, is not recognized with sufficient clearness." Machiavelli was so devoted to the ideal of stability in society that he made stability an end in itself and thought only of the welfare of the state. Macaulay wisely comments: "Of all political fallacies, this has had the widest and the most mischievous operation."

However, the Prince and another political study by Machiavelli, the Discourses, mark the beginning of modern political science. He took the study of politics out of the realm of moral preachment and abstruse speculation. Henceforth this study was to concentrate on social realities, on the factors that operate in political life because men are what they are, follow certain motives, and respond in certain ways. The Prince, moreover, deserves the high place it holds in literature because it gives vivid expression to its age and is written with brilliant realism. At the same time, those who read it in its entirety will find in it passages of eloquent nobility and keen analyses of human conduct.

Benvenuto Cellini (1500-1571) reflected the artistic and personal side of the Italian Renaissance in his naively frank Autobiography. His was by no means the only or even the important record of Italy's absorption in the arts. For a contemporary account of the painters of the times we would have to turn to Vasari's famous, if inadequate, Lives of the Painters. Besides, Cellini himself was only a minor artist. But in reading the autobiography of this Florentine master goldsmith and sculptor we get the most vivid eye-witness report on the behavior and spirit of his times. He was a man of inflammable temperament, an egoist, a ruffian, an immoral adventurer—and an artist, with an artist's pride in his work and interest in the details of his craft. He was twice banished from Florence before he was eighteen for duelling and brawling, and twice imprisoned by Pope Paul III for appropriating some gold from the papal jewelry. His Autobiography reads like a novel of adventure, and Cellini appears in it as a character who sums up the best and worst features of Renaissance man's individualism.

Since the modern world to which the Renaissance gave birth cannot be separated from modern science, it is fitting to conclude our account with Giordano Bruno, the poet of modern science. Science does not often express itself in great literature, and the selection from Bruno is given primarily as background material for the student. Giordano Bruno (1548-1600), who was burned at the stake by the Church, became the spokesman of a new view of the world. The Middle Ages considered the earth the center of the universe. The new science of cosmology begun by Copernicus and later developed by the German Johann Kepler and the Italian Galileo Galilei (1564-1642) destroyed this notion. It held that our solar system revolves around the sun, that the world is infinite and has no center, and that there is a plurality of universes. This view contradicted the teachings of the Church, which did not come to terms with the scientists until the nineteenth century, and it made man a very insignificant atom in boundless space. Bruno was entranced with this new cosmology, and the world revealed by science filled him with wonder instead of fear. There was even an unorthodox piety in his ecstasy, for this limitless world only made God's creation more marvellous and exalted His glory. The little world of the Middle Ages was gone. Man had to make himself at home in a different world and adjust his thought and feeling to it. Bruno was the first to do this in his book, The Infinity of the Universe.

DANTE ALIGHIERI

Inferno

Canto I

ARGUMENT

The writer, having lost his way in a gloomy forest, and being hindered by certain wild beasts from ascending a mountain, is met by Virgil, who promises to show him the punishments of Hell, and afterwards of Purgatory; and that he shall then be conducted by Beatrice into Paradise. He follows the Roman poet.

In the midway of this our mortal life,¹
I found me in a gloomy wood, astray
Gone from the path direct: and e'en to tell,
It were no easy task, how savage wild

That forest, how robust and rough its growth, 5
Which to remember only, my dismay
Renews, in bitterness not far from death.
Yet, to discourse of what there good befell,
All else will I relate discover'd there.

How first I enter'd it I scarce can say, 10
Such sleepy dullness in that instant weigh'd
My senses down, when the true path I left;
But when a mountain's foot I reach'd, where closed
The valley that had pierced my heart with dread,
I look'd aloft, and saw his shoulders broad 15
Already vested with that planet's² beam,
Who leads all wanderers safe through every way.

Then was a little respite to the fear,
That in my heart's recesses deep had lain

Dante, Inferno. Translated by Henry F. Cary. Dante Alighieri (1265-1321) took a prominent part in the political life of his native city of Florence. Banished in middle life, he lived in Verona, Bologna, Padua, and Ravenna, never returning to Florence.

¹ Middle of the life-span of seventy years. This was Good Friday of the year 1300, when Dante was thirty-five years old.

² The sun's.

All of that night, so pitifully past: 20
 And as a man, with difficult short breath,
 Forespent with toiling, 'scaped from sea to shore,
 Turns to the perilous wide waste, and stands
 At gaze; e'en so my spirit, that yet fail'd, 24
 Struggling with terror, turn'd to view the straits
 That none hath past and lived. My weary frame
 After short pause recomforted, again
 I journey'd on over that lonely steep,
 The hinder foot still firmer. Scarce the ascent
 Began, when, lo! a panther,³ nimble, light, 30
 And cover'd with a speckled skin, appear'd;
 Nor, when it saw me, vanish'd; rather strove
 To check my onward going; that oft-times,
 With purpose to retrace my steps, I turn'd.

The hour was morning's prime, and on his way
 Aloft the sun ascended with those stars, 36
 That with him rose when Love Divine first moved
 Those its fair works: so that with joyous hope
 All things conspired to fill me, the gay skin
 Of that swift animal, the matin dawn, 40
 And the sweet season. Soon that joy was chased,
 And by new dread succeeded, when in view
 A lion came, 'gainst me as it appear'd,
 With his head held aloft and hunger-mad,
 That e'en the air was fear-struck. A she-wolf 45
 Was at his heels, who in her leanness seem'd
 Full of all wants, and many a land hath made Disconsolate ere now. She with such fear
 O'erwhelm'd me, at the sight of her appall'd,
 That of the height all hope I lost. As one, 50
 Who, with his gain elated, sees the time
 When all unwares is gone, he inwardly
 Mourns with heart-gripping anguish; such was I,
 Haunted by that fell beast, never at peace,
 Who coming o'er against me, by degrees 55
 Impell'd me where the sun in silence rests.

While to the lower space with backward step
 I fell, my ken discern'd the form of one Whose voice seem'd faint through long disuse of speech.

When him in that great desert I espied, 60
 "Have mercy on me," cried I out aloud,
 "Spirit! or living man! whate'er thou be."

He answer'd: "Now not man, man once I was,
 And born of Lombard parents, Mantuans both
 By country, when the power of Julius yet 65
 Was scarcely firm. At Rome my life was past,
 Beneath the mild Augustus, in the time

Of fabled deities and false. A bard
 Was I, and made Anchises' upright son
 The subject of my song, who came from Troy, 70
 When the flames prey'd on Ilium's haughty towers.
 But thou, say wherefore to such perils past
 Return'st thou? wherefore not this pleasant mount Ascendest, cause and source of all delight?"
 "And art thou then that Virgil, that well-spring,
 From which such copious floods of eloquence 76
 Have issued?" I with front abash'd replied.
 "Glory and light of all the tuneful train!
 May it avail me, that I long with zeal 79
 Have sought thy volume, and with love immense
 Have conn'd it o'er. My master thou, and guide!
 Thou he from whom alone I have derived
 That style, which for its beauty into fame
 Exalts me. See the beast, from whom I fled.
 O save me from her, thou illustrious sage! 85
 For every vein and pulse throughout my frame
 She hath made tremble." He, soon as he saw
 That I was weeping, answer'd, "Thou must needs
 Another way pursue, if thou wouldst 'scape
 From out that savage wilderness. This beast, 90
 At whom thou criest, her way will suffer none
 To pass, and no less hindrance makes than death:
 So bad and so accursed in her kind,
 That never sated is her ravenous will,
 Still after food more craving than before. 95
 To many an animal in wedlock vile
 She fastens, and shall yet to many more,
 Until that Greyhound⁴ come, who shall destroy
 Her with sharp pain. He will not life support
 By earth nor its base metals, but by love, 100
 Wisdom, and virtue; and his land shall be
 The land 'twixt either Feltro. In his might Shall safety to Italia's plains arise,
 For whose fair realm, Camilla, virgin pure,
 Nisus, Euryalus, and Turnus fell.⁵ 105
 He, with incessant chase, through every town
 Shall worry, until he to Hell at length
 Restore her, thence by envy first let loose.
 I, for thy profit pondering, now devise
 That thou mayst follow me; and I, thy guide, 110
 Will lead thee hence through an eternal space,
 Where thou shalt hear despairing shrieks, and see
 Spirits of old tormented, who invoke
 A second death; and those next view, who dwell
 Content in fire, for that they hope to come, 115
 Whene'er the time may be, among the blest,

³ The three animals are: panther (sensuality), lion (pride of ambition), she-wolf (avarice).

⁴ The greyhound, who will be a savior from the she-wolf, has had many interpretations. No one knows what Dante had in mind.

⁵ Persons prominent in the latter part of Virgil's Aeneid.

Into whose regions if thou then desire
 To ascend, a spirit worthier than I
 Must lead thee, in whose charge, when I depart,
 Thou shalt be left: for that Almighty King, 120
 Who reigns above, a rebel to His law
 Adjudges me; and therefore hath decreed
 That, to His city, none through me should come.⁶
 He in all parts hath sway; there rules, there holds
 His citadel and throne. O happy those, 125 Whom there He chooses!" I to him in few:
 "Bard! by that God, whom thou didst not adore,
 I do beseech thee (that this ill and worse
 I may escape) to lead me where thou said'st,
 That I Saint Peter's gate may view, and those 130
 Who, as thou tell'st, are in such dismal plight."
 Onward he moved, I close his steps pursued.

Canto II

ARGUMENT

After the invocation, which poets are used to prefix to their works, he shows, that, on a consideration of his own strength, he doubted whether it sufficed for the journey proposed to him, but that, being comforted by Virgil, he at last took courage, and followed him as his guide and master.

Now was the day departing, and the air,
 Imbrown'd with shadows, from their toils released
 All animals on earth; and I alone 135
 Prepared myself the conflict to sustain,
 Both of sad pity, and that perilous road,
 Which my unerring memory shall retrace.

O Muses! O high genius! now vouchsafe
 Your aid. O mind! that all I saw hast kept 140
 Safe in a written record, here thy worth
 And eminent endowments come to proof.

I thus began: "Bard! thou who art my guide,
 Consider well, if virtue be in me
 Sufficient, ere to this high enterprise 145
 Thou trust me. Thou hast told that Silvius' sire, Yet clothed in corruptible flesh, among
 The immortal tribes had entrance, and was there Sensibly present. Yet if Heaven's great Lord,
 Almighty foe to ill, such favor show'd 150
 In contemplation of the high effect,
 Both what and who from him should issue forth,
 It seems in reason's judgment well deserved;

Sith he of Rome and of Rome's empire wide,
 In Heaven's empyreal height was chosen sire: 155
 Both which, if truth be spoken, were ordain'd
 And stablish'd for the holy place, where sits
 Who to great Peter's sacred chair succeeds.
 He from this journey, in thy song renown'd,
 Learn'd things, that to his victory gave rise 160
 And to the papal robe. In after-times
 The Chosen Vessel also travel'd there,
 To bring us back assurance in that faith
 Which is the entrance to salvation's way.
 But I, why should I there presume? or who 165
 Permits it? not Æneas I, nor Paul.
 My self I deem not worthy, and none else
 Will deem me. I, if on this voyage then
 I venture, fear it will in folly end.
 Thou, who art wise, better my meaning know'st,
 Than I can speak." As one, who unresolves 171
 What he hath late resolved, and with new thoughts
 Changes his purpose, from his first intent
 Remov'd; e'en such was I on that dun coast, 175
 Wasting in thought my enterprise, at first
 So eagerly embraced. "If right thy words
 I scan," replied that shade magnanimous,
 "Thy soul is by vile fear assail'd, which oft
 So overcasts a man, that he recoils 180
 From noblest resolution, like a beast
 At some false semblance in the twilight gloom.
 That from this terror thou mayst free thyself,
 I will instruct thee why I came, and what
 I heard in that same instant, when for thee 185
 Grief touch'd me first. I was among the tribe
 Who rest suspended,⁷ when a dame,⁸ so blest
 And lovely I besought her to command,
 Call'd me; her eyes were brighter than the star
 Of day; and she, with gentle voice and soft,
 Angelically tuned, her speech address'd: 190
 'O courteous shade of Mantua! thou whose fame
 'Yet lives, and shall live long as nature lasts!
 'A friend, not of my fortune but myself,
 'On the wide desert in his road has met
 'Hindrance so great, that he through fear has 195
 turn'd.
 'Now much I dread lest he past help have stray'd,
 'And I be risen too late for his relief,
 'From what in heaven of him I heard. Speed now,
 'And by thy eloquent persuasive tongue,
 'And by all means for his deliverance meet, 200
 'Assist him. So to me will comfort spring.

⁶ Virgil, not being a Christian, is not admitted into Paradise.

⁷ In limbo; cf. line 400 below.

⁸ Beatrice, the lady of Dante's idealistic love. She represents Theology, which leads man to the contemplation of God.

'I, who now bid thee on this errand forth,
'Am Beatrice; from a place I come
'Revisited with joy. Love brought me thence,
'Who prompts my speech. When in my Master's sight 205

'I stand, thy praise to him I oft will tell.'

"She then was silent, and I thus began:

'O Lady! by whose influence alone
'Mankind excels whatever is contain'd
'Within that heaven which hath the smallest orb,⁹
'So thy command delights me, that to obey, 211
'If it were done already, would seem late.
'No need hast thou farther to speak thy will:
'Yet tell the reason, why thou art not loth
'To leave that ample space, where to return 215
'Thou burnest, for this center here beneath.'

"She then: 'Since thou so deeply wouldst inquire,

'I will instruct thee briefly why no dread
'Hinders my entrance here. Those things alone
'Are to be fear'd whence evil may proceed; 220
'None else, for none are terrible beside.
'I am so framed by God, thanks to his grace!
'That any sufferance of your misery

'Touches me not, nor flame of that fierce fire
'Assails me. In high Heaven a blessed Dame 225
'Resides, who mourns with such effectual grief
'That hindrance, which I send thee to remove,
'That God's stern judgment to her will inclines.
'To Lucia calling, her she thus bespake:

"Now doth thy faithful servant need thy aid, 230
"And I commend him to thee." At her word
'Sped Lucia, of all cruelty the foe,

'And coming to the place, where I abode
'Seated with Rachel, her of ancient days, 234
'She thus address'd me: "Thou true praise of God!
'Beatrice! why is not thy succor lent

"To him, who so much loved thee, as to leave
"For thy sake all the multitude admires?

"Dost thou not hear how pitiful his wail, 239
"Nor mark the death, which in the torrent flood,
"Swoln mightier than a sea, him struggling holds?"

'Ne'er among men did any with such speed
'Haste to their profit, flee from their annoy,
'As, when these words were spoken, I came here,
'Down from my blessed seat, trusting the force
'Of thy pure eloquence, which thee, and all 246
'Who well have mark'd it, into honor brings.'

"When she had ended, her bright beaming eyes
Tearful she turn'd aside; whereat I felt
Redoubled zeal to serve thee. As she will'd, 250
Thus am I come: I saved thee from the beast,

Who thy near way across the goodly mount
Prevented. What is this comes o'er thee then?
Why, why dost thou hang back? why in thy breast

Harbor vile fear? why hast not courage there,
And noble daring; since three maids, so blest, 256
Thy safety plan, e'en in the court of Heaven;
And so much certain good my words forebode?"

As florets, by the frosty air of night
Bent down and closed, when day has blanch'd their leaves, 260

Rise all unfolded on their spiry stems;
So was my fainting vigor new restored,
And to my heart such kindly courage ran,
That I as one undaunted soon replied:

"O full of pity she, who undertook 265
My succor! and thou kind, who didst perform
So soon her true behest! With such desire
Thou hast disposed me to renew my voyage,
That my first purpose fully is resumed.

Lead on: one only will is in us both. 270
Thou art my guide, my master thou, and lord."
So spake I; and when he had onward moved,
I enter'd on the deep and woody way.

Canto III

ARGUMENT

Dante, following Virgil, comes to the gate of Hell; where, after having read the dreadful words that are written thereon, they both enter. Here, as he understands from Virgil, those were punished who had passed their time (for living it could not be called) in a state of apathy and indifference both to good and evil. Then pursuing their way, they arrive at the river Acheron; and there find the old ferryman Charon, who takes the spirits over to the opposite shore; which as soon as Dante reaches, he is seized with terror, and falls into a trance.

"Through me you pass into the city of woe:
Through me you pass into eternal pain: 275
Through me among the people lost for aye.
Justice the founder of my fabric moved:
To rear me was the task of Power divine,
Supremest Wisdom, and primeval Love.
Before me things create were none, save things
Eternal, and eternal I endure. 281

All hope abandon, ye who enter here."
Such characters, in color dim, I mark'd
Over a portal's lofty arch inscribed.

⁹ The moon.

Whereat I thus: "Master, these words import 285 Hard meaning." He as one prepared replied:
 "Here thou must all distrust behind thee leave;
 Here be vile fear extinguish'd. We are come
 Where I have told thee we shall see the souls
 To misery doom'd, who intellectual good 290
 Have lost." And when his hand he had stretch'd forth
 To mine, with pleasant looks, whence I was cheer'd,

Into that secret place he led me on.
 Here sighs, with lamentations and loud moans,
 Resounded through the air pierced by no star, 295
 That e'en I wept at entering. Various tongues,
 Horrible languages, outcries of woe,
 Accents of anger, voices deep and hoarse,
 With hands together smote that swell'd the sounds,
 Made up a tumult, that for ever whirls 300
 Round through that air with solid darkness
 stain'd,

Like to the sand that in the whirlwind flies.
 I then, with terror yet encompast, cried:
 "O master! what is this I hear? What race
 Are these, who seem so overcome with woe?"

He thus to me: "This miserable fate 306
 Suffer the wretched souls of those, who lived
 Without or praise or blame, with that ill band
 Of angels mix'd, who nor rebellious proved,
 Nor yet were true to God, but for themselves 310
 Were only. From his bounds Heaven drove them forth,

Not to impair his luster; nor the depth
 Of Hell receives them, lest the accursed tribe
 Should glory thence with exultation vain." 314

I then: "Master! what doth aggrieve them thus,
 That they lament so loud?" He straight replied:
 "That will I tell thee briefly. These of death
 No hope may entertain: and their blind life
 So meanly passes, that all other lots 319
 They envy. Fame of them the world hath none,
 Nor suffers; Mercy and Justice scorn them both.
 Speak not of them, but look, and pass them by."

And I, who straightway look'd, beheld a flag,
 Which whirling ran around so rapidly,
 That it no pause obtain'd: and following came 325
 Such a long train of spirits, I should ne'er
 Have thought that death so many had despoil'd.

When some of these I recognized, I saw
 And knew the shade of him, who to base fear
 Yielding, abjured his high estate. Forthwith 330
 I understood, for certain, this the tribe
 Of those ill spirits both to God displeasing
 And to His foes. These wretches, who ne'er lived,

Went on in nakedness, and sorely stung
 By wasps and hornets, which bedew'd their cheeks
 With blood, that, mix'd with tears, dropp'd to their feet, 336

And by disgusting worms was gather'd there.
 Then looking further onwards, I beheld
 A throng upon the shore of a great stream:
 Whereat I thus: "Sir! grant me now to know 340 Whom here we view, and whence impell'd they seem

So eager to pass o'er, as I discern
 Through the bleak light?" He thus to me in few:
 "This shalt thou know, soon as our steps arrive
 Beside the woeful tide of Acheron." 345

Then with eyes downward cast, and fill'd with shame,

Fearing my words offensive to his ear,
 Till we had reach'd the river, I from speech
 Abstained. And lo! toward us in a bark
 Comes on an old man, hoary white with eld, 350
 Crying, "Woe to you, wicked spirits! hope not Ever to see the sky again. I come

To take you to the other shore across,
 Into eternal darkness, there to dwell
 In fierce heat and in ice. And thou, who there 355
 Standest, live spirit! get thee hence, and leave
 These who are dead." But soon as he beheld
 I left them not, "By other way," said he,
 "By other haven shalt thou come to shore,
 Not by this passage; thee a nimbler boat 360
 Must carry." Then to him thus spake my guide:
 "Charon! thyself torment not: so 'tis will'd,
 Where will and power are one: ask thou no
 more."

Straightway in silence fell the shaggy cheeks
 Of him, the boatman o'er the livid lake, 365
 Around whose eyes glared wheeling flames. Meanwhile

Those spirits, faint and naked, color changed,
 And gnash'd their teeth, soon as the cruel words
 They heard. God and their parents they blas-phemed, 369

The human kind, the place, the time, and seed,
 That did engender them and give them birth.

Then all together sorely wailing drew
 To the curst strand, that every man must pass
 Who fears not God. Charon, demoniac form,
 With eyes of burning coal, collects them all, 375
 Beckoning, and each, that lingers, with his oar
 Strikes. As fall off the light autumnal leaves,
 One still another following, till the bough
 Strews all its honors on the earth beneath;
 E'en in like manner Adam's evil brood 380

Cast themselves, one by one, down from the shore,
Each at a beck, as falcon at his call.

Thus go they over through the umber'd wave;
And ever they on the opposing bank
Be landed, on this side another throng 385
Still gathers. "Son," thus spake the courteous guide,

"Those who die subject to the wrath of God
All here together come from every clime,
And to o'erpass the river are not loth:
For so Heaven's justice goads them on, that fear
Is turn'd into desire. Hence ne'er hath past 391
Good spirit. If of thee Charon complain,
Now mayst thou know the import of his words."

This said, the gloomy region trembling shook
So terribly, that yet with clammy dew 395
Fear chills my brow. The sad earth gave a blast,
That, lightening, shot forth a vermilion flame,
Which all my senses conquer'd quite, and I
Down dropp'd, as one with sudden slumber seized.

Canto IV

ARGUMENT

The Poet, being roused by a clap of thunder, and following his guide onwards, descends into Limbo, which is the first circle of Hell, where he finds the souls of those, who, although they have lived virtuously and have not to suffer for great sins, nevertheless, through lack of baptism, merit not the bliss of Paradise. Hence he is led on by Virgil to descend into the second circle.

Broke the deep slumber in my brain a crash 400
Of heavy thunder, that I shook myself,
As one by main force roused. Risen upright,
My rested eyes I moved around, and search'd,
With fixed ken, to know what place it was
Wherein I stood. For certain, on the brink 405
I found me of the lamentable vale,
The dread abyss, that joins a thundrous sound
Of plaints innumerable. Dark and deep,
And thick with clouds o'erspread, mine eye in vain Explored its bottom, nor could aught discern. 410

"Now let us to the blind world there beneath Descend," the bard again, all pale of look:
"I go the first, and thou shalt follow next."

Then I, his alter'd hue perceiving, thus:
"How may I speed, if thou yieldst to dread, 415
Who still art wont to comfort me in doubt?"
He then: "The anguish of that race below

With pity stains my cheek, which thou for fear
Mistakest. Let us on. Our length of way
Urges to haste." Onward, this said, he moved; 420
And entering led me with him, on the bounds
Of the first circle that surrounds the abyss.

Here, as mine ear could note, no plaint was heard

Except of sighs, that made the eternal air
Tremble, not caused by tortures, but from grief
Felt by those multitudes, many and vast, 426
Of men, women, and infants. Then to me
The gentle guide: "Inquirest thou not what spirits
Are these which thou beholdest? Ere thou pass
Farther, I would thou know, that these of sin
Were blameless; and if aught they merited, 431
It profits not, since baptism was not theirs,
The portal to thy faith. If they before
The Gospel lived, they served not God aright;
And among such am I. For these defects, 435
And for no other evil, we are lost;
Only so far afflicted, that we live
Desiring without hope." Sore grief assail'd
My heart at hearing this, for well I knew
Suspended in that Limbo many a soul 440
Of mighty worth. "O tell me, sire revered!
Tell me, my master!" I began, through wish
Of full assurance in that holy faith
Which vanquishes all error; "say, did e'er
Any, or through his own or other's merit, 445 Come forth from thence, who afterward was blest?"

Piercing the secret purport of my speech,
He answer'd: "I was new to that estate,"¹⁰
When I beheld a puissant one arrive
Amongst us, with victorious trophy crown'd. 450
He forth the shade of our first parent drew,
Abel his child, and Noah righteous man,
Of Moses lawgiver for faith approved,
Of Patriarch Abraham, and David king,
Israel with his sire and with his sons, 455
Nor without Rachel whom so hard he won,
And others many more, whom He to bliss
Exalted. Before these, be thou assured,
No spirit of human kind was ever saved."

We, while he spake, ceased not our onward road, 460

Still passing through the wood; for so I name
Those spirits thick beset. We were not far
On this side from the summit, when I kenn'd
A flame, that o'er the darken'd hemisphere
Prevailing shined. Yet we a little space 465

¹⁰ Virgil has been dead but a short time when Christ comes to hell and rescues the good men and women of the Old Testament story.

Were distant, not so far but I in part
Discover'd that a tribe in honor high
That place possess'd. "O thou, who every art
And science valuest! who are these, that boast
Such honor, separate from all the rest?" 470

He answer'd: "The renown of their great names,
That echoes through your world above, acquires Favor in Heaven, which holds them thus advanced."

Meantime a voice I heard: "Honor the bard
Sublime! his shade returns, that left us late!" 475
No sooner ceased the sound, than I beheld
Four mighty spirits toward us bend their steps,
Of semblance neither sorrowful nor glad.

When thus my master kind began: "Mark him,
Who in his right hand bears that falchion keen,
The other three preceding, as their lord. 481
This is that Homer, of all bards supreme:
Flaccus¹¹ the next, in satire's vein excell'g:
The third is Naso; Lucan is the last.
Because they all that appellation own, 485
With which the voice singly accosted me,
Honoring they greet me thus, and well they judge."

So I beheld united the bright school
Of him the monarch of sublimest song,
That o'er the others like an eagle soars. 490

When they together short discourse had held,
They turn'd to me, with salutation kind
Beckoning me; at the which my master smiled:
Nor was this all; but greater honor still
They gave me, for they made me of their tribe;
And I was sixth amid so learn'd a band. 496

Far as the luminous beacon on we pass'd,
Speaking of matters, then befitting well
To speak, now fitter left untold. At foot
Of a magnificent castle we arrived, 500
Seven times with lofty walls begirt, and round
Defended by a pleasant stream. O'er this As o'er dry land we pass'd. Next, through seven gates,

I with those sages enter'd, and we came
Into a mead with lively verdure fresh. 505
There dwelt a race, who slow their eyes around
Majestically moved, and in their port
Bore eminent authority: they spake

Seldom, but all their words were tuneful sweet.

We to one side retired, into a place 510
Open and bright and lofty, whence each one
Stood manifest to view. Incontinent,
There on the green enamel of the plain
Were shown me the great spirits, by whose sight
I am exalted in my own esteem. 515

Electra¹² there I saw accompanied
By many, among whom Hector I knew,
Anchises' pious son, and with hawk's eye
Cæsar alarm'd, and by Camilla there
Penthesilea. On the other side, 520
Old king Latinus seated by his child
Lavinia, and that Brutus I beheld
Who Tarquin chased, Lucretia, Cato's wife
Marcia, with Julia and Cornelia there;
And sole apart retired, the Soldan¹⁸ fierce. 525

Then when a little more I raised my brow
I spied the master of the sapient throng,¹⁴
Seated amid the philosophic train.

Him all admire, all pay him reverence due.
There Socrates and Plato both I mark'd 530
Nearest to him in rank, Democritus,
Who sets the world at chance, Diogenes,
With Heraclitus, and Empedocles,
And Anaxagoras, and Thales sage,
Zeno, and Dioscorides well read 535

In nature's secret lore. Orpheus I mark'd
And Linus, Tully and moral Seneca,
Euclid and Ptolemy, Hippocrates,
Galenus, Avicenna, and him who made
That commentary vast, Averroës. 540

Of all to speak at full were vain attempt;
For my wide theme so urges, that oft-times
My words fall short of what bechanced. In two
The six associates part. Another way
My sage guide leads me, from that air serene, 545
Into a climate ever vex'd with storms:
And to a part I come, where no light shines.

Canto V

ARGUMENT

Coming into the second circle of Hell, Dante at the entrance beholds Minos the Infernal Judge, by whom he is admonished to beware how he

¹¹ Flaccus is Horace; Naso, Ovid.

¹² The persons mentioned in the following lines, all important in the history of Rome, are: Electra, whose son Dardanus founded Troy; Hector, the defender of Troy; Æneas, the supposed founder of Rome; Cæsar, who founded the Roman Empire; Camilla, who died fighting for Latium; Penthesilea, who defended Troy; Latinus, king of Latium, and his daughter, Lavinia, who married Æneas. Lucius Junius Brutus delivered Rome from its tyrants. Lucretia, Marcia, Julia, and Cornelia were famous Roman women.

enters those regions. Here he witnesses the punishment of carnal sinners, who are tost about ceaselessly in the dark air by the most furious winds. Among these, he meets with Francesca of Rimini, through pity at whose sad tale he falls fainting to the ground.

From the first circle I descended thus
Down to the second, which, a lesser space
Embracing, so much more of grief contains, 550
Provoking bitter moans. There Minos stands,
Grinning with ghastly feature: he, of all
Who enter, strict examining the crimes,
Gives sentence, and dismisses them beneath,
According as he foldeth him around: 555
For when before him comes the ill-fated soul,
It all confesses; and that judge severe
Of sins, considering what place in Hell
Suits the transgression, with his tail so oft
Himself encircles, as degrees beneath 560
He dooms it to descend. Before him stand
Alway a numerous throng: and in his turn
Each one to judgment passing, speaks, and hears
His fate, thence downward to his dwelling hurl'd.

"O thou! who to this residence of woe 565
Approachest!" when he saw me coming, cried
Minos, relinquishing his dread employ,
"Look how thou enter here; beware in whom Thou place thy trust; let not the entrance broad Deceive thee to thy harm." To him my guide:
"Wherefore exclaimest? Hinder not his way 571
By destiny appointed; so 'tis will'd,
Where will and power are one. Ask thou no
more."

Now 'gin the rueful wailings to be heard.
Now am I come where many a plaining voice
Smites on mine ear. Into a place I came 576
Where light was silent all. Bellowing there groan'd

A noise, as of a sea in tempest torn
By warring winds. The stormy blast of Hell
With restless fury drives the spirits on, 580
Whirl'd round and dash'd amain with sore annoy.
When they arrive before the ruinous sweep,
There shrieks are heard, there lamentations, moans,
And blasphemies 'gainst the good Power in Heaven.

I understood, that to this torment sad 585
The carnal sinners are condemn'd, in whom Reason by lust is swayed. As in large troops
And multitudinous, when winter reigns,
The starlings on their wings are borne abroad;
So bears the tyrannous gust those evil souls. 590

On this side and on that, above, below,
It drives them: hope of rest to solace them
Is none, nor e'en of milder pang. As cranes,
Chanting their dolorous notes, traverse the sky,
Stretch'd out in long array; so I beheld 595
Spirits, who came loud wailing, hurried on
By their dire doom. Then I: "Instructor! who Are these, by the black air so scourged?"—"The first

'Mong those, of whom thou question'st," he replied,
"O'er many tongues was empress. She in vice 600
Of luxury was so shameless, that she made
Liking be lawful by promulged decree,
To clear the blame she had herself incurr'd.
This is Semiramis, of whom 'tis writ,
That she succeeded Ninus her espoused; 605
And held the land, which now the Soldan rules.
The next in amorous fury slew herself,
And to Sicheus' ashes broke her faith:
Then follows Cleopatra, lustful queen." 609

There mark'd I Helen, for whose sake so long
The time was fraught with evil; there the great
Achilles, who with love fought to the end.
Paris I saw, and Tristan; and beside,
A thousand more he show'd me, and by name
Pointed them out, whom love bereaved of life. 615

When I had heard my sage instructor name
Those dames and knights of antique days, o'er-power'd

By pity, well-nigh in amaze my mind
Was lost; and I began: "Bard! willingly 620
I would address those two together coming,
Which seem so light before the wind." He thus:
"Note thou, when nearer they to us approach.
Then by that love which carries them along,
Entreat; and they will come." Soon as the wind
Sway'd them towards us, I thus framed my speech:
"O wearied spirits! come, and hold discourse 626
With us, if by none else restrain'd." As doves
By fond desire invited, on wide wings
And firm, to their sweet nest returning home,
Cleave the air, wafted by their will along; 630
Thus issued, from that troop where Dido ranks,
They, through the ill air speeding: with such force
My cry prevail'd, by strong affection urged
"O gracious creature and benign! who go'st
Visiting, through this element obscure, 635
Us, who the world with bloody stain imbrued;
If, for a friend, the King of all, we own'd,
Our prayer to him should for thy peace arise,
Since thou hast pity on our evil plight.
Of whatsoe'er to hear or to discourse 640

It pleases thee, that will we hear, of that
 Freely with thee discourse, while e'er the wind,
 As now, is mute. The land, that gave me birth,
 Is situate on the coast, where Po descends
 To rest in ocean with his sequent streams. 645

"Love, that in gentle heart is quickly learnt,
 Entangled him by that fair form, from me
 Ta'en in such cruel sort, as grieves me still:
 Love, that denial takes from none beloved.
 Caught me with pleasing him so passing well, 650
 That, as thou seest, he yet deserts me not.
 Love brought us to one death: Caïna waits
 The soul, who spilt our life." Such were their words;

At hearing which, downward I bent my looks,
 And held them there so long, that the bard cried:
 "What art thou pondering?" I in answer thus: 656
 "Alas! by what sweet thoughts, what fond desire,
 Must they at length to that ill pass have reach'd!"

Then turning, I to them my speech address'd,
 And thus began: "Francesca! your sad fate 660
 Even to tears my grief and pity moves.

But tell me; in the time of your sweet sighs,
 By what, and how Love granted, that ye knew
 Your yet uncertain wishes?" She replied:

"No greater grief than to remember days 665
 Of joy, when misery is at hand. Then kens
 Thy learn'd instructor. Yet so eagerly

If thou art bent to know the primal root,
 From whence our love gat being, I will do
 As one, who weeps and tells his tale. One day,
 For our delight we read of Lancelot, 671

How him love thrall'd. Alone we were, and no
 Suspicion near us. Oft-times by that reading
 Our eyes were drawn together, and the hue
 Fled from our alter'd cheek. But at one point 675

Alone we fell. When of that smile we read,
 The wished smile, so rapturously kiss'd
 By one so deep in love, than he, who ne'er
 From me shall separate, at once my lips 679

All trembling kiss'd. The book and writer both
 Were love's purveyors. In its leaves that day
 We read no more." While thus one spirit spake,
 The other wail'd so sorely, that heart-struck

I, through compassion fainting, seem'd not far 684
 From death, and like a corse fell to the ground.

[Canto VI. On his recovery, the Poet finds himself in the third circle, where the gluttonous are punished. Their torment is, to lie in the mire, under a continual and heavy storm of hail, snow, and discolored water; Cerberus meanwhile barking over them with his threefold throat, and rending them piecemeal. One of these, who on earth was named Ciacco, foretells the divisions with which Florence is about to be distracted. Dante proposes a question to his guide, who solves it; and they proceed towards the fourth circle.

Canto VII. In the present Canto, Dante describes his descent into the fourth circle, at the beginning of which he sees Plutus stationed. Here one like doom awaits the prodigal and the avaricious; which is, to meet in direful conflict, rolling great weights against each other with mutual upbraidings. From hence Virgil takes occasion to show how vain the goods that are committed into the charge of Fortune; and this moves our author to inquire what being that Fortune is, of whom he speaks: which question being resolved, they go down into the fifth circle, where they find the wrathful and gloomy tormented in the Stygian lake. Having made a compass round great part of this lake, they come at last to the base of a lofty tower.

Canto VIII. A signal having been made from the tower, Phlegyas, the ferryman of the lake, speedily crosses it, and conveys Virgil and Dante to the other side. On their passage, they meet with Filippo Argenti, whose fury and torment are described. They then arrive at the city of Dis, the entrance whereto is denied, and the portals closed against them by many Demons.

Canto IX. After some hindrances, and having seen the hellish furies and other monsters, the Poet, by the help of an angel, enters the city of Dis, wherein he discovers that the heretics are punished in tombs burning with intense fire: and he, together with Virgil, passes onwards between the sepulchers and the walls of the city.

Canto X. Dante, having obtained permission from his guide, holds discourse with Farinata degli Uberti and Cavalcante Cavalcanti, who lie in their fiery tombs that are yet open, and not to be closed up till after the last judgment. Farinata predicts the Poet's exile from Florence; and shows him that the condemned have knowledge of future things, but are ignorant of what is at present passing, unless it be revealed by some newcomer from earth.

Canto XI. Dante arrives at the verge of a rocky precipice which encloses the seventh circle, where he sees the sepulcher of Anastasius the Heretic; behind the lid of which, pausing a little, to make himself capable by degrees of enduring the fetid smell that steamed upward from the abyss, he is instructed by Virgil concerning the manner in which the three following circles are disposed, and what description of sinners is punished in each.

He then inquires the reason why the carnal, the gluttonous, the avaricious and prodigal, the wrathful and gloomy, suffer not their punishments within the city of Dis. He next asks how the crime of usury is an offense against God; and at length the two Poets go towards the place from whence a passage leads down to the seventh circle.

Canto XII. Descending by a very rugged way into the seventh circle, where the violent are punished, Dante and his leader find it guarded by the Minotaur; whose fury being pacified by Virgil, they step downwards from crag to crag; till, drawing near the bottom, they descry a river of blood, wherein are tormented such as have committed violence against their neighbor. At these, when they strive to emerge from the blood, a troop of Centaurs, running along the side of the river, aim their arrows; and three of their band opposing our travelers at the foot of the steep, Virgil prevails so far, that one consents to carry them both across the stream; and on their passage, Dante is informed by him of the course of the river, and of those that are punished therein.

Canto XIII. Still in the seventh circle, Dante enters its second compartment, which contains both those who have done violence on their own persons and those who have violently consumed their goods; the first changed into rough and knotted trees whereon the harpies build their nests, the latter chased and torn by black female mastiffs. Among the former, Piero delle Vigne is one who tells him the cause of his having committed suicide, and moreover in what manner the souls are transformed into those trunks. Of the latter crew, he recognizes Lano, a Siennese, and Giacomo, a Paduan; and lastly, a Florentine, who had hung himself from his own roof, speaks to him of the calamities of his countrymen.

Canto XIV. They arrive at the beginning of the third of those compartments into which this seventh circle is divided. It is a plain of dry and hot sand, where three kinds of violence are punished; namely, against God, against Nature, and against Art; and those who have thus sinned, are tormented by flakes of fire, which are eternally showering down upon them. Among the violent against God is found Capaneus, whose blasphemies they hear. Next, turning to the left along the forest of self-slayers, and having journeyed a little onwards, they meet with a streamlet of blood that issues from the forest and traverses the sandy plain. Here Virgil speaks to our Poet of a huge ancient statue that stands within Mount Ida in Crete, from a fissure in which statue there is a dripping of tears, from which the said streamlet, together with the three other infernal rivers, are formed.

Canto XV. Taking their way upon one of the mounds by which the streamlet, spoken of in the last Canto, was embanked, and having gone so far that they could no longer have discerned the forest if they had turned round to look for it, they meet a troop of spirits that come along the sand by the side of the pier. These are they who have done violence to Nature; and amongst them Dante distinguishes Brunetto Latini, who had been formerly his master; with whom, turning a little backward, he holds a discourse which occupies the remainder of this Canto.

Canto XVI. Journeying along the pier, which crosses the sand, they are now so near the end of it as to hear the noise of the stream falling into the eighth circle, when they meet the spirits of three military men; who judging Dante, from his dress, to be a countryman of theirs, entreat him to stop. He complies, and speaks with them. The two Poets then reach the place where the water descends, being the termination of this third compartment in the seventh circle; and here Virgil having thrown down into the hollow a cord, wherewith Dante was girt, they behold at that signal a monstrous and horrible figure come swimming up to them.

Canto XVII. The monster Geryon is described; to whom while Virgil is speaking in order that he may carry them both down to the next circle, Dante, by permission, goes a little farther along the edge of the void, to descry the third species of sinners contained in this compartment, namely, those who have done violence to Art; and then returning to his master, they both descend, seated on the back of Geryon.

Canto XVIII. The Poet describes the situation and form of the eighth circle, divided into ten gulfs, which contain as many different descriptions of fraudulent sinners; but in the present Canto he treats only of two sorts: the first is of those who, either for their own pleasure, or for that of another, have seduced any woman from her duty; and these are scourged of demons in the first gulf: the other sort is of flatterers, who in the second gulf are condemned to remain immersed in filth.

Canto XIX. They come to the third gulf, wherein are punished those who have been guilty of simony. These are fixed with the head downwards in certain apertures, so that no more of them than the legs appears without, and on the soles of their feet are seen burning flames. Dante is taken down by his guide into the bottom of the gulf; and there finds Pope Nicholas the Fifth, whose evil deeds, together with those of other pontiffs, are bitterly reprehended. Virgil then carries him up again to the arch, which affords them a passage over the following gulf.

Canto XX. The Poet relates the punishment of such as presumed, while living, to predict future events. It is to have their faces reversed and set the contrary way on their limbs, so that, being deprived of the power to see before them, they are constrained ever to walk backwards. Among these Virgil points out to him Amphiarus, Tiresias, Aruns, and Manto (from the mention of whom he takes occasion to speak of the origin of Mantua), together with several others, who had practiced the arts of divination and astrology.

Canto XXI. Still in the eighth circle, which bears the name of Malebolge, they look down from the bridge that passes over its fifth gulf, upon the barterers or public peculators. These are plunged in a lake of boiling pitch, and guarded by demons, to whom Virgil, leaving Dante apart, presents himself; and license being obtained to pass onward, both pursue their way.

Canto XXII. Virgil and Dante proceed, accompanied by the demons, and see other sinners of the same description in the same gulf. The device of Ciampolo, one of these, to escape from the demons, who had laid hold on him.

Canto XXIII. The enraged demons pursue Dante, but he is preserved from them by Virgil. On reaching the sixth gulf he beholds the punishment of the hypocrites; which is, to pace continually round the gulf under the pressure of caps and hoods, that are gilt on the outside, but leaden within. He is addressed by two of these, Catalano and Loderingo, Knights of Saint Mary, otherwise called Joyous Friars of Bologna. Caiaphas is seen fixed to a cross on the ground, and lies so stretched along the way, that all tread on him in passing.

Canto XXIV. Under the escort of his faithful master, Dante not without difficulty makes his way out of the sixth gulf; and in the seventh, sees the robbers tormented by venomous and pestilent serpents. The soul of Vanni Fucci, who had pillaged the sacristy of Saint James in Pistoia, predicts some calamities that impended over that city, and over the Florentines.

Canto XXV. The sacrilegious Fucci vents his fury in blasphemy, is seized by serpents, and flying is pursued by Cacus in the form of a Centaur, who is described with a swarm of serpents on his haunch, and a dragon on his shoulders breathing forth fire. Our Poet then meets with the spirits of three of his countrymen, two of whom undergo a marvelous transformation in his presence.

Canto XXVI. Remounting by the steps, down which they had descended to the seventh gulf, they go forward to the arch that stretches over the eighth, and from thence behold numberless flames wherein are punished the evil counselors, each flame containing a sinner, save one, in which were Diomedes and Ulysses, the latter of whom relates the manner of his death.

Canto XXVII. The Poet, treating of the same punishment as in the last Canto, relates that he turned towards a flame in which was the Count Guido da Montefeltro, whose inquiries respecting the state of Romagna he answers; and Guido is thereby induced to declare who he is, and why condemned to that torment.

Canto XXVIII. They arrive in the ninth gulf, where the sowers of scandal, schismatics, and heretics, are seen with their limbs miserably maimed or divided in different ways. Among these the Poet finds Mahomet, Piero da Medicina, Curio, Mosca, and Bertrand de Born.

Canto XXIX. Dante, at the desire of Virgil, proceeds onward to the bridge that crosses the tenth gulf, from whence he hears the cries of the alchemists and forgers, who are tormented therein; but not being able to discern anything on account of the darkness, they descend the rock, that bounds this the last of the compartments in which the eighth circle is divided, and then behold the spirits who are afflicted by divers plagues and diseases. Two of them, namely, Grifolino of Arezzo and Capocchio of Siena, are introduced speaking.

Canto XXX. In the same gulf, other kinds of impostors, as those who have counterfeited the persons of others, or debased the current coin, or deceived by speech under false pretenses, are described as suffering various diseases. Sinon of Troy and Adamo of Brescia mutually reproach each other with their several impostures.

Canto XXXI. The poets, following the sound of a loud horn, are led by it to the ninth circle, in which there are four rounds, one enclosed within the other, and containing as many sorts of Traitors; but the present Canto shows only that the circle is encompassed with Giants, one of whom, Antæus, takes them both in his arms and places them at the bottom of the circle.

Canto XXXII. This Canto treats of the first, and, in part, of the second of those rounds, into which the ninth and last, or frozen circle, is divided. In the former, called Caïna, Dante finds Camiccione de' Pazzi, who gives him an account of other sinners who are there punished; and in the next, named Antenora, he hears in like manner from Bocca degli Abbati who his fellow-sufferers are.

Canto XXXIII. The Poet is told by Count Ugolino de' Gherardeschi of the cruel manner in which he and his children were famished in the tower at Pisa, by command of the Archbishop Ruggieri. He next discourses of the third round, called Ptolomea, wherein those are punished who have betrayed others under the semblance of kindness; and among these he finds the Friar Alberigo de' Manfredi, who tells him of one whose soul was already tormented in that place, though his body appeared still to be alive upon the earth, being yielded up to the governance of a fiend.

Canto XXXIV. In the fourth and last round of the ninth circle, those who have betrayed their benefactors are wholly covered with ice. And in the midst is Lucifer, at whose back Dante and Virgil ascend, till by a secret path they reach the surface of the other hemisphere of the earth, and once more obtain sight of the stars.]

Purgatory

Canto I

ARGUMENT

The Poet describes the delight he experienced at issuing a little before dawn from the infernal regions, into the pure air that surrounds the isle of Purgatory; and then relates how, turning to the right, he beheld four stars never seen before but by our first parents, and met on his left the shade of Cato of Utica, who, having warned him and Virgil what is needful to be done before they proceed on their way through Purgatory, disappears; and the two poets go towards the shore, where Virgil cleanses Dante's face with the dew, and girds him with a reed, as Cato had commanded.

O'er better waves to speed her rapid course
The light bark of my genius lifts the sail,
Well pleased to leave so cruel sea behind;
And of that second region will I sing,
In which the human spirit from sinful blot 5
Is purged, and for ascent to Heaven prepares.

Here, O ye hallow'd Nine! for in your train
I follow, here the deaden'd strain revive;
Nor let Calliope refuse to sound
A somewhat higher song, of that loud tone 10

Which when the wretched birds of chattering note¹

Had heard, they of forgiveness lost all hope.

Sweet hue of eastern sapphire, that was spread
O'er the serene aspect of the pure air,
High up as the first circle, to mine eyes 15
Unwonted joy renew'd, soon as I 'scaped
Forth from the atmosphere of deadly gloom,
That had mine eyes and bosom fill'd with grief,
The radiant planet, that to love invites,
Made all the orient laugh, and veil'd beneath 20
The Pisces' light,² that in his escort came.

To the right hand I turn'd, and fix'd my mind
On the other pole attentive, where I saw
Four stars³ ne'er seen before save by the ken
Of our first parents. Heaven of their rays 25
Seem'd joyous. O thou northern site! bereft
Indeed, and widow'd, since of these deprived.

As from this view I had desisted, straight
Turning a little towards the other pole,
There from whence now the wain had disappear'd,
I saw an old man⁴ standing by my side 31
Alone, so worthy of reverence in his look,
That ne'er from son to father more was owed.
Low down his beard, and mix'd with hoary white,
Descended, like his locks, which, parting, fell 35
Upon his breast in double fold. The beams

¹ The daughters of Pierus, who challenged the Muses to sing, and were by them changed into magpies.

² The constellation of the Fish veiled by the more luminous body of Venus, then a morning star.

³ Symbolical of the four cardinal virtues, Prudence, Justice, Fortitude, and Temperance.

⁴ Cato.

Of those four luminaries on his face
So brightly shone, and with such radiance clear
Deck'd it, that I beheld him as the sun.

"Say who are ye, that stemming the blind stream, 40

Forth from the eternal prison-house have fled?"

He spoke and moved those venerable plumes.

"Who hath conducted, or with lantern sure
Lights you emerging from the depth of night,
That makes the infernal valley ever black? 45

Are the firm statutes of the dread abyss

Broken, or in high heaven new laws ordain'd,

That thus, condemn'd, ye to my caves approach?"

My guide, then laying hold on me, by words

And intimations given with hand and head, 50

Made my bent knees and eye submissive pay

Due reverence; then thus to him replied:

"Not of myself I come; a Dame from heaven⁵

Descending, him besought me in my charge

To bring. But since thy will implies, that more

Our true condition I unfold at large, 56

Mine is not to deny thee thy request.

This mortal ne'er hath seen the furthest gloom;

But erring by his folly had approach'd

So near, that little space was left to turn. 60

Then, as before I told, I was dispatch'd

To work his rescue; and no way remain'd

Save this which I have ta'en. I have display'd

Before him all the regions of the bad;

And purpose now those spirits to display, 65

That under thy command are purged from sin.

How I have brought him would be long to say.

From high descends the virtue, by whose aid

I to thy sight and hearing him have led.

Now may our coming please thee. In the search 70

Of liberty he journeys: that how dear,

They know who for her sake have life refused.

Thou knowest, to whom death for her was sweet

In Utica, where thou didst leave those weeds,

That in the last great day will shine so bright. 75

For us the eternal edicts are unmoved:

He breathes, and I of Minos am not bound,

Abiding in that circle, where the eyes

Of thy chaste Marcia⁶ beam, who still in look

Prays thee, O hallow'd spirit! to own her thine.

Then by her love we implore thee, let us pass 81

Through thy seven regions;⁷ for which, best thanks

I for thy favor will to her return,

If mention there below thou not disdain."

"Marcia so pleasing in my sight was found," 85

He then to him rejoin'd, "while I was there,

That all she ask'd me I was fain to grant.

Now that beyond the accursed stream she dwells,

She may no longer move me, by that law,⁸

Which was ordain'd me, when I issued thence. 90

Not so, if Dame from heaven, as thou sayst,

Moves and directs thee; then no flattery needs.

Enough for me that in her name thou ask.

Go therefore now: and with a slender reed

See that thou duly gird him, and his face 95

Lave, till all sordid stain thou wipe from thence.

For not with eye, by any cloud obscured,

Would it be seemly before Him to come,

Who stands the foremost minister in heaven.

This islet all around, there far beneath, 100

Where the wave beats it, on the oozy bed

Produces store of reeds. No other plant,

Cover'd with leaves, or harden'd in its stalk,

There lives, not bending to the water's sway.

After, this way return not; but the sun 105

Will show you, that now rises, where to take

The mountain in its easiest ascent."

He disappear'd; and I myself uprais'd

Speechless, and to my guide retiring close,

Toward him turn'd mine eyes. He thus began:

"My son! observant thou my steps pursue. 111

We must retreat to rereward; for that way

The champain to its low extreme declines."

The dawn had chased the matin hour of prime,

Which fled before it, so that from afar 115

I spied the trembling of the ocean stream.

We traversed the deserted plain, as one

Who, wander'd from his track, thinks every step

Trodden in vain till he regain the path.

When we had come, where yet the tender dew

Strove with the sun, and in a place where fresh 121

The wind breathed o'er it, while it slowly dried;

Both hands extended on the watery grass

My master placed, in graceful act and kind.

Whence I of his intent before apprized, 125

Stretch'd out to him my cheeks suffused with tears.

There to my visage he anew restored

That hue which the dun shades of hell conceal'd.

Then on the solitary shore arrived,

That never sailing on its waters saw 130

Man that could after measure back his course,

He girt me in such manner as had pleased

Canto II

ARGUMENT

They behold a vessel under conduct of an angel, coming over the waves with spirits to Purgatory, among whom, when the passengers have landed,
 Dante recognizes his friend Casella; but, while they are entertained by him with a song, they hear Cato exclaiming against their negligent loitering, and at that rebuke hasten forwards to the mountain.

Now had the sun to that horizon reach'd,
 That covers, with the most exalted point
 Of its meridian circle, Salem's walls;
 And night, that opposite to him her orb 140
 Rounds, from the stream of Ganges issued forth,
 Holding the scales,⁹ that from her hands are dropt
 When she reigns highest: so that where I was,
 Aurora's white and vermeil-tinctured cheek
 To orange turn'd as she in age increased. 145

Meanwhile we linger'd by the water's brink,
 Like men who, musing on their road, in thought
 Journey, while motionless the body rests.
 When lo! as, near upon the hour of dawn,
 Through the thick vapors Mars with fiery beam
 Glares down in west, over the ocean floor; 151
 So seem'd, what once again I hope to view,
 A light, so swiftly coming through the sea,
 No winged course might equal its career.
 From which when for a space I had withdrawn
 Mine eyes, to make inquiry of my guide, 156
 Again I look'd, and saw it grown in size
 And brightness: then on either side appear'd
 Something, but what I knew not, of bright hue,
 And by degrees from underneath it came 160
 Another. My preceptor silent yet
 Stood, while the brightness, that we first discern'd,
 Open'd the form of wings: then when he knew
 The pilot, cried aloud, "Down, down; bend low
 Thy knees; behold God's angel: fold thy hands:
 Now shalt thou see true ministers indeed. 166
 Lo! how all human means he sets at nought;
 So that nor oar he needs, nor other sail
 Except his wings, between such distant shores.
 Lo! how straight up to heaven he holds them
 rear'd, 170

Winnowing the air with those eternal plumes,
 That not like mortal hairs fall off or change."

As more and more toward us came, more bright
 Appear'd the bird of God, nor could the eye
 Endure his splendor near: I mine bent down. 175
 He drove ashore in a small bark so swift
 And light, that in its course no wave it drank.
 The heavenly steersman at the prow was seen,
 Visibly written Blessed in his looks.

Within, a hundred spirits and more there sat. 180
 "In Exitu¹⁰ Israel de Egypto,"

All with one voice together sang, with what
 In the remainder of that hymn is writ.
 Then soon as with the sign of holy cross
 He bless'd them, they at once leap'd out on land:
 He, swiftly as he came, return'd. The crew, 186
 There left, appear'd astounded with the place,
 Gazing around, as one who sees new sights.

From every side the sun darted his beams,
 And with his arrowy radiance from mid heaven
 Had chased the Capricorn, when that strange tribe, 191

Lifting their eyes toward us: "If ye know, Declare what path will lead us to the mount."

Them Virgil answer'd: "Ye suppose, perchance,
 Us well acquainted with this place: but here, 195
 We, as yourselves, are strangers. Not long erst
 We came, before you but a little space,
 By other road so rough and hard, that now
 The ascent will seem to us as play." The spirits,
 Who from my breathing had perceived I lived,
 Grew pale with wonder. As the multitude 201
 Flock round a herald sent with olive branch,
 To hear what news he brings, and in their haste
 Tread one another down; e'en so at sight
 Of me those happy spirits were fix'd, each one
 Forgetful of its errand to depart 206
 Where, cleansed from sin, it might be made all fair.

Then one I saw darting before the rest
 With such fond ardor to embrace me, I
 To do the like was moved. O shadows vain! 210
 Except in outward semblance: thrice my hands
 I clasp'd behind it, they as oft return'd
 Empty into my breast again. Surprise
 I need must think was painted in my looks,
 For that the shadow smiled and backward drew.
 To follow it I hasten'd, but with voice 216
 Of sweetness it enjoin'd me to desist.
 Then who it was I knew, and pray'd of it,
 To talk with me it would a little pause.

¹⁰ "When Israel came out of Egypt." Psalms cxiv.

It answer'd: "Thee as in my mortal frame 220
I loved, so loosed from it I love thee still,
And therefore pause: but why walkest thou here?"

"Not without purpose once more to return,
Thou find'st me, my Casella,¹¹ where I am,¹²
Journeying this way"; I said: "but how of thee Hath so much time been lost?" He answer'd straight: 226

"No outrage hath been done to me, if he,¹³
Who when and whom he chooses takes, hath oft Denied me passage here; since of just will His will he makes. These three months past¹⁴ indeed, 230

He, whoso chose to enter, with free leave
Hath taken; whence I wandering by the shore¹⁵
Where Tiber's wave grows salt, of him gain'd kind Admittance, at that river's mouth, toward which
His wings are pointed; for there always throng
All such as not to Acheron descend." 236

Then I: "If new law taketh not from thee
Memory or custom of love-tuned song,
That whilom all my cares had power to 'swage;
Please thee therewith a little to console 240
My spirit, that encumber'd with its frame,
Traveling so far, of pain is overcome."

"Love, that discourses in my thoughts," he then Began in such soft accents, that within
The sweetness thrills me yet. My gentle guide, 245
And all who came with him, so well were pleased,
That seem'd nought else might in their thoughts have room.

Fast fix'd in mute attention to his notes
We stood, when lo! that old man venerable
Exclaiming, "How is this, ye tardy spirits? 250
What negligence detains you loitering here?
Run to the mountain to cast off those scales,
That from your eyes the sight of God conceal."

As a wild flock of pigeons, to their food
Collected, blade or tares, without their pride 255
Accustom'd, and in still and quiet sort,
If aught alarm them, suddenly desert
Their meal, assail'd by more important care;
So I that new-come troop beheld, the song
Deserting, hasten to the mountain's side, 260
As one who goes, yet, where he tends, knows not.

Nor with less hurried step did we depart.

[Canto III. Our Poet, perceiving no shadow except that cast by his own body, is fearful that Virgil has deserted him; but he is freed from that error, and both arrive together at the foot of the mountain: on finding it too steep to climb, they inquire the way from a troop of spirits that are coming towards them, and are by them shown which is the easiest ascent. Manfredi, King of Naples, who is one of these spirits, bids Dante inform his daughter Costanza, Queen of Arragon, of the manner in which he had died.

Canto IV. Dante and Virgil ascend the mountain of Purgatory, by a steep and narrow path pent in on each side by rock, till they reach a part of it that opens into a ledge or cornice. There seating themselves, and turning to the east, Dante wonders at seeing the sun on their left, the cause of which is explained to him by Virgil; and while they continue their discourse, a voice addresses them, at which they turn, and find several spirits behind the rock, and amongst the rest one named Belacqua, who had been known to our Poet on earth, and who tells that he is doomed to linger there on account of his having delayed his repentance to the last.

Canto V. They meet with others, who had deferred their repentance till they were overtaken by a violent death, when sufficient space being allowed them, they were then saved; and amongst these, Giacompo del Cassero, Buonconte da Montefeltro, and Pia, a lady of Siena.

Canto VI. Many besides, who are in like case with those spoken of in the last Canto, beseech our Poet to obtain for them the prayers of their friends, when he shall be returned to this world. This moves him to express a doubt to his guide, how the dead can be profited by the prayers of the living; for the solution of which doubt he is referred to Beatrice. Afterwards he meets with Sordello the Mantuan, whose affection, shown to Virgil his countryman, leads Dante to break forth into an invective against the unnatural divisions with which Italy, and more especially Florence, was distracted.

Canto VII. The approach of night hindering further ascent, Sordello conducts our Poets apart to an eminence, from whence they behold a pleasant recess, in form of a flowery valley, scooped out of the mountain; where are many famous spirits, and among them the Emperor Rodolph, Ottocar, King of Bohemia, Philip III of France, Henry of Navarre, Peter III of Arragon, Charles I of Naples, Henry III of England, and William, Marquis of Montferrat.

¹² Cary has not made this passage clear. Dante means that he has undertaken this journey in order to save his soul, so that after death he may be numbered among the holy spirits in Purgatory.

Canto VIII. Two angels, with flaming swords broken at the points, descend to keep watch over the valley, into which Virgil and Dante entering by desire of Sordello, our Poet meets with joy the spirit of Nino, the judge of Gallura, one who was well known to him. Meantime three exceedingly bright stars appear near the pole, and a serpent creeps subtly into the valley, but flees at hearing the approach of those angelic guards. Lastly, Conrad Malaspina predicts to our Poet his future banishment.

Canto IX. Dante is carried up the mountain, asleep and dreaming, by Lucia; and, on wakening, finds himself, two hours after sunrise, with Virgil, near the gate of Purgatory, through which they are admitted by the angel deputed by Saint Peter to keep it.

Canto X. Being admitted at the gate of Purgatory, our Poets ascend a winding path up the rock, till they reach an open and level space that extends each way round the mountain. On the side that rises, and which is of white marble, are seen artfully engraven many stories of humility, which whilst they are contemplating, there approach the souls of those who expiate the sin of pride, and who are bent down beneath the weight of heavy stones.

Canto XI. After a prayer uttered by the spirits, who were spoken of in the last Canto, Virgil inquires the way upwards, and is answered by one, who declares himself to have been Omberto, son of the Count of Santafore. Next our Poet distinguishes Oderigi, the illuminator, who discourses on the vanity of worldly fame, and points out to him the soul of Provenzano Salvani.

Canto XII. Dante being desired by Virgil to look down on the ground which they are treading, observes that it is wrought over with imagery exhibiting various instances of pride recorded in history and fable. They leave the first cornice, and are ushered to the next by an angel who points out the way.

Canto XIII. They gain the second cornice, where the sin of envy is purged; and having proceeded a little to the right, they hear voices uttered by invisible spirits recounting famous examples of charity, and next behold the shades, or souls, of the envious clad in sackcloth, and having their eyes sewed up with an iron thread. Amongst these Dante finds Sapia, a Sienese lady, from whom he learns the cause of her being there.

Canto XIV. Our Poet on this second cornice finds also the souls of Guido del Duca of Bretinoro, and Rinieri da Calboli of Romagna; the latter of whom, hearing that he comes from the banks of the Arno, inveighs against the degeneracy of all those who dwell in the cities visited by that stream; and the former, in like manner, against the inhabitants of Romagna. On leaving these, our Poets hear voices recording noted instances of envy.

Canto XV. An angel invites them to ascend the next steep. On their way Dante suggests certain doubts, which are resolved by Virgil; and, when they reach the third cornice, where the sin of anger is purged, our Poet, in a kind of waking dream, beholds remarkable instances of patience; and soon after they are enveloped in a dense fog.

Canto XVI. As they proceed through the mist, they hear the voices of spirits praying. Marco Lombardo, one of these, points out to Dante the error of such as impute our actions to necessity; explains to him that man is endued with free will; and shows that much of human depravity results from the undue mixture of spiritual and temporal authority in rulers.

Canto XVII. The Poet issues from that thick vapor; and soon after his fancy represents to him in lively portraiture some noted examples of anger. This imagination is dissipated by the appearance of an angel, who marshals them onward to the fourth cornice, on which the sin of gloominess or indifference is purged; and here Virgil shows him that this vice proceeds from a defect of love, and that all love can be only of two sorts, either natural, or of the soul; of which sorts the former is always right, but the latter may err either in respect of object or of degree.

Canto XVIII. Virgil discourses further concerning the nature of love. Then a multitude of spirits rush by; two of whom in van of the rest, record instances of zeal and fervent affection, and another, who was abbot of San Zeno in Verona, declares himself to Virgil and Dante; and lastly follow other spirits, shouting forth memorable examples of the sin for which they suffer. The Poet, pursuing his meditations, falls into a dreamy slumber.

Canto XIX. The Poet, after describing his dream, relates how, at the summoning of an angel, he ascends with Virgil to the fifth cornice, where the sin of avarice is cleansed, and where he finds Pope Adrian the fifth.

Canto XX. Among those on the fifth cornice, Hugh Capet records illustrious examples of voluntary poverty and of bounty; then tells who himself is, and speaks of his descendants on the French throne; and, lastly, adds some noted instances of avarice. When he has ended, the mountain shakes, and all the spirits sing "Glory to God."

Canto XXI. The two Poets are overtaken by the spirit of Statius, who, being cleansed, is on his way to Paradise, and who explains the cause of the mountain shaking, and of the hymn; his joy at beholding Virgil.

Canto XXII. Dante, Virgil, and Statius mount to the sixth cornice, where the sin of gluttony is cleansed, the two Latin Poets discoursing by the way. Turning to the right, they find a tree hung with sweet-smelling fruit, and watered by a shower that issues from the rock. Voices are heard to proceed from among the leaves, recording examples of temperance.

Canto XXIII. They are overtaken by the spirit of Forese, who had been a friend of our Poet's on earth, and who now inveighs against the immodest dress of their countrywomen at Florence.

Canto XXIV. Forese points out several others by name who are here, like himself, purifying themselves from the vice of gluttony; and amongst the rest, Buonaggiunta of Lucca, with whom our Poet converses. Forese then predicts the violent end of Dante's political enemy, Corso Donati; and, when he has quitted them, the Poet, in company with Statius and Virgil, arrives at another tree, from whence issue voices that record ancient examples of gluttony; and proceeding forwards, they are directed by an angel which way to ascend to the next cornice of the mountain.

Canto XXV. Virgil and Statius resolve some doubts that have arisen in the mind of Dante from what he had just seen. They all arrive on the seventh and last cornice, where the sin of incontinence is purged in fire; and the spirits of those suffering therein are heard to record illustrious instances of chastity.

Canto XXVI. The spirits wonder at seeing the shadow cast by the body of Dante on the flame as he passes it. This moves one of them to address him. It proves to be Guido Guinicelli, the Italian poet, who points out to him the spirit of Arnault Daniel, the Provençal, with whom he also speaks.

Canto XXVII. An angel sends them forward through the fire to the last ascent, which leads to the terrestrial Paradise, situated on the summit of the mountain. They have not proceeded many steps on their way upward, when the fall of night hinders them from going farther; and our Poet, who has lain down with Virgil and Statius to rest, beholds in a dream two females, figuring the active and contemplative life. With the return of morning, they reach the height; and here Virgil gives Dante full liberty to use his own pleasure and judgment in the choice of his way, till he shall meet with Beatrice.

Canto XXVIII. Dante wanders through the forest of the terrestrial Paradise, till he is stopped by a stream, on the other side of which he beholds a fair lady, culling flowers. He speaks to her; and she, in reply, explains to him certain things touching the nature of that place, and tells that the water, which flows between them, is here called Lethe, and in another place has the name of Eunoe.

Canto XXIX. The lady, who in a following Canto is called Matilda, moves along the side of the stream in a contrary direction to the current, and Dante keeps equal pace with her on the opposite bank. A marvelous sight, preceded by music, appears in view.]

ARGUMENT

Beatrice descends from heaven, and rebukes the Poet.

Soon as that polar light,¹⁶ fair ornament
Of the first heaven, which hath never known
Setting nor rising, nor the shadowy veil 265
Of other cloud than sin, to duty there
Each one conveying, as that lower doth
The steersman to his port, stood firmly fix'd;
Forthwith the saintly tribe, who in the van
Between the Gryphon and its radiance came, 270
Did turn them to the car, as to their rest:
And one, as if commission'd from above,
In holy chant thrice shouted forth aloud;
"Come,"¹⁷ spouse! from Libanus": and all the rest
Took up the song.—At the last audit, so 275

¹⁷ "Come with me from Lebanon, my spouse, with me, from Lebanon." Song of Solomon iv. 8.

The blest shalt rise, from forth his cavern each
 Uplifting lightly his new-vested flesh;
 As, on the sacred litter, at the voice
 Authoritative of that elder, sprang
 A hundred ministers and messengers 280
 Of life eternal. "Blessed¹⁸ thou, who comest!"
 And, "Oh!" they cried, "from full hands scatter ye Unwithering lilies": and, so saying, cast
 Flowers over head and round them on all sides.

I have beheld, ere now, at break of day, 285
 The eastern clime all roseate; and the sky
 Opposed, one deep and beautiful serene;
 And the sun's face so shaded, and with mists
 Attemper'd, at his rising, that the eye
 Long while endured the sight: thus, in a cloud 290
 Of flowers, that from those hands angelic rose,
 And down within and outside of the car
 Fell showering, in white veil with olive wreathed,
 A virgin in my view appear'd, beneath
 Green mantle, robed in hue of living flame: 295
 And o'er my spirit, that so long a time
 Had from her presence felt no shuddering dread,
 Albeit mine eyes discern'd her not, there moved
 A hidden virtue from her, at whose touch
 The power of ancient love was strong within me.

No sooner on my vision streaming, smote 301
 The heavenly influence, which, years past, and e'en
 In childhood, thrill'd me, than towards Virgil I
 Turn'd me to leftward; panting, like a babe,
 That flees for refuge to his mother's breast, 305
 If aught have terrified or work'd him woe:
 And would have cried, "There is no dram of
 blood,

That doth not quiver in me. The old flame
 Throws out clear tokens of reviving fire."
 But Virgil had bereaved us of himself; 310
 Virgil, my best loved father; Virgil, he
 To whom I gave me up for safety: nor
 All, our prime mother lost, avail'd to save
 My undew'd cheeks from blur of soiling tears.

"Dante! weep not that Virgil leaves thee; nay,
 Weep thou not yet: behoves thee feel the edge 316
 Of other sword; and thou shalt weep for that."

As to the prow or stern, some admiral
 Paces the deck, inspiriting his crew,
 When 'mid the sail-yards all hands ply aloof; 320
 Thus, on the left side of the car, I saw (Turning me at the sound of mine own name,
 Which here I am compell'd to register)
 The virgin station'd, who before appear'd
 Veil'd in that festive shower angelical. 325

Towards me, across the stream, she bent her eyes;

Though from her brow the veil descending, bound
 With foliage of Minerva, suffer'd not
 That I beheld her clearly: then with act
 Full royal, still insulting o'er her thrall, 330
 Added, as one who, speaking, keepeth back
 The bitterest saying, to conclude the speech:
 "Observe me well. I am, in sooth, I am
 Beatrice. What! and hast thou deign'd at last Approach the mountain? Knewest not, O man!
 Thy happiness is here?" Down fell mine eyes 336
 On the clear fount; but there, myself espying, Recoil'd, and sought the greensward; such a weight

Of shame was on my forehead. With a mien
 Of that stern majesty, which doth surround 340
 A mother's presence to her awe-struck child,
 She look'd; a flavor of such bitterness
 Was mingled in her pity. There her words
 Brake off; and suddenly the angels sang, 344
 "In thee, O gracious Lord! my hope hath been":
 But went no further than, "Thou, Lord! hast set
 My feet in ample room." As snow, that lies,
 Amidst the living rafters¹⁹ on the back
 Of Italy, congeal'd, when drifted high
 And closely piled by rough Sclavonian blasts; 350
 Breathe but the land whereon no shadow falls,
 And straightway melting it distils away,
 Like a fire-wasted taper: thus was I,
 Without a sigh or tear, or ever these Did sing, that, with the chiming of heaven's sphere, 355

Still in their warbling chime: but when the strain
 Of dulcet symphony express'd for me
 Their soft compassion, more than could the words,
 "Virgin! why so consumest him?" then, the ice
 Congeal'd about my bosom, turn'd itself 360
 To spirit and water; and with anguish forth Gush'd, through the lips and eyelids, from the heart.

Upon the chariot's same edge till she stood,
 Immoveable; and thus address'd her words
 To those bright semblances with pity touch'd:
 "Ye in the eternal day your vigils keep; 366
 So that nor night nor slumber, with close stealth,
 Conveys from you a single step, in all
 The goings on of time: thence, with more heed
 I shape mine answer, for his ear intended, 370
 Who there stands weeping; that the sorrow now
 May equal the transgression. Not alone

¹⁸ "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." Matt. xxi. 9.

¹⁹ The leafless woods on the Apennine.

Through operation of the mighty orbs,
 That mark each seed to some predestined aim,
 As with aspect or fortunate or ill 375
 The constellations meet; but through benign
 Largess of heavenly graces, which rain down
 From such a height as mocks our vision, this man
 Was, in the freshness of his being, such,
 So gifted virtually, that in him 380
 All better habits wonderously had thrived.
 The more of kindly strength is in the soil,
 So much doth evil seed and lack of culture
 Mar it the more, and make it run to wildness.
 These looks sometime upheld him; for I show'd
 My youthful eyes, and led him by their light 386
 In upright walking. Soon as I had reach'd
 The threshold of my second age, and changed
 My mortal for immortal; then he left me,
 And gave himself to others. When from flesh 390
 To spirit I had risen, and increase
 Of beauty and of virtue circled me,
 I was less dear to him, and valued less.
 His steps were turn'd into deceitful ways,
 Following false images of good, that make 395
 No promise perfect. Nor avail'd me aught
 To sue for inspirations, with the which,
 I, both in dreams of night, and otherwise,
 Did call him back; of them, so little reck'd him.
 Such depth he fell, that all device was short 400
 Of his preserving, save that he should view
 The children of perdition. To this end
 I visited the purlieu of the dead:
 And one, who hath conducted him thus high,
 Received my supplications urged with weeping.
 It were a breaking of God's high decree, 406
 If Lethe should be past, and such food²⁰ tasted,
 Without the cost of some repentant tear."

Canto XXXI

ARGUMENT

Beatrice continues her reprehension of Dante, who confesses his error, and falls to the ground: coming to himself again, he is by Matilda drawn through the waters of Lethe, and presented first to the four virgins who figure the cardinal virtues; these in their turn lead him to the Gryphon, a symbol of our Saviour; and the three virgins, representing the evangelical virtues, intercede for him with Beatrice, that she would display to him her second beauty.

"O thou!" her words she thus without delay
 Resuming, turn'd their point on me, to whom 410
 They, but with lateral edge,²¹ seem'd harsh before:
 "Say thou, who stand'st beyond the holy stream,
 If this be true. A charge, so grievous, needs Thine own avowal." On my faculty
 Such strange amazement hung, the voice expired
 Imperfect, ere its organs gave it birth. 416

A little space refraining, then she spake:
 "What dost thou muse on? Answer me. The wave
 On thy remembrances of evil yet
 Hath done no injury." A mingled sense 420
 Of fear and of confusion, from my lips
 Did such a "Yea" produce, as needed help
 Of vision to interpret. As when breaks,
 In act to be discharged, a cross-bow bent
 Beyond its pitch, both nerve and bow o'erstretch'd;
 The flagging weapon feebly hits the mark: 426
 Thus, tears and sighs forth gushing, did I burst,
 Beneath the heavy load: and thus my voice
 Was slacken'd on its way. She straight began:
 "When my desire invited thee to love 430
 The good, which sets a bound to our aspirings;
 What bar of thwarting foss or linked chain
 Did meet thee, that thou so shouldst quit the hope
 Of further progress? or what bait of ease,
 Or promise of allurement, led thee on 435
 Elsewhere, that thou elsewhere shouldst rather wait?"

A bitter sigh I drew, then scarce found voice
 To answer; hardly to these sounds my lips Gave utterance, wailing: "Thy fair looks withdrawn,
 Things present, with deceitful pleasures, turn'd
 My steps aside." She answering spake: "Hadst thou 441

Been silent, or denied what thou avow'st,
 Thou hadst not hid thy sin the more; such eye
 Observes it. But whene'er the sinner's cheek
 Breaks forth into the precious-streaming tears 445
 Of self-accusing, in our court the wheel
 Of justice doth run counter to the edge.²²
 Howe'er, that thou mayst profit by thy shame
 For errors past, and that henceforth more strength
 May arm thee, when thou hear'st the Syren-voice;
 Lay thou aside the motive to this grief, 451
 And lend attentive ear, while I unfold

²⁰ The oblivion of sins.

²¹ The words of Beatrice, when not addressed directly to himself, but spoken to the angel of him, Dante had thought sufficiently harsh.

²² "The weapons of divine justice are blunted by the confession and sorrow of the offender."

How opposite a way my buried flesh
Should have impell'd thee. Never didst thou spy,
In art or nature, aught so passing sweet, 455
As were the limbs that in their beauteous frame
Enclosed me, and are scatter'd now in dust.
If sweetest thing thus fail'd thee with my death,
What, afterward, of mortal, should thy wish
Have tempted? When thou first hadst felt the dart
Of perishable things, in my departing 461
For better realms, thy wing thou shouldst have pruned

To follow me; and never stoop'd again,
To 'bide a second blow, for a slight girl,
Or other gaud as transient and as vain.²³ 465
The new and inexperienced bird awaits,
Twice it may be, or thrice, the fowler's aim;
But in the sight of one whose plumes are full,
In vain the net is spread, the arrow wing'd."

I stood, as children silent and ashamed 470
Stand, listening, with their eyes upon the earth,
Acknowledging their fault, and self-condemn'd.
And she resumed: "If, but to hear, thus pains thee;
Raise thou thy beard, and lo! what sight shall do."

With less reluctance yields a sturdy hólme, 475
Rent from its fibers by a blast, that blows
From off the pole, or from Iarbas' land,²⁴
Than I at her behest my visage raised:
And thus the face denoting by the beard,
I mark'd the secret sting her words convey'd. 480

No sooner lifted I mine aspect up,
Than I perceived those primal creatures cease
Their flowery sprinkling; and mine eyes beheld
(Yet unassured and wavering in their view)
Beatrice; she, who towards the mystic shape, 485
That joins two natures in one form, had turn'd:
And, even under shadow of her veil,
And parted by the verdant rill that flow'd
Between, in loveliness she seem'd as much
Her former self surpassing, as on earth 490
All others she surpass'd. Remorseful goads Shot sudden through me. Each thing else, the more

Its love had late beguiled me, now the more
Was loathsome. On my heart so keenly smote
The bitter consciousness, that on the ground 495
O'erpower'd I fell: and what my state was then,
She knows, who was the cause. When now my strength

Flow'd back, returning outward from the heart,
The lady,²⁵ whom alone I first had seen,
I found above me. "Loose me not," she cried: 500
"Lose not thy hold": and lo! had dragg'd me high
As to my neck into the stream; while she,
Still as she drew me after, swept along,
Swift as a shuttle, bounding o'er the wave.

The blessed shore approaching, then was heard
So sweetly "Tu asperges me,"²⁶ that I 506
May not remember, much less tell the sound.

The beauteous dame, her arms expanding, clasp'd

My temples, and immersed me where 'twas fit
The wave should drench me: and, thence raising 510
up,

Within the fourfold dance of lovely nymphs
Presented me so laved; and with their arm
They each did cover me. "Here are we nymphs,
And in the heaven are stars. Or ever earth

Was visited of Beatrice, we, 515
Appointed for her handmaids, tended on her.

We to her eyes will lead thee: but the light
Of gladness, that is in them, well to scan,
Those yonder three,²⁷ of deeper ken than ours,
Thy sight shall quicken." Thus began their song:
And then they led me to the Gryphon's breast, 521
Where, turn'd toward us, Beatrice stood.

"Spare not thy vision. We have station'd thee
Before the emeralds,²⁸ whence love, erewhile,
Hath drawn his weapons on thee." As they spake,
A thousand fervent wishes riveted 526
Mine eyes upon her beaming eyes, that stood,
Still fix'd toward the Gryphon, motionless.

As the sun strikes a mirror, even thus
Within those orbs the twyfold being shone; 530
For ever varying, in one figure now
Reflected, now in other. Reader! muse
How wondrous in my sight it seem'd, to mark
A thing, albeit steadfast in itself,
Yet in its imaged semblance mutable. 535

Full of amaze, and joyous, while my soul
Fed on the viand, whereof still desire
Grows with satiety; the other three,
With gesture that declared a loftier line,
Advanced: to their own carol, on they came 540
Dancing, in festive ring angelical.

"Turn, Beatrice!" was their song: "Oh! turn
Thy saintly sight on this thy faithful one,

²³ Beatrice alludes to Dante's unworthy life after her death.

²⁴ The south.

²⁵ Matilda.

²⁶ "Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean; wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow." Psalms li. 7.

²⁷ Faith, hope, and charity.

²⁸ The eyes of Beatrice.

Who, to behold thee, many a wearisome pace
 Hath measured. Gracious at our prayer, vouchsafe
 Unveil to him thy cheeks; that he may mark 546
 Thy second beauty, now conceal'd." O splendor!
 O sacred light eternal! who is he,
 So pale with musing in Pierian shades,
 Or with that fount so lavishly imbued, 550
 Whose spirit should not fail him in the essay
 To represent thee such as thou didst seem,
 When under cope of the still-chiming heaven
 Thou gavest to open air thy charms reveal'd?

Canto XXXII

ARGUMENT

Dante is warned not to gaze too fixedly on Beatrice. The procession moves on, accompanied by Matilda, Statius, and Dante, till they reach an exceeding lofty tree, where divers strange chances befall.

Mine eyes with such an eager coveting 555
 Were bent to rid them of their ten years' thirst;²⁹
 No other sense was waking: and e'en they
 Were fenced on either side from heed of aught;
 So tangled, in its custom'd toils, that smile
 Of saintly brightness drew me to itself: 560
 When forcibly, toward the left, my sight
 The sacred virgins turn'd; for from their lips
 I heard the warning sounds: "Too fix'd a gaze!"
 Awhile my vision labor'd; as when late
 Upon the o'erstrained eyes the sun hath smote:
 But soon, to lesser object, as the view 566
 Was now recover'd (lesser in respect
 To that excess of sensible, whence late
 I had perforce been sunder'd), on their right
 I mark'd that glorious army wheel, and turn, 570
 Against the sun and sevenfold lights, their front.
 As when, their bucklers for protection raised,
 A well-ranged troop, with portly banners curl'd, Wheel circling, ere the whole can change their ground;
 E'en thus the goodly regiment of heaven, 575
 Proceeding, all did pass us ere the car
 Had sloped his beam. Attendant at the wheels
 The damsels turn'd; and on the Gryphon moved
 The sacred burden, with a pace so smooth,
 No feather on him trembled. The fair dame, 580
 Who through the wave had drawn me, companied

By Statius and myself, pursued the wheel,
 Whose orbit, rolling, mark'd a lesser arch.
 Through the high wood, now void (the more
 her blame,
 Who by the serpent was beguiled), I pass'd, 585
 With step in cadence to the harmony
 Angelic. Onward had we moved, as far,
 Perchance, as arrow at three several flights
 Full wing'd had sped, when from her station down
 Descended Beatrice. With one voice 590
 All murmur'd "Adam"; circling next a plant
 Despoil'd of flowers and leaf, on every bough.
 Its tresses, spreading more as more they rose,
 Were such, as 'midst their forest wilds, for height,
 The Indians might have gazed at. "Blessed thou, Gryphon!"³⁰ whose beak hath never pluck'd that tree 596
 Pleasant to taste: for hence the appetite
 Was warp'd to evil." Round the stately trunk
 Thus shouted forth the rest, to whom return'd
 The animal twice-gender'd: "Yea! for so 600
 The generation of the just are saved."
 And turning to the chariot-polé, to foot
 He drew it of the widow'd branch, and bound
 There, left unto the stock whereon it grew.
 As when large floods of radiance from above 605
 Stream, with that radiance mingled, which ascends
 Next after setting of the scaly sign,
 Our plants then burgein, and each wears anew
 His wonted colors, ere the sun have yoked
 Beneath another star his flamy steeds; 610
 Thus putting forth a hue more faint than rose,
 And deeper than the violet, was renew'd
 The plant, erewhile in all its branches bare.
 Unearthly was the hymn, which then arose.
 I understood it not, nor to the end 615
 Endured the harmony. Had I the skill
 To pencil forth how closed the unpitying eyes
 Slumbering, when Syrinx warbled (eyes that paid
 So dearly for their watching), then, like painter,
 That with a model paints, I might design 620
 The manner of my falling into sleep.
 But feign who will the slumber cunningly,
 I pass it by to when I waked; and tell,
 How suddenly a flash of splendor rent
 The curtain of my sleep, and one cries out, 625
 "Arise: what dost thou?" As the chosen three,
 On Tabor's mount, admitted to behold
 The blossoming of that fair tree,³¹ whose fruit

²⁹ Beatrice had been dead ten years.

³⁰ Our Saviour's submission to the Roman empire appears to be intended, and particularly His injunction, "to render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's."

³¹ Our Saviour's transfiguration. "As the apple-tree among the trees of the wood, so is my beloved among the sons." Song of Solomon ii. 3.

Is coveted of angels, and doth make
 Perpetual feast in heaven; to themselves 630
 Returning, at the word whence deeper sleeps⁸²
 Were broken, they their tribe diminish'd saw;
 Both Moses and Elias gone, and changed
 The stole their master wore; thus to myself
 Returning, over me beheld I stand 635
 The piteous one,⁸³ who, cross the stream, had brought

My steps. "And where," all doubting, I exclaim'd,
 "Is Beatrice?"—"See her," she replied,
 "Beneath the fresh leaf, seated on its root.
 Behold the associate choir, that circles her. 640
 The others, with a melody more sweet
 And more profound, journeying to higher realms,
 Upon the Gryphon tend." If there her words
 Were closed, I know not; but mine eyes had now
 Ta'en view of her, by whom all other thoughts
 Were barr'd admittance. On the very ground 646
 Alone she sat, as she had there been left
 A guard upon the wain, which I beheld
 Bound to the twyform beast. The seven nymphs
 Did make themselves a cloister round about her;
 And, in their hands, upheld those lights⁸⁴ secure
 From blast septentrion and the gusty south. 652

"A little while thou shalt be forester here;
 And citizen shalt be, for ever with me,
 Of that true Rome,⁸⁵ wherein Christ dwells a Roman 655

To profit the misguided world, keep now
 Thine eyes upon the car; and what thou seest,
 Take heed thou write, returning to that place."⁸⁶

Thus Beatrice: at whose feet inclined
 Devout, at her behest, my thought and eyes 660
 I, as she bade, directed. Never fire,
 With so swift motion, forth a stormy cloud
 Leap'd downward from the welkin's furthest
 bound,

As I beheld the bird of Jove descend
 Down through the tree; and, as he rush'd, the rind
 Disparting crush beneath him; buds much more,
 And leaflets. On the car, with all his might 667
 He struck; whence, staggering, like a ship it reel'd,

At random driven, to starboard now, o'ercome,
 And now to larboard, by the vaulting waves. 670

Next, springing up into the chariot's womb,
 A fox⁸⁷ I saw, with hunger seeming pined
 Of all good food. But, for his ugly sins
 The saintly maid rebuking him, away
 Scampering he turn'd, fast as his hide-bound corpse 675
 Would bear him. Next, from whence before he came,

I saw the eagle dart into the hull
 O' the car, and leave it with his feathers lined:⁸⁸
 And then a voice, like that which issues forth
 From heart with sorrow rived, did issue forth 680
 From heaven, and "O poor bark of mine!" it cried,
 "How badly art thou freighted." Then it seem'd
 That the earth open'd, between either wheel;
 And I beheld a dragon⁸⁹ issue thence, 684
 That through the chariot fix'd his forked train;
 And like a wasp, that draggeth back the sting,
 So drawing forth his baleful train, he dragg'd
 Part of the bottom forth; and went his way,
 Exulting. What remain'd, as lively turf 689
 With green herb, so did clothe itself with plumes,⁴⁰
 Which haply had, with purpose chaste and kind,
 Been offer'd; and therewith were clothed the wheels,

Both one and other, and the beam, so quickly,
 A sigh were not breathed sooner. Thus trans-form'd,

The holy structure, through its several parts, 695
 Did put forth heads;⁴¹ three on the beam, and one
 On every side: the first like oxen horn'd;
 But with a single horn upon their front,
 The four. Like monster, sight hath never seen.
 O'er it⁴² methought there sat, secure as rock 700
 On mountain's lofty top, a shameless whore,
 Whose ken roved loosely round her. At her side,
 As 'twere that none might bear her off, I saw
 A giant stand; and ever and anon
 They mingled kisses. But, her lustful eyes 705
 Chancing on me to wander, that fell minion
 Scourged her from head to foot all o'er; then full
 Of jealousy, and fierce with rage, unloosed

⁸² The sleep of death, in the instance of the ruler of the synagogue's daughter and of Lazarus.

⁸³ Matilda.

⁸⁴ The tapers of gold.

⁸⁵ Of heaven.

⁸⁶ To the earth.

⁸⁷ By the fox probably is represented the treachery of the heretics.

⁸⁸ In allusion to the donations made by Constantine to the Church.

⁸⁹ Probably Mahomet.

⁴⁰ The increase of wealth and temporal dominion, which followed the supposed gift of Constantine.

⁴¹ By the seven heads, it is supposed with sufficient probability, are meant the seven capital sins.

⁴² The harlot is thought to represent the state of the Church under Boniface VIII and the giant to figure Philip IV of France.

The monster, and dragg'd on,⁴⁸ so far across
The forest, that from me its shades alone 710
Shielded the harlot and the new-form'd brute.

Canto XXXIII

ARGUMENT

After a hymn sung, Beatrice leaves the tree, and takes with her the seven virgins, Matilda, Statius, and Dante. She then darkly predicts to our Poets some future events. Lastly, the whole band arrive at the fountain, from whence the two streams, Lethe and Eunoe, separating, flow different ways; and Matilda, at the desire of Beatrice, causes our Poet to drink of the latter stream.

"The heathen,⁴⁴ Lord! are come": responsive thus,
The trinal now, and now the virgin band
Quaternal, their sweet psalmody began,
Weeping; and Beatrice listen'd, sad 715
And sighing, to the song, in such a mood,
That Mary, as she stood beside the cross,
Was scarce more changed. But when they gave her place
To speak, then, risen upright on her feet,
She, with a color glowing bright as fire, 720
Did answer: "Yet a little while, and ye
Shall see me not; and, my beloved sisters!
Again a little while, and ye shall see me."

Before her then she marshal'd all the seven;
And, beckoning only, motion'd me, the dame,
And that remaining sage,⁴⁵ to follow her. 726

So on she pass'd; and had not set, I ween,
Her tenth step to the ground, when, with mine eyes,
Her eyes encounter'd; and, with visage mild,
"So mend thy pace," she cried, "that if my words
Address thee, thou mayst still be aptly placed 731
To hear them." Soon as duly to her side
I now had hasten'd: "Brother!" she began,
"Why makest thou no attempt at questioning,
As thus we walk together?" Like to those 735
Who, speaking with too reverent an awe

Before their betters, draw not forth the voice
Alive unto their lips, befell me then
That I in sounds imperfect thus began: 739
"Lady! what I have need of, that thou know'st;
And what will suit my need." She answering thus:
"Of fearfulness and shame, I will that thou
Henceforth do rid thee; that thou speak no more,
As one who dreams. Thus far be taught of me:
The vessel which thou saw'st the serpent break,
Was, and is not: let him, who hath the blame, 746
Hope not to scare God's vengeance with a sop.⁴⁶
Without an heir for ever shall not be
That eagle,⁴⁷ he, who left the chariot plumed,
Which monster made it first and next a prey. 750
Plainly I view, and therefore speak, the stars
E'en now approaching, whose conjunction, free
From all impediment and bar, brings on
A season, in the which, one sent from God 754
(Five hundred, five, and ten, do mark him out),
That foul one, and the accomplice of her guilt,
The giant, both, shall slay. And if perchance
My saying, dark as Themis or as Sphinx,
Fail to persuade thee (since like them it foils
The intellect with blindness), yet erelong 760
Events shall be the Naiads, that will solve
This knotty riddle; and no damage light
On flock or field. Take heed; and as these words
By me are utter'd, teach them even so
To those who live that life, which is a race 765
To death: and when thou writest them, keep in mind
Not to conceal how thou hast seen the plant,
That twice⁴⁸ hath now been spoil'd. This whoso robs,
This whoso plucks, with blasphemy of deed
Sins against God, who for His use alone 770
Creating hallow'd it. For taste of this,
In pain and in desire, five thousand years
And upward, the first soul did yearn for Him
Who punish'd in Himself the fatal gust.
"Thy reason slumbers, if it deem this height,
And summit thus inverted, of the plant, 776
Without due cause: and were not vainer thoughts,

⁴⁸ The removal of the Pope's residence from Rome to Avignon is pointed at.

⁴⁴ "O God, the heathen are come into Thine inheritance." Psalms lxxix. 1.

⁴⁵ Statius.

⁴⁶ "Let not him who hath occasioned the destruction of the Church, that vessel which the serpent brake, hope to appease the anger of the Deity by any outward acts of religious, or rather superstitious ceremony; such as was that, in our Poet's time, performed by a murderer at Florence, who imagined himself secure from vengeance, if he ate a sop of bread in wine upon the grave of the person murdered, within the space of nine days."

⁴⁷ He prognosticates that the Emperor of Germany will not always continue to submit to the usurpations of the Pope, and foretells the coming of Henry VII, Duke of Luxemburg, signified by the numerical figures DVX; or, as Lombardi supposes, of Can Grande della Scala, appointed the leader of the Ghibelline forces.

⁴⁸ First by the eagle and next by the giant.

As Elsa's numbing waters,⁴⁹ to thy soul.
 And their fond pleasures had not dyed it dark
 As Pyramus the mulberry; thou hadst seen, 780
 In such momentous circumstances alone,
 God's equal justice morally implied
 In the forbidden tree. But since I mark thee,
 In understanding, harden'd into stone,
 And, to that hardness, spotted too and stain'd,
 So that thine eye is dazzled at my word; 786
 I will, that, if not written, yet at least
 Painted thou take it in thee, for the cause,
 That one brings home his staff inwreathed with palm."

I thus: "As wax by seal, that changeth not 790
 Its impress, now is stamp'd my brain by thee.
 But wherefore soars thy wish'd-for speech so high
 Beyond my sight, that loses it the more,
 The more it strains to reach it?"—"To the end
 That thou mayst know," she answer'd straight,
 "the school, 795

That thou hast follow'd; and how far behind,
 When following my discourse, its learning halts:
 And mayst behold your art, from the divine
 As distant, as the disagreement is 'Twixt earth and heaven's most high and rapturous orb." 800

"I not remember," I replied, "that e'er
 I was estranged from thee; nor for such fault
 Doth conscience chide me." Smiling she return'd:
 "If thou canst not remember, call to mind
 How lately thou hast drunk of Lethe's wave; 805
 And, sure as smoke doth indicate a flame,
 In that forgetfulness itself conclude
 Blame from thy alienated will incurr'd.
 From henceforth, verily, my words shall be
 As naked, as will suit them to appear 810
 In thy unpracticed view." More sparkling now,
 And with retarded course, the sun possess'd
 The circle of mid-day, that varies still
 As the aspect varies of each several clime;

When, as one, sent in vaward of a troop 815
 For escort, pauses, if perchance he spy
 Vestige of somewhat strange and rare; so paused
 The sevenfold band, arriving at the verge
 Of a dun umbrage hoar, such as is seen,
 Beneath green leaves and gloomy branches, oft
 To overbrow a bleak and alpine cliff. 821
 And, where they stood, before them, as it seem'd,
 I, Tigris and Euphrates both, beheld
 Forth from one fountain issue; and, like friends,
 Linger at parting. "O enlightening beam! 825
 O glory of our kind! beseech thee say
 What water this, which, from one source derived,
 Itself removes to distance from itself?"

To such entreaty answer thus was made:
 "Entreat Matilda, that she teach thee this." 830
 And here, as one who clears himself of blame
 Imputed, the fair dame return'd: "Of me
 He this and more hath learnt; and I am safe
 That Lethe's water hath not hid it from him."

And Beatrice: "Some more pressing care, 835
 That oft the memory 'reaves, perchance hath made
 His mind's eye dark. But lo, where Eunoe flows!
 Lead thither; and, as thou art wont, revive
 His fainting virtue." As a courteous spirit,
 That proffers no excuses, but as soon 840

As he hath token of another's will,
 Makes it his own; when she had ta'en me, thus
 The lovely maiden moved her on, and call'd
 To Statius, with an air most lady-like:
 "Come thou with him." Were further space
 allow'd, 845

Then, Reader! might I sing, though but in part.
 That beverage, with whose sweetness I had ne'er
 Been sated. But, since all the leaves are full,
 Appointed for this second strain, mine art
 With warning bridle checks me. I return'd 850
 From the most holy wave, regenerate,
 E'en as new plants renew'd with foliage new.
 Pure and made apt for mounting to the stars.

⁴⁹ The Elsa, a little stream, which flows into the Arno about twenty miles below Florence, is said to possess a petrifying quality.

Paradise

Canto I

ARGUMENT

The Poet ascends with Beatrice towards the first heaven; and is by her resolved of certain doubts which arise in his mind.

His glory, by whose might all things are moved,
Pierces the universe, and in one part
Sheds more resplendence, elsewhere less. In heaven,
That largeliest of his light partakes, was I,
Witness of things, which, to relate again, 5
Surpasseth power of him who comes from thence;
For that, so near approaching its desire,
Our intellect is to such depth absorb'd,
That memory cannot follow. Nathless all,
That in my thoughts I of that sacred realm 10
Could store, shall now be matter of my song.

Benign Apollo! this last labor aid;
And make me such a vessel of thy worth,
As thy own laurel claims, of me beloved.
Thus far ¹ hath one of steep Parnassus' brows 15
Sufficed me; henceforth, there is need of both
For my remaining enterprise. Do thou ²
Enter into my bosom, and there breathe
So, as when Marsyas by thy hand was dragg'd Forth from his limbs, unsheathed. O power divine! 20

If thou to me of thine impart so much,
That of that happy realm the shadow'd form
Traced in my thoughts I may set forth to view;
Thou shalt behold me of thy favor'd tree
Come to the foot, and crown myself with leaves:
For to that honor thou, and my high theme 26
Will fit me. If but seldom, mighty Sire!
To grace his triumph, gathers thence a wreath
Cæsar, or bard (more shame for human wills
Depraved), joy to the Delphic god must spring
From the Peneian foliage, when one breast 31
Is with such thirst inspired. From a small spark
Great flame hath risen: after me, perchance,
Others with better voice may pray, and gain,
From the Cyrrhæan city, answer kind. 35

Through divers passages, the world's bright lamp

Rises to mortals; but through that ³ which joins Four circles with the threefold cross, in best
Course, and in happiest constellation ⁴ set,
He comes; and, to the worldly wax, best gives 40
Its temper and impression. Morning there,
Here eve was well nigh by such passage made;
And whiteness had o'erspread that hemisphere,
Blackness the other part: when to the left
I saw Beatrice turn'd, and on the sun 45
Gazing, as never eagle fix'd his ken.
As from the first a second beam is wont
To issue, and reflected upwards rise,
Even as a pilgrim bent on his return;
So of her act, that through the eyesight pass'd 50
Into my fancy, mine was form'd: and straight,
Beyond our mortal wont, I fix'd mine eyes
Upon the sun. Much is allow'd us there,
That here exceeds our power; thanks to the place
Made for the dwelling of the human kind. 55

I suffer'd it not long; and yet so long,
That I beheld it bickering sparks around,
As iron that comes boiling from the fire.
And suddenly upon the day appear'd
A day new-risen; as he, who hath the power, 60
Had with another sun bedeck'd the sky.

Her eyes fast fix'd on the eternal wheels,
Beatrice stood unmoved; and I with ken
Fix'd upon her, from upward gaze removed,
At her aspect, such inwardly became 65
As Glaucus, when he tasted of the herb
That made him peer among the ocean gods:
Words may not tell of that transhuman change;
And therefore let the example serve, though weak,
For those whom grace hath better proof in store.

If I were only what thou didst create, 71
Then newly, Love! by whom the heaven is ruled;
Thou know'st, who by thy light didst bear me up.
Whenas the wheel which thou dost ever guide,
Desired Spirit! with its harmony, 75
Temper'd of thee and measured, charm'd mine ear
Then seem'd to me so much of heaven to blaze

¹ He appears to mean nothing more than that this part of his poem will require a greater exertion of his powers than the former.

² Make me thine instrument; and, through me, utter such sound as when thou didst contend with Marsyas.

³ "Where the four circles, the horizon, the zodiac, the equator, and equinoctial colure join; the last three intersecting each other so as to form three crosses, as may be seen in the armillary sphere."

⁴ Aries. Some understand the planet Venus by the "miglior stella."

With the sun's flame, that rain or flood ne'er made
A lake so broad. The newness of the sound,
And that great light, inflamed me with desire, 80
Keener than e'er was felt, to know their cause.

Whence she, who saw me, clearly as myself,
To calm my troubled mind, before I ask'd,
Open'd her lips, and gracious thus began:
"With false imagination thou thyself 85
Makest dull; so that thou seest not the thing,
Which thou hadst seen, had that been shaken off.
Thou art not on the earth as thou believest;
For lightning, scaped from its own proper place,
Ne'er ran, as thou hast hither now return'd." 90

Although divested of my first-raised doubt
By those brief words accompanied with smiles,
Yet in new doubt was I entangled more,
And said: "Already satisfied, I rest
From admiration deep; but now admire 95
How I above those lighter bodies rise."

Whence, after utterance of a piteous sigh,
She towards me bent her eyes, with such a look,
As on her frenzied child a mother casts;
Then thus began: "Among themselves all things
Have order; and from hence the form,⁵ which 101 makes

The universe resemble God. In this
The higher creatures see the printed steps
Of that eternal worth, which is the end
Whither the line is drawn.⁶ All natures lean, 105
In this their order, diversly; some more,
Some less approaching to their primal source.
Thus they to different havens are moved on Through the vast sea of being, and each one
With instinct given, that bears it in its course:
This to the lunar sphere directs the fire; 111
This moves the hearts of mortal animals;
This the brute earth together knits, and binds.
Nor only creatures, void of intellect,
Are aim'd at by this bow; but even those, 115
That have intelligence and love, are pierced.
That Providence, who so well orders all,
With her own light makes ever calm the heaven,⁷
In which the substance, that hath greatest speed,⁸
Is turn'd: and thither now, as to our seat 120
Predestined, we are carried by the force
Of that strong cord, that never looses dart
But at fair aim and glad. Yet it is true,
That as, oft-times, but ill accords the form
To the design of art, through sluggishness 125

Or unreplying matter; so this course
Is sometimes quitted by the creature, who Hath power, directed thus, to bend elsewhere;
As from a cloud the fire is seen to fall,
From its original impulse warp'd to earth, 130
By vitious fondness. Thou no more admire
Thy soaring (if I rightly deem), than lapse
Of torrent downwards from a mountain's height.
There would in thee for wonder be more cause,
If, free of hindrance, thou hadst stay'd below,
As living fire unmoved upon the earth." 136
So said, she turn'd toward the heaven her face.

[Canto II. Dante and his celestial guide enter the moon. The cause of the spots or shadows, which appear in that body, is explained to him.

Canto III. In the moon Dante meets with Piccarda, the sister of Forese, who tells him that this planet is allotted to those, who, after having made profession of chastity and a religious life, had been compelled to violate their vows; and she then points out to him the spirit of the Empress Costanza.

Canto IV. While they still continue in the moon, Beatrice removes certain doubts which Dante had conceived respecting the place assigned to the blessed, and respecting the will absolute or conditional. He inquires whether it is possible to make satisfaction for a vow broken.

Canto V. The question proposed in the last Canto is answered. Dante ascends with Beatrice to the planet Mercury, which is the second heaven; and here he finds a multitude of spirits, one of whom offers to satisfy him of anything he may desire to know from them.

Canto VI. The spirit, who had offered to satisfy the inquiries of Dante, declares himself to be the Emperor Justinian; and after speaking of his own actions, recounts the victories, before him, obtained under the Roman Eagle. He then informs our Poet that the soul of Romeo the pilgrim, is in the same star.

Canto VII. In consequence of what had been said by Justinian, who together with the other spirits have now disappeared, some doubts arise in the mind of Dante respecting the human redemption. These difficulties are fully explained by Beatrice.

Canto VIII. The Poet ascends with Beatrice to the third heaven, which is the planet Venus; and ⁵ This order it is, that gives to the universe the form of unity, and therefore of resemblance to God.

⁶ All things, as they have their beginning from the Supreme Being, so are they referred to Him again.

⁷ The empyrean, which is always motionless.

⁸ The primum mobile.

here finds the soul of Charles Martel, King of Hungary, who had been Dante's friend on earth, and who now, after speaking of the realms to which he was heir, unfolds the cause why children differ in disposition from their parents.

Canto IX. The next spirit, who converses with our Poet in the planet Venus, is the amorous Cunizza. To her succeeds Folco, or Folques, the Provençal bard, who declares that the soul of Rahab the harlot is there also; and then, blaming the Pope for his neglect of the holy land, prognosticates some reverse to the papal power.

Canto X. Their next ascent carries them into the sun, which is the fourth heaven. Here they are encompassed with a wreath of blessed spirits, twelve in number. Thomas Aquinas, who is one of these, declares the names and endowments of the rest.

Canto XI. Thomas Aquinas enters at large into the life and character of St. Francis; and then solves one of two difficulties, which he perceived to have risen in Dante's mind from what he had heard in the last Canto.

Canto XII. A second circle of glorified souls encompasses the first. Buonaventura, who is one of them, celebrates the praises of St. Dominic, and informs Dante who the other eleven are, that are in this second circle or garland.

Canto XIII. Thomas Aquinas resumes his speech. He solves the other of those doubts which he discerned in the mind of Dante, and warns him earnestly against assenting to any proposition without having duly examined it.

Canto XIV. Solomon, who is one of the spirits in the inner circle, declares what the appearance of the blest will be after the resurrection of the body. Beatrice and Dante are translated into the fifth heaven, which is that of Mars; and here behold the souls of those who had died fighting for the true faith, ranged in the sign of a cross, athwart which the spirits move to the sound of a melodious hymn.

Canto XV. The spirit of Cacciaguida, our Poet's ancestor, glides rapidly to the foot of the cross; tells who he is; and speaks of the simplicity of the Florentines in his days, since then much corrupted.

Canto XVI. Cacciaguida relates the time of his birth; and, describing the extent of Florence when he lived there, recounts the names of the chief families who then inhabited it. Its degeneracy, and subsequent disgrace, he attributes to the introduction of families from the neighboring country and villages, and to their mixture with the primitive citizens.

Canto XVII. Cacciaguida predicts to our Poet his exile and the calamities he had to suffer; and, lastly, exhorts him to write the present poem.

Canto XVIII. Dante sees the souls of many renowned warriors and crusaders in the planet Mars; and then ascends with Beatrice to Jupiter, the sixth heaven, in which he finds the souls of those who had administered justice rightly in the world, so disposed, as to form the figure of an eagle. The Canto concludes with an invective against the avarice of the clergy, and especially of the pope.

Canto XIX. The eagle speaks as with one voice proceeding from a multitude of spirits, that compose it; and declares the cause for which it is exalted to that state of glory. It then solves a doubt, which our Poet had entertained, respecting the possibility of salvation without belief in Christ; exposes the inefficacy of a mere profession of such belief; and prophesies the evil appearance that many Christian potentates will make at the day of judgment.

Canto XX. The eagle celebrates the praise of certain kings, whose glorified spirits form the eye of the bird. In the pupil is David; and, in the circle round it, Trajan, Hezekiah, Constantine, William II of Sicily, and Ripheus. It explains to our Poet, how the souls of those whom he supposed to have had no means of believing in Christ, came to be in heaven; and concludes with an admonition against presuming to fathom the counsels of God.

Canto XXI. Dante ascends with Beatrice to the seventh heaven, which is the planet Saturn; wherein is placed a ladder, so lofty, that the top of it is out of his sight. Here are the souls of those who had passed their life in holy retirement and contemplation. Piero Damiano comes near them, and answers questions put to him by Dante; then declares who he was on earth; and ends by declaiming against the luxury of pastors and prelates in those times.

Canto XXII. He beholds many other spirits of the devout and contemplative; and amongst these is addressed by St. Benedict, who, after disclosing his own name and the names of certain of his companions in bliss, replies to the request made by our Poet that he might look on the form of the saint, without that covering of splendor, which then invested it; and then proceeds, lastly, to inveigh against the corruption of the monks. Next Dante mounts with his heavenly conductress to the eighth heaven, or that of the fixed stars, which he enters at the constellation of the Twins; and thence looking back, reviews all the space he has past between his present station and the earth.

Canto XXIII. He sees Christ triumphing with His church. The Saviour ascends, followed by His Virgin Mother. The others remain with St. Peter.

Canto XXIV. St. Peter examines Dante touching Faith, and is contented with his answers.

Canto XXV. St. James questions our Poet concerning Hope. Next St. John appears; and, on perceiving that Dante looks intently on him, informs him that he, St. John, had left his body resolved into earth, upon the earth, and that Christ and the Virgin alone had come with their bodies into heaven.

Canto XXVI. St. John examines our Poet touching Charity. Afterwards Adam tells when he was created, and placed in the terrestrial Paradise; how long he remained in that state; what was the occasion of his fall; when he was admitted into heaven; and what language he spake.

Canto XXVII. St. Peter bitterly rebukes the covetousness of his successors in the apostolic see, while all the heavenly host sympathize in his indignation: they then vanish upwards. Beatrice bids Dante again cast his view below. Afterwards they are borne into the ninth heaven, of which she shows him the nature and properties; blaming the perverseness of man, who places his will on low and perishable things.]

Canto XXVIII

ARGUMENT

Still in the ninth heaven, our Poet is permitted to behold the divine essence; and then sees, in three hierarchies, the nine choirs of angels. Beatrice clears some difficulties which occur to him on this occasion.

So she, who doth imparadise my soul,
Had drawn the veil from off our present life,
And bared the truth of poor mortality; 140
When lo! as one who, in a mirror, spies
The shining of a flambeau at his back,
Lit sudden ere he deem of its approach,
And turneth to resolve him, if the glass
Have told him true, and sees the record faithful
As note is to its meter; even thus, 146
I well remember, did befall to me,
Looking upon the beauteous eyes, whence love
Had made the leash to take me. As I turn'd:
And that which none, who in that volume looks,
Can miss of, in itself apparent, struck 151
My view; a point I saw, that darted light

So sharp, no lid, unclosing, may bear up Against its keenness. The least star we ken
From hence, had seem'd a moon; set by its side,
As star by side of star. And so far off, 156
Perchance, as is the halo from the light
Which paints it, when most dense the vapor spreads;

There wheel'd about the point a circle of fire,
More rapid than the motion which surrounds, 160
Speediest, the world. Another this enring'd;
And that a third; the third a fourth, and that
A fifth encompass'd; which a sixth next bound;
And over this, a seventh, following, reach'd
Circumference so ample, that its bow, 165
Within the span of Juno's messenger,⁹
Had scarce been held entire. Beyond the seventh,
Ensued yet other two. And every one,
As more in number distant from the first,
Was tardier in motion: and that glow'd 170
With flame most pure, that to the sparkle of truth,
Was nearest; as partaking most, methinks,
Of its reality. The guide beloved
Saw me in anxious thought suspense, and spake:
"Heaven, and all nature, hangs upon that point
The circle thereto most conjoin'd observe; 176
And know, that by intenser love its course
Is, to this swiftmess, wing'd." To whom I thus:
"It were enough; nor should I further seek,
Had I but witness'd order, in the world 180
Appointed, such as in these wheels is seen.
But in the sensible world such difference is,
That in each round shows more divinity,
As each is wider from the center. Hence,
If in this wondrous and angelic temple, 185
That hath, for confine, only light and love,
My wish may have completion, I must know,
Wherefore such disagreement is between
The exemplar and its copy: for myself,
Contemplating, I fail to pierce the cause." 190
"It is no marvel, if thy fingers foil'd
Do leave the knot untied: so hard 'tis grown
For want of tenting." Thus she said: "But take,"
She added, "if thou wish thy cure, my words,
And entertain them subtly. Every orb, 195
Corporeal, doth proportion its extent
Unto the virtue through its parts diffused.
The greater blessedness preserves the more.
The greater is the body (if all parts
Share equally) the more is to preserve. 200
Therefore the circle, whose swift course enwheels
The universal frame, answers to that
Which is supreme in knowledge and in love.

⁹ Iris, the rainbow.

Puts forth her radiant brow, all, light by light,
 Fade; and the spangled firmament shuts in, 275
 E'en to the loveliest of the glittering throng.
 Thus vanish'd gradually from my sight
 The triumph, which plays ever round the point,
 That overcame me, seeming (for it did)
 Engirt¹⁶ by that it girdeth. Wherefore love, 280
 With loss of other object, forced me bend
 Mine eyes on Beatrice once again.

If all, that hitherto is told of her,
 Were in one praise concluded, 'twere too weak
 To furnish out this turn. Mine eyes did look 285
 On beauty, such, as I believe in sooth,
 Not merely to exceed our human; but,
 That save its Maker, none can to the full
 Enjoy it. At this point o'erpower'd I fail;
 Unequal to my theme; as never bard 290
 Of buskin or of sock hath fail'd before.
 For as the sun doth to the feeblest sight,
 E'en so remembrance of that witching smile
 Hath dispossest my spirit of itself.
 Not from that day, when on this earth I first 295
 Beheld her charms, up to that view of them,
 Have I with song applausive ever ceased
 To follow; but now follow them no more;
 My course here bounded, as each artist's is,
 When it doth touch the limit of his skill. 300

She (such as I bequeath her to the bruit
 Of louder trump than mine, which hasteneth on Urging its arduous matter to the close)
 Her words resumed, in gesture and in voice
 Resembling one accusom'd to command: 305
 "Forth¹⁷ from the last corporeal are we come
 Into the heaven, that is unbodied light;
 Light intellectual, replete with love,
 Love of true happiness, replete with joy;
 Joy, that transcends all sweetness of delight. 310
 Here shalt thou look on either mighty host¹⁸
 Of Paradise; and one in that array,
 Which in the final judgment thou shalt see."

As when the lightning, in a sudden spleen
 Unfolded, dashes from the blinding eyes 315
 The visive spirits, dazzled and bedimm'd;
 So, round about me, fulminating streams
 Of living radiance play'd, and left me swathed
 And veil'd in dense impenetrable blaze.
 Such weal is in the love, that stills this heaven;
 For its own flame the torch thus fitting ever. 321

No sooner to my listening ear had come

The brief assurance, than I understood
 New virtue into me infused, and sight 325
 Kindled afresh, with vigor to sustain
 Excess of light however pure. I look'd;
 And, in the likeness of a river, saw
 Light flowing, from whose amber-seeming waves
 Flash'd up effulgence, as they glided on
 'Twixt banks, on either side, painted with spring,
 Incredible how fair: and, from the tide, 331
 There ever and anon, outstarting, flew
 Sparkles instinct with life; and in the flowers
 Did set them, like to rubies chased in gold:
 Then, as if drunk with odors, plunged again 335
 Into the wondrous flood; from which, as one
 Re-enter'd, still another rose. "The thirst
 Of knowledge high, whereby thou art inflamed,
 To search the meaning of what here thou seest,
 The more it warms thee, pleases me the more.
 But first behoves thee of this water drink, 341
 Or e'er that longing be allay'd." So spake
 The day-star of mine eyes: then thus subjoin'd:
 "This stream; and these, forth issuing from its gulf,

And diving back, a living topaz each; 345
 With all this laughter on its bloomy shores;
 Are but a preface, shadowy of the truth
 They emblem: not that, in themselves, the things
 Are crude; but on thy part is the defect,
 For that thy views not yet aspire so high." 350

Never did babe that had outslept his wont,
 Rush, with such eager straining, to the milk,
 As I toward the water; bending me,
 To make the better mirrors of mine eyes
 In the refining wave: and as the eaves 355
 Of mine eyelids did drink of it, forthwith
 Seem'd it unto me turn'd from length to round.
 Then as a troop of maskers, when they put
 Their vizors off, look other than before;
 The counterfeited semblance thrown aside: 360
 So into greater jubilee were changed
 Those flowers and sparkles; and distinct I saw,
 Before me, either court of heaven display'd.

O prime enlightener! thou who gavest me
 strength
 On the high triumph of thy realm to gaze; 365
 Grant virtue now to utter what I kenn'd.

There is in heaven a light, whose goodly shine
 Makes the Creator visible to all
 Created, that in seeing Him alone

¹⁶ "Appearing to be encompassed by these angelic bands, which are in reality encompassed by it."

¹⁷ From the ninth sphere to the empyrean, which is mere light.

¹⁸ Of angels, that remained faithful, and of beautified souls; the latter in that shape which they will have at the last day.

Have peace; and in a circle spreads so far, 370
 That the circumference were too loose a zone
 To girdle in the sun. All is one beam,
 Reflected from the summit of the first,
 That moves, which being hence and vigor takes.
 And as some cliff, that from the bottom eyes 375
 His image mirror'd in the crystal flood,
 As if to admire his brave appareling
 Of verdure and of flowers; so, round about,
 Eying the light, on more than million thrones,
 Stood, eminent, whatever from our earth 380
 Has to the skies return'd. How wide the leaves,
 Extended to their utmost, of this rose,
 Whose lowest step embosoms such a space
 Of ample radiance! Yet, nor amplitude
 Nor height impeded, but my view with ease 385
 Took in the full dimensions of that joy.
 Near or remote, what there avails, where God
 Immediate rules, and Nature, awed, suspends
 Her sway? Into the yellow of the rose
 Perennial, which, in bright expansiveness, 390
 Lays forth its gradual blooming, redolent
 Of praises to the never-wintering sun,
 As one, who fain would speak yet holds his peace,
 Beatrice led me; and, "Behold," she said,
 "This fair assemblage; stoles of snowy white, 395
 How numberless. The city, where we dwell,
 Behold how vast; and these our seats so throng'd,
 Few now are wanting here. In that proud stall,
 On which, the crown, already o'er its state
 Suspended, holds thine eyes—or e'er thyself 400
 Mayst at the wedding sup,—shall rest the soul
 Of the great Harry,¹⁹ he who, by the world
 Augustus hail'd, to Italy must come,
 Before her day be ripe. But ye are sick,
 And in your tetchy wantonness as blind, 405
 As is the bantling, that of hunger dies,
 And drives away the nurse. Nor may it be,
 That he,²⁰ who in the sacred forum sways,
 Openly or in secret, shall with him
 Accordant walk: whom God will not endure 410
 I' the holy office long; but thrust him down
 To Simon Magus, where Alagna's priest²¹
 Will sink beneath him: such will be his meed."

[Canto XXXI. The Poet expatiates further on the glorious vision described in the last Canto. On looking round for Beatrice, he finds that she has left him, and that an old man is at his side. This proves to be St. Bernard, who shows him that Beatrice has returned to her throne, and then points out to him the blessedness of the Virgin Mother.]

Canto XXXII

ARGUMENT

St. Bernard shows him, on their several thrones, the other blessed souls, both of the Old and New Testament; explains to him that their places are assigned them by grace, and not according to merit; and lastly, tells him that if he would obtain power to descry what remained of the heaven-vision, he must unite with him in supplication to Mary.

Freely the sage, though wrapt in musings high,
 Assumed the teacher's part, and mild began: 415
 "The wound, that Mary closed, she²² open'd first,
 Who sits so beautiful at Mary's feet.
 The third in order, underneath her, lo!
 Rachel with Beatrice: Sarah next;
 Judith; Rebecca; and the gleaner-maid, 420
 Meek ancestress²³ of him, who sang the songs
 Of sore repentance in his sorrowful mood.
 All, as I name them, down from leaf to leaf,
 Are, in gradation, throned on the rose.
 And from the seventh step, successively, 425
 Adown the breathing tresses of the flower,
 Still doth the file of Hebrew dames proceed.
 For these are a partition wall, whereby
 The sacred stairs are sever'd, as the faith
 In Christ divides them. On this part, where blooms
 Each leaf in full maturity, are set 431
 Such as in Christ, or e'er He came, believed.
 On the other, where an intersected space
 Yet shows the semicircle void, abide
 All they, who look'd to Christ already come. 435
 And as our Lady on her glorious stool,
 And they who on their stools beneath her sit,
 This way distinction make; e'en so on his,
 The mighty Baptist, that way marks the line,
 (He who endured the desert, and the pains 440
 Of martyrdom, and, for two years,²⁴ of hell,
 Yet still continued holy), and beneath,
 Augustine; ²⁵ Francis; Benedict; and the rest,

Thus far from round to round. So heaven's decree
Forecasts, this garden equally to fill, 445
With faith in either view, past or to come.
Learn too, that downward from the step, which cleaves,

Midway, the twain compartments, none there are
Who place obtain for merit of their own,
But have through others' merit been advanced,
On set conditions; spirits all released, 451
Ere for themselves they had the power to choose.
And, if thou mark and listen to them well,
Their childish looks and voice declare as much.

"Here, silent as thou art, I know thy doubt; 455
And gladly will I loose the knot, wherein Thy subtle thoughts have bound thee. From this realm

Excluded, chance no entrance here may find;
No more than hunger, thirst, or sorrow can.
A law immutable hath stablish'd all; 460
Nor is there aught thou seest, that doth not fit,
Exactly, as the finger to the ring.

It is not, therefore, without cause, that these,
O'erspeedy comers to immortal life,
Are different in their shares of excellence. 465
Our Sovran Lord, that settlETH this estate
In love and in delight so absolute,
That wish can dare no further, every soul,
Created in His joyous sight to dwell,
With grace, at pleasure, variously endows. 470
And for a proof the effect may well suffice.
And 'tis moreover most expressly mark'd
In holy Scripture, where the twins are said
To have struggled in the womb. Therefore, as grace

Inweaves the coronet, so every brow 475
Weareth its proper hue of orient light.
And merely in respect to His prime gift,
Not in reward of meritorious deed,
Hath each his several degree assign'd.
In early times with their own innocence 480
More was not wanting, than the parents' faith,
To save them: those first ages past, behoved
That circumcision in the males should imp
The flight of innocent wings: but since the day
Of grace hath come, without baptismal rites 485
In Christ accomplish'd, innocence herself
Must linger yet below. Now raise thy view
Unto the visage most resembling Christ:
For, in her splendor only, shalt thou win
The power to look on Him." Forthwith I saw 490
Such floods of gladness on her visage shower'd,
From holy spirits, winging that profound;

That, whatsoever I had yet beheld,
Had not so much suspended me with wonder,
Or shown me such similitude of God. 495
And he, who had to her descended, once,
On earth, now hail'd in heaven; and on poised wing,

"Ave, Maria, Gratia Plena," sang:
To whose sweet anthem all the blissful court,
From all parts answering, rang: that holier joy
Brooded the deep serene. "Father revered! 501
Who deign'st, for me, to quit the pleasant place
Wherein thou sittest, by eternal lot;
Say, who that angel is, that with such glee
Beholds our queen, and so enamor'd glows 505
Of her high beauty, that all fire he seems."

So I again resorted to the lore
Of my wise teacher, he, whom Mary's charms
Embellish'd, as the sun the morning star;
Who thus in answer spake: "In him are summ'd,
Whate'er of buxomness and free delight 511
May be in spirit, or in angel, met:
And so beseems: for that he bare the palm
Down unto Mary, when the Son of God
Vouchsafed to clothe him in terrestrial weeds. 515
Now let thine eyes wait heedful on my words;
And note thou of this just and pious realm
The chiefest nobles. Those, highest in bliss,
The twain, on each hand next our empress
throned,

Are as it were two roots unto this rose: 520
He to the left, the parent, whose rash taste
Proves bitter to his seed; and, on the right,
That ancient father of the holy church,
Into whose keeping Christ did give the keys
Of this sweet flower; near whom behold the seer,²⁶
That, ere he died, saw all the grievous times 526
Of the fair bride, who with the lance and nails
Was won. And, near unto the other, rests
The leader, under whom, on manna, fed
The ungrateful nation, fickle and perverse. 530
On the other part, facing to Peter, lo!
Where Anna sits, so well content to look
On her loved daughter, that with moveless eye
She chants the loud hosanna: while, opposed
To the first father of your mortal kind, 535
Is Lucia, at whose hest thy lady sped,
When on the edge of ruin closed thine eye.

"But (for the vision hasteneth to an end)
Here break we off, as the good workman doth,
That shapes the cloak according to the cloth; 540
And to the primal love our ken shall rise;
That thou mayst penetrate the brightness, far

²⁶ St. John.

As sight can bear thee. Yet, alas! in sooth
 Beating thy pennons, thinking to advance, Thou backward fall'st. Grace then must first be gain'd, 545
 Her grace, whose might can help thee. Thou in prayer
 Seek her: and, with affection, whilst I sue,
 Attend, and yield me all thy heart." He said;
 And thus the saintly orison began.

Canto XXXIII

ARGUMENT

St. Bernard supplicates the Virgin Mary that Dante may have grace given him to contemplate the brightness of the Divine Majesty, which is accordingly granted; and Dante then himself prays to God for ability to show forth some part of the celestial glory in his writings. Lastly, he is admitted to a glimpse of the great mystery; the Trinity, and the Union of Man with God.

"O virgin mother, daughter of thy Son! 550
 Created beings all in lowliness
 Surpassing, as in height above them all;
 Term by the eternal counsel pre-ordain'd;
 Ennobler of thy nature, so advanced
 In thee, that its great Maker did not scorn, 555
 To make Himself His own creation,
 For in thy womb rekindling shone the love
 Reveal'd, whose genial influence makes now
 This flower to germin in eternal peace:
 Here thou to us, of charity and love, 560
 Art, as the noon-day torch; and art, beneath,
 To mortal men, of hope a living spring.
 So mighty art thou, lady, and so great,
 That he, who grace desireth, and comes not
 To thee for aidance, fain would have desire 565
 Fly without wings. Not only him, who asks,
 Thy bounty succors; but doth freely oft Forerun the asking. Whatso'er may be
 Of excellence in creature, pity mild,
 Relenting mercy, large munificence, 570
 Are all combined in thee. Here kneeleth one,
 Who of all spirits hath review'd the state,
 From the world's lowest gap unto this height.
 Suppliant to thee he kneels, imploring grace
 For virtue yet more high, to lift his ken 575
 Toward the bliss supreme. And I, who ne'er
 Coveted sight, more fondly, for myself,
 Than now for him, my prayers to thee prefer,
 (And pray they be not scant), that thou wouldst drive

Each cloud of his mortality away, 580
 Through thine own prayers, that on the sovran joy
 Unveil'd he gaze. This yet, I pray thee, Queen,
 Who canst do what thou wilt; that in him thou
 Wouldst, after all he hath beheld, preserve
 Affection sound, and human passions quell. 585
 Lo! where, with Beatrice, many a saint Stretch their clasp'd hands, in furtherance of my suit."

The eyes, that heaven with love and awe regards,
 Fix'd on the suitor, witness'd, how benign
 She looks on pious prayers: then fasten'd they 590
 On the everlasting light, wherein no eye
 Of creature, as may well be thought, so far
 Can travel inward. I, meanwhile, who drew
 Near to the limit, where all wishes end,
 The ardor of my wish (for so behoved) 595
 Ended within me. Beckoning smiled the sage,
 That I should look aloft: but, ere he bade,
 Already of myself aloft I look'd;
 For visual strength, refining more and more,
 Bare me into the ray authenticall 600
 Of sovran light. Thenceforward, what I saw,
 Was not for words to speak, nor memory's self
 To stand against such outrage on her skill.

As one, who from a dream awaken'd, straight,
 All he hath seen forgets; yet still retains 605
 Impression of the feeling in his dream;
 E'en such am I: for all the vision dies,
 As 'twere, away; and yet the sense of sweet,
 That sprang from it, still trickles in my heart.
 Thus in the sun-thaw is the snow unscal'd; 610
 Thus in the winds on flitting leaves was lost
 The Sibyl's sentence. O eternal beam!
 (Whose height what reach of mortal thought may soar?)

Yield me again some little particle
 Of what thou then appearedst; give my tongue
 Power, but to leave one sparkle of thy glory, 616
 Unto the race to come, that shall not lose
 Thy triumph wholly, if thou waken aught
 Of memory in me, and endure to hear
 The record sound in this unequal strain. 620

Such keenness from the living ray I met,
 That, if mine eyes had turn'd away, methinks,
 I had been lost; but, so embolden'd, on
 I pass'd, as I remember, till my view
 Hover'd the brink of dread infinitude. 625

O grace, unenvying of thy boon! that gavest
 Boldness to fix so earnestly my ken
 On the everlasting splendor, that I look'd,
 While sight was unconsumed; and, in that depth,

Saw in one volume clasp'd of love, whate'er 630
 The universe unfolds; all properties
 Of substance and of accident, beheld,
 Compounded, yet one individual light
 The whole. And of such bond methinks I saw
 The universal form; for that whene'er 635
 I do but speak of it, my soul dilates
 Beyond her proper self; and, till I speak,
 One moment seems a longer lethargy,
 Than five-and-twenty ages had appear'd
 To that emprise, that first made Neptune wonder
 At Argo's shadow darkening on his flood. 641
 With fixed heed, suspense and motionless,
 Wondering I gazed; and admiration still
 Was kindled as I gazed. It may not be,
 That one, who looks upon that light, can turn
 To other object, willingly, his view, 646
 For all the good, that will may covet, there
 Is summ'd; and all, elsewhere defective found,
 Complete. My tongue shall utter now, no more E'en what remembrance keeps, than could the babe's 650
 That yet is moisten'd at his mother's breast.
 Not that the semblance of the living light
 Was changed (that ever as at first remain'd),
 But that my vision quickening, in that sole
 Appearance, still new miracles descried, 655
 And toil'd me with the change. In that abyss

Of radiance, clear and lofty, seem'd, methought,
 Three orbs of triple hue, clipt in one bound:²⁷
 And, from another, one reflected seem'd,
 As rainbow is from rainbow: and the third 660
 Seem'd fire, breathed equally from both. O speech!
 How feeble and how faint art thou, to give Conception birth. Yet this to what I saw
 Is less than little. O eternal light!
 Sole in thyself that dwell'st; and of thyself 665
 Sole understood, past, present, or to come;
 Thou smiledst, on that circling,²⁸ which in thee
 Seem'd as reflected splendor, while I mused;
 For I therein, methought, in its own hue
 Beheld our image painted: stedfastly 670
 I therefore pored upon the view. As one,
 Who versed in geometric lore, would fain
 Measure the circle; and though pondering long
 And deeply, that beginning, which he needs,
 Finds not: e'en such was I, intent to scan 675
 The novel wonder, and trace out the form,
 How to the circle fitted, and therein
 How placed: but the flight was not for my wing;
 Had not a flash darted athwart my mind,
 And, in the spleen, unfolded what it sought. 680
 Here vigor fail'd the towering fantasy:
 But yet the will roll'd onward, like a wheel,
 In even motion, by the love impell'd,
 That moves the sun in heaven and all the stars.

Ladies that have intelligence in love,
 Of mine own lady I would speak with you;
 Not that I hope to count her praises through,
 But telling what I may, to ease my mind.
 And I declare that when I speak thereof, 5
 Love sheds such perfect sweetness over me
 That if my courage failed not, certainly
 To him my listeners must be all resign'd.
 Wherefore I will not speak in such large kind
 That mine own speech should foil me, which were base; 10
 But only will discourse of her high grace
 In these poor words, the best that I can find,
 With you alone, dear dames and damozels:
 'Twere ill to speak thereof with any else.

An angel, of his blessed knowledge, saith 15
 To God: "Lord, in the world that Thou hast made,
 A miracle in action is display'd,
 By reason of a soul whose splendors fare
 Even hither: and since Heaven requireth
 Nought saving her, for her it prayeth Thee, 20
 Thy Saints crying aloud continually."
 Yet Pity still defends our earthly share
 In that sweet soul; God answering thus the prayer:
 "My well-belovèd, suffer that in peace
 Your hope remain, while so My pleasure is, 25
 There where one dwells who dreads the loss of her:
 And who in Hell unto the doomed shall say,

II

My lady is desired in the high Heaven:
Wherefore, it now behoveth me to tell, 30
Saying: Let any maid that would be well
Esteemed keep with her: for as she goes by,
Into foul hearts a deathly chill is driven
By Love, that makes ill thought to perish there:
While any who endures to gaze on her 35
Must either be ennobled, or else die.
When one deserving to be raised so high
Is found, 'tis then her power attains its proof,
Making his heart strong for his soul's behoof
With the full strength of meek humility. 40
Also this virtue owns she, by God's will:
Who speaks with her can never come to ill.

Love saith concerning her: "How chanceth it
That flesh, which is of dust, should be thus pure?"
Then, gazing always, he makes oath: "Forsure, 45
This is a creature of God till now unknown."
She hath that paleness of the pearl that's fit
In a fair woman, so much and not more;
She is as high as Nature's skill can soar;
Beauty is tried by her comparison. 50
Whatever her sweet eyes are turned upon,
Spirits of love do issue thence in flame,
Which through their eyes who then may look on them
Pierce to the heart's deep chamber every one.
And in her smile Love's image you may see; 55
Whence none can gaze upon her steadfastly.

Dear Song, I know thou wilt hold gentle speech
With many ladies, when I send thee forth:
Wherefore (being mindful that thou hadst thy birth
From Love, and art a modest, simple child,) 60
Whomso thou meetest, say thou this to each:
"Give me good speed! To her I went along
In whose much strength my weakness is made strong."
And if, i' the end, thou wouldst not be beguiled
Of all thy labor seek not the defiled 65
And common sort; but rather choose to be
Where man and woman dwell in courtesy.
So to the road thou shalt be reconciled,
And find the Lady, and with the lady, Love.
Commend thou me to each, as doth behave. 70

Love and the gentle heart are one same thing,
Even as the wise man in his ditty saith:
Each, of itself, would be such life in death
As rational soul bereft of reasoning.
'Tis Nature makes them when she loves: a king
Love is, whose palace where he sojourneth
Is called the Heart; there draws he quiet breath
At first, with brief or longer slumbering.
Then beauty seen in virtuous womankind
Will make the eyes desire, and through the heart
Send the desiring of the eyes again;
Where often it abides so long enshrin'd
That Love at length out of his sleep will start.
And women feel the same for worthy men.

18

Love hath so long possessed me for his own
And made his lordship so familiar
That he, who at first irked me, is now grown Unto my heart as its best secrets are.
And thus, when he is such sore wise doth mar
My life that all its strength seems gone from it,
Mine inmost being then feels thoroughly quit
Of anguish, and all evil keeps afar.
Love also gathers to such power in me
That my sighs speak, each one a grievous thing,
Always soliciting
My lady's salutation piteously.
Whenever she beholds me, it is so,
Who is more sweet than any words can show.

19

The eyes that weep for pity of the heart
Have wept so long that their grief languisheth,
And they have no more tears to weep withal:
And now, if I would ease me of a part
Of what, little by little, leads to death, 5
It must be done by speech, or not at all.
And because often, thinking, I recall
How it was pleasant, ere she went afar,
To talk of her with you, kind damozels,
I talk with no one else, 10
But only with such hearts as women's are.
And I will say,—still sobbing as speech fails,—
That she hath gone to Heaven suddenly,
And hath left Love below, to mourn with me.

Beatrice is gone up into high Heaven, 15
The kingdom where the angels are at peace;

And lives with them: and to her friends is dead.
Not by the frost of winter was she driven
Away, like others; nor by summer-heats;
But through a perfect gentleness, instead. 20
For from the lamp of her meek lowlihead
Such an exceeding glory went up hence
That it woke wonder in the Eternal Sire,
Until a sweet desire
Entered Him for that lovely excellence, 25
So that He bade her to Himself aspire;
Counting this weary and most evil place
Unworthy of a thing so full of grace.

Wonderfully out of the beautiful form
Soared her clear spirit, waxing glad the while; 30
And is in its first home, there where it is.
Who speaks thereof, and feels not the tears warm
Upon his face, must have become so vile
As to be dead to all sweet sympathies.
Out upon him! an abject wretch like this 35
May not imagine anything of her,—
He needs no bitter tears for his relief.
But sighing comes, and grief,
And the desire to find no comforter,
(Save only Death, who makes all sorrow brief,)
To him who for a while turns in his thought 41
How she hath been among us, and is not.

With sighs my bosom always laboreth
In thinking, as I do continually,
Of her for whom my heart now breaks apace;
And very often when I think of death, 46
Such a great inward longing comes to me
That it will change the color of my face;
And, if the idea settles in its place,
All my limbs shake as with an ague-fit: 50
Till, starting up in wild bewilderment,
I do become so shent
That I go forth, lest folk misdoubt of it.
Afterward, calling with a sore lament
On Beatrice, I ask, "Canst thou be dead?" 55
And calling on her, I am comforted.

Grief with its tears, and anguish with its sighs,
Come to me now when'er I am alone;
So that I think the sight of me gives pain.
And what my life hath been, that living dies, 60
Since for my lady the New Birth's begun,
I have not any language to explain.

And so, dear ladies, though my heart were fain,
I scarce could tell indeed how I am thus.
All joy is with my bitter life at war; 65
Yea, I am fallen so far
That all men seem to say, "Go out from us," Eyeing my cold white lips, how dead they are.
But she, though I be bowed unto the dust,
Watches me; and will guerdon me, I trust. 70

Weep, pitiful Song of mine, upon thy way,
To the dames going and the damozels
For whom and for none else
Thy sisters have made music many a day.
Thou, that art very sad and not as they, 75
Go dwell thou with them as a mourner dwells.

26

A gentle thought there is will often start,
Within my secret self, to speech of thee:
Also of Love it speaks so tenderly
That much in me consents and takes its part.
"And what is this," the soul saith to the heart,
"That cometh thus to comfort thee and me,
And thence where it would dwell, thus potently
Can drive all other thoughts by its strange art?"
And the heart answers: "Be no more at strife
'Twixt doubt and doubt: this is Love's messenger
And speaketh but his words, from him received;
And all the strength it owns and all the life
It draweth from the gentle eyes of her
Who, looking on our grief, hath often grieved."

29

Beyond the sphere which spreads to widest space
Now soars the sigh that my heart sends above;
A new perception born of grieving Love
Guideth it upward the untrodden ways.
When it hath reached unto the end, and stays,
It sees a lady round whom splendors move
In homage; till, by the great light thereof
Abashed, the pilgrim spirit stands at gaze.
It sees her such, that when it tells me this
Which it hath seen, I understand it not,
It hath a speech so subtle and so fine.
And yet I know its voice within my thought
Often remembereth me of Beatrice:
So that I understand it, ladies mine.

PETRARCH

Love's Inconsistency

I find no peace, and all my war is done;
 I fear and hope, I burn and freeze likewise;
 I fly above the wind, yet cannot rise;
 And nought I have, yet all the world I seize on;
 That looseth, nor locketh, holdeth me in prison, 5
 And holds me not, yet can I 'scape no wise;
 Nor lets me live, nor die, at my devise,
 And yet of death it giveth none occasion.
 Without eyes I see, and without tongue I plain;
 I wish to perish, yet I ask for health; 10
 I love another, and yet I hate myself;
 I feed in sorrow, and laugh in all my pain;
 Lo, thus displeaseth me both death and life,
 And my delight is causer of my grief.

Summer Is Come

The soote season, that bud and bloom forth brings
 With green hath clad the hill, and eke the vale.
 The nightingale with feathers new she sings;
 The turtle to her mate hath told her tale.
 Summer is come, for every spray now springs; 5
 The hart has hung his old head on the pale;
 The buck in brake his winter coat he flings;
 The fishes flete with new repaired scale;
 The adder all her slough away she slings;
 The swift swallow pursueth the flies smale; 10
 The busy bee her honey now she mings.
 Winter is worn that was the flowers' bale,
 And thus I see among these pleasant things
 Each care decays, and yet my sorrow springs!

*A Complaint by Night of the Lover
Not Beloved*

Alas, so all things now do hold their peace!
 Heaven and earth disturbèd in no thing;
 The beasts, the air, the birds their song do cease,
 The nightè car the stars about doth bring;
 Calm is the sea; the waves work less and less: 5
 So am not I, whom love, alas! doth wring,
 Bringing before my face the great increase
 Of my desires, whereat I weep and sing,
 In joy and woe, as in a doubtful case.
 For my sweet thoughts sometime do pleasure
 bring; 10
 But by and by, the cause of my disease
 Gives me a pang that inwardly doth sting,
 When that I think what grief it is again
 To live and lack the thing should rid my pain.

Sonnet VIOf His Foolish Passion for Laura

My tameless will doth recklessly pursue
 Her, who, unshackled by love's heavy chain,
 Flies swiftly from its chase, whilst I in vain
 My fetter'd journey pantingly renew;
 The safer track I offer to its view, 5
 But hopeless is my power to restrain,
 It rides regardless of the spur or rein;
 Love makes it scorn the hand that would subdue.
 The triumph won, the bridle all its own, 10
 Without one curb I stand within its power,
 And my destruction helplessly presage:
 It guides me to that laurel, ever known,
 To all who seek the healing of its flower,
 To aggravate the wound it should assuage.

Sonnet XIHe Hopes That Time Will Render Her More Merciful

Lady, if grace to me so long be lent
 From love's sharp tyranny and trials keen,
 Ere my last days, in life's far vale, are seen,
 To know of thy bright eyes the luster spent,
 The fine gold of thy hair with silver sprent, 5
 Neglected the gay wreaths and robes of green,
 Pale, too, and thin the face which made me, e'en
 'Gainst injury, slow and timid to lament:
 Then will I, for such boldness love would give,
 Lay bare my secret heart, in martyr's fire 10
 Years, days, and hours that yet has known to live;
 And, though the time then suit not fair desire,
 At least there may arrive to my long grief,
 Too late of tender sighs the poor relief.

Sonnet XVIIIThe Praises of Laura Transcend His Poetic Power

Ashamed at times that I am silent, yet,
 Lady, though your rare beauties prompt my rhyme,
 When first I saw thee I recall the time
 Such as again no other can be met.
 But, with such burthen on my shoulders set. 5
 My mind, its frailty feeling, cannot climb,
 And shrinks alike from polish'd and sublime,
 While my vain utterance frozen terrors let.
 Often already have I sought to sing,
 But midway in my breast the voice was stay'd, 10
 For ah! so high what praise may ever spring?
 And oft have I the tender verse essay'd,
 But still in vain; pen, hand, and intellect
 In the first effort conquer'd are and check'd.

BOCCACCIO

The DecameronIntroduction

In 1348 in the illustrious city of Florence, the fairest of all the cities of Italy, there made its appearance that deadly pestilence, which, whether disseminated by the influence of the celestial bodies, or sent upon us mortals by God in His just wrath by way of retribution for our iniquities, had had its origin some years before in the East, whence, after destroying an innumerable multitude of living beings, it had propagated itself without respite from place to place, and so, calamitously, had spread into the West.

In Florence, despite all that human wisdom and forethought could devise to avert it, as the cleansing of the city from many impurities by officials appointed for the purpose, the refusal of entrance to all sick folk, and the adoption of many precautions for the preservation of health; despite also humble supplications addressed to God, and often 20 repeated both in public procession and otherwise, by the devout; towards the beginning of the spring of the said year the doleful effects of the pestilence began to be horribly apparent by symptoms that showed as if miraculous.

Not such were they as in the East, where an issue of blood from the nose was a manifest sign of inevitable death; but in men and women alike it first betrayed itself by the emergence of certain tumors in the groin or the armpits, some of which grew as large as a common apple, others as an egg, some more, some less, which the common folk called gavoccioli. From the two said parts of the body this deadly gavoccioli soon began to propagate and spread itself in all directions indifferently; after which the form of the malady began to change, black spots or livid making their appearance in many cases on the arm or the thigh or elsewhere, now few and large, now minute and numerous. And as the gavocciolo had been and Giovanni Boccaccio (1313-1375) was born in Paris of a French mother and Florentine father but soon went to Italy, where he had a notable literary career in Naples and Florence. Though all his poems were well received in his own day, his fame rests on his Decameron, with its setting of the plague which carried off more than half the population in 1348.

still was an infallible token of approaching death, such also were these spots on whomsoever they showed themselves. . . .

Irksome it is to myself to rehearse in detail so sorrowful a history. Wherefore, being minded to pass over so much thereof as I fairly can, I say, that our city being thus well-nigh depopulated, it so happened, as I afterwards learned from one worthy of credit, that on a Tuesday morning after Divine Service the venerable church of Santa Maria Novella was almost deserted save for the presence of seven young ladies habited sadly in keeping with the season. All were connected either by blood or at least as friends or neighbors; and fair and of good understanding were they all, as also of noble birth, gentle manners, and a modest sprightliness. In age none exceeded twenty-eight, or fell short of eighteen years. Their names I would set down in due form, had I not good reason to withhold them, being solicitous lest the matters which here ensue, as told and heard by them, should in after-time be occasion of reproach to any of them, in view of the ample indulgence which was then, for the reasons heretofore set forth, accorded to the lighter hours of persons of much riper years than they, but which the manners of today have somewhat restricted; nor would I furnish material to detractors, ever ready to bestow their bite where praise is due, to cast by invidious speech the least slur upon the honor of these noble ladies. Wherefore, that what each says may be apprehended without confusion, I intend to give them names more or less appropriate to the character of each. The first, then, being the eldest of the seven, we will call Pampinea, the second Fiammetta, the third Filomena, the fourth Emilia, the fifth we will distinguish as Lauretta, the sixth as Neifile, and the last, not without reason, shall be named Elisa.

'Twas not of set purpose but by mere chance that these ladies met in the same part of the church; but at length grouping themselves into a sort of circle, after heaving a few sighs, they gave up saying paternosters, and began to converse (among other topics) on the times.

So they continued for a while, and then Pampinea, the rest listening in silent attention, thus began:—"Dear ladies mine, often have I heard it said, and you doubtless as well as I, that wrong is done to none by whoso but honestly uses his reason. And to fortify, preserve, and defend his life to the utmost of his power is the dictate of natural reason in everyone that is born. Which right is accorded in such measure that in defense thereof men have been held blameless in taking life. And if this be allowed by the laws, albeit on their stringency depends the well-being of every mortal, how much more exempt from censure should we, and all other honest folk, be in taking such means as we may for the preservation of our life? As often as I bethink me how we have been occupied this morning, and not this morning only, and what has been the tenor of our conversation, I perceive—and you will readily do the like—that each of us is apprehensive on her own account; nor thereat do I marvel, but at this I do marvel greatly, that, though none of us lacks a woman's wit, yet none of us has recourse to any means to avert that which we all justly fear. Here we tarry, as if, methinks, for no other purpose than to bear witness to the number of the corpses that are brought hither for interment, or to hearken if the brothers there within, whose number is now almost reduced to nought, chant their offices at the canonical hours, or, by our weeds of woe, to obtrude on the attention of everyone that enters, the nature and degree of our sufferings.

"And if we quit the church, we see dead or sick folk carried about, or we see those, who for their crimes were of late condemned to exile by the outraged majesty of the public laws, but who now, in contempt of those laws, well knowing that their ministers are a prey to death or disease, have returned, and traverse the city in packs, making it hideous with their riotous antics; or else we see the refuse of the people, fostered on our blood, becchini, as they call themselves, who for our torment go prancing about here and there and everywhere, making mock of our miseries in scurrilous songs. Nor hear we aught but:—Such and such are dead; or, Such and such are dying; and should hear dolorous wailing on every hand, were there but any to wail. Or go we home, what see we there? I know not if you are in like case with me; but there, where once were servants in plenty, I find none left but my maid, and shudder with terror, and feel the very hairs of my head to stand on end; and turn or tarry where I may, I encounter the ghosts of the departed, not with their wonted mien, but with something horrible in their aspect that appalls me. For which reasons church and street and home are alike distressful to me, and the more so that none, methinks, having means and place of retirement as we have, abides here save only we; or if any such there be, they are of those, as my senses too often have borne witness, who make no distinction between things honorable and their opposites, so they but answer the cravings of appetite, and, alone or in company, do daily and nightly what things soever give promise of most gratification. Nor are these secular persons alone; but such as live recluse in monasteries break their rule, and give themselves up to carnal pleasures, persuading themselves that they are permissible to them, and only forbidden to others, and, thereby thinking to escape, are become unchaste and dissolute. If such be our circumstances—and such most manifestly they are—what do we here? what wait we for? what dream we of? why are we less prompt to provide for our own safety than the rest of the citizens? Is life less dear to us than to all other women? or think we that the bond which unites Soul and body in us is stronger than in others, so that there is no blow that may light upon it, of which we need be apprehensive? If so, we err, we are deceived. What insensate folly were it in us so to believe! We have but to call to mind the number and condition of those, young as we, and of both sexes, who have succumbed to this cruel pestilence, to find therein conclusive evidence to the contrary. And lest from lethargy or indolence we fall into the vain imagination that by some lucky accident we may in some way or another, when we would, escape—I know not if your opinion accord with mine—I should deem it most wise in us, our case being what it is, if, as many others have done before us, and are still doing, we were to quit this place, and, shunning like death the evil example of others, betake ourselves to the country, and there live as honorable women on one of the estates, of which none of us has any lack, with all cheer of festal gathering and other delights, so long as in no particular we overstep the bounds of reason. There we shall hear the chant of birds, have sight of verdant hills and plains, of cornfields undulating like the sea, of trees of a thousand sorts; there also we shall have a larger view of the heavens, which, however harsh to usward, yet deny not their eternal beauty; things fairer far for eye to rest on than the desolate walls of our city. Moreover, we shall there breathe a fresher air, find ampler store of things meet for such as live in these times, have fewer causes of annoy. For, though the husbandmen die there, even as here the citizens, they are dispersed in scattered homesteads, and 'tis thus less painful to witness. Nor, so far as I can see, is there a soul here whom we shall desert; rather we may truly say, that we are ourselves deserted; for, our kinsfolk being either dead or fled in fear of death, no more regardful of us than if we were strangers, we are left alone in our great affliction. No censure, then, can fall on us if we do as I propose; and otherwise grievous suffering, perhaps death, may ensue. Wherefore, if you agree, 'tis my advice, that, attended by our maids with all things needful, we sojourn, now on this, now on the other estate, and in such way of life continue, until we see—if death should not first overtake us—the end which Heaven reserves for these events. And I remind you that it will be at least as seemly in us to leave with honor, as in others, of whom there are not a few, to stay with dishonor."

The other ladies praised Pampinea's plan, and indeed were so prompt to follow it that they had already begun to discuss the manner in some detail, as if they were forthwith to rise from their seats and take the road, when Filomena, whose judgment was excellent, interposed, saying:—"Ladies, though Pampinea has spoken to most excellent effect, yet it were not well to be so precipitate as you seem disposed to be. Bethink you that we are all women; nor is there any here so young, but she is of years to understand how women are minded towards one another, when they are alone together, and how ill they are able to rule themselves without the guidance of some man. We are sensitive, perverse, suspicious, pusillanimous and timid; wherefore I much misdoubt, that, if we find no other guidance than our own, this company is like to break up sooner, and with less credit to us, than it should. Against which it were well to provide at the outset." Said then Elisa:—"Without doubt man is woman's head, and, without man's governance, it is seldom that aught that we do is brought to a commendable conclusion. But how are we to come by the men? Every one of us here knows that her kinsmen are for the most part dead, and that the survivors are dispersed, one here, one there, we know not where, bent each on escaping the same fate as ourselves; nor were it seemly to seek the aid of strangers; for, as we are in quest of health, we must find some means so to order matters that, wherever we seek diversion or repose, trouble and scandal do not follow us."

While the ladies were thus conversing, there came into the church three young men, young, I say, but not so young that the age of the youngest was less than twenty-five years; in whom neither the sinister course of events, nor the loss of friends or kinsfolk, nor fear for their own safety, had availed to quench, or even temper, the ardor of their love. The first was called Pamfilo, the second Filostrato, and the third Dioneo. Very debonair and chivalrous were they all; and in this troublesome time they were seeking if haply, to their exceeding great solace, they might have sight of their fair friends, all three of whom chanced to be among the said seven ladies, besides some that were of kin to the young men. At one and the same moment they recognized the ladies and were recognized by them: wherefore, with a gracious smile, Pampinea thus began:—"Lo, fortune is propitious to our enterprise, having vouchsafed us the good offices of these young men, who are as gallant as they are discreet, and will gladly give us their guidance and escort, so we but take them into our service." Whereupon Nefile, crimson from brow to neck with the blush of modesty, being one of those that had a lover among the young men, said:—"For God's sake, Pampinea, have a care what you say. Well assured am I that nought but good can be said of any of them, and I deem them fit for office far more onerous than this which you propose for them, and their good and honorable company worthy of ladies fairer by far and more tenderly to be cherished than such as we. But 'tis no secret that they love some of us here; wherefore I misdoubt that, if we take them with us, we may thereby give occasion for scandal and censure merited neither by us nor by them." "That," said Filomena, "is of no consequence; so I but live honestly, my conscience gives me no disquietude; if other asperse me, God and the truth will take arms in my defense. Now, should they be disposed to attend us, of a truth we might say with Pampinea, that fortune favors our enterprise." The silence which followed betokened consent on the part of the other ladies, who then with one accord resolved to call the young men, and acquaint them with their purpose, and pray them to be of their company. So without further parley Pampinea, who had kinsman among the young men, rose and approached them where they stood intently regarding them; and greeting them gaily, she opened to them their plan, and besought them on the part of herself and her friends to join their company on terms of honorable and fraternal comradeship. At first the young men thought she did but trifle with them; but when they saw that she was in earnest, they answered with alacrity that they were ready, and promptly, even before they left the church, set matters in train for their departure. So all things meet being first sent forward in due order to their intended place of sojourn, the ladies with some of their maids, and the three young men, each attended by a man-servant, sallied forth of the city on the morrow, being Wednesday, about daybreak, and took the road; nor had they journeyed more than two short miles when they arrived at their destination. The estate lay upon a little hill some distance from the nearest highway, and, embowered in shrubberies of divers hues, and other greenery, afforded the eye a pleasant prospect. On the summit of the hill was a palace with galleries, halls and chambers, disposed around a fair and spacious court, each very fair in itself, and the goodlier to see for the glad-some pictures with which it was adorned; the whole set amidst meads and gardens laid out with marvelous art, wells of the coolest water, and the vaults of the finest wines, things more suited to dainty drinkers than to sober and honorable women. On their arrival the company, to their no small delight, found their beds already made, the rooms well swept and garnished with flowers of every sort that the season could afford, and the floors carpeted with rushes. When they were seated, Dioneo, a gallant who had not his match for courtesy and wit, spoke thus:—"My ladies, 'tis not our forethought so much as your own mother-wit that has guided us hither. How you mean to dispose of your cares I know not; mine I left behind me within the city-gate when I issued thence with you a brief while ago. Wherefore, I pray you, either address yourselves to make merry, to laugh and sing with me (so far, I mean, as may consist with your dignity), or give me leave to hie me back to the stricken city, there to abide with my cares." To whom blithely Pampinea replied, as if she too had cast off all her cares:—"Well sayest thou, Dioneo, excellent well; gaily we mean to live; 'twas a refuge from sorrow that here we sought, nor had we other cause to come hither. But, as no anarchy can long endure, I who initiated the deliberations of which this fair company is the fruit, do now, to the end that our joy may be lasting, deem it expedient, that there be one among us in chief authority, honored and obeyed by us as our superior, whose exclusive care it shall be to devise how we may pass our time blithely. And that each in turn may prove the weight of the care, as well as enjoy the pleasure, of sovereignty, and, no distinction being made of sex, envy be felt by none by reason of exclusion from the office; I propose, that the weight and honor be borne by each one for a day; and let the first to bear sway be chosen by us all, those that follow to be appointed towards the vesper hour by him or her who shall have had the signory for that day; and let each holder of the signory be, for the time, sole arbiter of the place and manner in which we are to pass our time."

Pampinea's speech was received with the utmost applause, and with one accord she was chosen queen for the first day. Whereupon Filomena hied her lightly to a bay tree, having often heard of the great honor in which its leaves, and such as were deservedly crowned therewith, were worthy to be holden; and having gathered a few sprays, she made thereof a goodly wreath of honor, and set it on Pampinea's head; which wreath was thenceforth, while their company endured, the visible sign of the wearer's sway and sovereignty.

No sooner was Queen Pampinea crowned than she bade all be silent. She then caused summon to her presence their four maids, and the servants of the three young men, and, all keeping silence, said to them:—"That I may show you all at once, how, well still giving place to better, our company may flourish and endure, as long as it shall pleasure us, with order meet and assured delight and without reproach, I first of all constitute Dioneo's man Parmeno, my seneschal, and intrust him with the care and control of all our household, and all that belongs to the service of the hall. Pamfilo's man, Sirisco, I appoint treasurer and chancellor of our exchequer; and be he ever answerable to Parmeno. While Parmeno and Sirisco are too busy about their duties to serve their masters, let Filostrato's man, Tindaro, have charge of the chambers of all three. My maid, Missia, and Filomena's maid, Licisca, will keep in the kitchen, and with all due diligence prepare such dishes as Parmeno shall bid them. Lauretta's maid, Chimera, and Fiammetta's maid, Stratilia, we make answerable for the ladies' chambers, and wherever we may take up our quarters, let them see that all is spotless. And now we enjoin you, one and all alike, as you value our favor, that none of you, go where you may, return whence you may, hear or see what you may, bring us any tidings but such as be cheerful." These orders thus succinctly given were received with universal approval. Whereupon Pampinea rose, and said gaily:—"Here are gardens, meads, and other places delightsome enough, where you may wander at will, and take your pleasure; but on the stroke of tierce, let all be here to breakfast in the shade."

Thus dismissed by their new queen the gay

company sauntered gently through a garden, the young men saying sweet things to the fair ladies, who wove fair garlands of divers sorts of leaves and sang love-songs.

Having thus spent the time allowed them by the queen, they returned to the house, where they found that Parmeno had entered on his office with zeal; for in a hall on the ground-floor they saw tables covered with the whitest of cloths, and beakers that shone like silver, and sprays of broom scattered everywhere. So, at the bidding of the queen, they washed their hands, and all took their places as marshaled by Parmeno. Dishes, daintily prepared, were served, and the finest wines were at hand; the three serving men did their office noiselessly; in a word all was fair and ordered in a seemly manner; whereby the spirits of the company rose, and they seasoned their viands with pleasant jests and sprightly sallies. Breakfast done, the tables were removed, and the queen bade fetch instruments of music; for all, ladies and young men alike, knew how to tread a measure, and some of them played and sang with great skill: so, at her command, Dioneo having taken a lute, and Fiammetta a viol, they struck up a dance in sweet concert; and, the servants being dismissed to their repast, the queen, attended by the other ladies and the two young men, led off a stately carol; which ended they fell to singing ditties dainty and gay. Thus they diverted themselves until the queen, deeming it time to retire to rest, dismissed them all for the night. So the three young men and the ladies withdrew to their several quarters, which were in different parts of the palace. There they found the beds well made, and abundance of flow-ers, as in the hall; and so they undressed, and went to bed. Shortly after nine the queen rose, and roused the rest of the ladies, as also the young men, averring that it was injurious to the health to sleep long in the daytime. They therefore hied them to a meadow, where the grass grew green and luxuriant, being nowhere scorched by the sun, and a light breeze gently fanned them. So at the queen's command they all ranged themselves in a circle on the grass, and hearkened while she thus spoke:—

"You mark that the sun is high, the heat intense, and the silence unbroken save by the cicadas among the olive trees. It were therefore the height of folly to quit this spot at present. Here the air is cool and the prospect fair, and here, observe, are dice and chess. Take, then, your pleasure as you may be severally minded; but, if you take my advice, you will find pastime for the hot hours before us, not in play, in which the loser must needs be vexed, and neither the winner nor the onlooker much the better pleased, but in telling of stories, in which the invention of one may afford solace to all the company of his hearers. You will not each have told a story before the sun will be low, and the heat abated, so that we shall be able to go and severally take our pleasure where it may seem best to each. Wherefore, if my proposal meet with your approval—for in this I am disposed to consult your pleasure—let us adopt it; if not, divert yourselves as best you may, until the vesper hour."

The queen's proposal being approved by all, ladies and men alike, she added:—"So please you, then, I ordain, that, for this first day, we be free to discourse of such matters as most commend themselves to each in turn." She then addressed Pamfilo, who sat on her right hand, bidding him with a gracious air to lead off with one of his stories.

The Falcon of Sir Federigo

There was of yore in Florence a gallant named Federigo di Messer Filippo Alberighi, who for feats of arms and courtesy had not his peer in Tuscany; who, as is the common lot of gentlemen, became enamored of a lady named Monna Giovanna, who in her day held rank among the fairest and most elegant ladies of Florence; to gain whose love he jousted, tilted, gave entertainments, scattered largess, and in short set no bounds to his expenditure. However, the lady, no less virtuous than fair, cared not a jot for what he did for her sake, nor yet for him.

Spending thus greatly beyond his means, and making nothing, Federigo could hardly fail to come to lack, and was at length reduced to such poverty that he had nothing left but a little estate, on the rents of which he lived very straitly, and a single falcon, the best in the world. The estate was at Campi, and thither, deeming it no longer possible for him to live in the city as he desired, he repaired, more in love than ever before; and there, in complete seclusion, diverting himself with hawking, he bore his poverty as patiently as he might.

Now, Federigo being thus reduced to extreme poverty, it so happened that one day Monna Giovanna's husband, who was very rich, fell ill, and seeing that he was nearing his end, made his will, whereby he left his estate to his son, who was now growing up, and in the event of his death without lawful heir named Monna Giovanna, whom he dearly loved, heir in his stead; and having made these dispositions he died.

Monna Giovanna, being thus left a widow, did as our ladies are wont, and repaired in the summer to one of her estates in the country which lay very near to that of Federigo. And so it befell that the urchin began to make friends with Federigo, and to shew a fondness for hawks and dogs, and having seen Federigo's falcon fly not a few times, took a singular fancy to him, and greatly longed to have him for his own, but still did not dare to ask him of Federigo, knowing that Federigo prized him so much. So the matter stood when by chance the boy fell sick; whereby the mother was sore distressed, for he was her only son, and she loved him as much as might be, insomuch that all day long she was beside him, and ceased not to comfort him, and again and again asked him if there were aught that he wished for, imploring him to say the word, and, if it might by any means be had, she would assuredly do her utmost to procure it for him. Thus repeatedly exhorted, the boy said:—"Mother mine, do but get me Federigo's falcon, and I doubt not I shall soon be well." Whereupon the lady was silent for a while, bethinking her what she should do. She knew that Federigo had long loved her, and had never had so much as a single kind look from her: wherefore she said to herself:—How can I send or go to beg of him this falcon, which by what I hear is the best that ever flew, and moreover is his sole comfort? And how could I be so unfeeling as to seek to deprive a gentleman of the one solace that is now left him? And so, albeit she very well knew that she might have the falcon for the asking, she was perplexed, and knew not what to say, and gave her son no answer. At length, however, the love she bore the boy carried the day, and she made up her mind for his contentment, come what might, not to send, but to go herself and fetch him the falcon. So:—"Be of good cheer, my son," she said, "and doubt not thou wilt soon be well; for I promise thee that the very first thing that I shall do tomorrow morning will be to go and fetch thee the falcon." Whereat the child was so pleased that he began to mend that very day.

On the morrow the lady, as if for pleasure, hied her with another lady to Federigo's little house, and asked to see him. 'Twas still, as for some days past, no weather for hawking, and Federigo was in his garden, busy about some small matters which needed to be set right there. When he heard that Monna Giovanna was at the door, asking to see him, he was not a little surprised and pleased, and hied him to her with all speed. As soon as she saw him, she came forward to meet him with womanly grace, and having received his respectful salutation, said to him:—"Good morrow, Federigo," and continued:—"I am come to requite thee for what thou hast lost by loving me more than thou shouldst: which compensation is this, that I with this lady that accompanies me will breakfast with thee without ceremony this morning." "Madam," Federigo replied with all humility, "I mind not ever to have lost aught by loving you, but rather to have been so much profited that, if I ever deserved well in aught, 'twas to your merit that I owed it, and to the love that I bore you. And of a surety had I still as much to spend as I have spent in the past, I should not prize it so much as this visit you so frankly pay me, come as you are to one who can afford you but a sorry sort of hospitality." Which said, with some confusion, he bade her welcome to his house, and then led her into his garden, where, having none else to present to her by way of companion, he said:—"Madam, as there is none other here, this good woman, wife of this husbandman, will bear you company, while I go to have the table set." Now, albeit his poverty was extreme, yet he had not known as yet how sore was the need to which his extravagance had reduced him; but this morning 'twas brought home to him, for that he could find nought wherewith to do honor to the lady, for love of whom he had done the honors of his house to men without number: wherefore, distressed beyond measure, and inwardly cursing his evil fortune, he sped hither and thither like one beside himself, but never a coin found he, nor yet aught to pledge. Meanwhile it grew late, and sorely he longed that the lady might not leave his house altogether unhonored, and yet to crave help of his own husbandman was more than his pride could brook. In these desperate straits his glance happened to fall on his brave falcon on his perch in his little parlor. And so, as a last resource, he took him, and finding him plump, deemed that he would make a dish meet for such a lady. Wherefore, without thinking twice about it, he wrung the bird's neck, and caused his maid forthwith to pluck him and set him on a spit, and roast him carefully; and having still some spotless table-linen, he had the table laid therewith, and with a cheerful countenance hied him back to his lady in the garden, and told her that such breakfast as he could give her was ready. So the lady and her companion rose and came to table, and there, with Federigo, who waited on them most faithfully, ate the brave falcon, knowing not what they ate.

When they were risen from table, and had dallied a while in gay converse with him, the lady deemed it time to tell the reason of her visit: wherefore, graciously addressing Federigo, thus began she:—"Federigo, by what thou rememberest of thy past life and my virtue, which, perchance thou hast deemed harshness and cruelty, I doubt not thou must marvel at my presumption, when thou hearest the main purpose of my visit; but if thou hadst sons, or hadst had them, so that thou mightest know the full force of the love that is borne them, I should make no doubt that thou wouldst hold me in part excused. Nor, having a son, may I, for that thou hast none, claim exemption from the laws to which all other mothers are subject, and, being thus bound to own their sway, I must, though fain were I not, and though 'tis neither meet nor right, crave of thee that which I know thou dost of all things and with justice prize most highly, seeing that this extremity of thy adverse fortune has left thee nought else wherewith to delight, divert and console thee; which gift is no other than thy falcon, on which my boy has so set his heart that, if I bring him it not, I fear lest he grow so much worse of the malady that he has, that thereby it may come to pass that I lose him. And so, not for the love which thou dost bear me, and which may nowise bind thee, but for that nobleness of temper, whereof in courtesy more conspicuously than in aught else thou hast given proof, I implore thee that thou be pleased to give me the bird, that thereby I may say that I have kept my son alive, and thus made him for aye thy debtor."

No sooner had Federigo apprehended what the lady wanted, than, for grief that 'twas not in his power to serve her, because he had given her the falcon to eat, he fell a-weeping in her presence, before he could so much as utter a word. At first the lady supposed that 'twas only because he was loath to part with the brave falcon that he wept, and as good as made up her mind that he would refuse her: however, she awaited with patience Federigo's answer, which was on this wise:—"Madam, since it pleased God that I should set my affections upon you there have been matters not a few, in which to my sorrow I have deemed Fortune adverse to me; but they have all been trifles in comparison of the trick that she now plays me: the which I shall never forgive her, seeing that you are come here to my poor house, where, while I was rich, you deigned not to come, and ask a trifling favor of me, which she has put it out of my power to grant: how 'tis so, I will briefly tell you. When I learned that you, of your grace, were minded to breakfast with me, having respect to your high dignity and desert, I deemed it due and seemly that in your honor I should regale you, to the best of my power, with fare of a more excellent quality than is commonly set before others; and, calling to mind the falcon which you now ask of me, and his excellence, I judged him meet¹⁰ food for you, and so you have had him roasted on the trencher this morning; and well indeed I thought I had bestowed him; but, as now I see that you would fain have had him in another guise, so mortified am I that I am not able to serve you, that I doubt I shall never know peace of mind more." In witness whereof he had the feathers and feet and beak of the bird brought in and laid before her.

The first thing the lady did, when she had heard²⁰ Federigo's story, and seen the relics of the bird, was to chide him that he had killed so fine a falcon to furnish a woman with a breakfast; after which the magnanimity of her host, which poverty had been and was powerless to impair, elicited no small share of inward commendation. Then, frustrated of her hope of possessing the falcon, and doubting of her son's recovery, she took her leave with the heaviest of hearts, and hied her back to the boy: who, whether for fretting, that he might not have the falcon, or by the unaided energy of his disorder, departed this life not many days after, to the exceeding great grief of his mother. For a while she would do nought but weep and bitterly bewail herself; but being still young, and left very wealthy, she was often urged by her brothers to marry again, and though she would rather have not done so, yet being importuned, and remembering Federigo's high desert, and the magnificent generosity with which he had finally killed his falcon to do her honor, she said to her brothers:—"Gladly, with your consent, would I remain a widow, but if you will not be satisfied except I take a husband, rest assured that none other will I ever take save Federigo degli Alberighi." Whereupon her brothers derided her, saying:—"Foolish woman, what is't thou sayst? How wouldst thou want Federigo, who has not a thing in the world?" To whom she answered:—"My brothers, well wot I that 'tis as you say; but I had rather have a man without wealth than wealth without a man." The brothers, perceiving that her mind was made up, and knowing Federigo for a good man and true, poor though he was, gave her to him with all her wealth. And so Federigo, being mated with such a wife, and one that he had so much loved, and being very wealthy to boot, lived happily, keeping more exact accounts, to the end of his days.

NICCOLÒ MACHIAVELLI

The Prince

The Conduct of a Successful Ruler

Ch. XV. Of Such Things as Render Men (Especially Princes) Worthy of Blame or Applause.

It remains now that we see in what manner a prince ought to comport with his subjects and friends; and because many have written of this subject before, it may perhaps seem arrogant in me, especially considering that in my discourse I shall deviate from the opinion of other men. But²⁰ my intention being to write for the benefit and advantage of him who understands, I thought it more convenient to respect the essential verity, rather than an imaginary view, of the subject; for many have framed imaginary commonwealths and governments to themselves which never were seen nor had any real existence. And the present manner of living is so different from the way that ought to be taken, that he who neglects what is done to follow what ought to be done, will sooner learn how to ruin than how to preserve himself; for a tender man, and one that desires to be honest in everything, must needs run a great hazard among so many of a contrary principle. Wherefore it is necessary for a prince who is willing to subsist to harden himself, and learn to be good or otherwise according to the exigence of his affairs. Laying aside, therefore, all imaginary notions of a prince, and discoursing of nothing but what is actually true, I say that all men when they are spoken of, and especially princes, who are in a higher and more eminent station, are remarkable for some quality or other that makes them either honorable or contemptible. Hence it is that some are counted liberal, others miserly; . . . some munificent, others rapacious; some cruel, others merciful; some faithless, others precise; one poor-spirited and effeminate, another fierce and ambitious; one courteous, another haughty; one modest, another libidinous; one sincere, another cunning; one rugged and morose, another accessible and easy; one grave, another giddy; one devout, another an atheist.

The Prince. Translated by Henry Morley. Niccolò Machiavelli (1469-1527), a Florentine statesman and politician, spent his life in the midst of political intrigues, in which he gained the experience necessary for writing The Prince.

No man, I am sure, will deny but that it would be an admirable thing and highly to be commended to have a prince endued with all the good qualities aforesaid; but because it is impossible to have, much less to exercise, them all by reason of the frailty and grossness of our nature, it is convenient that he be so well instructed as to know how to avoid the scandal of those vices which may deprive him of his state, and be very cautious of the rest, though their consequence be not so pernicious but that where they are unavoidable he need trouble himself the less. Again, he is not to concern himself if he incur the infamy of those vices without which his dominion is not to be preserved; for if we consider things impartially we shall find some things are virtuous in appearance, and yet, if pursued, would bring certain destruction; while others, seemingly bad, yet, if followed by a prince, procure his peace and security.

Ch. XVI. Of Liberality and Parsimony.

To begin, then, with the first of the above-mentioned qualities, I say, it would be advantageous to be accounted liberal; nevertheless, liberality so used as not to render you formidable does but injure you; for if it be used virtuously as it ought to be it will not be known, nor secure you from the imputation of its contrary. To keep up, therefore, the name of liberal amongst men, it is necessary that no kind of luxury be omitted, so that a prince of that disposition will consume his revenue in that kind of expenses, and be obliged at last, if he would preserve that reputation, to become grievous, and a great exactor upon the people, and do whatever is practicable for the getting of money, which will cause him to be hated of his subjects and despised by everybody else when he once comes to be poor, so that offending many with his liberality and rewarding but few, he becomes sensible of the first disaster, and runs great hazard of being ruined the first time he is in danger; which, when afterward he discovers, and desires to remedy, he runs into the other extreme, and grows as odious for his avarice. So, then, if a prince cannot exercise this virtue of liberality so as to be publicly known, without detriment to himself, he ought, if he be wise, not to dread the imputation of being covetous, for in time he shall be esteemed liberal when it is discovered that by his parsimony he has increased his revenue to a condition of defending himself against invasion and of engaging in enterprises upon other people without oppressing his subjects; so that he shall be accounted noble to all from whom he takes nothing away, which are an infinite number, and near and parsimonious only to such few as he gives nothing to.

In our days we have seen no great action done but by those who were accounted miserly; others have failed always. Pope Julius II made use of his bounty to get into the Chair, but to enable himself to make war with the King of France he never practiced it afterwards, and by his frugality he maintained several wars without any tax or imposition upon the people, his long parsimony having furnished him for his extraordinary expenses. The present King of Spain, if he had affected to be thought liberal, could never have undertaken so many great designs nor obtained so many great victories. A prince, therefore, ought not to be much concerned over being accounted covetous—so long as he is enabled thereby to forbear from burdening his subjects, to defend himself, and to keep himself from becoming poor and despicable; covetousness is one of those vices which fortify his dominion. If anyone objects that Cæsar by his liberality made his way to the empire, and many others upon the same score of reputation have made themselves great, I answer: "Either you are actually a prince, or you are in a fair way to be made one. In the first case, liberality is hurtful; in the second, it is necessary; Cæsar aspired to the sovereignty of Rome; when he was arrived at that dignity, if he had lived, and had not retrenched his expenses, he would have ruined that empire." If anyone replies that many have been princes, and with their armies performed great matters, who have been reputed liberal, I rejoin that a prince spends either of his own, or his subjects', or other people's. In the first case he is to be frugal; in the second, he may be as profuse as he pleases, and balk no point of liberality. But that prince whose army is to be maintained with free quarter and plunder and exactions from other people, is obliged to be liberal, or his army will desert him; and well he may be prodigal of what neither belongs to him nor his subjects, as was the case with Cæsar, and Cyrus, and Alexander; for to spend upon another's stock rather adds to than subtracts from his reputation; it is spending of his own that is so mortal and pernicious. Nor is there anything that destroys itself like liberality; for in practicing it you lose the means whereby it can be practiced, and you become poor and contemptible, or, to avoid that poverty, you make yourself odious and a tyrant; and there is nothing of so much importance to a prince to avoid as to be either contemptible or odious, both of which depend much upon the prudent exercise of your liberality. Upon these considerations it is more wisdom to lie under the scandal of being miserly, which is an imputation rather infamous than odious, than to be thought liberal and run yourself into a necessity of playing the tyrant, which is infamous and odious both.

Ch. XVII. Of Cruelty and Clemency, and Whether it is Best for a Prince to be Beloved or Feared.

To come now to the other qualities proposed, I say every prince is to desire to be esteemed rather merciful than cruel, but with great caution that his mercy be not abused; Cæsar Borgia was counted cruel, yet that cruelty reduced Romagna, united it, settled it in peace, and rendered it faithful: so that if well considered, he will appear much more merciful than the Florentines, who rather than be thought cruel suffered Pistoia to be destroyed. A prince, therefore, is not to regard the reproach of being cruel, if thereby he keeps his subjects in their allegiance and united, seeing that by some few examples of justice he may be more merciful than they who by a universal exercise of pity permit several disorders to follow, which occasion rapine and murder; and the reason is, because that exorbitant mercy has an ill effect upon the whole community, whereas particular executions extend only to particular persons. But among all princes a new prince has the hardest task to avoid the scandal of being cruel by reason of the newness of his government, and the dangers which attend it: hence Virgil in the person of Dido excused the inhospitality of her government.

Res dura, et regni novitas, me talia cogunt
Moliri, et late fines Custode tueri.

My new dominion and my harder fate
Constrains me to't, and I must guard my state.

Nevertheless, he is not to be too credulous of reports, too hasty in his motions, nor create fears and jealousies to himself, but so to temper his administrations with prudence and humanity that neither too much confidence may make him careless, nor too much diffidence intolerable. And hence arises a new question, Whether it be better to be beloved than feared, or feared than beloved? It is answered, both would be convenient, but because that is hard to attain, it is better and more secure, if one must be wanting, to be feared than beloved; for in general men are ungrateful, inconstant, hypocritical, fearful of danger, and covetous of gain; while they receive any benefit by you, and the danger is at a distance, they are absolutely yours, and their blood, their estates, their lives and their children, as I said before, are all at your service; but when mischief is at hand, and you have present need of their help, they make no scruple to revolt; and that prince who leaves himself naked of other preparations, and relies wholly upon their professions, is sure to be ruined; for amity contracted by price, and not by the greatness and generosity of the mind, may seem a good pennyworth; yet when you have occasion to make use of it, you will find no such thing. Moreover, men do with less remorse offend against those who desire to be beloved than against those who are ambitious of being feared; the reason is that love is fastened only by a ligament of obligation, which the ill-nature of man breaks upon every occasion that is presented to his profit; but fear depends upon an apprehension of punishment, which is never to be dispelled. Yet a prince is to render himself awful in such sort that, if he gains not his subjects' love, he may escape their hatred; for to be feared and not hated are compatible enough, and he may be always in that condition if he offers no violence to their estates, nor attempts anything upon the honor of their wives, and when he has occasion to take away any man's life, if he takes his time when the cause is manifest, and he has good matter for his justification; but above all things he is to have a care of intrenching upon their estates, for men do sooner forget the death of their father than the loss of their patrimony; besides, occasions of confiscation never fail, and he that once gives way to that humor or rapine shall never want temptation to ruin his neighbor. But, on the contrary, provocations to blood are more rare, and do sooner evaporate; but when a prince is at the head of his army, and has a multitude of soldiers to govern, then it is absolutely necessary not to value the epithet of cruel, for without that no army can be kept in unity, nor in disposition for any great act.

Among the several instances of Hannibal's great conduct, it is one that, having a vast army constituted out of several nations, and conducted to make war in an enemy's country, there never happened any sedition among them, or any mutiny against their general, either in his adversity or prosperity. This can only be attributed to his great cruelty, which, added to his infinite virtues, rendered him both awful and terrible to his soldiers; without that all his virtues would have signified nothing. Some writers there are, but of little consideration, who admire his great exploits and condemn the true causes of them. But to prove that his other virtues would never have carried him through, let us reflect upon Scipio, a person honorable not only in his own time, but in all history whatever; nevertheless his army mutinied in Spain, and the true cause of it was his too much gentleness and lenity, which gave his soldiers more liberty than was suitable or consistent with military discipline. Fabius Maximus upbraided him for it in the senate, and called him corrupter of the Roman Militia; the inhabitants of Locris having been plundered and destroyed by one of Scipio's lieutenants, they were never redressed, nor the legate's insolence corrected, all proceeding from the mildness of Scipio's nature, which was so eminent in him, that a person undertaking to excuse him in the senate declared that there were many who knew better how to avoid doing ill themselves than to punish it in other people; which temper would doubtless in time have eclipsed the glory and reputation of Scipio, had that authority been continued in him; but receiving orders and living under the direction of the senate, that ill quality was not only not discovered in him, but turned to his renown. I conclude, therefore, according to what I have said about being feared or beloved, that forasmuch as men do love at their own discretion, but fear at their prince's, a wise prince is obliged to lay his foundation upon that which is in his own power, not that which depends on other people, but, as I said before, with great caution that he does not make himself odious.

Ch. XVIII. How Far a Prince is Obligated by His Promise.

How honorable it is for a prince to keep his word, and act rather with integrity than collusion, I suppose everybody understands: nevertheless, experience has shown in our times that those princes who have not pinned themselves up to that punctuality and preciseness have done great things, and by their cunning and subtilty have not only circumvented those with whom they had to deal, but have overcome and been too hard for those who have been so superstitiously exact. For further explanation you must understand there are two ways of contending—by law and by force: the first is proper to men; the second to beasts; but because many times the first is insufficient, recourse must be had to the second. It belongs, therefore, to a prince to understand both—when to make use of the rational and when of the brutal way; and this is recommended to princes, though abstrusely, by ancient writers, who tell them how Achilles and several other princes were committed for education to Chiron the Centaur, who was half man and half beast—thus showing how necessary it is for a prince to be acquainted with both natures, for one without the other will be of little duration. Seeing, therefore, it is of such importance to a prince to take upon him the nature and disposition of a beast, of all the whole flock he ought to imitate the lion and the fox; for the lion is in danger of toils and snares, and the fox of the wolf; so that he must be a fox to find out the snares, and a lion to fight away the wolves, but they who keep wholly to the lion have no true notion of themselves. A prince, therefore, who is wise and prudent, cannot or ought not to keep his word, when the keeping of it is to his prejudice, and the causes for which he promised removed. Were men all good this doctrine would not be taught, but because they are wicked and not likely to be punctual with you, you are not obliged to any such strictness with them; nor was there ever any prince that lacked lawful pretense to justify his breach of promise. I might give many modern examples, and show how many confederations, and peaces, and promises have been broken by the infidelity of princes, and how he that best personated the fox had the better success. Nevertheless, it is of great consequence to disguise your inclination, and to play the hypocrite well; and men are so simple in their temper and so submissive to their present necessities that he that is neat and cleanly in his collusions shall never want people to practice them upon. I cannot forbear one example which is still fresh in our memory. Alexander VI never did, nor thought of, anything but cheating, and never wanted matter to work upon; and though no man promised a thing with greater asseveration, nor confirmed it with more oaths and imprecations, and observed them less, yet understanding the world well he never miscarried.

A prince, therefore, is not obliged to have all the forementioned good qualities in reality, but it is necessary he have them in appearance; nay, I will be bold to affirm that, having them actually, and employing them upon all occasions, they are extremely prejudicial, whereas, having them only in appearance, they turn to better account; it is honorable to seem mild, and merciful, and courteous, and religious, and sincere, and indeed to be so, provided your mind be so rectified and prepared that you can act quite contrary upon occasion. And this must be premised, that a prince, especially if come but lately to the throne, cannot observe all those things exactly which cause men to be esteemed virtuous, being oftentimes necessitated, for the preservation of his state, to do things inhuman, uncharitable, and irreligious; and, therefore, it is convenient for his mind to be at his command, and flexible to all the puffs and variations of fortune; not forbearing to be good while it is in his choice, but knowing how to be evil when there is a necessity. A prince, then, is to have particular care that nothing falls from his mouth but what is full of the five qualities aforesaid, and that to see and hear him he appears all goodness, integrity, humanity, and religion, which last he ought to pretend to more than ordinarily, because more men do judge by the eye than by the touch; for everybody sees but few understand; everybody sees how you appear, but few know what in reality you are, and those few dare not oppose the opinion of the multitude, who have the majesty of their prince to defend them; and in the actions of all men, especially princes, where no man has power to judge, everyone looks to the end. Let a prince, therefore, do what he can to preserve his life, and continue his supremacy, the means which he uses shall be thought honorable, and be commended by everybody; because the people are always taken with the appearance and event of things, and the greatest part of the world consists of the people; those few who are wise taking place when the multitude has nothing else to rely upon. There is a prince at this time in being (but his name I shall conceal) who has nothing in his mouth but fidelity and peace; and yet had he exercised either the one or the other, they had robbed him before this both of his power and reputation.

Ch. XIX. That Princes Ought to be Cautious of Becoming either Odious or Contemptible.

Since in our discourse of the qualifications of a prince we have hitherto spoken only of those which are of greatest importance, we shall now speak briefly of the rest, with the general statements that a prince should make it his business (as is partly hinted before) to avoid such things as may make him odious or contemptible, and that as often as he does that he plays his part very well, and shall meet no danger or inconveniences by the rest of his vices. Nothing, as I said before, makes a prince so insufferably odious as usurping his subjects' estates and debauching their wives, which are two things he ought studiously to forbear; for while the generality of the world live quietly upon their estates and unprejudiced in their honor, they live peaceably enough, and all his contention is only with the pride and ambition of some few persons who can in many ways and with great ease be restrained.

But a prince is contemptible when he is counted effeminate, light, inconstant, pusillanimous, and irresolute; and of this he ought to be as careful as of a rock in the sea; and he should strive that in all his actions there may appear magnanimity, courage, gravity, and fortitude, desiring that in the private affairs of his subjects his sentence and determination may be irrevocable, and that he himself may stand so in their opinion that none may think it possible either to delude or divert him. The prince who causes himself to be esteemed in that manner shall be highly feared, and if he be feared, people will not easily conspire against him, nor readily invade him, because he is known to be an excellent person and formidable to his subjects; for a prince ought to be terrible in two places—at home to his subjects, and abroad to his equals, from whom he defends himself by good arms and good allies; for, if his power be good, his friends will not be wanting, and while his affairs are fixed at home, there will be no danger from abroad, unless they be disturbed by some former conspiracy; and upon any commotion ab extra, if he be composed at home, has lived as I prescribe, and not deserted himself, he will be able to bear up against any attack, according to the example of Nabis the Spartan.

When things are well abroad his affairs at home will be safe enough, unless they be perplexed by some secret conspiracy, against which the prince sufficiently provides if he keeps himself from being hated or despised, and the people remain satisfied of him, which is a thing very necessary, as I have shown at length before. And one of the best remedies a prince can use against conspiracy is to keep himself from being hated or despised by the multitude; for nobody plots but expects by the death of the prince to gratify the people, and the thought of offending them will deter him from any such enterprise, because in conspiracies the difficulties are infinite. By experience we find that many conspiracies have been on foot, but few have succeeded, because no man can conspire alone, nor choose a confederate but out of those who are discontented; and no sooner shall you impart your mind to a malcontent but you give him opportunity to reconcile himself, because there is no advantage which he seeks but what he may hope to gain by betraying you. So that the gain being certain on that side, and hazardous and uncertain on the other, he must be either an extraordinary friend to you or an implacable enemy to the prince if he does not betray you; in short, on the side of the conspirators there is nothing but fear and jealousy, and apprehension of punishment; but, on the prince's side, there is the majesty of the government, the laws, the assistance of his friends and state, which defend him so effectually that, if the affections of the people be added to them, no man can be so rash and precipitate as to conspire; for if, before the execution of his design, the conspirator has reason to be afraid, in this case he has much more afterwards, having offended the people in the execution and left himself no refuge to fly to. Of this many examples may be produced, but I shall content myself with one which happened in the memory of our fathers. Hannibal Bentivoglio, grandfather to this present Hannibal, was Prince of Bologna, and was killed by the Caneschi who conspired against him, none of his race being left behind but John, who was then in his cradle; the murder was no sooner committed but the people took arms and slew all the Caneschi, which proceeded only from the affection that the house of Bentivoglio had at that time among the populace in Bologna, which was then so great that when Hannibal was dead, there being none of that family remaining in a capacity for the government of the state, upon information that at Florence there was a natural son of the said Bentivoglio's, who till that time had passed only for the son of a smith, they sent ambassadors for him, and having conducted him honorably to that city, they gave him the government, which he executed very well till the said John came of age. I conclude, therefore, a prince need not be much apprehensive of conspiracies while the people are his friends; but when they are dissatisfied, and have taken prejudice against him, there is nothing nor no person which he ought not to fear.

It has been the constant care of all wise princes and all well-governed states not to reduce the nobility to despair nor the people to discontent, which is one of the most material things a prince is to prevent. Among the best-ordered monarchies of our times France is one, in which there are many good laws and constitutions tending to the liberty and preservation of the king. The first of them is the Parliament and the authority where-with it is vested; for he who was the founder of that monarchy, was sensible of the ambition and insolence of the nobles, and judged it convenient to have them bridled and restrained; he knew, on the other side, the hatred of the people against the nobility, and that it proceeded from fear, and he desired to protect the people; but in order to save himself from the displeasure of the nobles if he sided with the people, or from the malice of the people if he inclined to the nobles, he established a third party to be arbitrator, who, without any reflection upon the king, should keep the nobility under, and protect the people; nor could there be a better order, wiser, nor of greater security to the king and the kingdom, whence we may deduce another observation—That princes are to leave things of injustice and envy to the ministry and execution of others, but acts of favor and grace are to be performed by themselves. . . .

Ch. XXI. How a Prince is to Demean Himself to Gain Reputation.

Nothing recommends a prince so highly to the world as great enterprises and noble expressions of his own valor and conduct. We have in our days Ferdinand, King of Aragon—the present King of Spain—who may, and not improperly, be called a new prince, since from one of the smallest and weakest he has become for fame and renown the greatest monarch in Christendom; and if his exploits be considered you will find them all brave, but some of them extraordinary. In the beginning of his reign he invaded the kingdom of Granada, and that enterprise was the foundation of his grandeur. He began it leisurely, and without suspicion of impediment, holding the barons of Castile employed in that service, and so intent upon that war that they dreamt not of any innovation, while in the meantime, before they were aware, he got reputation and authority over them. He found out a way of maintaining his army at the expense of the church and the people; and by the length of that war he established such order and discipline among his soldiers, that afterwards they gained him many honorable victories. Besides this, to adapt him for greater enterprises (always making religion his pretense), by a kind of devout cruelty he destroyed and exterminated the Moors, than which nothing could be more strange or deplorable. Under the same cloak of religion he invaded Africa, made his expedition into Italy, assaulted France, and began many great things which always kept the minds of his subjects in admiration and suspense, wondering what the event of his machinations would be. And these enterprises had so sudden a spring and result one from the other that they gave no leisure to any man to be at quiet, or to continue anything against him. It is likewise of great advantage to a prince to give some rare example of his own administration at home whenever the actions, good or bad, of someone in civil life give him opportunity to reward or punish such actions in such a way as to make himself much talked of in the world. Above all, a prince is to have a care in all his actions to behave himself so as to give himself the reputation of being excellent as well as great.

A prince is likewise much esteemed when he shows himself a sincere friend or a generous enemy—that is, when without any hesitation he declares himself in favor of one against another, which, as it is more frank and princely, so it is more profitable than to stand neutral; for if two of your potent neighbors be at war, they are either of such condition that you are to be afraid of the victor or not; in either of which cases it will be always more for your benefit to discover yourself freely, and make a fair war. For in the first case, if you do not declare, you shall be a prey to him who overcomes, and it will be a pleasure and satisfaction to him that is conquered to see you his fellow-sufferer; nor will anybody either defend or receive you, and the reason is because the conqueror will never understand them to be his friends who would not assist him in his distress; and he that is worsted will not receive you because you neglected to share his fortune with your arms in your hands. . . . And those princes who are ill-advised to avoid some present danger by following the neutral way are most commonly ruined; but when you pronounce yourself courageously in favor of one party, if he with whom you join overcome, though he be very powerful, and you seem to remain at his discretion, yet he is obliged to you, and must needs have a respect for you; and men are not so wicked with signal and exemplary ingratitude as to oppress you after you have helped them. Besides, victories are never so clear and complete as to leave the conqueror without all sparks of reflection, and especially upon what is just. But if your confederate comes by the worst, you are received by him, and assisted while he is able, and you become a companion of his fortune, which may possibly restore you. In the second place, if they who contend be of such condition that they have no occasion to fear, let which will overcome, you are in prudence to declare yourself the sooner, because by assisting the one you contribute to the ruin of the other, whom, if your confederate had been wise, he ought rather to have preserved; if he whom you help overcomes, he remains wholly in your power, and by your assistance he must of necessity overcome. And here it is to be noted, if he can avoid it, a prince is never to league himself with another more powerful than himself in an offensive war; because in that case if the latter overcomes the former remains at his mercy, and princes ought to be as cautious as possible of falling under the discretion of other people. The Venetians, when there was no necessity for it, associated with France against the Duke of Milan, and that association was the cause of their ruin. But where it is not to be avoided, as happened to the Florentines when the Pope and the Spaniard sent their armies against Lombardy, then a prince is to adhere for the reasons aforesaid. Nor is any prince or government to imagine that in those cases any certain counsel can be taken, because the affairs of this world are so ordered that in avoiding one mischief we fall commonly into another. But a man's wisdom is most conspicuous where he is able to distinguish of dangers and make choice of the least.

Moreover, it is a prince's wisdom to show himself a virtuoso, and honorer of all that is excellent in any art whatsoever. He is likewise to encourage and assure his subjects that they may live quietly in peace, and exercise themselves in their several vocations, whether merchandise, agriculture, or any other employment whatever, to the end that no one may forbear improving or embellishing his estate for fear it should be taken from him, or forbear advancing his trade in apprehension of taxes; but the prince is rather to excite them by propositions of reward and immunities to all such as shall in any way amplify his territory or power. He is obliged, likewise, at convenient times in the year to entertain the people by feastings and plays, and spectacles of recreation; and, because all cities are divided into companies or wards, he ought to have respect to those societies, be merry with them sometimes, and give them some instance of his humanity and magnificence, but always retaining the majesty of his degree, which is never to be debased in any case whatever.

BENVENUTO CELLINI

The Casting of the Perseus

As I had been particularly successful in casting my Medusa, I made a model of my Perseus in wax, and flattered myself that I should have the same success in casting the latter in bronze, as I had had with the former. Upon its appearing to such advantage, and looking so beautiful in wax, the duke, whether somebody else put it into his head, or whether it was a notion of his own, as he came to my house oftener than usual, once took occasion to say to me, "Benvenuto, this statue cannot be cast in bronze; it is not in the power of your art to compass it." Hearing him express himself in that manner, I discovered great vexation, and said, "My lord, I know that your excellency places very little confidence in me, and that you have but too good an opinion of those who speak ill of me; or else you do not understand things of this nature." Scarce did he suffer me to utter these words, when he answered, "I profess to understand them, and I do understand them perfectly." I replied, "You may understand them as a prince, but not as an artist; for if you had that skill in these matters, which you think you have, you would believe me upon account of the fine bronze head which I cast for your excellency, and which was sent to the Elbe; as also for having restored the beautiful figure of Ganymede, a work that gave me infinite trouble, insomuch that it would have been easier for me to have made a new one; likewise for having cast the Medusa, which stands here before you so excellency, a performance of immense difficulty, in which I have done what no other man has done before me in this most laborious art. Consider, my lord, I have constructed a new sort of a furnace, in a manner unknown to other artists; for besides many other particulars and curious inventions to be seen in it, I have made two issues for the bronze; for otherwise that difficult and distorted figure could never come out, and it was only by means of my skill and invention that it came out as well as it did: and do not imagine that every common artist could have done as much. Know likewise, my lord, that all the great and difficult undertakings that I have been employed in by the renowned King Francis, were attended with admirable success, purely on account of that king's generous encouragement of my labors, in providing me with everything I wanted, and allowing me as many hands as I required. At certain times I had under me above forty journeymen, all of my own choosing; and this was the reason that I finished so many undertakings in so short a time. Therefore, my lord, take my advice, and afford me the assistance I want, for I have great hopes of producing a work that will please you; whereas, if your excellency discourages me, and does not supply me with the necessary helps, it is impossible that either I or any man living can produce any thing worth notice."

The duke scarcely had patience to hear me out,

The Casting of the Perseus from Cellini's Autobiography. Translated by Thomas Roscoe. Benvenuto Cellini (1501-1571) was born at Florence. He was a great artist in metal as well as an indefatigable adventurer.

but sometimes turned one way, sometimes another; and I was quite in despair when I recollected the circumstances in which I had lived in France. At last he all on a sudden said, "Tell me, Benvenuto, how is it possible that this fine head of Medusa, which Perseus holds aloft in his hand, should ever come out cleverly?" I immediately answered, "It is clear, my lord, that you are no connoisseur in statuary, as your excellency boasts yourself; for if you had any skill in the art, you would not be afraid of that fine head not coming out, but would express your apprehensions concerning that right foot, which is at such a distance below." The duke, half angry, addressing himself to some noblemen who were with him, said, "I really believe it is a practice of Benvenuto's to contradict and oppose everything he hears advanced"; then turning to me, as it were in derision, in which he was imitated by all present, he expressed himself thus: "I am willing to have patience to hear what reason you can allege, that can possibly induce me to believe what you affirm." I answered, "I will give your excellency a reason so satisfactory, that you will be able to conceive the full force of it." I thereupon began in these terms: "You know, my lord, that the nature of fire is to fly upwards; I therefore assure you that the head of Medusa will come out perfectly well. But as it is not the property of fire to descend, and it is necessary to force it down six cubits by art, hence, I affirm that it is impossible that yon foot should ever come out; but it will be an easy matter for me to make a new one. The duke thereupon said, "Why did you not think of contriving to make that foot come out as well as the head?" "I must then," answered I, "have made the furnace much bigger, to be able to cast a piece of brass as thick as my leg, and with that weight of hot metal I should have made it come out by force; whereas, my brass, which goes down to the feet six cubits, as I mentioned before, is not above two inches thick. Therefore, it was not worth your notice, for it can soon be rectified; but when my mold is something more than half full, I have good hopes that from that half upwards, the fire mounting, by its natural property, the heads of Perseus and Medusa will come out admirably; and this you may depend upon." When I had laid before the duke all these reasons, with many more, which I for the sake of brevity omit, he shook his head, and departed.

I now took courage, resolving to depend on myself, and banished all those thoughts which from time to time occasioned me great inquietude, and made me sorely repent my ever having quitted France, with a view of assisting six poor nieces at Florence; which good intention proved the source and origin of all the misfortunes that afterwards befell me. However, I still flattered myself that if I could but finish my statue of Perseus, all my labors would be converted to delight, and meet with a glorious and happy reward. Thus, having recovered my vigor of mind, I exerted all my strength of body and of purse, though indeed I had but little money left, and began to purchase several loads of pine-wood from the pine-grove of the Serristori, hard by Monte Lupo; and whilst I was waiting for it, I covered my Perseus with the earth which I had prepared several months beforehand, that it might have its proper seasoning. After I had made its coat of earth, covered it well, and bound it properly with irons, I began by means of a slow fire to draw off the wax, which melted away by many vent-holes; for the more of these are made, the better the molds are filled: and when I had entirely stripped off the wax, I made a sort of fence round my Perseus, that is, round the mold above-mentioned, of bricks, piling them one upon another, and leaving several vacuities for the fire to exhale at. I next began gradually to put on the wood, and kept a constant fire for two days and two nights, till the wax being quite off, and the mold well baked, I began to dig a hole to bury my mold in, and observed all those fine methods of proceeding that are prescribed by our art. When I had completely dug my hole, I took my mold, and by means of levers and strong cables directed it with care, and suspended it a cubit above the level of the furnace, so that it hung exactly in the middle of the hole. I then let it gently down to the very bottom of the furnace, and placed it with all the care and exactness I possibly could. After I had finished this part of my task, I began to make a covering of the very earth I had taken off, and in proportion as I raised the earth, I made vents for it, which are a sort of tubes of baked earth, generally used for conduits, and other things of a similar nature. As soon as I saw that I had placed it properly, and that this manner of covering it, by putting on these small tubes in their proper places, was likely to answer, as also that my journeymen thoroughly understood my plan, which was very different from that of all other masters, and I was sure that I could depend upon them, I turned my thoughts to my furnace. I had caused it to be filled with several pieces of brass and bronze, and heaped them upon one another in the manner taught us by our art, taking particular care to leave a passage for the flames, that the metal might the sooner assume its color and dissolve into a fluid. Thus, I with great alacrity, excited my men to lay on the pine-wood, which, because of the oiliness of the resinous matter that oozes from the pine-tree, and that my furnace was admirably well made, burned at such a rate, that I was continually obliged to run to and fro, which greatly fatigued me. I, however, bore the hardship; but to add to my misfortune, the shop took fire, and we were all very much afraid that the roof would fall in and crush us. From another quarter, that is, from the garden, the sky poured in so much rain and wind, that it cooled my furnace.

Thus did I continue to struggle with these cross accidents for several hours, and exerted myself to such a degree that my constitution, though robust, could no longer bear such severe hardship, and I was suddenly attacked by a most violent intermitting fever: in short, I was so ill that I found myself under a necessity of lying down upon my bed. This gave me great concern, but it was unavoidable. I thereupon addressed myself to my assistants, who were about ten in number, consisting of masters who melted bronze, helpers, men from the country, and the journeymen that worked in the shop, amongst whom was Bernardino Manellini di Mugello, who had lived with me several years. After having recommended it to them all to take proper care of my business, I said to Bernardino, "My friend, be careful to observe the method which I have shown you, and use all possible expedition, for the metal will soon be ready. You cannot mistake: these two worthy men here will quickly make the tubes; with two such directors you can certainly contrive to pour out the hot metal by means of the mandriani or iron crooks; and I have no doubt but my mold will be filled completely. I find myself extremely ill, and really believe that in a few hours this severe disorder will put an end to my life." Thus I left them in great sorrow, and went to bed. I then ordered the maids to carry victuals and drink into the shop for all the men, and told them I did not expect to live till the next morning. They encouraged me notwithstanding, assuring me that my disorder would not last, as it was only the effect of over-fatigue. In this manner did I continue for two hours in a violent fever, which I every moment perceived to increase; and I was incessantly crying out, "I am dying, I am dying."

My housekeeper, whose name was Mona Fiore

da Castel del Rio, was one of the most sensible and affectionate women in the world: she rebuked me for giving way to vain fears, and at the same time attended me with the greatest kindness and care imaginable: however, seeing me so very ill, and terrified to such a degree, she could not contain herself, but shed a flood of tears, which she endeavored to conceal from me. Whilst we were both in this deep affliction, I perceived a man enter the room, who in his person appeared to be as crooked and distorted as a great S, and began to express himself in these terms, with a tone of voice as dismal and melancholy as those who exhort and pray with persons who are going to be executed: "Alas! poor Benvenuto, your work is spoiled, and the misfortune admits of no remedy."

No sooner had I heard the words uttered by this messenger of evil, but I cried out so loud that my voice might be heard to the skies, and got out of bed. I began immediately to dress, and giving plenty of kicks and cuffs to the maidservants and the boy as they offered to help me on with my clothes, I complained bitterly in these terms: "O you envious and treacherous wretches, this is a piece of villainy contrived on purpose; but I swear by the living God that I will sift it to the bottom, and before I die, give such proofs who I am as shall not fail to astonish the whole world." Having huddled on my clothes, I went with a mind boding evil to the shop, where I found all those whom I had left so alert, and in such high spirits, standing in the utmost confusion and astonishment. I thereupon addressed them thus: "Listen all of you to what I am going to say; and since you either would not or could not follow the method I pointed out, obey me now that I am present: my work is before us, and let none of you offer to oppose or contradict me, for such cases as this require activity and not counsel." Hereupon one Alessandro Lastricati had the assurance to say to me, "Look you, Benvenuto, you have undertaken a work which our art cannot compass, and which is not to be effected by human power."

Hearing these words I turned round in such a passion, and seemed so bent upon mischief, that both he and all the rest unanimously cried out to me, "Give your orders, and we will all second you in whatever you command: we will assist you as long as we have breath in our bodies." These kind and affectionate words they uttered, as I firmly believe, in a persuasion that I was upon the point of expiring. I went directly to examine the furnace, and saw all the metal in it concreted. I thereupon ordered two of the helpers to step over the way to Capretta, a butcher, for a load of young oak, which had been above a year drying, and been offered me by Maria Ginevera, wife to the said Capretta.

Upon his bringing me the first bundles of it, I began to fill the grate. This sort of oak makes a brisker fire than any other wood whatever; but the wood of elder-trees and pine-trees is used in casting artillery, because it makes a mild and gentle fire. As soon as the concreted metal felt the power of this violent fire, it began to brighten and glitter. In another quarter I made them hurry the tubes with all possible expedition, and sent some of them to the roof of the house to take care of the fire, which through the great violence of the wind had acquired new force; and towards the garden I had caused some tables with pieces of tapestry and old clothes to be placed, in order to shelter me from the rain. As soon as I had applied the proper remedy to each evil, I with a loud voice cried out to my men to bestir themselves and lend a helping hand; so that when they saw that the concreted metal began to melt again, the whole body obeyed me with such zeal and alacrity, that every man did the work of three. Then I caused a mass of pewter weighing about sixty pounds to be thrown upon the metal in the furnace, which with the other helps, as the brisk wood fire, and stirring it sometimes with iron, and sometimes with long poles, soon became completely dissolved. Finding that, contrary to the opinion of my ignorant assistants, I had effected what seemed as difficult as to raise the dead, I recovered my vigor to such a degree, that I no longer perceived whether I had any fever, nor had I the least apprehension of death. Suddenly a loud noise was heard, and a glittering of fire flashed before our eyes, as if it had been the darting of a thunderbolt. Upon the appearance of this extraordinary phenomenon, terror seized on all present, and on none more than myself. This tremendous noise being over, we began to stare at each other, and perceived that the cover of the furnace had burst and flown off, so that the bronze began to run.

I immediately caused the mouths of my mold to be opened; but finding that the metal did not run with its usual velocity, and apprehending that the cause of it was that the fusibility of the metal was injured by the violence of the fire, I ordered all my dishes and porringers, which were in number about two hundred, to be placed one by one before my tubes, and part of them to be thrown into the furnace; upon which all present perceived that my bronze was completely dissolved, and that my mold was filling; they now with joy and alacrity assisted and obeyed me. I for my part was sometimes in one place, sometimes in another, giving my directions and assisting my men, before whom I offered up this prayer: "O God, I address myself to thee, who, of thy divine power, didst rise from the dead, and ascend in glory to heaven. I acknowledge in gratitude this mercy that my mold has been filled: I fall prostrate before thee, and with my whole heart return thanks to thy divine majesty." My prayer being over, I took a plate of meat which stood upon a little bench, and ate with a great appetite. I then drank with all my journeymen and assistants, and went joyful and in good health to bed; for there were still two hours of night; and I rested as well as if I had been troubled with no manner of disorder.

My good housekeeper, without my having given any orders, had provided a young capon for my dinner. When I arose, which was not till about noon, she accosted me in high spirits, and said merrily, "Is this the man that thought himself dying? It is my firm belief that the cuffs and kicks which you gave us last night, when you were quite frantic and possessed, frightened away your fever, which, apprehending lest you should fall upon it in the same manner, took to flight." So my whole poor family, having got over such panics and hardships, without delay procured earthen vessels to supply the place of the pewter dishes and porringers, and we all dined together very cheerfully; indeed, I do not remember having ever in my life eaten a meal with greater satisfaction, or with a better appetite. After dinner, all those who had assisted me in my work came and congratulated me upon what had happened, returned thanks to the Divine Being, for having interposed so mercifully in our behalf, and declared that they had in theory and practice learnt such things as were judged impossible by other masters. I thereupon thought it allowable to boast a little of my knowledge and skill in this fine art, and, pulling out my purse, satisfied all my workmen for their labor.

My mortal enemy, Pier Francesco Ricci, the duke's steward, was very eager to know how the affair had turned out; so that the two whom I suspected of being the cause of my metal's concretizing in the manner above related, told him that I was not a man, but rather a downright devil, for I had compassed that which was not in the power of art to effect; with many other surprising things which would have been too much even for the infernal powers. As they greatly exaggerated what had passed, perhaps with a view of excusing themselves, the steward wrote to the duke, who was then at Pisa, an account still more pompous, and more replete with the marvelous than that which the workingmen had given him.

Having left my work to cool during two days after it was cast, I began gradually to uncover it. I first of all found the Medusa's head, which had come out admirably by the assistance of the vents, as I had observed to the duke that the property of fire was to fly upwards. I proceeded to uncover the rest, and found that the other head, I mean that of Perseus, was likewise come out perfectly well. This occasioned me still greater surprise, because, as it is seen in the statue, it is much lower than that of Medusa, the mouth of that figure being placed over the head and shoulders of Perseus. I found that where the head of Perseus ends, all the bronze was exhausted which I had in my furnace. This surprised me very much, that there should not be any thing over and above what is necessary in casting. My astonishment, indeed, was raised to such a degree, that I looked upon it as a miracle immediately wrought by the Almighty. I went on uncovering it with great success, and found every part turn out to admiration, till I reached the foot of the right leg, which supports the figure, where I found the heel come out: so proceeding to examine it, and thinking that the whole was filled up, in one respect I was glad, in another sorry, because I had told the duke it would not have that effect. Continuing, however, to uncover it, I found that not only the toes were wanting, but part of the foot itself, so that there was almost one half deficient. This occasioned me some new trouble; but I was not displeased at it, because I could thereby convince the duke that I understood my business thoroughly; and though there had come out a great deal more of that foot than I thought there would, the reason was, that in consequence of the several accidents that had happened, it was heated much more than it could have been in the regular course of business; especially as the pewter plates had been thrown into the furnace, a thing never done before.

I was highly pleased that my work had succeeded so well, and went to Pisa to pay my respects to the duke, who received me in the most gracious manner imaginable. The duchess vied with him in kindness to me; and though the steward had written them an account of the affair, it appeared to them much more wonderful and extraordinary when I related it myself. Upon my speaking to him of the foot of Perseus, which had not come out (a circumstance of which I had apprised his excellency), I perceived that he was filled with the utmost astonishment, and told the affair to the duchess in the same terms that I had before related to him. Finding that these great personages were become so favorable to me, I availed myself of the opportunity to request the duke's permission to go to Rome: he granted it in the most obliging terms, and desired me to return speedily, in order to finish my statue of Perseus. He at the same time gave me letters of recommendation to his ambassador Averardo Serristori. This happened in the beginning of the pontificate of Pope Julio de Monti.

A Philosophy of the Infinite Universe

These are the doubts, difficulties and motives, about the solution whereof I have said enough in our dialogues to expose the intimate and radicated errors of the common philosophy, and to show the weight and worth of our own. Here you will meet with the reasons why we should not fear that any part of this Universe should fall or fly off, that the least particle should be lost in empty space, or be truly annihilated. Here you will perceive the reason of that vicissitude which may be observed in the constant change of all things, whereby it happens, that there is nothing so ill but may befall us or be prevented, nor anything so good but may be lost or obtained by us; since in this infinite field the parts and modes do perpetually vary, though the substance and the whole do eternally persevere the same.

From this contemplation (if we do but rightly consider), it will follow that we ought never to be dispirited by any strange accidents through excess of fear or pain, nor ever be elated by any prosperous event through excess of hope or pleasure; whence we have the way to true morality, and, following it, we would become the magnanimous despisers of what men of childish thoughts do fondly esteem, and the wise judges of the history of nature which is written in our minds, and the strict executioners of those divine laws which are engraven in the centre of our hearts. We would know that it is no harder thing to fly from hence up into heaven, than to fly from heaven back again to the earth, that ascending thither and ascending hither are all one; that we are no more circumferential to the other globes than they are to us, nor they more central to us than we are to them, and that none of them is more above the stars than we, as they are no less than we covered over or comprehended by the sky. Behold us therefore free from envying them! behold us delivered from the vain anxiety and foolish care of desiring to enjoy that good afar off, which in as great a degree we may possess so near hand, and even at home! Behold us freed from the terror that they should fall upon us, any more than we should hope that we might fall upon them; since every one as well as all of these globes are sustained by infinite ether, in which this our animal freely runs, and keeps to his prescribed course, as the rest of the planets do to theirs. . . .

We fear not, therefore, that what is accumulated in this world, should, by the malice of some wandering spirit, or by the wrath of some evil genius, be shook and scattered, as it were, into smoke or dust, out of this cupola of the sky, and beyond the starry mantle of the firmament; nor that the nature of things can otherwise come to be annihilated in substance, than, as it seems to our eyes, that the air contained in the concavity of a bubble is become nothing when that bubble is burst; because we know that in the world one thing ever succeeds another, there being no utmost bottom, whence, as by the hand of some artificer, things are irreparably struck into nothing. There are no ends, limits, margins, or walls, that keep back or subtract any parcel of the infinite abundance of things. Thence it is that the earth and sea are ever equally fertile, and thence the perpetual brightness of the sun, eternal fuel circulating to those devouring fires, and a supply of waters being eternally furnished to the evaporated seas, from the infinite and ever renewing magazine of matter: so that Democritus and Epicurus, who asserted the infinity of things with their perpetual variability and restoration were so far more in the right than he who endeavored to account for the eternally same appearance of the Universe, by making homogeneous particles of matter ever and numerically to succeed one another.

Thus the excellency of God is magnified, and the grandeur of his Empire made manifest; he is not glorified in one, but in numberless suns, not in one earth nor in one world, but in ten hundred thousand, of infinite globes: so that this faculty of the intellect is not vain or arbitrary, that ever will or can add space to space, quantity to quantity, unity to unity, member to member. By this science we are loosened from the chains of a most narrow dungeon, and set at liberty to rove in a most august empire; we are removed from conceited boundaries and poverty, to the innumerable riches of an infinite space, of so worthy a field, and of such beautiful worlds: this science does not, in a word, make a horizontal circle feigned by the eye on earth, and imagined by the fancy in the spacious sky.

THE GOLDEN AGE OF SPAIN

The Renaissance faced various conditions and experienced various developments in different countries. Spain, the next country after Italy to be ready for the transition to modern times, first accepted and then rejected modernism, so that its life and literature reflected violent contrasts.

By the end of the fifteenth century had come the unification of Spain under Ferdinand and Isabella, the fall of Granada (which doomed the Moorish empire in Spain), and the voyages of Columbus. Within a generation or so after this, in the reign of Emperor Charles V, Spain was the greatest power in Europe, controlling large sections of the continent and acquiring the land and treasures of the greater portion of the New World. A people hardened by many centuries of conflict with the Moors now enjoyed the full release of its energies and became a master class, to which nothing seemed impossible when one considers the staggering conquests of the small bands of conquistadores in the Western hemisphere. Wealth pouring into Spain, moreover, made luxury and cultural gratifications possible. That medievalism would give way to modern enlightenment seemed, therefore, inevitable, and signs of this were not wanting in the literature that emerged.

As early as the fourteenth century, a rich lyric poetry appeared in Castille, and the later composition of pastoral romances expressed the gaiety and pleasure-seeking of the Renaissance. Bubbling plays of love-making and adventure, known as "cloak and sword" drama, were turned out by numerous writers for Spain's popular theaters. Tirso de Molina gave the stage the dashing worldly and cynical character Don Juan in his Burlador de Sevilla; and Lope de Vega, the world's most prolific playwright, made "love and honor" the theme of about five hundred extant plays. Lope even composed a few dramas like Fuente Ovejuna (The Sheep-Well) in which the peasantry was endowed with a strong sense of its own worth and readiness to revolt against its feudal overlords. Realism appeared intermingled with the grossest obscenity in the famous prose play Celestina, which was intended to be read rather than staged. Prose, indeed, began to express contemporary reality with great vigor and satirical incisiveness. A veritable literature of roguery developed in such sixteenth-century novels as Lazarillo de Tormes and Aleman's Guzman de Alfarache. These are called picaresque novels after the word pícaro, the Spanish name for a low-class adventurer or rogue. Seen through the eyes of the pícaro, society revealed its corrupt and unromantic aspects. The modern novel of manners, represented in England by such masterpieces as Tom Jones and Peregrine Pickle, owes its beginnings to these picaresque tales. Cervantes' great Don Quixote successfully contrasted knightly adventure with everyday reality, and burlesqued the former. Gracián's Worldly Wisdom expressed the materialistic outlook of the times and spoke for the men who had to function in the business and official worlds of the empire. Finally, the Spain of the discoveries and conquests became articulate in histories and prose accounts.

Nevertheless, the Spanish Golden Age also revealed an exactly opposite tendency: to hold on to medievalism. Nowhere did the Church have such a strong grip on the people and put up such resistance to the critical spirit of the Renaissance.

The lower clergy and the activist Dominican Order fought resolutely and drew the high clergy and the monarchs of Spain away from whatever concessions they were willing to make to the new forces. The Jews and the Moors, whose economic and intellectual activity favored the rise of the modern world, were driven out; Spain refused to accept modern economic and social life. The Inquisition crushed intellectual inquiry and stamped out the beginnings of protestantism. Mysticism, piety, and fanaticism counteracted worldliness and the cult of reason. Spain, in short, drew away from the Renaissance at the very time when it was drawn toward it.

This conflict in Spain between the medieval and Renaissance spirits divided the soul of her Golden Age. Even so effervescent and vital a person as the playwright, Lope de Vega, gave himself up to seizures of penitence and piety, flogged himself in a cell, and served as an officer of the Inquisition. Nevertheless, memorable poetic work came out of this "anguish" of the Spanish soul, to use the term of the Spanish scholar, Professor Américo Castro.

The selections that follow present some of the fluctuations of the two attitudes of Spain during her greatest epoch. In Cervantes we find a critical view of medievalism, a realization of the incongruity of unbridled chivalric romanticism, to which Spanish taste was particularly partial, and yet a respect for spiritual and chivalric ideals. The Obscure Night of the Soul by St. John of the Cross (1549-1591) reveals the pure flame of Spanish mysticism, which also burned in the poetry of Fray Luis de Leon and in the prose and verse of Saint Teresa. The epic spirit appears in La Araucana, written in 1569 by Alonso de Ercilla y Zúñiga (1533-1599?) a member of Philip II's court. As a captain in one of the armies sent to conquer Chile, Ercilla participated in the struggle against the Araucanian Indians, the only tribe that successfully resisted the Spaniards. In La Araucana, the first important European poem written in America, Ercilla described this war, as well as the customs and methods of warfare of the Araucanians. This epic of some eight thousand lines is noteworthy for its unbiased portrayal of Indian chieftains and its respect for the natives. Contrary to our general impression, some of the conquistadors discovered that the Indians were not contemptible and benighted by comparison with Europeans. This discovery was made not without some anguish by men who had been reared in the belief that Christianity made men better than the rest of mankind.

In the plays of Calderón de la Barca we encounter the reflectiveness and other-worldliness that invaded even the theater, which had been a generation earlier the breeziest and most active in the world. Calderón (1600-1681) was educated in a Jesuit college in Madrid and then studied law at the University of Salamanca. He won popularity with ingeniously contrived plays about love and honor but he achieved even greater distinction with his numerous philosophical and religious plays. In La Vida es Sueño (Life Is a Dream), a philosophical play, a prince's evil disposition is cured by his realization that life is only a dream. In the body of Calderón's religious work there are about eighty, generally allegorical, short religious pieces (autos) and some long plays, among which the mystical Devotion of the Cross is the best. Its brigand hero Eusebio retains his devotion to the cross of Christ, at the foot of which he was born, even when he becomes a murderer, and thus achieves salvation after being restored to life long enough to confess his sins to a saint. The poems taken from Life Is a Dream and Devotion to the Cross represent the best of Calderón, his reflective and religious spirit.

The Art of Worldly Wisdom by Baltasar Gracián (1601-1658) represents the practical spirit that existed alongside the mystical one. The two often appeared in the same person; thus Saint Teresa was an energetic administrator as well as an enraptured nun and poetess. In Gracián we see the pragmatic side alone. His reflections are astute and admirably stated. But they reveal a narrow, compromising, and somewhat timid manner of approaching reality, like Spain's own policy when decadence made the country lackadaisical even in the struggle for political power.

Not many works of the Golden Age entered directly into our heritage. But there was one glorious exception: Cervantes' Don Quixote, which was translated into English as early as 1612, suggested the theme for Beaumont and Fletcher's charming Elizabethan play The Knight of the Burning Pestle, and was made an English masterpiece in 1701 by the Motteux translation.

Miguel de Cervantes (1547-1616) participated as a soldier in the famous naval victory of Lepanto over the Turks in 1571. Here he lost his left hand but remained in the service until three years later when he was captured by Algerian pirates while on his way home. After enduring many years of slavery in Algiers he was ransomed by his family and rejoined his regiment. Then he settled down to civilian life, marrying and becoming a clerk in the naval office, in which capacity he helped to equip the Spanish Armada. At this time, too, he resumed writing, realizing an ambition that had seized him in his youth.

He wrote about thirty plays but did not succeed in the theater. Following one Renaissance fashion, he composed an unsuccessful pastoral romance, Galatea; following another, he wrote two collections of novels, one of which, Novelas Exemplares (Exemplary Novels), contained interesting stories and proved immensely successful. It was a special circumstance, however, that launched him on the road to immortality. In 1597, when he was collector of revenue for the city of Granada, he was accused of withholding money from the treasury and was sent to prison. Here he conceived Don Quixote, the first part of which was completed in 1604 and published a year later. The book achieved instant popularity. In 1615, aroused when another author wrote a sequel to it, Cervantes returned to the exploits of Don Quixote and wrote a second part, which was even more delightful than the first. With Don Quixote and the Exemplary Novels Cervantes became Spain's greatest writer.

Cervantes wrote his book as an extravaganza to put an end forever to medieval romances, which were becoming increasingly extravagant as medieval knighthood vanished from the world. Recalling over one hundred and thirty books of this kind, and realizing the absurdity of this fashion, he showed the effect of the romances on an impressionable gentleman, Don Quixote, who goes out into the everyday world as a knight errant and becomes the victim of his illusions. The result is one of the most amusing masterpieces of all time. But the author of this work was a man of generous feeling and profound understanding. He, therefore, made Don Quixote a deeply pathetic figure and a symbol of idealism tilting against the practical world represented by his delightfully realistic peasant squire Sancho Panza and by the people he encounters on his travels. Don Quixote's generosity, sense of justice, and fidelity to his principles in a mocking and often brutal world, exalt him above most men despite his aberrations. He has "a higher reason and a nobler sanity" than the men and women who laugh at his absurd conduct.

Many writers have pondered on the meaning that Don Quixote acquired as it grew beyond Cervantes' original intention of composing a travesty. One of them, the contemporary Spanish philosopher Miguel de Unamuno, concludes that Don Quixote teaches us to place warmth of sympathy before the cold light of reason, to regard nothing as impossible, and to have the courage to defy the grubbing, materialistic world in the name of true humanity. This interpretation need not, however, detract from our enjoyment of Cervantes' glorious humor, his realistic pictures of life, and his narrative interest. In the last analysis, Cervantes was not a philosopher but a great humorist and storyteller.

Don Quixote

Chapter I

WHICH TREATS OF THE CONDITION AND PURSUITS OF THE FAMOUS DON QUIXOTE DE LA MANCHA

In a village of la Mancha, the name of which I have no desire to recollect, there lived, not long ago, one of those gentlemen who usually keep a lance upon a rack, an old buckler, a lean horse, and a coursing greyhound. Soup, composed of somewhat more beef than mutton, salmagundy at night, lentils on Fridays, and a pigeon, by way of addition, on Sundays, consumed three-fourths of his income; the remainder of it supplied him with a cloak of fine cloth, velvet breeches, with slippers of the same for holidays, and a suit of the best homespun, in which he adorned himself on week days. His establishment consisted of a housekeeper above forty, a niece not quite twenty, and a lad who served him both in the field and at home, who could saddle the horse or handle the pruning hook. The age of our gentleman bordered upon fifty years; he was of a strong constitution, spare-bodied, of a meager visage, a very early riser, and a lover of the chase. Some pretend to say that he had the surname of Quixada, or Quesada, for on this point his historians differ: but, from very plausible conjectures, we may conclude that his name was Quixada. That is, however, of little importance to our history: let it suffice that in relating it, we swerve not a jot from the truth.

Cervantes, Don Quixote. Translated by Peter Motteux. Miguel de Cervantes Saavedra (1547-1616) was born and died in Madrid. He led an active life as a soldier before turning to writing. His Don Quixote was composed between 1603 and 1614.

Be it known, then, that the above-mentioned gentleman, in his leisure moments, which composed the greater part of the year, applied himself with so much ardor and relish to the perusal of books of chivalry, that he almost wholly neglected the exercise of the chase, and even the regulation of his domestic affairs; indeed, so extravagant was his zeal in this pursuit that he sold many acres of arable land to purchase books of knight-errantry: collecting as many as he could possibly obtain. Among these, there were none he admired so much as those written by the famous Feliciano de Silva, whose brilliant prose and intricate style were, in his opinion, infinitely precious; especially those amorous speeches and challenges in which they so abound; such as: "the reason of unreasonable treatment of my reason so enfeebles my reason that with reason I complain of your beauty." And again: "the high heavens that, with your divinity, divinely fortify you with the stars, rendering you meritorious of the merit merited by your greatness." These and similar rhapsodies distracted the poor gentleman; for he labored to comprehend and unravel their meaning, which was more than Aristotle himself could do, were he to rise from the dead expressly for that purpose. He was not quite satisfied as to the wounds which Don Belianis gave and received; for he could not help thinking that, however skillful the professors who healed them, his face and whole body must infallibly have been covered with seams and scars. Nevertheless, he commended his author for concluding his book with the promise of that interminable adventure; and he often felt an inclination to seize the pen himself and conclude it, literally as it is there promised: this he would doubtless have done, and with success, had he not been diverted from it by meditations of greater moment, on which his mind was incessantly employed.

He often debated with the curate of the village,

a man of learning, and a graduate of Sigüenza, which of the two was the best knight, Palmerin of England,¹ or Amadis de Gaul; but master Nicholas, barber of the same place, declared that none ever equaled the knight of the sun; if, indeed, anyone could be compared to him, it was Don Galaor, brother of Amadis de Gaul, for he had a genius suited to everything: he was no effeminate knight, no whimperer, like his brother; and in point of courage, he was by no means his inferior. In short, he became so infatuated with this kind of study that he passed whole days and nights over these books: and thus, with little sleeping and much reading, his brains were dried up and his intellects deranged. His imagination was full of all that he had read; of enchantments, contests, battles, challenges, wounds, blandishments, amours, tortures, and impossible absurdities; and so firmly was he persuaded of the truth of the whole tissue of visionary fiction that, in his mind, no history in the world was more authentic. The Cid Ruy Diaz, he asserted, was a very good knight, but not to be compared with the knight of the flaming sword, who, with a single back-stroke, cleft asunder two fierce and monstrous giants. He was better pleased with Bernardo del Carpio, because, at Roncesvalles, he slew Roland the enchanted, by availing himself of the stratagem employed by Hercules upon Anteus, whom he squeezed to death within his arms. He spoke very favorably of the giant Morganti, for, although of that monstrous brood who are always proud and insolent, he alone was courteous and well-bred. Above all, he admired Rinaldo de Montalvan, particularly when he saw him sallying forth from his castle to plunder all he encountered; and when, moreover, he seized upon that image of Mahomet which according to history, was of massive gold. But he would have given his housekeeper, and even his niece into the bargain, for a fair opportunity of kicking the traitor, Ganelon.

In fine, his judgment being completely obscured, he was seized with one of the strangest fancies that ever entered the head of a madman; this was a persuasion that it behooved him, as well for the advancement of his glory as the service of his country, to become a knight-errant, and traverse the world, armed and mounted, in quest of adventures, and to practice all that had been performed by the knights-errant, of whom he had read; redressing every species of grievance, and exposing himself to dangers which, being surmounted, might secure to him eternal glory and renown. The poor gentleman imagined himself at least crowned Emperor of Trapisonda, by the valor of his arm: and thus indulging in these agreeable meditations, and borne away by the extraordinary pleasure he found in them, he hastened to put his designs into execution.

The first thing he did was to scour up some rusty armor, which belonged to his great-grandfather, and had lain many years neglected in a corner. These he cleaned and adjusted as well as he could, but he found one grand defect; the helmet was incomplete; having only the morion: this deficiency, however, he ingeniously supplied, by making a kind of vizor of pasteboard, which, being fixed to the morion, gave the appearance of an entire helmet. True it is that, in order to prove its strength, he drew his sword and gave it two strokes, the first of which instantly demolished the labor of a week; but not altogether approving of the facility with which it was destroyed, and in order to secure himself against a similar misfortune, he made another vizor, which, having fenced in the inside with small bars of iron, he felt assured of its strength, and without making any more experiments, held it to be a most excellent helmet.

In the next place, he visited his steed; and although this animal had more blemishes than the horse of Gonela, which "tantum pellis et ossa fuit,"² yet, in his eyes, neither the Bucephalus of Alexander, nor the Cid's Babieca, could be compared with him. Four days was he deliberating upon what name he should give him; for, as he said to himself, it would be very improper that a horse so excellent, appertaining to a knight so famous, should be without an appropriate name: he therefore endeavored to find one that should express what he had been before he belonged to a knight-errant, and also what he now was: nothing could, indeed, be more reasonable than that, when the master changed his state, the horse should likewise change his name and assume one, pompous and high-sounding as became the new order he now professed. So after having devised, altered, lengthened, curtailed, rejected, and again framed in his imagination a variety of names, he finally determined upon Rozinante, a name, in his opinion, lofty, sonorous, and full of meaning; importing that he had been only a Rozin, a drudge-horse, before his present condition, and that now he was before all the Rozins in the world.

Having given his horse a name so much to his satisfaction, he resolved to fix upon one for himself. This consideration employed him eight more days, which at length he determined to call himself Don Quixote; whence some of the historians of this most true history have concluded that his name was certainly Quixada, and not Quesada, as others would have it. Then recollecting that the valorous Amadis, not content with the simple appellation of Amadis, added thereto the name of his kingdom, and native country, in order to render it famous, styling himself Amadis de Gaul; so he, like a good knight, also added the name of his province, and called himself Don Quixote de la Mancha; whereby, in his opinion, he fully proclaimed his lineage and country, which, at the same time, he honored, by taking its name.

His armor being now furbished, his helmet made perfect, his horse and himself provided with names, he found nothing wanting but a lady to be in love with: for a knight-errant without the tender passion was a tree without leaves and fruit—a body without a soul. If, said he, for my sins, or rather, through my good fortune, I encounter some giant—an ordinary occurrence to knights-errant—and overthrow him at the first onset, or cleave him in twain, or, in short, vanquish him and force him to surrender, must I not have some lady, to whom I may send him, as a present? that when he enters into the presence of my charming mistress, he may throw himself upon his knees before her, and in a submissive, humble voice, say: "Madam, in me you behold the giant Caraculiambro, lord of the island Malendrania, who, being vanquished in single combat by the never-enough-to-be-praised Don Quixote de la Mancha, am by him commanded to present myself before you, to be disposed of according to the will and pleasure of your highness." How happy was our good knight after this harangue! How much more so when he found a mistress! It is said that, in a neighboring village, a good-looking peasant girl resided, of whom he had formerly been enamored, although it does not appear that she ever knew or cared about it; and this was the lady whom he chose to nominate mistress of his heart. He then sought a name for her, which, without entirely departing from her own, should incline and approach towards that of a princess, or great lady, and determined upon Dulcinea del Toboso (for she was a native of that village), a name, he thought, harmonious, uncommon, and expressive—like all the others which he had adopted.

² Was all skin and bones.

*Chapter II*WHICH TREATS OF THE FIRST SALLY THAT DON QUIXOTE
MADE FROM HIS NATIVE ABODE

These arrangements being made, he would no longer defer the execution of his project, which he hastened from a consideration of what the world suffered by his delay: so many were the grievances he intended to redress, the wrongs to rectify, errors to amend, abuses to reform, and debts to discharge! Therefore, without communicating his intentions to any individual, and wholly unobserved, one morning before day, being one of the most sultry in the month of July, he armed himself cap-a-pie, mounted Rozinante, placed the helmet on his head, braced on his target, took his lance, and, through the private gate of his back yard, issued forth into the open plain, in a transport of joy to think he had met with no obstacles to the commencement of his honorable enterprise. But scarcely had he found himself on the plain when he was assailed by a recollection so terrible as almost to make him abandon the undertaking: for it just then occurred to him, that he was not yet a knight; therefore, in conformity to the laws of chivalry, he neither could nor ought to enter the lists against any of that order; and, even if he had been actually dubbed, he should, as a new knight, have worn white armor, without any device on his shield, until he had gained one by force of arms. These considerations made him irresolute whether to proceed; but frenzy prevailing over reason, he determined to get himself made a knight by the first one he should meet, like many others, of whom he had read. As to white armor, he resolved, when he had an opportunity, to scour his own, so that it should be whiter than ermine. Having now composed his mind, he proceeded, taking whatever road his horse pleased; for therein, he believed, consisted the true spirit of adventure.

Our new adventurer, thus pursuing his way, conversed within himself, saying: "Who doubts but that in future times, when the true history of my famous achievements is brought to light, the sage who records them will, in this manner, describe my first sally! 'Scarcely had ruddy Phœbus extended over the face of this wide and spacious earth the golden filaments of his beautiful hair, and scarcely had the little painted birds, with their forked tongues, hailed, in soft and mellifluous harmony, the approach of the rosy harbinger of morn, who, leaving the soft couch of her jealous consort, had just disclosed herself to mortals through the gates and balconies of the Manchegan horizon, when the renowned knight, Don Quixote de la Mancha, quitting the slothful down, mounted Rozinante, his famous steed, and proceeded over the ancient memorable plain of Montiel (which was indeed the truth). O happy era, happy age," he continued, "when my glorious deeds shall be revealed to the world! deeds worthy of being engraven on brass, sculptured in marble, and recorded by the pencil! And thou, O sage enchanter, whosoever thou mayest be, destined to chronicle this extraordinary history! forget not, I beseech thee, my good Rozinante, the inseparable companion of all my toils!" Then again, as if really enamored, he exclaimed, "O Dulcinea, my princess! sovereign of this captive heart! greatly do you wrong me by a cruel adherence to your decree, forbidding me to appear in the presence of your beauty! Deign, O lady, to think on this enslaved heart, which, for love of you, endures so many pangs!"

In this wild strain he continued, imitating the style of his books as nearly as he could, and proceeding slowly on, while the sun arose with such intense heat that it was enough to dissolve his brains, if any had been left. He traveled almost the whole of that day without encountering any thing worthy of recital, which caused him much vexation, for he was impatient for an opportunity to prove the valor of his powerful arm.

Some author says his first adventure was that of the straits of Lapice; others affirm it to have been that of the wind-mills; but, from what I have been able to ascertain of this matter, and have found written in the annals of La Mancha, the fact is that he traveled all that day, and as night approached, both he and his horse were wearied and dying of hunger; and in this state, as he looked around him, in hopes of discovering some castle, or shepherd's cot, where he might repose and find refreshment, he descried, not far from the road, an inn, which to him was a star conducting him to the portals, if not the palaces, of his redemption. He made all the haste he could, and reached it at night-fall. There chanced to stand at the door two young women, ladies of pleasure (as they are called), on their journey to Seville, in the company of some carriers who rested there that night. Now as every thing that our adventurer saw and conceived was, by his imagination, molded to what he had read, so, in his eyes, the inn appeared to be a castle, with its four turrets, and pinnacles of shining silver, together with its draw-bridge, deep moat, and all the appurtenances with which such castles are usually described. When he had advanced within a short distance of it, he checked Rozinante, expecting some dwarf would mount the battlements, to announce, by sound of trumpet, the arrival of a knight-errant at the castle; but finding them tardy, and Rozinante impatient for the stable, he approached the inn-door, and there saw the two strolling girls, who to him appeared to be beautiful damsels or lovely dames, enjoying themselves before the gate of their castle.

It happened that just at this time a swineherd collecting his hogs (I make no apology, for so they are called) from an adjoining stubble field, blew the horn which assembles them together, and instantly Don Quixote was satisfied, for he imagined it was a dwarf who had given the signal of his arrival. With extraordinary satisfaction, therefore, he went up to the inn; upon which the ladies, being startled at the sight of a man armed in that manner, with lance and buckler, were retreating into the house; but Don Quixote, perceiving their alarm, raised his pasteboard vizor, thereby partly discovering his meager dusty visage, and, with gentle demeanor and placid voice, thus addressed them: "Fly not, ladies, nor fear any discourtesy, for it would be wholly inconsistent with the order of knighthood which I profess to offer insult to any person, much less to virgins of that exalted rank which your appearance indicates." The girls stared at him, and were endeavoring to find out his face, which was almost concealed by the sorry vizor; but hearing themselves called virgins, a thing so much out of the way of their profession, they could not forbear laughing, and to such a degree that Don Quixote was displeased, and said to them: "Modesty well becomes beauty, and excessive laughter, proceeding from a slight cause, is folly; but I say not this to humble or distress you, for my part is no other than to do you service." This language, so unintelligible to the ladies, added to the uncouth figure of our knight, increased their laughter; consequently he grew more indignant, and would have proceeded further, but for the timely appearance of the inn-keeper, a very corpulent, and therefore a very pacific, man, who, upon seeing so ludicrous an object, armed, and with accouterments so ill-sorted as were the bridle, lance, buckler, and corslet, felt disposed to join the damsels in demonstrations of mirth; but, in truth, apprehending some danger from a form thus strongly fortified, he resolved to behave with civility, and therefore said, "If, Sir Knight, you are seeking for a lodging, you will here find, excepting a bed (for there are none in this inn) every thing in abundance." Don Quixote, perceiving the humility of the governor of the fortress, for such to him appeared the inn-keeper, answered: "For me, Señor Castellano, any thing will suffice: since arms are my ornaments, warfare my repose." The host thought he called him Castellano, because he took him for a sound Castilian, whereas he was an Andalusian, of the coast of St. Lucar, as great a thief as Cacus, and not less mischievous than a collegian or a page: and he replied, "If so, your worship's beds must be hard rocks, and your sleep continual watching; and, that being the case, you may dismount with a certainty of finding here sufficient cause for keeping awake the whole year, much more a single night." So saying, he laid hold of Don Quixote's stirrup, who alighted with much difficulty and pain, for he had fasted the whole of the day. He then desired the host to take especial care of his steed, for it was the finest creature that ever fed; the inn-keeper examined him, but thought him not so good by half as his master had represented him. Having led the horse to the stable, he returned to receive the orders of his guest, whom the damsels, being now reconciled to him, were disarming; they had taken off the back and breast-plates, but endeavored in vain to disengage the gorget, or take off the counterfeit beaver, which he had fastened with green ribbons, in such a manner that they could not be untied, and he would upon no account allow them to be cut; therefore he remained all that night with his helmet on, making the strangest and most ridiculous figure imaginable.

While these light girls, whom he still conceived to be persons of quality and ladies of the castle, were disarming him, he said to them with infinite grace, "Never before was Knight so honored by ladies as Don Quixote, after his departure from his native village! damsels attended upon him; princesses took charge of his steed! O Rozinante,—for that, ladies, is the name of my horse, and Don Quixote de la Mancha my own; although it was not my intention to have discovered myself, until deeds, performed in your service, should have proclaimed me; but impelled to make so just an application of the ancient romance of Lanzarote, to my present situation, I have thus prematurely disclosed my name: yet the time shall come when your ladyships may command, and I obey; when the valor of my arm shall make manifest the desire I have to serve you." The girls, unaccustomed to such rhetorical flourishes, made no reply, but asked him whether he would please to eat anything. "I shall willingly take some food," answered Don Quixote, "for I apprehend it would be of much service to me." That day happened to be Friday, and there was nothing in the house but some fish, of that kind which in Castile is called Abadexo, in Andalusia, Bacallao, in some parts Curadillo, and in others Truchuela. They asked if his worship would like some truchuela, for they had no other fish to offer him. "If there be many troutlings," replied Don Quixote, "they will supply the place of one trout; for it is the same to me whether I receive eight single rials or one piece of eight. Moreover, these troutlings may be preferable, as veal is better than beef, and kid superior to goat; be that as it may, let it come immediately, for the toil and weight of arms cannot be sustained by the body unless the interior be supplied with aliments." For the benefit of the cool air, they placed the table at the door of the inn, and the landlord produced some of his ill-soaked, and worse-cooked, bacallao, with bread as foul and black as the Knight's armor: but it was a spectacle highly risible to see him eat; for his hands being engaged in holding his helmet on, and raising the beaver, he could not feed himself, therefore one of the ladies performed this office for him; but to drink would have been utterly impossible had not the inn-keeper bored a reed, and, placing one end into his mouth, at the other poured in the wine; and all this he patiently endured rather than cut the lacings of his helmet.

In the mean time there came to the inn a sow-gelder, who, as soon as he arrived, blew his pipe of reeds four or five times, which finally convinced Don Quixote that he was now in some famous castle, where he was regaled with music; that the poor jack was trout, the bread of the purest white, the strolling wenches ladies of distinction, and the inn-keeper governor of the castle; consequently he remained satisfied with his enterprise and first sally, though it troubled him to reflect that he was not yet a knight, being persuaded that he could not lawfully engage in any adventure until he had been invested with the order of knighthood.

Chapter III

IN WHICH IS DESCRIBED THE DIVERTING CEREMONY OF KNIGHTING DON QUIXOTE

Tormented by this idea, he abruptly finished his scanty meal, called the inn-keeper, and, shutting himself up with him in the stable, he fell on his knees before him, and said, "Never will I rise from this place, valorous knight, until your courtesy shall vouchsafe to grant a boon which it is my intention to request: a boon that will redound to your glory and to the benefit of all mankind." The inn-keeper, seeing his guest at his feet, and hearing such language, stood confounded, and stared at him, without knowing what to do or say; he entreated him to rise, but in vain, until he had promised to grant the boon he requested. "I expected no less, signor, from your great magnificence," replied Don Quixote; "know, therefore, that the boon I have demanded, and which your liberality has conceded, is that, on the morrow, you will confer upon me the honor of knighthood. This night I will watch my arms in the chapel of your castle, in order that, in the morning, my earnest desire may be fulfilled, and I may with propriety traverse the four quarters of the world, in quest of adventures, for the relief of the distressed; conformable to the duties of chivalry and of knights-errant, who, like myself, are devoted to such pursuits."

The host, who, as we have said, was a shrewd fellow, and had entertained some doubts respecting the wits of his guest, was now confirmed in his suspicions; and, to make sport for the night, determined to follow his humor. He told him therefore that his desire was very reasonable, and that such pursuits were natural and suitable to knights so illustrious as he appeared to be, and as his gallant demeanor fully testified; that he had himself in the days of his youth followed that honorable profession, and traveled over various parts of the world in search of adventures; failing not to visit the suburbs of Malaga, the isles of Riaran, the compass of Seville, the market place of Segovia, the olive field of Valencia, the rondilla of Granada, the coast of St. Lucar, the fountain of Cordova, the taverns of Toledo, and divers other parts, where he had exercised the agility of his heels and the dexterity of his hands; committing sundry wrongs, soliciting widows, seducing damsels, cheating youths; in short, making himself known to most of the tribunals in Spain; and that finally he had retired to this castle, where he lived upon his own revenue and that of others; entertaining therein all knights-errant of every quality and degree, solely for the great affection he bore them, and that they might share their fortune with him, in return for his good will. He further told him that in his castle there was no chapel wherein he could watch his armor, for it had been pulled down, in order to be rebuilt; but that, in cases of necessity, he knew it might be done wherever he pleased: therefore he might watch it that night in a court of the castle, and the following morning, if it pleased God, the requisite ceremonies should be performed, and he should be dubbed so effectually that the world would not be able to produce a more perfect knight. He then enquired if he had any money about him? Don Quixote told him he had none: having never read in their histories that knights-errant provided themselves with money. The inn-keeper assured him he was mistaken, for, admitting that it was not mentioned in their history, the authors deeming it unnecessary to specify things so obviously requisite as money and clean shirts, yet was it not, therefore, to be inferred that they had none; but, on the contrary, he might consider it as an established fact that all the knights-errant, of whose history so many volumes are filled, carried their purses well provided against accidents; that they were also supplied with shirts, and a small casket full of ointments, to heal the wounds they might receive; for, in plains and deserts, where they fought and were wounded, no aid was near, unless they had some sage enchanter for their friend, who could give them immediate assistance, by conveying in a cloud through the air some damsel or dwarf, with a vial of water, possessed of such virtue that, upon tasting a single drop of it, they should instantly become as sound as if they had received no injury. But when the knights of former times were without such a friend, they always took care that their esquires should be provided with money, and such necessary articles as lint and salves; and when they had no esquires, which very rarely happened, they carried these things themselves, upon the crupper of their horse, in wallets so small as to be scarcely visible, that they might seem to be something of more importance: for, except in such cases, the custom of carrying wallets was not tolerated among knights-errant. He therefore advised, though, as his godson (which he was soon to be), he might command him, never henceforth to travel without money and the aforesaid provisions; and he would find them serviceable when he least expected it. Don Quixote promised to follow his advice with punctuality; and an order was now given for performing the watch of the armor, in a large yard adjoining the inn. Don Quixote, having collected it together, placed it on a cistern which was close to a well; then, bracing on his target and grasping his lance, with graceful demeanor, he paced to and fro, before the pile, beginning his parade as soon as it was dark.

The inn-keeper informed all who were in the inn of the frenzy of his guest, the watching of his armor, and of the intended knighting. They were surprised at so singular a kind of madness, and went out to observe him at a distance. They perceived him sometimes quietly pacing along, and sometimes leaning upon his lance with his eyes fixed upon his armor, for a considerable time. It was now night, but the moon shone with a splendor which might vie even with that whence it was borrowed; so that every motion of our new knight might be distinctly seen.

At this time, it happened that one of the carriers wanted to give his mules some water; for which purpose it was necessary to remove Don Quixote's armor from the cistern, who, seeing him advance, exclaimed with a loud voice, "O thou, whosoever thou art, rash knight! who approachest the armor of the most valiant adventurer that ever girded sword, beware of what thou dost, and touch it not, unless thou wouldst yield thy life as the forfeit of thy temerity." The carrier heeded not this admonition (though better would it have been for him if he had) but, seizing hold of the straps, he threw the armor some distance from him, which Don Quixote perceiving, he raised his eyes to heaven, and addressing his thoughts, apparently, to his lady Dulcinea, said: "Assist me, O lady, to avenge this first insult offered to your vassal's breast; nor let your favor and protection fail me in this my first perilous encounter!" Having uttered these and similar ejaculations, he let slip his target, and, raising his lance with both hands, he gave the carrier such a stroke upon the head that he fell to the ground in so grievous a plight that, had the stroke been repeated, there would have been no need of a surgeon. This done, he replaced his armor, and continued his parade with the same tranquillity as before.

Soon after another carrier, not knowing what had passed, for the first yet lay stunned, came out with the same intention of watering his mules; and, as he approached to take away the armor from the cistern, Don Quixote, without saying a word or imploring any protection, again let slip his target, raised his lance, and, with no less effect than before, smote the head of the second carrier. The noise brought out all the people in the inn, and the landlord among the rest; upon which Don Quixote braced on his target, and, laying his hand upon his sword, said: "O lady of beauty! strength and vigor of my enfeebled heart! Now is the time for thee to turn thy illustrious eyes upon this thy captive knight, whom so mighty an encounter awaits!" This address had, he conceived, animated him with so much courage that, were all the carriers in the world to have assailed him, he would not have retreated one step.

The comrades of the wounded, upon discovering the situation of their friends, began at a distance to discharge a shower of stones upon Don Quixote, who sheltered himself as well as he could with his target, without daring to quit the cistern, because he would not abandon his armor. The inn-keeper called aloud to them, begging they would desist, for he had already told them he was insane, and that, as a madman, he would be acquitted, though he were to kill them all. Don Quixote, in a voice still louder, called them infamous traitors, and the lord of the castle a cowardly, base-born knight, for allowing knight-errant to be treated in that manner; declaring that, had he received the order of knighthood, he would have made him sensible of his perfidy. "But as for you, ye vile and worthless rabble, I utterly despise ye! Advance! Come on, molest me as far as ye are able, for quickly shall ye receive the reward of your folly and insolence!" This he uttered with so much spirit and intrepidity that the assailants were struck with terror; which, in addition to the landlord's persuasions, made them cease their attack; he then permitted the wounded to be carried off, and, with the same gravity and composure, resumed the watch of his armor.

The host, not relishing these pranks of his guest, determined to put an end to them, before any further mischief ensued, by immediately investing him with the luckless order of chivalry; approaching him, therefore, he disclaimed any concurrence, on his part, in the insolent conduct of those low people, who were, he observed, well chastised for their presumption. He repeated to him that there was no chapel in the castle, nor was it by any means necessary for what remained to be done; that the stroke of knighting consisted in blows on the neck and shoulders, according to the ceremonial of the order, which might be effectually performed in the middle of a field; that the duty of watching his armor he had now completely fulfilled, for he had watched more than four hours, though only two were required. All this Don Quixote believed, and said that he was there ready to obey him, requesting him, at the same time, to perform the deed as soon as possible; because, should he be assaulted again when he found himself knighted, he was resolved not to leave one person alive in the castle, excepting those whom, out of request, he might be induced to spare.

The constable, thus warned and alarmed, immediately brought forth a book in which he kept his account of the straw and oats he furnished to the carriers, and, attended by a boy, who carried an end of candle, and the two damsels before-mentioned, went towards Don Quixote, whom he commanded to kneel down; he then began reading in his manual, as if it were some devout prayer, in the course of which he raised his hand and gave him a good blow on the neck, and, after that, a handsome stroke over the shoulders, with his own sword, still muttering between his teeth, as if in prayer. This being done, he commanded one of the ladies to gird on his sword, an office she performed with much alacrity, as well as discretion, no small portion of which was necessary to avoid bursting with laughter at every part of the ceremony; but indeed the prowess they had seen displayed by the new knight kept their mirth within bounds. At girding on the sword, the good lady said: "God grant you may be a fortunate knight, and successful in battle." Don Quixote enquired her name, that he might thenceforward know to whom he was indebted for the favor received, as it was his intentions to bestow upon her some share of the honor he should acquire by the valor of his arm. She replied, with much humility, that her name was Tolosa, and that she was the daughter of a cobbler at Toledo, who lived at the stalls of Sanchobienaya; and that, wherever she was, she would serve and honor him as her lord. Don Quixote, in reply, requested her, for his sake, to do him the favor henceforth to add to her name the title of Don, and call herself Donna Tolosa, which she promised to do. The other girl now buckled on his spur, and with her he held nearly the same conference as with the lady of the sword; having enquired her name, she told him it was Molinera, and that she was daughter to an honest miller of Antiquera; he then requested her likewise to assume the Don, and style herself Donna Molinera, renewing his proffers of service and thanks.

These never-till-then-seen ceremonies being thus speedily performed, Don Quixote was impatient to find himself on horseback, in quest of adventures: he therefore instantly saddled Rozinante, mounted him, and, embracing his host, made his acknowledgments for the favor he had conferred, by knighting him, in terms so extraordinary that it would be in vain to attempt to repeat them. The host, in order to get rid of him the sooner, replied with no less flourish, but with more brevity; and, without making any demand for his lodging, wished him a good journey.

Chapter VIII

OF THE VALOROUS DON QUIXOTE'S SUCCESS IN THE DREADFUL AND NEVER-BEFORE-IMAGINED ADVENTURE OF THE WIND-MILLS; WITH OTHER EVENTS WORTHY TO BE RECORDED

As they were thus discoursing, they came in sight of thirty or forty wind-mills, which are in that plain; and, as soon as Don Quixote espied them, he said to his squire: "Fortune disposes our affairs better than we ourselves could have desired: look yonder, friend Sancho Panza, where thou mayest discover somewhat more than thirty monstrous giants, whom I intend to encounter and slay; and with their spoils we will begin to enrich ourselves: for it is lawful war, and doing God good service to remove so wicked a generation from off the face of the earth." "What giants?" said Sancho Panza. "Those thou seest yonder," answered his master, "with their long arms; for some are wont to have them almost of the length of two leagues." "Look, sir," answered Sancho, "those, which appear yonder are not giants, but wind-mills; and what seem to be arms are the sails, which, whirled about by the wind, make the mill-stone go." "It is very evident," answered Don Quixote, "that thou art not versed in the business of adventures: they are giants: and, if thou art afraid, get thee aside and pray, whilst I engage with them in fierce and unequal combat." So saying, he clapped spurs to his steed, notwithstanding the cries his squire sent after him, assuring him that they were certainly wind-mills, and not giants. But he was so fully possessed that they were giants that he neither heard the outcries of his squire Sancho, nor yet discerned what they were, though he was very near them, but went on crying out aloud: "Fly not, ye cowards and vile caitiffs; for it is a single knight who assaults you." The wind now rising a little, the great sails began to move: upon which Don Quixote called out: "Although ye should move more arms than the giant Briareus, ye shall pay for it."

Then recommending himself devoutly to his lady Dulcinea, beseeching her to succor him in the present danger, being well covered with his buckler, and setting his lance in the rest, he rushed on as fast as Rozinante could gallop, and attacked the first mill before him; when, running his lance into the sail, the wind whirled it about with so much violence that it broke the lance to shivers, dragging horse and rider after it, and tumbling them over and over on the plain, in very evil plight. Sancho Panza hastened to his assistance, as fast as the ass could carry him; and when he came up to his master, he found him unable to stir, so violent was the blow which he and Rozinante had received in their fall. "God save me!" quoth Sancho, "did I not warn you to have a care of what you did, for that they were nothing but wind-mills? And nobody could mistake them, but one that had the like in his head." "Peace, friend Sancho," answered Don Quixote: "for matters of war are, of all others, most subject to continual change. Now I verily believe, and it is most certainly the fact, that the sage Freston, who stole away my chamber and books, has metamorphosed those giants into wind-mills, on purpose to deprive me of the glory of vanquishing them, so great is the enmity he bears me! But his wicked arts will finally avail but little against the goodness of my sword." "God grant it!" answered Sancho Panza; then helping him to rise, he mounted him again upon his steed, which was almost disjointed.

Conversing upon the late adventure, they followed the road that led to the pass of Lapice; because there, Don Quixote said, they could not fail to meet with many and various adventures, as it was much frequented. He was, however, concerned at the loss of his lance; and, speaking of it to his squire, he said: "I remember to have read that a certain Spanish knight, called Diego Perez de Vargas, having broken his sword in fight, tore off a huge branch or limb from an oak, and performed such wonders with it that day, and dashed out the brains of so many Moors, that he was surnamed Machuca; and, from that day forward, he and his descendants bore the names of Vargas and Machuca. I now speak of this, because from the first oak we meet, I mean to tear a limb, at least as good as that; with which I purpose and resolve to perform such feats that thou shalt deem thyself most fortunate in having been thought worthy to behold them, and to be an eye-witness of things which will scarcely be credited." "God's will be done!" quoth Sancho; "I believe all just as you say, sir. But, pray set yourself more upright in your saddle: for you seem to me to ride sideling, owing, perhaps, to bruises received by your fall." "It is certainly so," said Don Quixote; "and, if I do not complain of pain, it is because knights-errant are not allowed to complain of any wound whatever, even though their entrails should issue from it." "If so, I have nothing more to say;" quoth Sancho; "but God knows I should be glad to hear your worship complain when any thing ails you. As for myself, I must complain of the least pain I feel, unless this business of not complaining extend also to the squires of knights-errant." Don Quixote could not forbear smiling at the simplicity of his squire, and told him he might complain whenever and as much as he pleased, either with or without cause, having never yet read any thing to the contrary in the laws of chivalry.

Sancho put him in mind that it was time to dine. His master answered that at present he had no need of food, but that he might eat whenever he thought proper. With this license, Sancho adjusted himself as well as he could upon his beast; and, taking out the contents of his wallet, he jogged on behind his master, very leisurely, eating, and ever anon raising the bottle to his mouth, with so much relish that the best fed victualer of Malaga might have envied him. And whilst he went on in this manner, repeating his draughts, he thought no more of the promises his master had made him; nor did he think it any toil, but rather a recreation, to go in quest of adventures, however perilous they might be. In fine, they passed that night under the shelter of some trees; and from one of them the knight tore a withered branch, to serve him in some sort as a lance, after fixing upon it the iron head of the one that had been broken. All that night Don Quixote slept not, but ruminated on his lady Dulcinea; conformably to the practice of knights-errant, who, as their histories told him, were wont to pass many successive nights in woods and deserts, without closing their eyes, indulging the sweet remembrance of their mistresses. Not so did Sancho spend the night; for, his stomach being full, and not of succory water, he made but one sleep of it; and, had not his master roused him, neither the beams of the sun, that darted full in his face, nor the melody of the birds, which, in great numbers, cheerfully saluted the approach of the new day, could have awaked him. At his uprising he applied again to his bottle, and found it much lighter than the evening before; which grieved him to the heart, for he did not think they were in the way soon to remedy that defect. Don Quixote would not yet break his fast; resolving, as we have said, still to subsist upon savory remembrances.

They now turned again into the road they had entered upon the day before, leading to the pass of Lapice, which they discovered about three in the afternoon. "Here, friend Sancho," said Don Quixote upon seeing it, "we may plunge our arms up to the elbows in what are termed adventures. But attend to this caution, that, even shouldst thou see me in the greatest peril in the world, thou must not lay hand to thy sword to defend me, unless thou perceivest that my assailants are vulgar and low people; in that case thou mayest assist me: but should they be knights, it is no wise agreeable to the laws of chivalry that thou shouldst interfere, until thou art thyself dubbed a knight." "Your worship," answered Sancho, "shall be obeyed most punctually therein, and the rather as I am naturally very peaceable, and an enemy to thrusting myself into brawls and squabbles; but, for all that, as to what regards the defense of my own person, I shall make no great account of those same laws, since both divine and human law allows every man to defend himself against whoever would wrong him." "That I grant," answered Don Quixote; "but with respect to giving me aid against knights, thou must refrain and keep within bounds thy natural impetuosity." "I say, I will do so," answered Sancho; "and I will observe this precept as religiously as the Lord's-day."

As they were thus discoursing, there appeared on the road two monks of the order of St. Benedict, mounted upon dromedaries; for the mules whereon they rode were not much less. They wore traveling masks, and carried umbrellas. Behind them came a coach, accompanied by four or five men on horseback, and two muleteers on foot. Within the coach, as it afterwards appeared, was a Biscaine lady on her way to join her husband at Seville, who was there waiting to embark for India, where he was appointed to a very honorable post. The monks were not in her company, but were only traveling the same road. Scarcely had Don Quixote espied them, when he said to his squire: "Either I am deceived, or this will prove the most famous adventure that ever happened; for those black figures that appear yonder must undoubtedly be enchanters, who are carrying off, in that coach, some princess, whom they have stolen; which wrong I am bound to use my utmost endeavors to redress." "This may prove a worse business than the wind-mills," said Sancho: "pray, sir, take notice that those are Benedictine monks, and the coach must belong to some travelers. Hearken to my advice, sir; have a care what you do, and let not the devil deceive you." "I have already told thee, Sancho," answered Don Quixote, "that thou knowest little concerning adventures: what I say is true, as thou wilt presently see." So saying, he advanced forward, and planted himself in the midst of the highway, by which the monks were to pass; and when they were so near that he supposed they could hear what he said, he cried out, with a loud voice: "Diabolical and monstrous race! Either instantly release the high-born princesses whom ye are carrying away perforce in that coach, or prepare for instant death, as the just chastisement of your wicked deeds." The monks stopped their mules, and stood amazed, as much at the figure of Don Quixote, as at his expressions; to which they answered: "Signor cavalier, we are neither diabolical nor monstrous, but monks of the Benedictine order, traveling on our own business, and entirely ignorant whether any princesses are carried away in that coach, by force, or not." "No fair speeches to me: for I know ye, treacherous scoundrels!" said Don Quixote: and, without waiting for a reply, he clapped spurs to Rozinante, and, with his lance couched, ran at the foremost monk, with such fury and resolution that, if he had not slid down from his mule, he would certainly have been thrown to the ground, and wounded too, if not killed outright. The second monk, on observing how his comrade was treated, clapped spurs to the sides of his good mule, and began to scour along the plain, lighter than the wind itself.

Sancho Panza, seeing the monk on the ground, leaped nimbly from his ass, and running up to him, began to disrobe him. While he was thus employed, the two lackeys came up and asked him why he was stripping their master. Sancho told them that they were his lawful perquisites, being the spoils of the battle, which his Lord Don Quixote had just won. The lackeys, who did not understand the jest, nor what was meant by spoils or battles, seeing that Don Quixote was at a distance, speaking with those in the coach, fell upon Sancho, threw him down, and, besides leaving him not a hair in his beard, gave him a hearty kicking, and left him stretched on the ground, deprived of sense and motion. Without losing a moment, the monk now got upon his mule again, trembling, terrified, and pale as death; and was no sooner mounted than he spurred after his companion, who stood at some distance, to observe the issue of this strange encounter: but, being unwilling to wait, they pursued their way, crossing themselves as often as if the devil had been at their heels. In the meantime Don Quixote, as it hath been already mentioned, addressing the lady in the coach, "Your beauteous ladyship may now," said he, "dispose of your person as pleaseth you best; for the pride of your ravishers lies humbled in the dust, overthrown by my invincible arm; and, that you may be at no trouble to learn the name of your deliverer, know that I am called Don Quixote de la Mancha, knight-errant and adventurer, and captive to the peerless and beauteous Dulcinea del Toboso; and, in requital of the benefit you have received at my hands, all that I desire is that you would return to Toboso, and, in my name, present yourselves before that lady, and tell her what I have done to obtain your liberty."

All that Don Quixote said was overheard by a certain squire, who accompanied the coach, a Biscainer, who, finding he would not let it proceed, but talked of their immediately returning to Toboso, flew at Don Quixote, and, taking hold of his lance, addressed him, in bad Castilian and worse Biscaine, after this manner: "Cavalier, begone! and the devil go with thee! I swear, by the God that made me, if thou dost not quit the coach, thou forfeitest thy life, as I am a Biscainer."

Don Quixote understood him very well, and with great calmness answered: "If thou wert a gentleman, as thou art not, I would before now have chastised thy folly and presumption, thou pitiful slave." "I no gentleman!" said the Biscainer; "I swear by the great God, thou lyeest, as I am a Christian; if thou wilt throw away thy lance, and draw thy sword, thou shalt see how soon the cat will get into the water: Biscainer by land, gentleman by sea, gentleman for the devil and thou lyeest! Now what hast thou to say?" "Thou shalt see that presently, as said Agrages," answered Don Quixote; then, throwing down his lance, he drew his sword, grasped his buckler, and set upon the Biscainer, with a resolution to take his life. The Biscainer, seeing him come on in that manner, would fain have alighted, knowing that his mule, a wretched hackney, was not to be trusted, but he had only time to draw his sword. Fortunately for him he was so near the coach as to be able to snatch from it a cushion, that served him for a shield; whereupon, they immediately fell to, as if they had been mortal enemies. The rest of the company would have made peace between them, but it was impossible; for the Biscainer swore, in his jargon, that, if they would not let him finish the combat, he would murder his mistress, or whoever attempted to prevent him. The lady of the coach, amazed and affrighted at what she saw, ordered the coachman to remove a little out of the way, and sat at a distance, beholding the rigorous conflict; in the progress of which, the Biscainer gave Don Quixote so mighty a stroke on one of his shoulders, and above his buckler, that, had it not been for his armor, he had cleft him down to the girdle. Don Quixote, feeling the weight of that unmeasurable blow, cried out aloud, saying: "O lady of my soul! Dulcinea, flower of all beauty! Succor this thy knight, who, to satisfy thy great goodness, exposes himself to this perilous extremity!" This invocation, the drawing his sword, the covering himself well with his buckler, and rushing with fury on the Biscainer, was the work of an instant—resolving to venture all on the fortune of a single blow. The Biscainer, perceiving his determination, resolved to do the same, and therefore waited for him, covering himself well with his cushion; but he was unable to turn his mule either to the right, or the left, for, being already jaded, and unaccustomed to such sport, the creature would 20 not move a step.

Don Quixote, as we before said, now advanced against the wary Biscainer, with his uplifted sword, fully determined to cleave him asunder; and the Biscainer awaited him, with his sword also raised, and guarded by his cushion. All the bystanders were in fearful suspense as to the event of those prodigious blows with which they threatened each other; and the lady of the coach and her attendants were making a thousand vows, and promises of offerings, to all the images and places of devotion in Spain, that God might deliver them and their squire from this great peril. But the misfortune is that the author of the history, at that very crisis, leaves the combat unfinished, pleading, in excuse, that he could find no more written of the exploits of Don Quixote than what he has already related. It is true, indeed, that the second undertaker of this work could not believe that so curious a history should have been consigned to oblivion; or that the wits of La Mancha should have so little curiosity as not to preserve in their archives, or cabinets, some memorials of this famous knight; and, under that persuasion, he did not despair of finding the conclusion of this delectable history; which, through the favor of heaven, actually came to pass, and in the manner that shall be faithfully recounted in the following chapter.

ST. JOHN OF THE CROSS

The Obscure Night of the Soul

Upon an obscure night
Fevered with love in love's anxiety
(O hapless-happy plight!)
I went, none seeing me,
Forth from my house where all things be.

By night, secure from sight,
And by the secret stair, disguisedly,
(O hapless-happy plight!)
By night, and privily,
Forth from my house where all things quiet be. 10

Blest night of wandering,
In secret, where by none might I be spied,
Nor I see anything;
Without a light or guide,
Save that which in my heart burnt in my side. 15

That light did lead me on,
More surely than the shining of noontide,
Where well I knew that one
Did for my coming bide;
Where He abode, might none but He abide. 20

O night that didst lead thus,
O night more lovely than the dawn of light,
O night that broughtest us,
Lover to lover's sight,
Lover with loved in marriage of delight! 25

Upon my flowery breast
Wholly for Him, and save Himself for none,
There did I give sweet rest
To my beloved one;
The fanning of the cedars breathed thereon. 30

When the first moving air
Blew from the tower and waved His locks aside,
His hand, with gentle care,
Did wound me in the side,
And in my body all my senses died. 35

All things I then forgot,
My cheek on Him who for my coming came;
All ceased, and I was not,
Leaving my cares and shame
Among the lilies, and forgetting them. 40

ALONSO DE ERCILLA

La Araucana

Not of ladies, love, or graces
 Do I sing, nor knights enamored,
 Nor of gifts and shows of feeling,
 Cares of love, or love's affections;
 But the valiant acts and prowess
 Of those never-daunted Spaniards
 Who with sword placed yoke of bondage
 On the neck of untamed Indian.

Chile, fertile province, famous
 In the vast Antarctic region,
 Known to far-flung mighty nations
 For its princely strength and courage,
 Has produced a race so noble,
 Proud and brave, illustrious, warlike,
 That by king it ne'er was humbled,
 Nor to foreign sway submitted. . . .

'Tis Arauco self-sufficient
 That with wisdom, fame and glory
 Holds the soil in far dominion
 From the one Pole to the other,
 Set the Spaniard in such hazard
 As my writing soon will picture.
 Twenty leagues contain its landmarks,
 Sixteen Toqui¹ chiefs possess it.

Each brave has one weapon only,
 Which he skills himself to handle,
 One to which since early childhood
 He has shown fond predilection.
 He attempts with this one solely,
 To win mastery; the archer
 Is untrammelled by the pikestaff;
 Pikeman spurns the bow and arrows. . . .

Beardless men, robust of gesture,
 Theirs are full-grown, shapely bodies,
 Lofty chests and massive shoulders,
 Stalwart limbs and steely sinews;
 They are confident, emboldened,
 Dauntless, gallant, and audacious,
 Firm inured to work, and suffering
 Mortal cold, and heat, and hunger.

Never has a king subjected
 Such fierce people proud of freedom,

Nor has alien nation boasted
 E'er of having trod their borders;
 Ne'er has dared a neighboring country
 Raise the sword and move against them;
 Always were they feared, unshackled,
 Free of laws, with necks unbending.

[It was decreed in tribal council that the supreme command should fall to him who could longest bear a heavy tree trunk. Lincoya had borne the 10 log of leadership longer than all the contestants.
 Then Caupolicán gave the best performance of all:]

Briskly walked the proud barbarian
 Who was more than most outstanding, 50
 When Caupolicán, sans escort,
 Nimble entered the arena.
 Since his birth his eye was sightless,
 Like a precious blood-red garnet;
 But deficiency of vision
 He offset by strength and effort.

20 This young blade was tall of stature,
 Masculine, authoritative,
 Grave, severe, and loving justice,
 Harsh, and rigorous, and righteous, 60
 Large of body, chest uplifted,
 Skillful, passing strong, and agile,
 Wise and resolute, sagacious,
 E'er eschewing rash behavior.

With what happy signs they greeted
 Him, though in their hearts they quavered!
 To him they revealed the matter
 30 Pithily from start to finish.
 Seeing now Apollo plunging
 Down the sea-lanes, they determined 70
 That his testing wait the morrow,
 Till the longed-for light had risen.

Night was passed in great contention
 Which arose with his arrival.
 Some upheld Lincoya; others
 Claimed Caupolicán the stronger.
 Pro and con the bets were posted.
 40 Others, doubtful, waived their wagers,
 Waiting with their eyes turned eastward
 For a glimpse of Phoebus' horses. 80

Alonso de Ercilla y Zúñiga (1533-1599?), La Araucana. Translated by Paul Thomas Manchester and Charles Maxwell Lancaster by whose permission these lines are reprinted.

¹ The ranking chieftains of the Araucanians were called Ulmens, Apo-Ulmens, and Toquis.

Rosy dawn had just embroidered
 Cloudlets with a thousand stitches,
 And the wretched folk and tillers
 Wakened to accustomed labor,
 Dawn already was restoring
 Freshened hues to withered gardens;
 New-born light suffused that valley
 As Caupolicán came striding.

With disdain and haughty bearing,
 Seizing hard the knotty tree-trunk,
 As if 'twere a dainty yardstick,
 On his sturdy back he laid it.
 Silence hushed the crowd in wonder,
 Seeing frame so strong of sinew;
 Color changed for fell Lincoya;
 Hope of victory had faded.

Slowly paced the prudent savage
 In the daybreak's hastening brightness.
 Sun cut down the lengthened shadows,
 But he never shrank in purpose,
 In the West the light was waning,
 But his heart's flame never flickered.
 Stars appeared in myriad radiance,
 Gleaming on that tireless hero.

Peering moonbeams lamped the tourney
 From their dampened lodge of shadows,
 Ridding somber field and forest
 Of their murky veil of darkness.
 Still Caupolicán ne'er wavered
 From his wager; but renewing
 Strength, he stood and bore his burden,
 As if by no weight afflicted.

'Twixt two towering Andean ridges
 Loomed afar Tithonus² lady,
 With her golden hair disheveled,
 Shaken free from dewy hoar-frost,
 And she greened the languid meadows
 Blossoming with cool-sprayed moisture,
 And like pearls 'midst gems of colors
 Lovely, lay enchased in flowers.

Phaeton's chariot came coursing
 From the sea, o'er road long travelled;
 Shadows plucked the peaks of mountains
 From the sun's gaze; and the warrior,
 Stout, though freighted down with burden,
 Tottered back and forth, unwearied,
 Though again the dense, black curtain
 Swiftly fell, the day immersing.

[The burning and sacking of Concepción by the Indians is the most graphic scene of Canto VII:]
 Villagers in sight of houses
 Spread about in all directions, 130
 That the pillage of their city
 Furnish booty nothing human.
 On the signal of departure,
 Like a darkened flock of starlings
 Swooping on the whitened wheat stacks,
 Hostile armies sacked the village. . . .

Some climbed stairs, and some descended,
 Others rushed to clothes and coffers,
 Opening or bursting hinges,
 Leaving not one bag or trinket; 140
 Some contended, others shuffled;
 Some brought loot for fair division;
 Through the turrets, roofs, and attics,
 Burdened down, appeared the savage.

Savage hearts broke forth in madness
 And their war-cries loud resounded, 100
 Seeing flames respecting nothing,
 Carvings, pillars, roofs, nor stables;
 Not a man in all that rabble
 Grieved, beholding such destruction; 150
 But they groaned and muttered, sighing
 For the things to fire resistant.

Then again the tongues Plutonian
 Flicked the clouds with darting radiance;
 Northern gales loosed violent swirlings,
 Shook the trees and bent their branches: 110
 Vulcan with his lusty bellows
 Blew his smutty breath in anger,
 Giving life to dying embers
 Till in flames all things were leveled. 160

Nero fiddled, sang his ballads
 As alone he laughed and gloated
 O'er the crumbling gates of Caesar,
 Rome, reduced to smoke and ashes.
 Nero never laughed so raucous
 As those loathsome base barbarians 120
 Roared to see the blazes ravage
 Opulence of magic cities.

[In Canto VIII, Caupolicán holds a powwow to discuss a fresh attack:]
 "We shall test these folks' divineness.
 If they drop from skies of crystal, 170
 As they claim, our steel will hew them
 And will devastate their lineage . . .

² Eos, in Greek mythology; "rosy-fingered dawn"; Aurora to the Romans, who brought her lover, Tithonus, the gift of immortality and bore him a son.

Flicked no eyelash, and their nostrils
 Scarcely breathed upon their spirits
 During this harangue so haughty
 Which Caupolicán delivered.
 Complimentary responses,
 Courteous speech flowed. Prince Lautaro
 Smiled, excused himself from speaking,
 And Lincoya stood in answer:

"Lord, in token of my fealty
 Where you lead I swear I'll follow,
 Nor will chance adverse and horrid
 Turn my bleeding bosom homeward.
 Sire, of this you may be certain:
 All will fail and all be blasted
 Ere the vouchsafed word and promise
 Of a man like me betray you."

Thus he spake, and when requested,
 Old Curaca Peteguelen,
 Stern and stolid in annoyance,
 But in peacetime, soft and human,
 Shrivelled, but of wiry structure,
 Lord of that lush beauteous plainland,
 Vast of voice and grave of gesture,
 Rasped in accents philosophic:

"Warrior strong and perfect captain,
 I'm not loath to be the first one
 To assay my breastplate's texture.
 If my axe breaks through its lining
 I can pledge you as an expert
 That much work remains unfinished
 Ere the Spaniard quit our country,
 Ere we dream of Spain invaded."

This chief hushed, strode Tucapelo
 Scowling with inflamed demeanor,
 And without respect he bellowed
 In a tone of rage contemptuous,
 Saying: "Spain does not affright me,
 And I'll doff my cloak of manhood,
 If alone I do not ruin
 Christians, be they gods or earthlings.

By my dexterous arm I vow you,
 If two years my stick sustains me,
 Flouting Heaven with pure iron
 I'll discharge this dire commission,
 Let no wall of Spain stand upright.
 Passion puffs me with ambition,
 For when alien soil is leveled,
 War I'll wage on Heaven's portals.

Fates exist not; silly twaddle,
 Mouthed to clog us, and to hamper!
 Witless is belief in Fortune.
 Destiny is might of muscle.
 Sooner will the skyland's fortress
 Crumble in explosive fragments
 Than will Tucapel's sworn promise
 Fail or flag one jot or tittle."

[Colocolo again soothes their angry hearts:]
 "Verdant age, oh sons, provokes you
 To insanity. We old ones
 Bring the world no other profit
 Than the winds of wholesome counsel.
 Smoky vapors do not blind us,
 Nor the surging saps of springtime.
 Free of fervor, young no longer,
 We can plumb the depths of wisdom.

You, O captains, plucky, dauntless,
 Swollen with a single triumph,
 Bawl and stretch your toes and fingers
 Like papooses born but lately.
 Moderate your ire ungoverned.
 Mitigate your breasts' upheaval.
 Do not let your scorn of Spaniards
 Sell away your lives too cheaply." . . .

After him, the necromancer,
 Wizened weasel, aged Curaca,
 Self-styled augur Puchecalco,
 Held a sage prognosticator,
 Heaving sighs of deep hysteria,
 Thus began to rave in sorrow:
 "Eponamon," Prince of midnight,
 Supplement my wails prophetic! . . .

Full of portents are the breezes;
 Screeching birds flap wings nocturnal,
 Fouling day's serenest glamor,
 Boding fatal ills prodigious.
 Plants with earthy humors laden.
 Wither, starve, and vanish, fruitless.
 Moon, sun, stars confirm this havoc,
 Omens by the hundred thousands . . .

Death, irreparable and furious,
 With a baleful mien looms on us.
 Lady Luck, once bright and friendly,
 Stares and frowns upon us outcasts.
 Eponamon, grim, horrendous,
 In warm blood of ours enveloped,
 Hooks his claws and scours the desert,
 Leading us to what oasis?"

⁸ The war-god of the Araucanians.

[As the Spaniards rebuild Concepción, they are attacked by Lautaro's braves:]

When the sun had reached the zenith
Of the brazen vault celestial,
And the cricket shrill was chirring
With a counterpoint discordant,
Then Lautaro's camp was lifted,
Then marched off the close-packed squadron
In the din of rhythmic treading
Toward the site of Spanish sconces.

Those withdrawn within the fortress
Warded off the assault like tigers,
Prizing death above submission,
Treasuring a glorious sunset;
Powered with such aspiration,
Lunged they without hope of living,
Butchering their adversaries,
Loosening blood-lakes on the plaza.

In that citadel, Lautaro,
Flouting arms and men, first entered,
Tomahawked and scalped two soldiers,
Which that morning's chance had flung him.
Smiting, slashing went Lincoya.
Who can tell of Tucapelo
Who would brave celestial portals,
If he could but find a ladder?

Scarcely had the headstrong savage
Landed firmly in the plaza,
When he swung his bulky cudgel,
And dispersed his lurking foemen;
Fine-meshed mail, stout armor-plating,
Helmets were not worth a copper;
Raining blows they could not suffer;
Skulls and brains were mashed and mangled.

Some fell bruised and badly crippled;
Others swooned from life-long damage;
Through their chests he drove their neck-bones,
And their ribs and backs he fractured.
As if all their bones were beeswax,
They were twisted, crushed, and molded,
As he forced his way unflinching,
Through the armored human thicket. . . .

[Lautaro, surprised by the Spanish foe as he languishes in the arms of his beautiful wife, Guacolda:]

Their retreat had one lane only
Occupied with hawk-eyed sentries.
Other paths lacked trails or footprints
Since the land was almost barren.
On that night the savage slumbered
In the arms of fair Guacolda

Whom he loved with flaming passion,
Who for him felt equal ardor.

The Araucan was divested
Of his cumbrous martial trappings.
That night only fate disposed him
To repose and sweet caresses.
Heavy nightmares pressed his eyelids.
He awoke distressed and anxious,
And Guacolda, taut and breathless,
Asked him why he seemed so startled.

"Dear beloved," Lautaro answered,
"Just this instant I was dreaming
That a scowling Spaniard faced me
With ferocity depicted
In his mien. With hands of violence
He squeezed out my heart and robbed me
Of my manliness. I woke then Overcome with rage and sorrow."
In a troubled tone she murmured:
"I, alas, have dreamed this, also.
Happiness I e'er distrusted. . . .

Spectral visions, soon unveiling,
Will attempt to mar love's banquet,
Leave our bridal bed forsaken.
Never shall they separate us.
Such a blow I cannot suffer.
But in other blows there's solace.
When cold earth received your body,
Mine shall lie in death above you."

Great Pillano's son embraced her;
Arms about her neck, he clasped her,
Bathed with tears her swan-white bosom;
And with reallumed love-longing
He responded: "Fret not, lady,
Nor becloud my joy with omens.
Let delight preside, for freely
In these arms I'll e'er possess you.

Who restored to Araucan people
Self-esteem, lost reputation,
After necks, untamed and stately,
To domestic yokes fell victim.
I, the man who ripped asunder
Spanish tyranny's dominions!
In this land my name suffices
Sans the sword to waken war-lust.

All the less, with you beside me
Should I fear or slink from damage;
Let not dreams harass you, lady,
For reality is tearless.
From more slippery crags abysmal

Has my fortune been left dangling.
I have looked on direr dangers,
Always thwarting them with honor."

She, less sure and still more plaintive
To Lautaro's neck was hanging,
And with piteous eyes she conjured
What her lips had failed to wheedle:
"If that purest love I gave you
Freely, when I had most freedom
If, as Heaven is my witness
It prevails, sweet lord and lover,

By it now, I swear, by torment
That I felt when you forsook me,
By that troth the wind has spared us,
That you pledged me with great weeping,
Give at least this one contentment,
If through me it has caressed you,
Don your war-gear, Do not tarry.
Lead your warriors to the rampart."

He responded: "All too clearly
Is your little faith depicted.
Is Lautaro held so feeble;
And do you despise his warclub
Cherished for the folk's redemption
Which has shown itself so worthy?
You accredit me a hero
Since forsooth you weep my passing."

"Lackaday," exclaimed Guacolda;
"I am satisfied, but worried.
Your strong arm can bring what profit,
If my woe is dire and stronger?
Now that qualms I have stand naked,
That same love I hold assures me
Since the sword that separates us
Sends me too to dog your traces.

Since necessity and hazard
Menace me with bitter downfall,
And I needs must bear such evil
As to see you parted from me,
Let the little life that's left me
Sip some sweetness ere I perish.
They who sense no ill are proven
To derive small bliss from blessings." . . .

As we may presume, Lautaro
Reasoned long with sweet Guacolda,
With assurances and chidings
For the little faith she offered;

Spurning reason, and offended,
She endured far greater sorrow
As the sound of drums and trumpets
Interrupted tender wranglings.

Never leaps the wretched miser
370 Pondering on his hoard of riches
With such sprightliness when startled
By the noise of thieves and robbers;
Never did a mother hasten 420
To the cries of son beloved,
Fearing some wild beast's encroachment,
As Lautaro met this summons.

On his arm was draped his mantle,
Bare his body, bare his rapier.
Ran the savage to the portal,
380 For he had no time for arming,
Oh perfidious, fickle Fortune,
With what cruelty art thou smirking,
For the goodness of the ages 430
Thus with one fell blow thou stealest!

Friends and neighboring troops four hundred
By one flank attacked the stronghold,
Who to aid, abet the Christians,
Hastened with their painted quivers;
390 Ready hands and nimble forces
Loosed the shafts in countless volleys;
From their midst Pillano's offspring
Stepped to meet the dart that sought him.

On the left, oh luck accursed! 440
Tore the arrow so directed
That it pierced the heart most noble
E'er contained in human bosom.
Death was proud of such a target,
Seeing in one blow its laurels,
And usurping murderous glory,
400 Death proclaimed this wound its guerdon.

Tragedy was the arrow's mission,
For the fierce one bit the gravel,
Opening wide a copious spigot, 450
Pouring blood in black abundance;
From his face the color vanished;
Eyes he walled; from mortal body
Rushed his soul in rapid anguish
Downward to the abode infernal.

PEDRO CALDERÓN DE LA BARCA

The Dream Called Life

A dream it was in which I found myself.
 And you that hail me now, then hailed me king,
 In a brave palace that was all my own,
 Within, and all without it, mine; until,
 Drunk with excess of majesty and pride, 5
 Methought I towered so big and swelled so wide
 That of myself I burst the glittering bubble
 Which my ambition had about me blown
 And all again was darkness. Such a dream
 As this, in which I may be walking now, 10
 Dispensing solemn justice to you shadows,
 Who make believe to listen; but anon
 Kings, princes, captains, warriors, plume and steel,
 Ay, even with all your airy theater,
 May flit into the air you seem to rend 15
 With acclamations, leaving me to wake
 In the dark tower; or dreaming that I wake
 From this that waking is; or this and that,
 Both waking and both dreaming; such a doubt
 Confounds and clouds our mortal life about. 20
 But whether wake or dreaming, this I know
 How dreamwise human glories come and go;
 Whose momentary tenure not to break,
 Walking as one who knows he soon may wake,
 So fairly carry the full cup, so well 25
 Disordered insolence and passion quell,
 That there be nothing after to upbraid
 Dreamer or doer in the part he played;
 Whether to-morrow's dawn shall break the spell,
 Or the last trumpet of the Eternal Day, 30
 When dreaming, with the night, shall pass away.

The Dying Eusebio's Address to the Cross

Tree, whereon the pitying skies
 Hang the true fruit love doth sweeten,
 Antidote of that first eaten,
 Flower of man's new paradise,
 Rainbow, that to tearful eyes 5
 Sin's receding flood discloses—
 Pledge that earth in peace reposes,
 Beauteous plant, all fruitful vine.
 A newer David's harp divine,
 Table of a second Moses;— 10
 Sinner am I, therefore I
 Claim thine aid as all mine own,
 Since for sinful man alone,
 God came down on thee to die:
 Praise through me thou hast won thereby, 16
 Since for me would God have died,
 If the world held none beside.
 Then, O Cross! thou 'rt all for me,
 Since God had not died on thee
 If sin's depths I had not tried. 20
 Ever for thy intercession
 Hath my faith implored, O Cross!
 That thou wouldst not to my loss
 Let me die without confession.
 I, repenting my transgression, 25
 Will not the first robber be
 Who on thee confessed to God;
 Since we two the same path trod,
 And repent, deny not me
 The redemption wrought on thee. 30

BALTASAR GRACIÁN

Worldly Wisdom

A MAN OF THE AGE

The rarest individuals depend on their age. It is not every one that finds the age he deserves, and even when he finds it he does not always know how to utilise it. Some men have been worthy of a better century, for every species of good does not always triumph. Things have their period; even excellences are subject to fashion. The sage has one advantage: he is immortal. If this is not his century many others will be.

SYMPATHY WITH GREAT MINDS

It is an heroic quality to agree with heroes. 'Tis like a miracle of nature for mystery and for use. There is a natural kinship of hearts and minds: its effects are such that vulgar ignorance scents witchcraft. Esteem established, goodwill follows, which at times reaches affection. It persuades without words and obtains without earning. This sympathy is sometimes active, sometimes passive, both alike felicitic; the more so, the more sublime. 'Tis a great art to recognise, to distinguish and to utilise this gift. No amount of energy suffices without that favour of nature.

SEE THAT THINGS END WELL

Some regard more the rigour of the game than the winning of it, but to the world the discredit of the final failure does away with any recognition of the previous care. The victor need not explain. The world does not notice the details of the measures employed, but only the good or ill result. You lose nothing if you gain your end. A good end gilds everything, however unsatisfactory the means. Thus at times it is part of the art of life to transgress the rules of the art, if you cannot end well otherwise.

DO AND BE SEEN DOING

Things do not pass for what they are but for what they seem. To be of use and to know how to show yourself of use, is to be twice as useful. What is not seen is as if it was not. Even the Right does not receive proper consideration if it does not seem right. The observant are far fewer in number than those who are deceived by appearances. Deceit rules the roost, and things are judged by their jackets, and many things are other than they seem. A good exterior is the best recommendation of the inner perfection.

BETTER MAD WITH THE REST OF THE WORLD THAN WISE ALONE

So say politicians. If all are so, one is no worse off than the rest, whereas solitary wisdom passes for folly. So important is it to sail with the stream. The greatest wisdom often consists in ignorance, or the pretence of it. One has to live with others, and others are mostly ignorant. "To live entirely alone one must be very like a god or quite like a wild beast," but I would turn the aphorism by saying: Better be wise with the many than a fool all alone. There be some too who seek to be original by seeking chimeras.

DO NOT SHOW YOUR WOUNDED FINGER,

for everything will knock up against it; nor complain about it, for malice always aims where weakness can be injured. It is no use to be vexed: being the butt of the talk will only vex you the more. Ill-will searches for wounds to irritate, aims darts to try the temper, and tries a thousand ways to sting to the quick. The wise never own to being hit, or disclose any evil, whether personal or hereditary. For even Fate sometimes likes to wound us where we are most tender. It always mortifies wounded flesh. Never therefore disclose the source of mortification or of joy, if you wish the one to cease, the other to endure.

LIVE FOR THE MOMENT

Our acts and thoughts and all must be determined by circumstances. Will when you may, for time and tide wait for no man. Do not live by certain fixed rules, except those that relate to the cardinal virtues. Nor let your will subscribe fixed conditions, for you may have to drink the water to-morrow which you cast away to-day. There be some so absurdly paradoxical that they expect all the circumstances of an action should bend to their eccentric whims and not vice versa. The wise man knows that the very polestar of prudence lies in steering by the wind.

ALWAYS ACT AS IF YOUR ACTS WERE SEEN

He must see all round who sees that men see him or will see him. He knows that walls have ears and that ill deeds rebound back. Even when alone he acts as if the eyes of the whole world were upon him. For as he knows that sooner or later all will be known, so he considers those to be present as witnesses who must afterwards hear of the deed. He that wished the whole world might always see him did not mind that his neighbours could see him over their walls.

IN ONE WORD, BE A SAINT

So is all said at once. Virtue is the link of all perfections, the centre of all the felicities. She it is that makes a man prudent, discreet, sagacious, cautious, wise, courageous, thoughtful, trustworthy, happy, honoured, truthful, and a universal Hero. Three HHH's make a man happy—Health, Holiness, and a Headpiece. Virtue is the sun of the microcosm, and has for hemisphere a good conscience. She is so beautiful that she finds favour with both God and man. Nothing is lovable but virtue, nothing detestable but vice. Virtue alone is serious, all else is but jest. A man's capacity and greatness are to be measured by his virtue and not by his fortune. She alone is all-sufficient. She makes men lovable in life, memorable after death.

THE FRENCH SPIRIT

The cultural supremacy of France on the European continent has been universally recognized. The cardinal fact to be remembered is that French culture remained uninterrupted during four fruitful centuries between its sixteenth-century Renaissance and our own day. No other land except England enjoyed such good fortune.

French literature revealed elements of modernism as early as the thirteenth century. In 1357 began the Hundred Years War with England over problems of vassalage and claims to the throne. The resulting misery and chaos pushed back the wheel of progress, and French writing stagnated. But by the middle of the fifteenth century the French nation began to recover, and even in the last years of the war a democratic spirit was making itself felt and was being harnessed to a strong monarchy.

VILLON AND MODERN BEGINNINGS

The new age appeared in the poetry of François Villon (1431-c.1484). By contrast with other poets of the period, like Alain Chartier and Charles, Duke of Orleans, Villon was exceptional. Medieval in his verse forms (the ballade, rondeau, etc.) and in his brooding on death, Villon was nevertheless modern in his realistic evocation of common life and in his satirical incisiveness. The child of a transitional era during which the social equilibrium of France was virtually destroyed, he led one of the most disorderly lives ever recorded of a poet. A scholar destined for the clergy, after receiving a Master's degree from the University of Paris, he fell into bad company, became a member of a thieving and robbing fraternity, committed murders in the course of unsavory brawls, and got into scrapes that caused his imprisonment and brought him within the shadow of the gallows in 1463. The sentence of death was commuted to banishment, but he appears to have died shortly thereafter, his health having been undermined by dissipation and prison.

Out of Villon's knowledge of the depths came a new poetry of democratic realism. His poems are filled with portraits of thieves, harlots, commoners, officials, and himself. Even the grossest people in his poems speak to us of their desires and pathos. Thus a horribly aged harlot evokes the tragedy of growing old and ugly that is the common lot of humanity; and elsewhere the poet reflects that the grave annihilates all social distinctions. Villon was also an autobiographical poet who made his feelings the center of his verse. Torn between evil and remorse, mocking and defiant but deeply sensible of his degradation and embittered by it, he is the lyricist of a complex and authentic personality. French wit keeps his lines spirited and vivid, but sorrow and passion give them depth and a dark turbulence.

The bulk of Villon's verse consists of two "testaments," a Little Testament and a later Great Testament, a long mocking death-bed bequest to his companions, friends, and enemies, mingled with superb lyrics mostly in ballade form. The Great Testament thus holds in solution all the elements of his inspiration—his realistic view of life, his personal story and self-evaluation, and his lyricism.

THE FRENCH RENAISSANCE

The fifteenth century prepared the ground for the Renaissance that came to full bloom in France in the next century. Under Francis I, who ascended the throne in 1515, French unification through a central monarchy was virtually completed. Feudal life was dissolved, and the fractious nobility flocked to the royal court where it became politically weakened and devoted itself to courtly graces and literary dilettantism. Humanist scholarship came to the foreground, liberal thought won many adherents, and even the Protestant Reformation advocated by Calvin in Geneva made its impression, giving rise to the powerful Huguenot sect and to Catholic critics of the Church.

The greatest singer of the French Renaissance was Pierre de Ronsard (1524-1585), court poet, traveler to other lands and courts, and a favorite of both Mary Stuart and her enemy Queen Elizabeth. Veering away from medieval verse forms, he adopted the Petrarchan sonnet and developed the ode and the heroic epic. In all this, Ronsard and the circle of seven learned poets (the Pleiad¹), of which he was the brightest star, were consciously classical. Their chief manifesto, The Defense and Illustration of the French Language (1549), by the fine poet Du Bellay, asked "Are we inferior to the Greeks and Romans?" and outlined a program for epics, Pindaric odes, Anacreontic verses, and classic drama. If new words were needed, writers were to invent them by resorting to the classic tongues, a custom that in time overburdened the French language although enriching it at first. Literature, the manifesto also insisted, was to be gay and bright, instead of crabbed and somber. Ronsard fulfilled these requirements by virtue of a lively, charming character and a genuine lyric talent.

Still, for the world at large the French Renaissance is most memorably represented by two commanding prose writers, Rabelais and Montaigne, who became two of the most influential and delightful figures in world literature.

François Rabelais (1490?-1553) epitomized in his life and work the exuberance, the earnest and purposeful light-heartedness, and the intellectual curiosity and breadth of the dawning modern spirit. At first a monk in a Franciscan monastery, he gratified his passion for learning by studying Greek, Hebrew, and Arabic in addition to Latin, as well as mathematics and the sciences. His ability attracted a powerful clerical patron but aroused the Franciscans against him. Thereupon he deserted his monastery, won permission to leave the order, and joined the learned Benedictine monks. After staying with his patron, the Bishop Maillezais, for six years and traveling to various universities in search of knowledge, he began the study of medicine at the University of Montpellier. Following this he became resident physician at a hospital in Lyons, then an intellectual center. Here he began to write, publishing the first part of his book, The Great and Inestimable Chronicles of the Grand and Enormous Giant Gargantua, in 1532. Then followed its sequel, Pantagruel. In 1534 and 1536, after new editions of his books, he accompanied the liberal Cardinal du Bellay to Rome, and was greatly favored, receiving permission to hold ecclesiastical offices and to practice medicine. In 1537 he received his doctor's degree, taught at the University of Montpellier until 1539, and engaged in botanical hobbies which led him to introduce the melon, the carnation, and the artichoke into France.

A few years later Rabelais had his first two books read to Francis I, who was so greatly pleased that he granted him a license for a third book. But when Francis died, the clergy began to assail Rabelais' writings for their impieties, so that he found it expedient to escape to Metz in Lorraine, where he resumed the practice of medicine. Fortunately, he found powerful protectors, was allowed to return to France, and was made curé of Meudon and Jainbet. Demands for the destruction of his writings, however, continued, compelling him to discontinue writing further additions to his great rambling tale.

His book, a bulky and loosely organized tale about good and wise giants and their companions, is an extravaganza calculated to dispel the mists of the Middle Ages with enormous gusts of laughter and derision. Rabelais coined the sentence "le rire est le propre de l'homme"—(laughter is the attribute of man). Some of his laughter was outrageously obscene, but there was a sober purpose in it. It affirmed the right of man to happiness and self-realization. It was, moreover, an exuberant assault on the Middle Ages wrapped up and camouflaged by verbal fire, buffoonery, and fantasy.

His first and best book, Gargantua, starts as a mocking account of the young giant's medieval schooling that makes a colossal dunce of him. Then his father Grandgousier places him under a humanist teacher whose progressive methods make a modern man of Gargantua. This is followed by Gargantua's participation in Grandgousier's war against the neighboring state of Picrochole, an extravaganza that is still one of the best satires on war-making and ends with an enlightened peace-treaty far in advance of anything that Europe has yet witnessed. After the victory and the generous peace, Gargantua rewards his valiant colleague, the valiant Friar John, with the kind of abbey the lively monk desires. Thus arises the Abbey of Theleme, the which is the exact reverse of a medieval monastery, since it encourages the full savoring of life and the enjoyment of complete freedom in preparation for a career of enlightened self-realization.

The second book, Pantagruel, describes the adventures of Gargantua's son Pantagruel in the company of a devil-may-care, infinitely ingenious companion, Panurge, whose character sums up the gay abandon of the Renaissance. Here, too, musty ideas and practices are the object of ridicule. The rest of Rabelais' work revolves around adventures entailed by Panurge's search for an oracle that will tell him whether he can marry without danger of being betrayed. Hypocritical monks, mercenary lawyers, indifferent judges, and other corrupt representatives of medieval institutions come under the flail of Rabelais' mockery. This immoderate work blasts all aspects of the old world with the intention of clearing the way for a new spirit. Its strenuous modernity is still unshared by the bulk of mankind.

Even more modern was Michel Eyquem de Montaigne (1533-1592), the son of a devout, progressive father and a Protestant mother of Spanish-Jewish descent. By birth and by virtue of a humanist education under the supervision of his father, he became the most broad-minded of men. A brilliant student whose erudition at the age of ten awed his masters at the college of Bordeaux, he also studied law and entered public life. He saw military service, became Gentleman-in-Ordinary to the king, who entrusted him with important duties, and was Mayor of Bordeaux for four years. But he continued to be an ardent scholar, used his considerable means to acquire a large library, retired to his estate, and gave himself up to the contemplation of all life and knowledge. His informal Essays, written at different times, became the record of a remarkable personality, for at the center of all of Montaigne's reflections was the man himself. "Reader, thou hast here an honest book," Montaigne declared with every justification. "Cut these words," Emerson said of the Essays, "and they would bleed,"—because Montaigne is so alive in them.

Montaigne was the model of a truly civilized person. Never dogmatic but always curious, he merely asked questions and arrived at tentative answers ever qualified by his sense of the impossibility of certainty, as expressed in his favorite sentence "Que sçais-je?"—"What do I know?" Although he cautiously refrained from fighting tradition, he riddled it with questions like tracer-bullets. His position was that of a relativist who was impressed by the diversity of human customs revealed by the age of discoverers and explorers. Our reason, our study of the greatly varied customs of mankind, and our realization that all "contrarities" or contradictory habits are found in every individual, should teach us that we cannot force mankind into a single mold; that we cannot establish a rigid and final truth or dogma which may be imposed on everyone. Tolerance, intellectual detachment, and constant investigation comprise the trinity of this modern gospel. It was inevitable that Montaigne's views on such matters as the unity of soul and body, religion, and above all, education should have become blueprints for modernity.

THE NEO-CLASSIC AGE

In the next century, pursuant with the policies of centralized absolutism in France under Louis XIII and Louis XIV, there arose a marked reaction to the exuberant individual of Rabelais, Montaigne, and their fellow-writers. A new discipline was propounded by influential critics like Malherbe and Boileau in the name of classicism, and this was sanctioned by the establishment of the French Academy in 1635 under the protection of Cardinal Richelieu, Louis XIII's minister of state. Wayward individualism in manners, thought, and literature were banned, and the cult of order and grace invaded all corners from the salon of the fashionable blue-stocking Madame de Rambouillet to the secluded study of philosophers like Descartes and Pascal.

For the drama the age prescribed orderliness of a special sort. Harking back to statements in Aristotle's Poetics as misinterpreted by humanist critics, French academicians insisted on rigid adherence to the unities of time, place, and action. Henceforth the scene was to remain unchanged throughout the play, the duration of the action was not to exceed the length of time consumed by the presentation of the play, and there were to be no secondary plots. The difficulty of shifting scenery made these rules practical, and further support for them was found in the French ideal of bon sens (common sense); for, after all, these regulations appeared eminently reasonable. Above all, however, they were sanctioned by the fact that they were in accord with classic precepts, for this was an age in which classicism was venerated as the supreme model of reasonableness and good taste; hence the name for the period neo-classicism or (new classicism). The first important French playwright, Pierre Corneille, struggled valiantly against the rules, for the author of The Cid and Horace was a rugged dramatist partial to heroic themes. When he surrendered to the law of the unities, under pressure from Cardinal Richelieu and his circle, the battle was over.

The rules proved least hampering to comedy because it is not easy to suppress the freedom and effervescence of laughter, and because comedy of manners generally does not need an elaborate plot and many changes of scene. For this type of comedy, moreover, this age of artificial manners and social pretensions provided an ideal subject. The greatest writer of comedies in France, Molière, found everything his genius needed—everything but freedom for political discussion. George Meredith described this comic world brilliantly in his famous Essay on Comedy: "Politically it is accounted a misfortune for France that her nobles thronged to the Court of Louis Quatorze [XIV]. It was a boon to the comic poet. He had that lively, quicksilver world of the animalcule passions, the huge pretensions, the placid absurdities, under his eyes in full activity; vociferous quacks and snapping dupes, hypocrites, posturers, extravagants, pedants, rose-pinked ladies and mad grammarians, sonnetting marquises, high-flying mistresses, plain-minded maids, interthreading as in a loom, noisy as at a fair."

Jean Baptiste Poquelin (1622-1673), who assumed the pen-name Molière, had every qualification for recording that "quicksilver world." The son of the king's upholsterer, he received an excellent education in a Jesuit college and developed a skeptical intellect by observation and by discussion with the scientific philosopher Gassendi at a rich friend's home. Joining an unsuccessful company, he started touring, wrote plays for it, managed it, became its leading comedian, and brought it back to Paris in triumph. His success was so great that he became a favorite of the king and a friend of important noblemen and literary men, although he made enemies in the social set and aroused the clergy, which kept his satire on a religious hypocrite Tartuffe off the stage for many years. His later years were clouded by illness and by an unhappy marriage to a flirtatious young woman twenty years his junior. But throughout all difficulties he maintained a judicious and inventive spirit, a fine critical mind, and an unflagging sense of humor.

Molière wrote all kinds of plays in prose and in verse, from ballets and trivial farces to brilliant comedies like Tartuffe and The Misanthrope. In his best work, the predominant element is social satire. His shafts were aimed at affected manners (Les Précieuses Ridicules, The Affected Misses), pretentious learning (The Learned Women), religious hypocrisy (Tartuffe), social climbing (The Would-Be Gentleman), charlatanism in the medical profession (The Imaginary Invalid), and many other extravagances and corruptions. In The Misanthrope, these are collected into a single play, which is virtually a cross-section of French society.

The Miser has a double edge to its satire, for it is directed both at the growing greed of a society in which the middle-class was becoming rich and powerful, and at the excessive power of parents over their children. At the same time, the play exemplifies one of Molière's most appealing qualities—his tolerance and sympathy for natural impulses and wholesome, young love. If Molière became a satirist, it was chiefly because he was on the side of common sense, reasonableness, and naturalness. He set an example that the best writers of comedy have followed since his time in all countries.

His younger contemporary Jean Racine (1639-1699), whom he helped to launch on his career by giving him his first production, won equal triumphs in the field of neo-classic tragedy. Racine's perfect dramatic poetry, fine sensibility, and intense temperament enabled him to write tragedies of great beauty and power. This was an age in which women dominated the fashionable world, and Racine, most of whose plays deal with feminine passions and are named after classic heroines, had an unusual faculty for understanding women. Moreover, having been reared in the Jansenist faith, which regarded the majority of mankind as naturally evil owing to "original sin," he was partial to stories of guilty passion and perverse behavior. A French critic has said of Racine's heroines that they are "fair women full of Attic grace but lacking the grace of God." His plays have been ideal vehicles for prominent French actresses up to our own day. One historian has aptly declared that "the empire of women in [French] literature dates from Racine." Phædra, for which Racine found models in Euripides' Hippolytus and Seneca's Phædra, exemplifies all these qualities, including his polished use of Alexandrine (twelve-syllable, rhymed) verse.

Tiring of court intrigues aimed at this play, Racine retired to Port Royal. The erstwhile lover of popular actresses married a pious wife who never read a line of his plays. The only tragedies he wrote thereafter were Esther and the powerful Athalie (Athaliah), biblical tragedies composed at the request of Louis XIV's religious mistress, Madame de Maintenon, for performance at a girl's school.

The great age of the French theater was also the age of belles-lettres. It produced brilliant letters, memoirs, epigrams, and essays, in which keen observation was combined with wit and literary precision.

The genial Jean de La Fontaine (1621-1695) was called the "butterfly of Parnassus" because he led such a carefree life and followed all fashionable circles. Largely for amusement, he took the oriental beast fables that had long ago become associated in Europe with the name of Æsop, and turned them into delightful verse. His Fables are excellent examples of the new witty style and of the sophisticated outlook of Louis XIV society. Although a critical spirit is evident in such lines as "The strongest reasons always yield to reasons of the strongest," La Fontaine was content with the society and government he knew, regarding them as the normal state of affairs.

Accommodation to a world, appraised with complete freedom from idealization, also appeared in the famous Maxims of François, the Duc de La Rochefoucauld (1613-1680), who at first fought the growing power of the throne like a medieval baron. After plotting against Cardinal Richelieu, the king's minister, and being imprisoned in the Bastille, La Rochefoucauld retired and set down his observations on human nature in his Maxims. If, as Dean Swift remarked, these scintillating aphorisms stress self-interest as the driving force in human conduct, the fault was not in their author but in mankind. Still it must be remembered that La Rochefoucauld was himself a product of the age and saw only what he was inclined to see. Nevertheless, the one side of the truth that he did record is observed with remarkable incisiveness and is etched into enduring prose. In the epigrams we see the clearest examples of the logic, lucidity, and urbane skepticism that has distinguished so much of French literature and life.

The most important products of seventeenth-century thought, however, are to be found, not in the casual writings of dilettantes like La Fontaine and La Rochefoucauld, but in the mathematicians and philosophers Pascal and his predecessor René Descartes who made doubt the springboard for all discovery of truth, and whose ideal of Reason was summed up in the Latin sentence "cogito, ergo sum" ("I think, therefore I am"). Blaise Pascal (1623-1662) was one of the world's great mathematicians but he was also a man of strong and deep feelings. A devout person, he became in his Provincial Letters the ablest champion of the Jansenist sect at Port Royal against the then dominant Jesuit order. Illness and excessive study filled him with melancholia, and he felt uncomfortable in the mechanical universe that science was discovering, a universe without moral purpose. "The eternal silence of these infinite spaces frightens me," he wrote. Nevertheless, he was at one with his age in his reasonable approach to life and his love of order, which is reflected not only in his lucid and elegant prose style but even in his religious cravings for a world well-ordered by God. In his beautiful Pensées (Thoughts), scattered reflections jotted down during his fatal illness, it is primarily the man of reason who speaks.

THE FRENCH ENLIGHTENMENT

With Descartes, Pascal was indeed the father of eighteenth-century rationalism. The difference lies only in the fact that in the next century, owing to the decadence of the monarchy and the growing strength of the common people, the rationalists became socially and politically militant. They challenged the State and the Church, and riddled superstition and tyranny with ridicule while making an effort to enlighten the people. They advocated religious tolerance, humanitarianism, and progress in all directions, all this to be achieved by free inquiry and the rule of Reason. Whether their unlimited faith in the power of Reason was misplaced is still a matter of debate. But it is indisputable that their teachings changed the face of Europe for at least a century, bringing in their wake the French Revolution, nineteenth-century democracy, and the separation of the Church from the State.

Many brilliant men pooled their talents to promote the "Enlightenment," as this movement is called. Diderot, D'Alembert, Montesquieu, Condorcet, and others compiled a critical Encyclopedia of all available knowledge that became the bible of the age, and they made important contributions to the study of sociology, government, science, and philosophy. But two men, Voltaire and Rousseau, stood foremost in the field of letters and added most to our literary heritage.

François Marie Arouet, who became famous under the pen-name of Voltaire (1694-1778), the son of a Parisian lawyer, was studying for the law himself when he turned instead to literature. He soon found himself in difficulties owing to his satirical and critical spirit. Louis XV had him confined in the Bastille for eleven months in 1717, and he was again in prison over a quarrel with a nobleman seven years later. After his release he was banished from France. He spent the next three years in England, where he developed a strong enthusiasm for British democracy and recommended it to his country in his English Letters. Their publication in 1734 resulted in the imprisonment of his printer and made it expedient for Voltaire to leave Paris and spend six years on the estate of his admirer and friend, Madame de Chatelet. His fame as a champion of liberty and progressive thought, however, mounted so high that his return to Paris became the occasion for a public demonstration; he was even appointed royal historiographer and made a member of the French Academy. Between 1750 and 1752 he was an honored guest at the court of Frederick the Great in Potsdam, and his writings and pronouncements continued to influence Europe during the rest of his long life. His name became synonymous with liberalism and the cult of progressive and militant reason. "Let there be light and Voltaire arose," a later writer said of him; "this light is Reason, and from it was born the modern world."

A versatile writer whose writings filled one hundred volumes of poems, plays, histories, and philosophical treatises like his famous Philosophical Dictionary, Voltaire is best remembered today for his brilliant contes (tales). The most important of these is Candide (1759), a work inspired by religious persecutions in Lisbon after a disastrous earthquake in that city. It is a travesty on the optimistic opinion of the philosopher Leibniz that this is the best of all possible worlds, and of the eighteenth-century belief popularized by Alexander Pope in England that "whatever is, is right." Voltaire's opinion is the very opposite, and he also uses his philosophical argument as a peg on which to hang his satire on superstition, militarism, and other social evils.

Voltaire made men dissatisfied with existing institutions by means of satire. His chief contemporary, Jean-Jacques Rousseau (1712-1778), achieved the same effect by positive arguments for liberty, by asserting the rights of man, and by calling for a return to the life of nature as opposed to a socially stratified artificial world.

Rousseau, whose mother died at his birth and whose father abandoned him at the age of ten, was endowed with an unstable and rebellious temperament. He ran away from the home of his employer at the age of sixteen, wandered from place to place, and finally came under the influence of an attractive widow, Madame de Warens, with whom he lived for nine years and studied philosophy, literature, and music. The friendship of another woman got him the post of secretary to the French ambassador in Venice and saved him from penury. Returning to Paris, he led an impoverished life as a copyist of music and formed a connection with a hotel servant, Thérèse le Vasseur, whom he married many years later. He had no sense of responsibility and placed his five illegitimate children in a public institution because, as he said, this seemed to him "reasonable and good." At this time he became a friend of Diderot and other liberal thinkers, and began to write. His first effort, an essay published in 1749 on the subject "Has the progress of science and art contributed to corrupt or purify morals?" won him first prize in a public competition. He took the negative view, and he returned to this subject in his epoch-making Discourse on the Origin and Basis of Inequality in 1755. This he followed in time with other unconventional works: The New Heloise, a novel on free human relations; Émile, a plea for a new kind of education favorable to natural development and to natural religion independent of creeds or churches; and The Social Contract (1762) an argument to the effect that a contract exists between the people and their rulers, who lose all claim to obedience when they disregard the interests of the governed.

On the one hand, Rousseau's writings inspired the French Revolution and created the eighteenth-century doctrine of the natural rights of man which found its way into our Declaration of Independence. On the other hand, his books, to which must be added his utterly candid posthumously published Confessions, laid the foundations for the "back to nature" movement and the glorification of self-expression at all costs, which characterized the romantic movement in literature. Both political democracy and romanticism will be found in his Discourse on the Origin and Basis of Inequality Among Men.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY

With Rousseau was born the Romantic movement in all of Europe, the movement represented in England by Coleridge, Wordsworth, Shelley, Keats, and Byron. It was natural that France should assume the leadership of romanticism, and the names of many once prominent French writers are associated with it. Among them were Chateaubriand who stressed the return to nature, Alexandre Dumas who wrote such popular romantic novels as The Three Musketeers and The Count of Monte Cristo, and Victor Hugo. The latter is remembered for his stirring poems, exciting and sentimental novels like Les Misérables and Notre Dame de Paris, and for his destruction of neo-classicism in the theater. However, the greatest contribution latter-day France made to world literature was the development and perfection of the modern realistic novel.

The greatest of the novelists was Honoré Balzac (1799-1850) a man of indefatigable energy who summed up an entire age, the first third of the nineteenth century, in nearly a hundred novels and short stories collectively called by him La Comédie

Humaine (The Human Comedy). The son of prosperous middle-class parents who suffered financial reverses, Balzac first attempted to study law, but soon launched himself on a literary career with a dogged resolve that no amount of failure and poverty could break. He was romantic in his philosophical speculations, his politics (which were anti-republican and monarchist), and his long attachment to a Polish lady, Madame de Hanska, whom he married only three months before his death. But Balzac was remarkably sensitive to the new age of business, large-scale finance, and other middle-class pursuits. Although he did not approve of the new world of cut-throat competition and devotion to money-making, he recorded it faithfully, though critically, in his novels, and even succumbed to the business spirit with ambitious, though unsuccessful, financial schemes.

Novels like his famous Father Goriot, the King Lear story of a vermicelli merchant who is abandoned by his socially ambitious daughters, and Eugénie Grandet, the tragedy of the daughter of a middle-class miser, are typical of Balzac's exhaustive exploration of the modern materialistic world. Two typical characters who appear in a number of his works are Vautrin, a criminal whose behavior and philosophy sum up the "dog-eat-dog" attitude of a money-minded age, and Rastignac, an ambitious young law student whose experiences in society convince him that one must be resourceful and hard if one is to survive. The short story Gold, included in this chapter, is a brief but dramatic representation of the driving force of greed that Balzac found in the soul of the nineteenth century.

Balzac was often an extravagant writer, a titan who did not always possess the gift of perfection and whose painstaking recording of reality was often personal and filled with his own comments. It remained for Gustave Flaubert (1821-1880) to perfect the realistic novel that Balzac and another, insufficiently read, master, Stendhal, had introduced. Flaubert, the son of a surgeon at Rouen, maintained a scientific detachment toward his characters and subject matter. Illness and a retiring disposition, aggravated by aversion to the materialistic age and by distress over the defeat of France in the Franco-Prussian War, also affected his writing. He became a perfectionist in his search for the precise shade of meaning, and an absolutely objective reporter of people's feelings and behavior. He followed this method regardless of his themes, so that his psychological fantasy The Temptation of St. Antony and his historical novel of Carthage, Sa- lamambo, to which he devoted laborious research, are as meticulously set down as the treatment of his own times in Madame Bovary. Among his novels, these three are the most remarkable. The first is a study of the desires and repressions of an ascetic, set against a background of early Christianity. The second is a novel of lustful passion in an oriental world so wonderfully authenticated that each detail seems as real as a modern street scene. The third, Madame Bovary (1857), describes the tragedy of an unhappy, cheaply romantic wife of a provincial doctor; it is so relentlessly truthful that it is considered the masterpiece of modern realism.

Flaubert's long story A Simple Heart published in 1877 with two other superb stories, reveals all the attributes of his style and approach, including his ability to capture even the most inconspicuous details of an inconspicuous life. It is characteristic of realistic fiction, as exemplified in A Simple Heart, that it could treat commonplace characters and the lowest social levels with the same care that writers had hitherto bestowed only on the upper classes. This is also true of most contemporary writers of novels and stories, such as Sinclair Lewis, Theodore Dreiser, Ernest Hemingway, and William Faulkner.

Flaubert had many followers in France, but none so renowned as his protégé Guy de Maupassant (1850-1893), another native of Normandy and another tormented soul who finally went insane. The son of a Paris stock-broker, he became a clerk in the government service. Here he learned to understand the commonplace life of the "white-collar" worker that appears in a story like The Diamond Necklace which nearly everybody has read, as well as the higher political world of journalism and intrigue that he recorded in several novels. In addition, he knew the habits of the peasants in his native Normandy, and this gave him the material for some of his best short stories, among them his well-known Piece of String and his painful peasant sketch The Christening. Like Flaubert he also wrote a powerful novel about an ordinary woman's unhappiness, entitled A Life, and explored psychological aberrations in a number of stories, the most famous of which, Le Horla, is a gripping study of his approaching madness.

It was Flaubert who, taking Maupassant under his wing for seven years, introduced him to the literary world and guided him in his early writings. But Maupassant also fell under the influence of a general movement, an extension and intensification of realism known as naturalism. This appears in his frequent choice of unpleasant subjects and in his clinical manner of treating them without varnishing their sordidness.

The leader of the naturalistic movement was Émile Zola (1840-1902), the son of an Italian father and a French mother, who picked up an education informally while he acquainted himself with common realities by experience. He made his first connection with literature in a Parisian publishing house where he served as a clerk, and his first efforts at writing were newspaper articles of a political and critical nature. He threw himself completely into the struggle for a form of realism that would present life with the same painstaking documentation that he found in the natural sciences; hence his name for this style—"naturalism." His first novel, Thérèse Raquin, which he turned into a play and presented as an example of "naturalistic drama," was a sordid account of adultery, murder, and remorse among the lower classes. Then, resolving to study this life in terms of sociology and genetics, Zola wrote his Rougon-Macquart series of twenty novels about two families, which he aptly subtitled A Physiological History of a Family under the Second Empire. His main theme he described when he wrote in his essay The Experimental Novel: "We are, in a word, experimental moralists, showing by experiment in what way a passion acts in a certain social condition." His claims were extravagant and his writing was often crude and brutal. But in championing naturalism and exploring the lowest depths of society Zola extended the scope of the novel, and he taught novelists to pay close attention to social problems. It was as a socially conscious writer that Zola threw himself into the Dreyfus case and made justice prevail with his pen. The best known of Zola's novels is the lurid Nana, the story of a courtesan's career. The best of them are his novel of the Franco-Prussian War, La Débâcle, and Germinal (1889), his bleak picture of the lives of the miners.

Although Zola's example was not followed to any marked degree by important French novelists of the present century, they have all excelled in the realistic vein opened by Flaubert and Balzac. Nevertheless, other trends existed side by side with the dominant realistic one. Poets like Charles Baudelaire and Paul Verlaine and their so-called "symbolist" colleagues, to whom sufficient justice cannot be done in translation, developed an "art for art's sake" movement based on perfection of form and vague suggestiveness; and the Belgian dramatist Maurice Maeterlinck and Edmond Rostand, author of the famous Cyrano de Bergerac, wrote successful poetic and romantic plays. Finally, we must note that the spirit of refined skepticism continued to hover over French writers and expressed itself in many civilized and witty essays and narratives.

The strongest evidence of the enduring wit and skeptical wisdom of French literature appeared in the work of Anatole France (1884-1924), born Jacques Anatole Thibault. The extremely studious son of a bookseller, he became a remarkably erudite man. But he bore his learning lightly and gracefully like a true Frenchman, and extracted a wealth of humor from it. Nor did his scholarly interests prevent him from becoming politically embroiled as a street-corner speaker and publicist for the socialist movement, though in the last analysis he regarded the state in any form with skepticism. After publishing two books of poems, he turned to fiction, writing many stories and novels into which he poured his gentle cynicism with great charm and humor. Best known among his books are his novel about a delightful antiquarian, The Crime of Sylvestre Bonnard; his psychological story of an ascetic's downfall, Thais; his whimsical glorification of Satan as the eternal questioner and rebel, Revolt of the Angels; and his Penguin Island. He made the latter a particularly incisive travesty on the high spots of European history, satirizing superstition, government founded on property and the rights of the strongest, dictatorship, and militarism. It closes with a prediction of the collapse of civilization and an even more pessimistic inference that after the cataclysm man will begin making the same mistakes all over again. The same pessimism appeared in his powerful serious novel about the reign of terror in the French Revolution, The Gods Are Athirst.

His urbanity and sophistication, however, never forsook him. His shorter works exemplify the same spirit; his Crainquebille does this in a brilliant account of the growth of a legend, and his short story, The Procurator of Judea, in a skeptical comment on history. Its main point is that we often fail to understand the momentousness of events when we are too close to them, and that even Christ may have had no special significance to the man who condemned him to the cross. Anatole France was indeed the spiritual son of Montaigne and Voltaire, and our brief survey of all but recent French literature may appropriately end with him.

FRANÇOIS VILLON

The Little Testament

This year of fourteen fifty-six
 I Francis Villon, man of letters,
 With might and main, full speed, prefix
 Advice to all in Fortune's fetters,
 To take the judgment of your betters
 About your work, the truth to know;
 Vegece has made us all his debtors,
 The sage of Rome, by saying so.

This winter, as was said before,
 Near Christmas, season deathly old,
 When wolves eat wind and nothing more,
 And men are held indoors by cold
 Where hearthstones glowing faggots hold,
 The will I won to break a way
 From Love's sweet gaol, whose walls enfold
 My breaking heart this many a day.

This way I take to end my anguish,
 For She is there, before my eyes,
 Quite satisfied to see me languish,
 No happier in any wise:
 My sorrows and complainings rise
 Demanding vengeance from above
 From amorous gods of every guise
 And cure for all my pangs of love.

As I believe, she showed me favor
 With soft regrets and fine deceit
 To lend duplicity more savor
 And make my overthrow complete;
 But as a horse of four white feet
 What seemed so fair but brought displeasure:
 I must replant this pleasaunce sweet
 And go to dig for other treasure.

Full harsh and hard was her oppression;
 For she who cast a spell on me,
 Though I am guiltless of transgression,
 Has doomed me die, and her decree
 Is fixed that I shall cease to be.
 I find no safety but in flight.
 She means to break my life, I see,
 Nor will take pity on my plight.

This danger to escape, I trow,
 The best plan is to run away.
 Adieu! I'm off to Angers now,
 Since she ungraciously says nay,
 Nor will a shred of ruth display.
 Though free from bodily complaints,
 I die Love's martyr, I might say,
 Thus numbered with his band of saints.

Although departing brings despair,
 Needs must, in truth, that I should fly,
 As I conceive of the affair:
 She loves another on the sly.
 No kipper of Boulogne so dry
 And tasteless as my wretched fate!
 May God in mercy hear my cry:
 For I am in a piteous state.

Well then, since go away I must,
 And of return uncertain feel:
 (Since I'm a being formed of dust,
 No more than others brass or steel;
 Unstable is all human weal
 And death cannot be scared away:)
 So setting out, I now reveal
 My will, these presents, in this lay.

Then first, in His our Father dear,
 The Son, and Holy Spirit's name,
 Our Lady's too, whom we revere,
 Whose grace keeps all of us from shame,
 I leave, God helping me, my fame
 To Guillaume Villon, foster sire,
 My goods and chattels, and proclaim
 The honor that those names inspire.

To her who harried me so hard
 And banished, as you'll call to mind,
 From every joy in life debarred,
 All pleasure being left behind,
 To her I leave my heart enshrined,
 Pale, piteous, shriveled up and thin;
 It perished by her deeds unkind,
 May God forgive her this her sin!

The Little Testament. Translated by John Heron Lepper. By permission of the Liveright Publishing Corporation. François Villon (1431-c. 1484), born in Paris, somehow managed to acquire a good education. His own poems give us pictures of his life as thief and vagabond.

And Ythier Marchant shall get,
 Joint heir with Master Cuckold John,
 To both of whom I'm much in debt,
 My trenchant sword of steel; undrawn,
 Because, by chance, it lies in pawn
 For some small trifle, which when paid,
 I order that mine host anon
 Shall hand them back the trusty blade.

Item, the White Horse tavern sign
 To Saint Amant and Mule as well.
 Blaru, that diamond of mine
 And balking Ass with Brindled Fell.
 The bull, whose opening letters spell
Omnis utriusque sexus,
 That with the Carmelites played hell,
 To parish priests for present use.

To Jehan Trouvé, the butcher chap,
 A sheep that's young and fat be brought,
 Thereto a feather whisk to flap
 The flies that taint his ox unbought
 Or cow; and when the villain's caught
 Who lifts her by the neck to thief her,
 Let him receive a collar taut
 And perish of a gallows fever.

To Master Robert Vallée now,
 A clerk of Parliament, sans riches,
 No hill or dale is his I trow.
 He'll have a noble keepsake, which is
 A special pair of under breeches,
 That also lie in pawn, the stuff
 To make a hood, with darns and stitches,
 For Jehanneton, his bit of fluff.

Because he holds a decent post
 He needs more pay, and might be led Entirely by the Holy Ghost,
 Because a trifle cracked, 'tis said;
 The "Art of Memory" be read
 To cure him, taken from Tom Fool;
 For no more wisdom's in his head
 Than lies within a wooden stool.

And furthermore, I will bestow
 Said Robert's livelihood, and tell,
 (No need to let your envy grow!)
 You friends of mine, that you must sell
 My hauberk, spend the money well,
 Some house near St. Jacques' steeple seek,
 Wherein this popinjay may dwell
 And coppy deeds all Easter Week.

To friend Jacques Cardon my bequest
 Both absolute is and profuse: 130
 To wit, my gloves and silken vest;
 With willow acorns for his use,
 85 And, every day, a fatted goose,
 A capon bursting through its skin,
 Ten tots of milk-white vineyard juice, 135
 And lawsuits two, to keep him thin.

René de Montigny, three hounds,
 90 As nobly born, I dedicate;
 And Jehan Raguyer shall have three pounds
 As charge upon my whole estate; 140
 Yet stay! I can't anticipate
 How rich I may become ere long:
 95 To friends be too considerate
 And rob my heirs, were surely wrong.

Item, I leave my lord of Grigny 145
 Bicêtre in need of overhauling,
 And six hounds more than to Montigny,
 100 With Nygon tower that's near to falling;
 And to that bastard caterwauling,
 Mouton, who summonses his betters, 150
 I fain would give a proper mauling
 And place for slumber, bound in fetters.

To James Raguyer the Popin Fountain,
 105 With chickens and blancmange and brill,
 In short, of food a very mountain; 155
 A rabbit cooked with choicest skill,
 The Fir-Cone cellar at his will 110 To ope and shut, with feet to fire
 And hooded gown to guard from chill;
 And tarlets too, should he desire. 160

To Master Jehan Mautaint and Peter
 Bassenier, for jointly sharing,
 115 The Provost's favor, none is fleetier
 To fine and punish without sparing;
 To Proctor Fournier for his wearing 165
 Light caps and shoes with toes embossed,
 All of my cobbler's own preparing,
 120 Meet fashion for this time of frost.

Item, the Captain of the Guard
 Shall with the Helmet be bedight; 170
 His men who keep their watch and ward
 And stumble over stalls at night,
 125 I leave to them the Lantern's light
 And rubies two; they are requested
 With their best dungeon to requite 175
 The donor, if he be arrested.

To Perrenet Marchant I give,
 The Bastard de la Barre renowned,
 (No better dealer e'er did live)
 Of straw three trusses, sweet and sound,
 To spread as mattress on the ground
 His amorous calling to pursue,
 Whereby his living must be found,
 The only trade he ever knew.

'Then to the Wolf and Chollet falls
 As legacy the ducklings which
 Are snatched at dusk, beneath the walls,
 As is their custom, from a ditch;
 A mantle long and wide to hitch
 About their prey, nor aught disclose,
 Wood, charcoal, peas and gammon-flitch,
 And my old waders lacking toes.

I leave, in pity of their cases,
 To three young boys by Fate derided,
 All mentioned in their proper places,
 Three orphans wholly unprovided,
 All barefoot, all three hollow-sided,
 And 'wormlike naked altogether,
 My order is that they be tided
 At least o'er all this wintry weather.

Colin Laurens the first, the others
 Girart Goussouyn and Jehan Marceau,
 Devoid of goods and sires and mothers,
 To each, who is not worth a row
 Of pins, a slice of land shall go,
 Or nimble fourpence paid in gold.
 Good eating all these boys will know
 In time to come, when I've grown old.

I here surrender and resign,
 Two poor clerks from poverty to free,
 Those high collegiate rights of mine,
 The claim to be a nominee
 Acquired on taking my degree;
 Their names are here below included:
 'Tis Charity that works in me
 And Nature, seeing them denuded.

They're Guillaume Cotin, I declare,
 And Thibault de Vitry, for each
 Is Latin scholar, poor and bare,
 Not quarrelsome, of peaceful speech,
 And fit in any church to preach.
 For Guillot Gueuldry's house-rent yet
 Incontinent their hands shall reach,
 While waiting something more to get.

St. Antoine's Cross that all may view, 225
 The tavern sign that hangs so plain,
 I leave them too, with billiard cue
 180 And daily draughts from out the Seine:
 To those poor pigeons laws constrain
 In cages barred to spend their life, 230
 My mirror bright without a stain,
 And favors from the gaoler's wife.

Item, I leave the hospitals
 My windows hung with cobweb-stuff;
 To outcasts under butchers' stalls, 235
 To each of them a hearty cuff,
 To tremble at a visage gruff,
 190 To go unshaven, starve and shiver,
 Coat tattered, breeches scant enough,
 Pinched, frozen, wet as any river. 240

My barber shall have this concession,
 The shreds and clippings of my hair,
 195 The whole in undisturbed possession;
 My cobbler, shoes that need repair;
 The ragman, clothes with many a tear;
 245 And they shall have the residue
 Of things that I have ceased to wear
 200 For less than what they cost when new.

Item, I leave the begging friars
 And nuns and tenders of the shrines, 250
 All dainties that a man desires,
 Flawns, capons and fat jellied chines;
 205 Then let them preach the Fifteen Signs,
 And keep on piling up the platter.
 The Carmelites make concubines 255
 Of our friends' wives, which doesn't matter.

Jehan de la Garde, who's spiced too much,
 210 The Golden Mortar sign shall claim,
 From St. Mor church a votive crutch
 To crush his mustard in the same. 260
 But he who plays the lawyers' game
 And threatens to begin a suit,
 215 Saint Anthony set him aflame!
 That's my bequest to him, the brute!

To Merebeuf be handed down 265
 And Nicolas de Louviers old,
 An eggshell stuffed with many a crown
 220 And franc, as full as it will hold.
 While to the Gouvieux porter bold,
 Pierre Rousseville, without delay, 270
 A larger sum of cash in gold,
 Such crowns as princes give away.

At last, while sitting at my writing
 Tonight, alone, in humor prime,
 This lay composing and enditing,
 I heard the Sorbonne belfry chime
 At nine o'clock, its proper time,
 The Angelus rang through the air;
 And so an end was made, for I'm Accustomed then to say a prayer.

Thereat, I fell into a doze,
 But not from wine I swear to you,
 My wits went wandering I suppose;
 I saw Dame Memory review
 Her shelves, collect in order due
 Concurrent mental operations,
 Opinions either false or true,
 And other psychic ideations.

Thereto our estimative motions,
 Whereby prosperity we gain,
 Cognition and conceptive notions,
 Whence, when disturbed, arises plain
 A like disorder in the brain
 And, monthly, men demented grow;
 I read it, and the sense retain,
 In Aristotle long ago.

My sensifacient system drove
 The loom Imagination plied
 Which divers paradoxes wove,
 My sovereign part was quite defied,
 Suspended, even might have died,
 Forgetful of all moods and tenses,
 While I in Schoolmen's jargon tried
 To prove th' alliance of the senses.

Since now my senses were at rest
 And I had found the matter out,
 I thought to finish my bequest;
 My ink was frozen round about,
 The wind had blown my candle out,
 There was no fire to light it at,
 So wrapped up in my mantle stout
 I fell asleep, and that was that.

By Francis Villon, name renowned,
 On date aforesaid made and writ,
 No figs or dates with him abound.
 Of all his chattels not one whit,
 Though black as scrubbing-brush with grit,
 But for some special friend is meant;

Some coppers make his only bit
 Of cash, and they will soon be spent.

The Ballad of Dead Ladies

Tell me now in what hidden way is Lady Flora the lovely Roman?
 280 Where's Hipparchia, and where is Thais,
 Neither of them the fairer woman?
 Where is Echo, beheld of no man,
 5 Only heard on river and mere,—
 She whose beauty was more than human? . . .
 But where are the snows of yester-year?

285 Where's Héloïse, the learned nun,
 For whose sake Abeillard, I ween,
 10 Lost manhood and put priesthood on?
 (From Love he won such dule and teen!)
 And where, I pray you, is the Queen
 290 Who willed that Buridan should steer
 Sewed in a sack's mouth down the Seine? . . .
 But where are the snows of yester-year? 16

White Queen Blanche, like a queen of lilies,
 With a voice like any mermaid,—
 295 Bertha Broadfoot, Beatrice, Alice,
 And Ermengarde the lady of Maine,—
 20 And that good Joan whom Englishmen
 At Rouen doomed and burned her there,—
 Mother of God, where are they then? . . .
 300 But where are the snows of yester-year?

Nay, never ask this week, fair lord,
 25 Where they are gone, nor yet this year,
 Save with this much for an overword,—
 But where are the snows of yester-year?

To Death of His Lady

Death, of thee do I make my moan,
 Who hadst my lady away from me,
 Nor wilt assuage thine enmity
 310 Till with her life thou hast mine own;
 For since that hour my strength has flown. 5
 Lo! what wrong was her life to thee,
 Death?

Two we were, and the heart was one;
 315 Which now being dead, dead I must be,
 Or seem alive as lifelessly
 As in the choir the painted stone,
 Death! 10

Fragment on Death

And Paris be it or Helen dying,
 Who dies soever, dies with pain.
 He that lacks breath and wind for sighing,
 His gall bursts on his heart; and then
 He sweats, God knows what sweat! again, 5
 No man may ease him of his grief;
 Child, brother, sister, none were fain
 To bail him thence for his relief.

Death makes him shudder, swoon, wax pale,
 Nose bend, veins stretch, and breath surrender,
 Neck swell, flesh soften, joints that fail 11
 Crack their strained nerves and arteries slender.
 O woman's body found so tender,
 Smooth, sweet, so precious in men's eyes,
 Must thou too bear such count to render 15
 Yes; or pass quick into the skies.

Ballad of the Women of Paris

Albeit the Venice girls get praise
 For their sweet speech and tender air,
 And though the old women have wise ways
 Of chaffering for amorous ware,
 Yet at my peril dare I swear, 5
 Search Rome, where God's grace mainly tarries,
 Florence and Savoy, everywhere,
 There's no good girl's lip out of Paris.

The Naples women, as folk prattle,
 Are sweetly spoken and subtle enough: 10
 German girls are good at tattle,
 And Prussians make their boast thereof;
 Take Egypt for the next remove,
 Or that waste land the Tartar harries,
 Spain or Greece, for the matter of love, 15
 There's no good girl's lip out of Paris.

Breton and Swiss know nought of the matter,
 Gascony girls or girls of Toulouse;
 Two fishwomen with a half-hour's chatter
 Would shut them up by threes and twos; 20
 Calais, Lorraine, and all their crews,
 (Names enow the mad song marries)
 England and Picardy, search them and choose,
 There's no good girl's lip out of Paris.

Prince, give praise to our French ladies 25
 For the sweet sound their speaking carries;

'Twixt Rome and Cadiz many a maid is,
 But no good girl's lip out of Paris.

Epistle in Form of a Ballad to His Friends

Have pity, pity, friends, have pity on me,
 Thus much at least, may it please you, of your grace!

I lie not under hazel or hawthorn-tree
 Down in this dungeon ditch, mine exile's place
 By leave of God and fortune's foul disgrace. 5
 Girls, lovers, glad young folk and newly wed,
 Jumpers and jugglers, tumbling heel o'er head,
 Swift as a dart, and sharp as needle-ware,
 Throats clear as bells that ring the kine to shed,
 Your poor old friend, what, will you leave him
 there? 10

Singers that sing at pleasure, lawlessly,
 Light, laughing, gay of word and deed, that race
 And run like folk light-witted as ye be
 And have in hand nor current coin nor base,
 Ye wait too long, for now he's dying apace. 15
 Rhymers of lays and roundels sung and read,
 Ye'll brew him broth too late when he lies dead.
 Nor wind nor lightning, sunbeam nor fresh air,
 May pierce the thick wall's bound where lies his bed;
 Your poor old friend, what, will you leave him
 there? 20

O noble folk from tithes and taxes free,
 Come and behold him in this piteous case,
 Ye that nor king nor emperor holds in fee,
 But only God in heaven; behold his face
 Who needs must fast, Sundays and holidays, 25
 Which makes his teeth like rakes; and when he hath fed
 With never a cake for banquet but dry bread,
 Must drench his bowels with much cold watery fare,
 With board nor stool, but low on earth instead;
 Your poor old friend, what, will you leave him
 there? 30

Princes afore-named, old and young foresaid,
 Get me the king's seal and my pardon sped,
 And hoist me in some basket up with care:
 So swine will help each other ill bested, 34
 For where one squeaks they run in heaps ahead.
 Your poor old friend, what, will you leave him
 there?

The Epitaph in Form of a Ballad

WHICH VILLON MADE FOR HIMSELF AND HIS COMRADES, EXPECTING TO BE HANGED ALONG WITH THEM

Men, brother men, that after us yet live,
Let not your hearts too hard against us be;
For if some pity of us poor men ye give,
The sooner God shall take of you pity.
Here are we five or six strung up, you see, 5
And here the flesh that all too well we fed
Bit by bit eaten and rotten, rent and shred,
And we the bones grow dust and ash withal;
Let no man laugh at us discomforted,
But pray to God that he forgive us all. 10

If we call on you, brothers, to forgive,
Ye should not hold our prayer in scorn, though we
Were slain by law; ye know that all alive
Have not wit away to walk righteously;
Make therefore intercession heartily 15
With him that of a virgin's womb was bred,

That his grace be not as a dry well-head
For us, nor let hell's thunder on us fall;
We are dead, let no man harry or vex us dead,
But pray to God that he forgive us all. 20

The rain has washed and laundered us all five,
And the sun dried and blackened; yea, perdie,
Ravens and pies with beaks that rend and rive
Have dug our eyes out, and plucked off for fee
Our beards and eyebrows; never we are free, 25
Not once, to rest; but here and there still sped,
Drive at its wild will by the wind's change led,
More pecked of birds than fruits on garden-
wall;
Men, for God's love, let no gibe here be said,
But pray to God that he forgive us all. 30

Prince Jesus, that of all art lord and head,
Keep us, that hell be not our bitter bed;
We have nought to do in such a master's hall.
Be not ye therefore of our fellowhead,
But pray to God that he forgive us all. 35

PIERRE DE RONSARD

Fragment of a Sonnet

Nature withheld Cassandra in the skies
For more adornment, a full thousand years;
She took their cream of Beauty, fairest dies,
And shaped and tinted her above all peers: 4
Meanwhile Love kept her dearly with his wings,
And underneath their shadow fill'd her eyes
With such a richness that the cloudy Kings
Of high Olympus utter'd slavish sighs.
When from the Heavens I saw her first descend,
My heart took fire, and only burning pains— 10
They were my pleasures—they my Life's sad end
Love pour'd her beauty into my warm veins.

To Helen

When you are very old, at evening
You'll sit and spin beside the fire, and say,
Humming my songs, "Ah well, ah well-a-day!

When I was young, of me did Ronsard sing."
None of your maidens that doth hear the thing, 5
Albeit with her weary task foredone,
But wakens at my name, and calls you one
Blessed, to be held in long remembering.
I shall be low beneath the earth, and laid
On sleep, a phantom in the myrtle shade, 10
While you beside the fire, a grandame gray,
My love, your pride, remember and regret;
Ah, love me, love! we may be happy yet,
And gather roses, while 'tis called today.

To His Young Mistress

Fair flower of fifteen springs, that still
Art scarcely blossomed from the bud,
Yet hast such store of evil will,
A heart so full of hardihood, 5
Seeking to hide in friendly wise
The mischief of your mocking eyes.

To His Young Mistress. Translated by Andrew Lang.

If you have pity, child, give o'er;
 Give back the heart you stole from me,
 Pirate, setting so little store
 On this your captive from Love's sea,
 Holding his misery for gain,
 And making pleasure of his pain.

Another, not so fair of face,
 But far more pitiful than you,
 Would take my heart, if of his grace,

My heart would give her of Love's due;
 And she shall have it, since I find
 That you are cruel and unkind.

Nay, I would rather that it died,
 Within your white hands prisoning,
 Would rather that it still abide
 In your ungente comforting
 Than change its faith, and seek to her
 That is more kind, but not so fair.

FRANÇOIS RABELAIS

Gargantua

[War Between Gargantua and Picrochole]

The cake-bakers, being returned to Lerné, went presently, before they did either eat or drink, to the Capitol, and there before their king, called Picrochole, the third of that name, made their complaint, showing their panniers broken, their caps all crumpled, their coats torn, their cakes taken away, but, above all, Marquet most enormously wounded, saying that all that mischief was done by the shepherds and herdsmen of Grangousier, near the broad highway beyond Seville. Picrochole incontinent grew angry and furious; and, without asking¹ any further what, how, why, or wherefore, commanded the ban and arriere ban to be sounded throughout all his country, that all his vassals of what condition soever should, upon pain of the halter, come, in the best arms they could, unto the great place before the castle, at the hour of noon, and, the better to strengthen his design, he caused the drum to be beat about the town. Himself, whilst his dinner was making ready, went to see his artillery mounted upon the carriage, to display his colors, and set up the great royal standard, and loaded wains with store of ammunition both for the field and the belly, arms and victuals. At dinner he despatched his commissions, and by his express edict my Lord Shagrag was appointed to command the vanguard, wherein were numbered sixteen thousand and fourteen arquebusiers or firelocks, together with thirty thousand and eleven volunteer adventurers. The great Touquedillon, master of the horse, had the charge of the ordnance, wherein were reckoned nine hundred and fourteen brazen pieces, in cannons, double cannons, basilisks, serpentes, culverins, bombards or murderers, falcons, bases or passevolins, spirofs, and other sorts of great guns. The rearguard was committed to the Duke of Scrapegood. In the main battle was the king and the princes of his kingdom. Thus being hastily furnished, before they would set forward, they sent three hundred light horsemen, under the conduct of Captain Swillwind, to discover the country, clear the avenues, and see whether there was any ambush laid for them. But, after they had made diligent search, they found all the land round about in peace and quiet, without any meeting or convention at all; which Picrochole understanding, commanded that everyone should march speedily under his colors. Then immediately in all disorder, without keeping either rank or file, they took the fields one amongst another, wasting, spoiling, destroying, and making havoc of all wherever they went, not sparing poor nor rich, privileged or unprivileged places, church nor laity, drove away oxen and cows, bulls, calves, heifers, wethers, ewes, lambs, goats, kids, hens, capons, chickens, geese, ganders, goslings, hogs, swine, pigs, and such like; beating down the walnuts, plucking the grapes, tearing the hedges, shaking the fruit-trees, and committing such incomparable abuses, that the like abomination was never heard of. Nevertheless, they met with none to resist them, for everyone submitted to their mercy, beseeching

Rabelais (1490?-1553). Gargantua and Pantagruel, translated by Urquhart and Motteux.

¹ The shepherds of Gargantua, having been provoked by the cake-bakers of Lerné, struck back in self-defense.

them that they might be dealt with courteously in regard that they had always carried themselves as became good and loving neighbors, and that they had never been guilty of any wrong or outrage done upon them, to be thus suddenly surprised, troubled, and disquieted, and that, if they would not desist, God would punish them very shortly. To which expostulations and remonstrances no other answer was made, but that they would teach them to eat cakes.

Grangousier's Unwillingness and Aversion from the Undertaking of War

. . . But let us leave them there, and return to our good Gargantua, who is at Paris very assiduous and earnest at the study of good letters and athletical exertitions, and to the good old man Grangousier his father, who after supper warmeth [himself] by a good, clear, great fire, and, waiting upon the broiling of some chestnuts, is very serious in drawing scratches on the hearth, with a stick burnt at the one end, wherewith they did stir up the fire, telling to his wife and the rest of the family pleasant old stories and tales of former times.

Whilst he was thus employed one of the shepherds which did keep the vines, named Pillot, came towards him, and to the full related the enormous abuses which were committed, and the excessive spoil that was made by Picrochole, King of Lerne, upon his lands and territories, and how he had pillaged, wasted, and ransacked all the country, except the enclosure at Seville, which Friar John des Entoumeures to his great honor had preserved; and that at the same present time the said king was in the rock Clermond, and there, with great industry and circumspection, was strengthening himself and his whole army. "Halas, halas, alas!" said Grangousier, "what is this, good people? Do I dream, or is it true that they tell me? Picrochole, my ancient friend of old time, of my kindred and alliance, comes he to invade me? What moves him? What provokes him? What sets him on? What drives him to it? Who hath given him this counsel? Ho, ho, ho, ho, ho, my God, my Saviour, help me, inspire me, and advise me what I shall do! I protest, I swear before thee, so be thou favorable to me, if ever I did him or his subjects any damage or displeasure, or committed any the least robbery in his country; but, on the contrary, I have succored and supplied him with men, money, friendship, and counsel, upon any occasion wherein I could be serviceable for the improvement of his good. That he hath therefore at this nick of time so outraged and wronged me, it cannot be but the malevolent and wicked spirit. Good God, thou knowest my courage, for nothing can be hidden from thee. If perhaps he be grown mad, and that thou hast sent him hither to me for the better recovery and re-establishment of his brain, grant me power and wisdom to bring him to the yoke of thy holy will by good discipline. Ho, ho, ho, ho, my good people, my friends and my faithful servants, must I hinder you from helping me? Alas, my old age required henceforward nothing else but rest, and all the days of my life I have labored for nothing so much as peace; but now I must, I see it well, load with arms my poor weary, and feeble shoulders, and take in my trembling hands the lance and horseman's mace, to succor and protect my honest subjects. Reason will have it so; for by their labor am I entertained, and with their sweat am I nourished, I, my children and my family. This notwithstanding, I will not undertake war, until I have first tried all the ways and means of peace; that I resolve upon."

Then assembled he his council, and proposed the matter as it was indeed. Whereupon it was concluded that they should send some discreet man unto Picrochole to know wherefore he had thus suddenly broken the peace and invaded those lands unto which he had no right or title. Furthermore, that they should send for Gargantua, and those under his command, for the preservation of the country, and defence thereof now at need. [In the ensuing struggle Gargantua's army, aided by the monk, thoroughly defeat Picrochole.]

Gargantua's Speech to the Vanquished

Our forefathers and ancestors of all times have been of this nature and disposition, that, upon the winning of a battle, they have chosen rather, for a sign and memorial of their triumphs and victories, to erect trophies and monuments in the hearts of the vanquished by clemency than by architecture in the lands which they had conquered. For they did hold in greater estimation the lively remembrance of men purchased by liberality than the dumb inscription of arches, pillars and pyramids, subject to the injury of storms and tempests, and the envy of everyone. You may very well remember of the courtesy which by them was used towards the Bretons in the battle of St. Aubin of Cormier and the demolishing of Partenay. You have heard, and hearing admire, their gentle comportment towards those at the barriers [the barbarians] of Spaniola, who had plundered, wasted and ransacked the maritime borders of Olone and Thalmondois. All this hemisphere of the world was filled with the praises and congratulations which yourselves and your fathers made, when Alpharbal, King of Canarre, not satisfied with his own fortunes, did most furiously invade the land of Onyx, and with cruel piracies molest all the Armoric Islands and confine regions of Brittany. Yet was he in a set naval fight justly taken and vanquished by my father, whom God preserve and protect. But what? Whereas other kings and emperors, yea, those who entitle themselves Catholics, would have dealt roughly with him, kept him a close prisoner, and put him to an extreme high ransom, he entreated him very courteously, lodged him kindly with himself in his own palace, and out of his incredible mildness and gentle disposition sent him back with a safe conduct, laden with gifts, laden with favors, laden with all offices of friendship. What fell out upon it? Being returned into his country, he called a parliament, where all the princes and states of his kingdom being assembled, he showed them the humanity which he had found in us, and therefore wished them to take such course by way of compensation therein as that the whole world might be edified by the example, as well of their honest graciousness to us as of our gracious honesty towards them. The result hereof was, that it was voted and decreed by an unanimous consent, that they should offer up entirely their land, dominions and kingdoms, to be disposed of by us according to our pleasure.

Alpharbal in his own person presently returned with nine thousand and thirty-eight great ships of burden, bringing with him the treasures, not only of his house and royal lineage, but almost of all the country besides. For he embarking himself, to set sail with a west-northeast wind, everyone in heaps did cast into the ship gold, silver, rings, jewels, spices, drugs, and aromatical perfumes, parrots, pelicans, monkeys, civet cats, black-spotted weasels, porcupines, &c. He was accounted no good mother's son that did not cast in all the rare and precious things he had.

Being safely arrived, he came to my said father, and would have kissed his feet. That action was found too submissively low, and therefore was not permitted, but in exchange he was most cordially embraced. He offered his presents; they were not received, because they were too excessive: he yielded himself voluntarily a servant and vassal, and was content his whole posterity should be liable to the same bondage; this was not accepted of, because it seemed not equitable: he surrendered, by virtue of the decree of his great parliamentary council, his whole countries and kingdoms to him, offering the deed and conveyance, signed, sealed and ratified by all those that were concerned in it; this was altogether refused, and the parchments cast into the fire. In end, this free goodwill and simple meaning of the Canarians wrought such tenderness in my father's heart, that he could not abstain from shedding tears, and wept most profusely; then, by choice, words very congruously adapted, strove in what he could to diminish the estimation of the good offices which he had done them, saying, that any courtesy he had conferred upon them was not worth a rush, and what favor soever he had showed them he was bound to do it. But so much the more did Alpharbal augment the repute thereof. What was the issue? Whereas for his ransom, in the greatest extremity of rigor and most tyrannical dealing, could not have been exacted above twenty times a hundred thousand crowns, and his eldest sons detained as hostages till that sum had been paid, they made themselves perpetual tributaries, and obliged to give us every year two millions of gold at four and twenty carats fine. The first year we received the whole sum of two millions; the second year of their own accord they paid freely to us three and twenty hundred thousand crowns; the third year six and twenty hundred thousand; the fourth year, three millions, and do so increase it always out of their own goodwill that we shall be constrained to forbid them to bring us any more. This is the nature of gratitude and true thankfulness. For time, which gnaws and diminisheth all things else, augments and increaseth benefits; because a noble action of liberality, done to a man of reason, doth grow continually by his generous thinking of it and remembering it.

Being unwilling, therefore any way to degenerate from the hereditary mildness and clemency of my parents, I do now forgive you, deliver you from all fines and imprisonments, fully release you, set you at liberty, and every way make you as frank and free as ever you were before. Moreover, at your going out of the gate, you shall have every one of you three months' pay to bring you home into your houses and families, and shall have a safe convoy of six hundred cuirassiers and eight thousand foot under the conduct of Alexander, esquire of my body, that the clubmen of the country may not do you any injury. God be with you. I am sorry from my heart that Picrochole is not here; for I would have given him to understand that this war was undertaken against my will and without any hope to increase either my goods or my renown. But seeing he is lost, and that no man can tell where nor how he went away, it is my will that his kingdom remain entire to his son; who, because he is too young, he not being yet full five years old, shall be brought up and instructed by the ancient princes and learned men of the kingdom. And because a realm thus desolate may easily come to ruin, if the covetousness and avarice of those who by their places are obliged to administer justice in it be not curbed and restrained, I ordain and will have it so, that Ponocrates be overseer and superintendent above all his governors, with whatever power and authority is requisite thereto, and that he be continually with the child until he find him able and capable to rule and govern by himself.

Now I must tell you, that you are to understand how a too feeble and dissolute facility in pardoning evildoers giveth them occasion to commit wickedness afterwards more readily, upon this pernicious confidence of receiving favor. I consider that Moses, the meekest man that was in his time upon the earth, did severely punish the mutinous and seditious people of Israel. I consider likewise that Julius Cæsar, who was so gracious an emperor that Cicero said of him that his fortune had nothing more excellent than that he could, and his virtue nothing better than that he would always save and pardon every man, he, notwithstanding all this, did in certain places most rigorously punish the authors of rebellion. After the example of these good men, it is my will and pleasure that you deliver over unto me before you depart hence, first, that fine fellow Marquet, who was the prime cause, origin, and groundwork of this war by his vain presumption and overweening; secondly, his fellow cake-bakers, who were neglective in checking and reprehending his idle hare-brained humor in the instant time; and lastly all the counsellors, captains, officers, and domestics of Picrochole, who had been incendiaries or fomenters of the war by provoking, praising, or counselling him to come out of his limits thus to trouble us.

How Gargantua Caused to Be Built for the Monk the Abbey of Theleme

There was left only the monk to provide for, whom Gargantua would have made abbot of Seville, but he refused it. He would have given him the abbey of Bourgueil, or of Sanct Florent, which was better, or both if it pleased him. But the monk gave him a very peremptory answer, that he would never take upon him the charge nor government of monks. . . . "If you think I have done you, or may hereafter do you any acceptable service, give me leave to found an abbey after my own mind and fancy." The motion pleased Gargantua very well, who thereupon offered him all the country of Theleme by the river of Loire, till within two leagues of the great forest of Porthuaut. The monk then requested Gargantua to institute his religious order contrary to all others. "First then," said Gargantua, "you must not build a wall about your convent, for all other abbeys are strongly walled and mured about." "See," said the monk, "and without cause, where there is mur before, and mur behind, there is store of murmur, envy, and mutual conspiracy."

Moreover, seeing there are certain convents in the world, whereof the custom is, if any woman come (I mean chaste and honest women) they immediately sweep the ground which they have trod upon. Therefore was it ordained, that if any man or woman, entered into religious orders, should by chance come within this new abbey, all the rooms should be thoroughly washed and cleansed, through which they had passed. And because in all other monasteries and nunneries all is compassed, limited, and regulated by hours, it was decreed, that in this new structure there should be neither clock nor dial, but that, according to the opportunities and incident occasions, all their hours should be disposed of. "For," said Gargantua, "the greatest loss of time that I know, is, to count the hours. What good comes of it? Nor can there be any greater dotage in the world, than for one to guide and direct his courses by the sound of a bell, and not by his own judgment and discretion."

Item, because at that time they put no women into nunneries but such as were either purblind, blinkards, lame, crooked, ill-favored, mis-shapen, fools, senseless, spoiled, or corrupt; nor encloistered any men, but those that were either sickly, subject to defluxions, ill-bred louts, simple sots, or peevish trouble-houses. "But to the purpose," said the monk: "a woman that is neither fair nor good, to what use serves she?" "To make a nun of," said Gargantua. "Yea," said the monk, "and to make shirts and smocks." Therefore was it ordained, that into this religious order should be admitted no women that were not fair, well featured, and of a sweet disposition; nor men that were not comely, personable, and well-conditioned.

Item, because in the convents of women, men come not but underhand, privily, and by stealth; it was therefore enacted, that in this house there shall be no women in case there be not men, nor men in case there be not women.

Item, because both men and women that are received into religious orders, after the expiring of their novitiat, or probation year, were constrained and forced perpetually to stay there all the days of their life; it was therefore ordered, that all whatever, men or women, admitted within this abbey, should have tull leave to depart with peace and contentment, whensoever it should seem good to them to do so.

Item, for that the religious men and women did ordinarily make three vows, to wit, those of chastity, poverty, and obedience; it was therefore constituted and appointed, that in this convent they might be honorably married, that they might be rich, and live at liberty. In regard of the legitimate time of the persons to be initiated, and years under and above which they were not capable of reception, the women were to be admitted from ten till fifteen, and the men from twelve to eighteen.

How the Abbey of the Thelemites Was Built and Endowed

For the fabric and furniture of the abbey Gargantua caused to be delivered out, in ready money, seven and twenty hundred thousand eight hundred and one, and thirty of those golden rams of Berrie, which have a sheep stamped on the one side, and a flowered cross on the other. And for every year, until the whole work were completed, he allotted three score and nine thousand crowns of the sun, and as many of the seven stars, to be charged all upon the receipt of the custom. For the foundation and maintenance thereof forever, he settled a perpetual fee-farm-rent of three and twenty hundred, threescore and nine thousand, five hundred and fourteen rose-nobles, exempt from all homage, fealty, service, or burden whatsoever, and payable every year at the gate of the abbey; and of this, by letters patent, passed a very good grant. The architecture was in a figure hexagonal, and in such a fashion that every one of the six corners there was built a great round tower of threescore feet in diameter; and were all of a like form and bigness. Upon the north side ran along the river of Loire, on the bank whereof was situated the tower called Arctic. Going towards the east, there was another called Calare; the next following, Anatole; the next, Mesembrine; the next, Hesperia, and the last, Criere. Every tower was distant from the other the space of three hundred and twelve paces. The whole edifice was everywhere six stories high, reckoning the cellars underground for one. The second was arched after the fashion of a basket-handle. The rest was ceiled with pure wainscot, flourished with Flanders fret-work, in the form of the foot of a lamp; and covered above with fine slates, with an indorsement of lead, carrying the antique figures of little puppets, and animals of all sorts, notably well suited to one another, and gilt, together with the gutters, which jetting without the walls, from betwixt the cross bars in a diagonal figure, painted with gold and azure, reached to the very ground, where they ended into great conduit pipes, which carried all away unto the river from under the house.

This same building was a hundred times more sumptuous and magnificent than ever was Bonnivet, Chambourg, or Chantilly. For there were in it nine thousand, three hundred, and two and thirty chambers; every one whereof had a withdrawing room, a handsome closet, a wardrobe, an oratory, and neat passage, leading into a great and spacious hall. Between every tower, in the midst of the said body of building, there was a pair of winding stairs, whereof the steps were part of porphyry, part of Numidian stone, and part of serpentine marble; each of those steps being two and twenty feet in length, and three fingers thick, and the just number of twelve betwixt every rest or landing-place. In every resting-place were two fair antique arches, where the light came in; and by those they went into a cabinet (closet), made even with, and of the breadth of the said winding, and the re-ascending above the roofs of the house ending conically in a pavilion. By that vize, or winding, they entered on every side into a great hall, and from the halls into the chambers. From the Arctic tower unto the Criere, were the fair great libraries in Greek, Latin, Hebrew, French, Italian, and Spanish, respectively distributed in their several cantons, according to the diversity of these languages. In the midst there was a wonderful winding stair, the entry whereof was without the house, in a vault or arch, six fathoms broad. It was made in such symmetry and largeness that six men-at-arms, with their lances in their rests, might together in a breast ride all up to the very top of all the palace. From the tower Anatole to the Mesembrine were spacious galleries, all colored over and painted with the ancient prowesses, histories, and descriptions of the world. In the midst thereof there was likewise such another ascent and gate, as we said there was on the river side. Upon that gate was written, in great antique letters, that which followeth.

How the Thelemites Were Governed, and of Their Manner of Living

All their life was spent not in laws, statutes, or rules, but according to their own free will and pleasure. They rose out of their beds when they thought good; they did eat, drink, labor, sleep when they had a mind to it, and were disposed for it. None did awake them, none did offer to constrain them to eat, drink, nor do any other thing; for so had Gargantua established it. In all their rule and strictest tie of their order, there was but this one clause to be observed:

DO WHAT THOU WILT

Because men that are free, well-bred, and conversant in honest companies, have naturally an instinct and spur that prompteth them unto virtuous actions, and withdraws them from vice, which is called honor. Those same men, when by base subjection and constraint they are brought under and kept down, turn aside from that noble disposition, by which they formerly were inclined to virtue, to shake off that bond of servitude, wherein they are so tyrannously inslaved; for it is agreeable to the nature of man to long after things forbidden, and to desire what is denied us. By this liberty they entered into a very laudable emulation, to do all of them what they saw did please one.

If any of the gallants or ladies should say, "Let us drink," they would all drink. If any one of them said, "Let us play," they all played. If one said, "Let us go a-walking into the fields," they went all. If it were to go a-hawking, or a-hunting, the ladies mounted upon dainty well-paced nags, seated in a stately palfrey saddle, carried on their lovely fists miniardly begloved every one of them, either a sparhawk, or a laneret, or a marlin, and the young gallants carried the other kinds of hawks. So nobly were they taught, that there was neither he nor she amongst them, but could read, write, sing, play upon several musical instruments, speak five or six several languages, and compose in them all very quaintly, both in verse and prose. Never were seen so valiant knights, so noble and worthy, so dexterous and skillful both on foot and horseback, more brisk and lively, more nimble and quick, or better handling all manner of weapons, than were there. Never were seen ladies so proper and handsome, so miniard and dainty, less forward, or more ready with their hand, and with their needle, in every honest and free action belonging to that sex, than were there. For this reason, when the time came that any man of the said abbey, either at the request of his parents, or for some other cause, had a mind to go out of it, he carried along with him one of the ladies, namely, her, whom he had before that chosen for his mistress, and they were married together. And if they had formerly in Theleme lived in good devotion and amity, they did continue therein, and increase it to a greater height in their state of matrimony; and did entertain that mutual love till the very last day of their life, in no less vigor and fervency than at the very day of their wedding.

Pantagruel

[Gargantua has a son Pantagruel, who surpasses his father. In the following letter the giant gives the son advice concerning his education.]

How Pantagruel, Being at Paris, Received Letters from His Father Gargantua, and the Copy of Them

Pantagruel studied very hard, as you may well conceive, and profited accordingly; for he had an excellent understanding, and notable wit, together with a capacity in memory, equal to the measure of twelve oil budgets, or butts of olives. And, as he was there abiding one day, he received a letter from his father in manner as followeth:

Most dear Son,—Amongst the gifts, graces, and prerogatives with which the sovereign plasmator God Almighty hath endowed and adorned human nature at the beginning, that seems to me most singular and excellent, by which we may in a moral estate attain to a kind of immortality, and in the course of this transitory life perpetuate our name and seed, which is done by a progeny issued from us in the lawful bonds of matrimony. Whereby that in some measure is restored unto us, which was taken from us by the sin of our first parents, to whom it was said, that, because they had not obeyed the commandment of God their Creator, they should die; and by death should be brought to nought that so stately frame and plasmature, wherein the man at first had been created.

But by this means of seminal propagation, there continueth in the children what was lost in the parents; and in the grand-children that which perished in their fathers, and so successively until the day of the last judgment, when Jesus Christ shall have rendered up to God the Father his kingdom in a peaceable condition, out of all danger and contamination of sin; for then shall cease all generations and corruptions, and the elements leave off their continual transmutations, seeing the so much desired peace shall be attained unto and enjoyed, and that all things shall be brought to their end and period. And, therefore, not without just and reasonable cause do I give thanks to God my Savior and Preserver, for that he hath enabled me to see my bald old age refflourish in thy youth; for when, at his good pleasure, who rules and governs all things, my soul shall leave this mortal habitation, I shall not account myself wholly to die, but to pass from one place unto another, considering that, in and by thee, I continue in my visible image living in the world, visiting and conversing with people of honor, and other my good friends, as I was wont to do. Which conversation of mine, although it was not without sin, (because we are all of us trespassers, and therefore ought continually to beseech his divine majesty to blot our transgressions out of his memory,) yet was it by the help and grace of God, without all manner of reproach before men.

Wherefore, if those qualities of the mind but shine in thee, wherewith I am endowed, as in thee remaineth the perfect image of my body, thou wilt be esteemed by all men to be the perfect guardian and treasure of the immortality of our name. But, if otherwise, I shall truly take but small pleasure to see it, considering that the lesser part of me, which is the body, would abide in thee, and the best, to wit, that which is the soul, and by which our name continues blessed amongst men, would be degenerate and abastardized. This I do not 10 speak out of any distrust that I have of thy virtue, which I have heretofore already tried, but to encourage thee yet more earnestly to proceed from good to better. And that which I now write unto thee is not so much that thou shouldst live in this virtuous course, as that thou shouldst rejoice in so living and having lived, and cheer up thyself with the like resolution in time to come; to the prosecution and accomplishment of which enterprise and generous undertaking thou mayest easily remember how that I have spared nothing, but have so helped thee as if I had no other treasure in this world, but to see thee once in my life completely well bred and accomplished, as well in virtue, honesty, and valor, as in all liberal knowledge and civility, and so to leave thee after my death as a mirror representing the person of me thy father, and if not so excellent, and such indeed as I do wish thee, yet such is my desire.

20 But although my deceased father of happy memory, Grandgousier, had bent his best endeavors to make me profit in all perfection and political knowledge, and that my labor and study was fully correspondent to, yea, went beyond his desire, nevertheless, as thou mayest well understand, the time then was not so proper and fit for learning as it is at present, neither had I plenty of such good masters as thou hast had. For that time was darksome, obscured with clouds of ignorance, and savoring a little of the infelicity and calamity of the Goths, who had, wherever they set footing, destroyed all good literature, which in my age hath by the divine goodness been restored unto its former light and dignity, and that with such amendment and increase of knowledge, that now hardly should I be admitted unto the first form of the little grammar-school boys. I say, I, who in my youthful days was, and that justly, reputed the most learned of that age. Which I do not speak in vain boasting, although I might lawfully do it in writing unto thee,—in verification whereof thou hast the authority of Marcus Tullius in his book of old age, and the sentence of Plutarch, in the book intituled, How a man may praise himself without envy:—but to give thee an emulous encouragement to strive yet further.

Now it is, that the minds of men are qualified with all manner of discipline and the old sciences revived, which for many ages were extinct. Now it is, that the learned languages are to their pristine purity restored, viz., Greek, without which a man may be ashamed to account himself a scholar, Hebrew, Arabic, Chaldaean, and Latin. Printing likewise is now in use, so elegant and so correct, that better cannot be imagined, although it was found out but in my time by divine inspiration, as by a diabolical suggestion on the other side, was the invention of ordnance. All the world is full of knowing men, of most learned schoolmasters, and vast libraries; and it appears to me as a truth, that neither in Plato's time, nor Cicero's, nor Papinian's, there was ever such conveniency for studying, as we see at this day there is. Nor must any adventure henceforward to come in public or present himself in company, that hath not been pretty well polished in the shop of Minerva. I see robbers, hangmen, free-booters, tapsters, ostlers, and such like, of the very rubbish of the people, more learned now than the doctors and preachers were in my time.

What shall I say? The very women and children have aspired to this praise and celestial manna of good learning. Yet so it is, that at the age I am now of, I have been constrained to learn the Greek tongue,—which I contemned not like Cato, but had not the leisure in my younger years to attend the study of it,—and I take much delight in the reading of Plutarch's Morals, the pleasant Dialogues of Plato, the Monuments of Pausanias, and the Antiquities of Athenæus, in waiting on the hour wherein God my Creator shall call me, and command me to depart from this earth and transitory pilgrimage. Wherefore, my son, I admonish thee to employ thy youth to profit as well as thou canst, both in thy studies and in virtue. Thou art at Paris, where the laudable examples of many brave men may stir up thy mind to gallant actions, and hast likewise, for thy tutor and pedagogue the learned Epistemon, who by his lively and vocal documents may instruct thee in the arts and sciences.

I intend, and will have it so, that thou learn the languages perfectly; first of all, the Greek, as Quintilian will have it; secondly, the Latin; and then the Hebrew, for the Holy Scripture-sake; and then the Chaldee and Arabic likewise, and that thou frame thy style in Greek in imitation of Plato; and for the Latin, after Cicero. Let there be no history which thou shalt not have ready in thy memory;—unto the prosecuting of which design, books of cosmography will be very conducible, and help thee much. Of the liberal arts of geometry, arithmetic, and music, I gave thee some taste when thou wert yet little, and not above five or six years old. Proceed further in them, and learn the remainder if thou canst. As for astronomy, study all the rules thereof. Let pass, nevertheless, the divining and judicial astrology, and the art of Lullius, as being nothing else but plain abuses and vanities. As for the civil law, of that I would have thee to know the texts by heart, and then to confer them with philosophy.

Now, in matter of the knowledge of the works of nature, I would have thee to study that exactly; that so there be no sea, river, nor fountain, of which thou dost not know the fishes; all the fowls of the air; all the several kinds of shrubs and trees, whether in forest or orchards; all the sort of herbs and flowers that grow upon the ground; all the various metals that are hid within the bowels of the earth; together with all the diversity of precious stones, that are to be seen, in the orient and south parts of the world. Let nothing of all these be hidden from thee. Then fail not most carefully to peruse the books of the Greek, Arabian, and Latin physicians, not despising the Talmudists and Cabalists; and by frequent anatomies get thee the perfect knowledge of that other world, called the microcosm, which is man. And at some of the hours of the day apply thy mind to the study of the Holy Scriptures; first, in Greek, the New Testament, with the Epistles of the Apostles; and then the Old Testament in Hebrew. In brief, let me see thee an abyss, and bottomless pit of knowledge: for from henceforward, as thou growest great and becomest a man, thou must part from this tranquillity and rest of study, thou must learn chivalry, warfare, and the exercises of the field, the better thereby to defend my house and our friends, and to succor and protect them at all their needs, against the invasion and assaults of evil doers.

Furthermore, I will that very shortly thou try how much thou hast profited, which thou canst not better do, than by maintaining publicly theses and conclusions in all arts, against all persons whatsoever, and by haunting the company of learned men, both at Paris and elsewhere. But because, as the wise man Solomon saith, Wisdom entereth not into a malicious mind, and that knowledge without conscience is but the ruin of the soul; it behoveth thee to serve, to love, to fear God, and on him to cast all thy thoughts and all thy hope, and, by faith formed in charity, to cleave unto him, so that thou mayst never be separated from him by thy sins. Suspect the abuses of the world. Set not thy heart upon vanity, for this life is transitory, but the Word of the Lord endureth for ever. Be serviceable to all thy neighbors, and love them as thyself. Reverence thy preceptors: shun the conversation of those whom thou desirest not to resemble; and receive not in vain the graces which God hath bestowed upon thee. And, when thou shalt see that thou hast attained to all the knowledge that is to be acquired in that part, return unto me, that I may see thee, and give thee my blessing before I die. My son, the peace and grace of our Lord be with thee, Amen.

Thy father, Gargantua. 10 indefatigable.

From Utopia the 17th day of the month of March.

These letters being received and read, Pantagruel plucked up his heart, took a fresh courage to him, and was inflamed with a desire to profit in his studies more than ever, so that if you had seen him, how he took pains, and how he advanced in learning, you would have said that the vivacity of his spirit amidst the books was like a great fire amongst dry wood, so active it was, vigorous, and

Of the Education of Children

To Madame Diane de Foix, Comtesse de Gursen

. . . A friend of mine, then, having read the preceding chapter, the other day told me, that I should a little farther have extended my discourse on the education of children. Now, madame, if I had any sufficiency in this subject, I could not possibly better employ it, than to present my best instructions to the little gentleman that threatens you 10 shortly with a happy birth (for you are too generous to begin otherwise than with a male); for having had so great a hand in the treaty of your marriage, I have a certain particular right and interest in the greatness and prosperity of the issue that shall spring from it; besides that, your having had the best of my services so long in possession, sufficiently obliges me to desire the honor and advantage of all wherein you shall be concerned. But, in truth, all I understand as to 20 that particular is only this, that the greatest and most important difficulty of human science is the education of children. . . .

For a boy of quality then, who pretends to letters not upon the account of profit (for so mean an object as that is unworthy of the grace and favor of the Muses, and moreover, in it a man directs his service to and depends upon others), nor so much for outward ornament, as 30 for his own proper and peculiar use, and to furnish and enrich himself within, having rather a desire to come out an accomplished cavalier than a mere scholar or learned man; for such a one, I say, I would, also, have his friends solicitous to find him out a tutor, who has rather a well-made than a well-filled head; seeking, indeed, both the one and the other, but rather of the two to prefer manners and judgment to mere learning, and that this man should exercise his charge after a new method.

'Tis the custom of pedagogues to be eternally thundering in their pupils' ears, as they were pouring into a funnel, while the business of the pupil is only to repeat what the others have said: now I would have a tutor to correct this error, and, that at the very first, he should, according to the capacity he has to deal with, put it to the test, permitting his pupil himself to taste things, and of himself to discern and choose them, sometimes opening the way to him, and sometimes leaving him to open it for himself; that is, I would not have him alone to invent and speak, but that he should also hear his pupil speak in turn. Socrates, and since him Arcesilaus, made first their scholars speak, and then they spoke to them. It is good to make him, like a young horse, trot before him that he may judge of his going and how much he is to abate of his own speed, to accommodate himself to the vigor and capacity 40 of the other. For want of which due proportion we spoil all; which also to know how to adjust, and to keep within an exact and due measure, is one of the hardest things I know, and 'tis the effect of a high and well-tempered soul to know how to condescend to such puerile motions and to govern and direct them. I walk firmer and more secure up hill than down.

Montaigne, Essays. Translated by Charles Cotton. Michel Eyquem de Montaigne (1533-1592), aristocrat and magistrate, lived the life of a country gentleman and scholar in his château near Bordeaux.

Such as, according to our common way of teaching, undertake, with one and the same lesson, and the same measure of direction, to instruct several boys of differing and unequal capacities, are infinitely mistaken; and 'tis no wonder, if in a whole multitude of scholars, there are not found above two or three who bring away any good account of their time and discipline. Let the master not only examine him about the grammatical construction of the bare words of his lesson, but about the sense and substance of them, and let him judge of the profit he has made, not by the testimony of his memory, but by that of his life. Let him make him put what he has learned into a hundred several forms, and accommodate it to so many several subjects, to see if he yet rightly comprehends it, and has made it his own, taking instruction of his progress by the pedagogic institutions of Plato. 'Tis a sign of crudity and indigestion to disgorge what we eat in the same condition it was swallowed; the stomach has not performed its office unless it has altered the form and condition of what was committed to it to concoct. Our minds work only upon trust, when bound and compelled to follow the appetite of another's fancy, and slaved and captivated under the authority of another's instruction; we have been so subjected to the trammel, that we have no free, nor natural pace of our own; our own vigor and liberty are extinct and gone. . . .

Let him make him examine and thoroughly sift everything he reads, and lodge nothing in his fancy upon simple authority and upon trust. Aristotle's principles will then be no more principles to him, than those of Epicurus and the Stoics: let this diversity of opinions be propounded to, and laid before him; he will himself choose, if he be able; if not, he will remain in doubt. For, if he embrace the opinions of Xenophon and Plato, by his own reason, they will no more be theirs, but become his own. Who follows another, follows nothing, finds nothing, nay, is inquisitive after nothing.

Let him at least, know that he knows. It will be necessary that he imbibe their knowledge, not that he be corrupted with their precepts; and no matter if he forgot where he had his learning, provided he know how to apply it to his own use. Truth and reason are common to every one, and are no more his who spake them first, than his who speaks them after: 'tis no more according to Plato, than according to me, since both he and I equally see and understand them. Bees cull their several sweets from this flower and that blossom, here and there where they find them, but themselves afterward make the honey, which is all and purely their own, and no more thyme and marjoram: so the several fragments he borrows from others, he will transform and shuffle together to compile a work that shall be absolutely his own; that is to say, his judgment: his instruction, labor and study, tend to nothing else but to form that. He is not obliged to discover whence he got the materials that have assisted him, but only to produce what he has himself done with them. Men that live upon pillage and borrowing, expose their purchases and buildings to every one's view: but do not proclaim how they came by the money. We do not see the fees and perquisites of a gentleman of the long robe; but we see the alliances wherewith he fortifies himself and his family, and the titles and honors he has obtained for him and his. No man divulges his revenue; or at least, which way it comes in: but every one publishes his acquisitions. The advantages of our study are to become better and more wise. 'Tis, says Epicharmus,¹ the understanding that sees and hears, 'tis the understanding that improves everything, that orders everything, and that acts, rules, and reigns: all other faculties are blind, and deaf, and without soul. And certainly we render it timorous and servile, in not allowing it the liberty and privilege to do anything of itself. Whoever asked his pupil what he thought of grammar or rhetoric, and of such and such a sentence of Cicero? Our masters stick them, full feathered, in our memories, and there establish them like oracles, of which the letters and syllables are of the substance of the thing. To know by rote, is no knowledge, and signifies no more but only to retain what one has intrusted to our memory. That which a man rightly knows and understands, he is the free disposer of at his own full liberty, without any regard to the author from whence he had it or fumbling over the leaves of his book. A mere bookish learning is a poor, paltry learning; it may serve for ornament, but there is yet no foundation for any superstructure to be built upon it, according to the opinion of Plato, who says that constancy, faith, and sincerity, are the true philosophy, and the other sciences, that are directed to other ends, mere adulterate paint. I could wish that Paluel or Pompey, those two noted dancers of my time, could have taught us to cut capers, by only seeing them do it, without stirring from our places, as these men pretend to inform the understanding, without ever setting it to work; or that we could learn to ride, handle a pike, touch a lute, or sing, without the trouble of practice, as these attempt to make us judge and speak well, without exercising us in judging or speaking. Now in this initiation of our studies and in their progress, whatsoever presents itself before us is book sufficient; a roguish trick of a page, a sottish mistake of a servant, a jest at the table, are so many new subjects.

And for this reason, conversation with men is of very great use, and travel into foreign countries; not to bring back (as most of our young monsieurs do) an account only of how many paces Santa Rotonda¹ is in circuit; or of the richness of Signora Livia's petticoats; or, as some others, how much Nero's face, in a statue in such an old ruin, is longer and broader than that made for him on some medal; but to be able chiefly to give an account of the humors, manners, customs and laws of those nations where he has been, and that we may whet and sharpen our wits by rubbing them against those of others. I would that a boy should be sent abroad very young, and first, so as to kill two birds with one stone, into those neighboring nations whose language is most differing from our own, and to which, if it be not formed betimes, the tongue will grow too stiff to bend.

And also 'tis the general opinion of all, that a child should not be brought up in his mother's lap. Mothers are too tender, and their natural affection is apt to make the most discreet of them all so overfond, that they can neither find in their hearts to give them due correction for the faults they commit, nor suffer them to be inured to hardships and hazards, as they ought to be. They will not endure to see them return all dust and sweat from their exercise, to drink cold drink when they are hot, nor see them mount an unruly horse, nor take a foil in hand against a rude fencer, or so much as to discharge a carbine. And yet there is no remedy; whoever will breed a boy to be good for anything when he comes to be a man, must by no means spare him when young, and must very often transgress the rules of physic. It is not enough to fortify his soul; you are also to make his sinews strong; for the soul will be oppressed if not assisted by the members, and would have too hard a task to discharge two offices alone. I know very well, to my cost, how much mine groans under the burden, from being accommodated with a body so tender and indisposed, as eternally leans and presses upon her; and often in my reading perceive that our masters, in their writings, make examples pass for magnanimity and fortitude of mind, which really are rather toughness of skin and hardness of bones; for I have seen men, women, and children, naturally born of so hard and insensible a constitution of body, that a sound cudgeling has been less to them than a flirt with a finger would have been to me, and that would neither cry out, wince, nor shrink, for a good swinging beating; and when wrestlers counterfeit the philosophers in patience, 'tis rather strength of nerves than stoutness of heart. Now to be inured to undergo labor, is to be accustomed to endure pain. A boy is to be broken into the toil and roughness of exercise, so as to be trained up to the pain and suffering of dislocations, cholics, cauteries, and even imprisonment and the rack itself; for he may come, by misfortune, to be reduced to the worst of these, which (as this world goes) is sometimes inflicted on the good as well as the bad.

And, moreover, by living at home, the authority of this governor which ought to be sovereign over the boy he has received into his charge, is often checked and hindered by the presence of parents; to which may also be added, that the respect the whole family pay him, as their master's son, and the knowledge he has of the estate and greatness he is heir to, are, in my opinion, no small inconveniences in these tender years.

And yet, even in this conversing with men I spoke of but now, I have observed this vice, that instead of gathering observations from others, we make it our whole business to lay ourselves upon them, and are more concerned how to expose and set out our own commodities, than how to increase our stock by acquiring new. Silence, therefore; and modesty are very advantageous qualities in conversation. One should, therefore, train up this boy to be sparing and a husband of his knowledge when he has acquired it; and to forbear taking exceptions at or reproving every idle saying or ridiculous story that is said or told in his presence; for it is a very unbecoming rudeness to carp at everything that is not agreeable to our own palate.

Let him be satisfied with correcting himself, and not seem to condemn everything in another he would not do himself, nor dispute it as against common customs. Let him avoid these vain and uncivil images of authority, this childish ambition of coveting to appear better bred and more accomplished, than he really will, by such carriage, discover himself to be. And, as if opportunities of interrupting and reprehending were not to be omitted, to desire thence to derive the reputation of something more than ordinary. For as it becomes none but great poets to make use of the poetical license, so it is intolerable for any but men of great and illustrious souls to assume privilege above the authority of custom. Let him be instructed not to engage in discourse or dispute but with a champion worthy of him, and, even there, not to make use of all the little subtleties that may seem pat for his purpose, but only such arguments as may best serve him. Let him be taught to be curious in the election and choice of his reasons, to abominate impertinence, and, consequently, to affect brevity; but, above all, let him be lessoned to acquiesce and submit to truth so soon as ever he shall discover it, whether in his opponent's argument, or upon better consideration of his own; for he shall never be preferred to the chair for a mere clatter of words and syllogisms, and is no further engaged to any argument whatever, than as he shall in his own judgment approve it: nor yet is arguing a trade, where the liberty of recantation and getting off upon better thoughts, are to be sold for ready money.

If his governor be of my humor, he will form his will to be a very good and loyal subject to his prince, very affectionate to his person, and very stout in his quarrel; but withal he will cool in him the desire of having any other tie to his service than public duty. Besides several other inconveniences that are inconsistent with the liberty every honest man ought to have, a man's judgment, being bribed and prepossessed by these particular obligations, is either blinded and less free to exercise its function, or is blemished with ingratitude and indiscretion. A man that is purely a courtier, can neither have power nor will to speak or think otherwise than favorably and well of a master, who, among so many millions of other subjects, has picked out him with his own hand to nourish and advance; this favor, and the profit flowing from it, must needs, and not without some show of reason, corrupt his freedom and dazzle him; and we commonly see these people speak in another kind of phrase than is ordinarily spoken by others of the same nation, though what they say in that courtly language is not much to be believed.

Let his conscience and virtue be eminently manifest in his speaking, and have only reason for their guide. Make him understand, that to acknowledge the error he shall discover in his own argument, though only found out by himself, is an effect of judgment and sincerity, which are the principal things he is to seek after; that obstinacy and contention are common qualities, most appearing in mean souls; that to revise and correct himself, to forsake an unjust argument in the height and heat of dispute, are rare, great, and philosophical qualities. Let him be advised; being in company, to have his eye and ear in every corner, for I find that the places of greatest honor are commonly seized upon by men that have least in them, and that the greatest fortunes are seldom accompanied with the ablest parts. I have been present when, while they at the upper end of the chamber have only been commending the beauty of the arras, or the flavor of the wine, many things that have been very finely said at the lower end of the table have been lost or thrown away. Let him examine every man's talent; a peasant, a bricklayer, a passenger: one may learn something from every one of these in their several capacities, and something will be picked out of their discourse whereof some use may be made at one time or another; nay, even the folly and impertinence of others will contribute to his instruction. By observing the graces and manners of all he sees, he will create to himself an emulation of the good, and a contempt of the bad.

Let an honest curiosity be suggested to his fancy of being inquisitive after everything; whatever there is singular and rare near the place where he is, let him go and see it; a fine house, a noble fountain, an eminent man, the place where a battle has been anciently fought, the passages of Cæsar and Charlemagne.

Let him inquire into the manners, revenues and alliances of princes, things in themselves very pleasant to learn, and very useful to know.

In this conversing with men, I mean also, and principally, those who only live in the records of history; he shall, by reading those books, converse with the great and heroic souls of the best ages. 'Tis an idle and vain study to those who make it by so doing it after a negligent manner, but to those who do it with care and observation, 'tis a study of inestimable fruit and value; and the only study, as Plato reports, that the Lacedæmonians reserved to themselves. What profit shall he not reap as to the business of men, by reading the lives of Plutarch? But, withal, let my governor remember to what end his instructions are principally directed, and that he do not so much imprint in his pupil's memory the date of the ruin of Carthage, as the manners of Hannibal and Scipio; nor so much where Marcellus died, as why it was unworthy of his duty that he died there. Let him not teach him so much the narrative parts of history as to judge them; the reading of them, in my opinion, is a thing that of all others we apply ourselves unto with the most differing measure. I have read a hundred things in Livy that another has not, or not taken notice of at least; and Plutarch has read a hundred more there than ever I could find, or than, peradventure, that author ever wrote; to some it is merely a grammar study, to others the very anatomy of philosophy, by which the most abstruse parts of our human nature penetrate. There are in Plutarch many long discourses very worthy to be carefully read and observed, for he is, in my opinion, of all others the greatest master in that kind of writing; but there are a thousand others which he has only touched and glanced upon, where he only points with his finger to direct us which way we may go if we will, and contents himself sometimes with giving only one brisk hit in the nicest article of the question, whence we are to grope out the rest. As, for example, where he says that the inhabitants of Asia came to be vassals to one only, for not having been able to pronounce one syllable, which is No. Which saying of his gave perhaps matter and occasion to La Boetie [1530-1563] to write his "Voluntary Servitude." Only to see him pick out a light action in a man's life, or a mere word that does not seem to amount even to that, is itself a whole discourse. 'Tis to our prejudice that men of understanding should so immoderately affect brevity; no doubt their reputation is the better by it, but in the meantime we are the worse. Plutarch had rather we should applaud his judgment than commend his knowledge, and had rather leave us with an appetite to read more, than glutted with that we have already read. He knew very well, that a man may say too much even upon the best subjects, and that Alexandridas justly reproached him who made very good but too long speeches to the Ephori, when he said: "Oh stranger! thou speakest the things thou shouldst speak, but not as thou shouldst speak them." Such as have lean and spare bodies stuff themselves out with clothes; so they who are defective in matter, endeavor to make amends with words.

Human understanding is marvelously enlightened by daily conversation with men, for we are, otherwise, compressed and heaped up in ourselves, and have our sight limited to the length of our own noses. One asking Socrates of what country he was, he did not make answer, of Athens, but of the world. He whose imagination was fuller and wider, embraced the whole world for his country, and extended his society and friendship to all mankind; not as we do, who look no further than our feet. When the vines of my village are nipped with the frost, my parish priest presently concludes, that the indignation of God is gone out against all the human race, and that the cannibals have already got the pip. Who is it, that seeing the havoc of these civil wars of ours, does not cry out, that the machine of the world is near dissolution, and that the day of judgment is at hand; without considering, that many worse things have been seen, and that, in the meantime, people are very merry in a thousand other parts of the earth for all this? For my part, considering the license and impunity that always attend such commotions, I wonder they are so moderate, and that there is no more mischief done. To him who feels the hailstones patter about his ears, the whole hemisphere appears to be in storm and tempest . . . And, in truth, we are all of us, insensibly, in this error, an error of a very great weight and very pernicious consequence. But whoever shall represent to his fancy, as in a picture, that great image of our mother Nature, in her full majesty and lustre, whoever in her face shall read so general and so constant a variety, whoever shall observe himself in that figure, and not himself but a whole kingdom, no bigger than the least touch or prick of a pencil in comparison of the whole, that man alone is able to value things according to their true estimate and grandeur.

This great world which some do yet multiply as several species under one genus, is the mirror wherein we are to behold ourselves, to be able to know ourselves as we ought to do in the true bias. In short, I would have this to be the book my young gentleman should study with the most attention. So many humors, so many sects, so many judgments, opinions, laws and customs, teach us to judge aright of our own, and inform our understanding to discover its imperfection and natural infirmity, which is no trivial speculation. So many mutations of states and kingdoms, and so many turns and revolutions of public fortune, will make us wise enough to make no great wonder of our own. So many great names, so many famous victories and conquests drowned and swallowed in oblivion, render our hopes ridiculous of eternizing our names. . . . The pride and arrogance of so many foreign pomps and ceremonies, the tumorous majesty of so many courts and grandeurs, accustomed and fortify our sight without astonishment or winking to behold the lustre of our own; so many millions of men, buried before us, encourage us not to fear to go seek such good company in the other world: and so of all the rest. Pythagoras¹ was wont to say, that our life resembles the great and populous assembly of the Olympic games, wherein some exercise the body, that they may carry away the glory of the prize; others bring merchandise to sell for profit; there are, also, some (and those none of the worst sort) who pursue no other advantage than only to look on, and consider how and why everything is done, and to be spectators of the lives of other men, thereby the better to judge of and regulate their own.

To examples may fitly be applied all the profitable discourses of philosophy, to which all human actions, as to their best rule, ought to be especially directed: a scholar shall be taught to know what it is to know, and what to be ignorant; what ought to be the end and design of study; what valor, temperance and justice are; the difference between ambition and avarice, servitude and subjection, license and liberty; by what token a man may know true and solid contentment; how far death, affliction, and disgrace are to be apprehended, by what secret springs we move, and the reason of our various agitations and irresolutions: for, methinks, the first doctrine with which one should season his understanding, ought to be that which regulates his manners and his sense; that teaches him to know himself, and how both well to die and well to live. Among the liberal sciences, let us begin with that which makes us free; not that they do not all serve in some measure to the instruction and use of life, as all other things in some sort also do; but let us make choice of that which directly and professedly serves to that end. If we are once able to restrain the offices of human life within their just and natural limits, we shall find that most of the sciences in use are of no great use to us, and even in those that are, that there are many very unnecessary cavities and dilatations which we had better let alone, and following

Socrates' direction, limit the course of our studies to those things only where is a true and real utility.

'Tis a great foolery to teach our children the knowledge of the stars and the motion of the eighth sphere, before their own.

Anaximenes² writing to Pythagoras, "To what purpose," said he, "should I trouble myself in searching out the secrets of the stars, having death or slavery continually before my eyes?" for the kings of Persia were at that time preparing to invade his country. Every one ought to say thus, "Being assaulted, as I am by ambition, avarice, temerity, superstition, and having within so many other enemies of life, shall I go cudgel my brains about the world's revolutions?"

After having taught him what will make him more wise and good, you may then entertain him with the elements of logic, physics, geometry, rhetoric, and the science which he shall then himself most incline to, his judgment being beforehand formed and fit to choose, he will quickly make his own. The way of instructing him ought to be sometimes by discourse, and sometimes by reading, sometimes his governor shall put the author himself, which he shall think most proper for him, into his hands, and sometimes only the marrow and substance of it; and if himself be not conversant enough in books to turn to all the fine discourses the books contain for his purpose, there may some man of learning be joined to him, that upon every occasion shall supply him with what he stands in need of, to furnish it to his pupil. . . .

The soul that lodges philosophy, ought to be of such a constitution of health, as to render the body in like manner healthful too; she ought to make her tranquillity and satisfaction shine so as to appear without, and her contentment ought to fashion the outward behavior to her own mold, and consequently to fortify it with a graceful confidence, an active and joyous carriage, and a serene and contented countenance. The most manifest sign of wisdom is a continual cheerfulness; her state is like that of things in the regions above the moon, always clear and serene. . . . It is she that calms and appeases the storms and tempests of the soul, and who teaches famine and fevers to laugh and sing; and that, not by certain imaginary epicycles, but by natural and manifest reasons. She has virtue for her end; which is not, as the schoolmen say, situate upon the summit of a perpendicular, rugged, inaccessible precipice: such as have approached her find her, quite on the contrary, to be seated in a fair, fruitful, and flourishing plain, from whence she easily discovers all things below; to which place any one may, however, arrive, if he know but the way, through shady, green, and sweetly flourishing avenues, by a pleasant, easy, and smooth descent, like that of the celestial vault.

Such a tutor will make a pupil digest this new lesson, that the height and value of true virtue consists in the facility, utility, and pleasure of its exercise; so far from difficulty, that boys, as well as men, and the innocent as well as the subtle, may make it their own: it is by order, and not by force, that it is to be acquired. Socrates, her first minion, is so averse to all manner of violence, as totally to throw it aside, to slip into the more natural facility of her own progress: 'tis the nursing mother of all human pleasures, who in rendering them just, renders them also pure and permanent; in moderating them, keeps them in breath and appetite; in interdicting those which she herself refuses, whets our desire to those that she allows; and, like a kind and liberal mother, abundantly allows all that nature requires, even to satiety, if not to lassitude: unless we mean to say, that the regimen which stops the toper before he has drunk himself drunk, the glutton before he has eaten to a surfeit, and the lecher before he has got the pox, is an enemy to pleasure. If the ordinary fortune fail, she does without it, and forms another, wholly her own, not so fickle and unsteady as the other. She can be rich, be potent and wise, and knows how to lie upon soft perfumed beds: she loves life, beauty, glory, and health; but her proper and peculiar office is to know how to regulate the use of all these good things, and how to lose them without concern: an office much more noble than troublesome, and without which the whole course of life is unnatural, turbulent, and deformed, and there it is indeed, that men may justly represent those monsters upon rocks and precipices.

If this pupil shall happen to be of so contrary a disposition, that he had rather hear a tale of a tub than the true narrative of some noble expedition or some wise and learned discourse; who at the beat of drum, that excites the youthful ardor of his companions, leaves that to follow another that calls to a morris or the bears; who would not wish, and find it more delightful and more excellent, to return all dust and sweat victorious from a battle, than from tennis or from a ball, with the prize of those exercises; I see no other remedy, but that he be bound prentice in some good town to learn to make minced pies, though he were the son of a duke; according to Plato's precept, that children are to be placed out and disposed of, not according to the wealth, qualities, or condition of the father, but according to the faculties and the capacity of their own souls.

Since philosophy is that which instructs us to live and that infancy has there its lessons as well as other ages, why is it not communicated to children betimes?

They begin to teach us to live when we have almost done living. A hundred students have got the pox before they have to come to read Aristotle's lecture on temperance. Cicero said, that though he should live two men's ages, he should never find leisure to study the lyric poets; and I find these sophisters yet more deplorably unprofitable. The boy we would breed has a great deal less time to spare; he owes but the first fifteen or sixteen years of his life to education; the remainder is due to action. Let us, therefore, employ that short time in necessary instruction. Away with the thorny subtleties of dialectics; they are abuses, things by which our lives can never be amended: take the plain philosophical discourses, learn how rightly to choose, and then rightly to apply them; they are more easy to be understood than one of Boccaccio's novels; a child from nurse is much more capable of them, than of learning to read or to write. Philosophy has discourses proper for childhood, as well as for the decrepit age of men.

I am of Plutarch's mind, that Aristotle did not so much trouble his great disciple with the knack of forming syllogisms, or with the elements of geometry, as with infusing into him good precepts concerning valor, prowess, magnanimity, temperance, and the contempt of fear; and with this ammunition, sent him, while yet a boy, with no more than thirty thousand foot, four thousand horse, and but forty-two thousand crowns, to subjugate the empire of the whole earth. For the other arts and sciences, he says, Alexander highly indeed commended their excellence and charm, and had them in very great honor and esteem, but not ravished with them to that degree, as to be tempted to affect the practice of them in his own person.

Epicurus, in the beginning of his letter to Meniceus, says, "That neither the youngest should refuse to philosophize, nor the oldest grow weary of it." Who does otherwise, seems tacitly to imply, that either the time of living happily is not yet come, or that it is already past. And yet, for all that, I would not have this pupil of ours imprisoned and made a slave to his book; nor would

I have him give up to the morosity and melancholic humor of a sour, ill-natured pedant; I would not have his spirit cowed and subdued, by applying him to the rack, and tormenting him, as some do, fourteen or fifteen hours a day, and so make a pack-horse of him. Neither should I think it good, when, by reason of a solitary and melancholic complexion, he is discovered to be overmuch addicted to his book, to nourish that humor in him; for that renders him unfit for civil conversation, and diverts him from better employments. And how many have I seen in my time totally brutified by an immoderate thirst after knowledge? [One such] was so besotted with it, that he would not find time as so much as to comb his head or to pare his nails. . . .

But to our little monsieur, a closet, a garden, the table, his bed, solitude and company, morning and evening, all hours shall be the same, and all places to him a study; for philosophy, who, as the formatrix of judgment and manners, shall be his principal lesson, has that privilege to have a hand in everything. The orator Isocrates, being at a feast entreated to speak of his art, all the company were satisfied with and commended his answer: "It is not now a time," said he, "to do what I can do; and that which it is now time to do, I cannot do." For to make orations and rhetorical disputes in a company met together to laugh and make good cheer, had been very unseasonable and improper, and as much might have been said of all the other sciences. But as to what concerns philosophy, that part of it at least that treats of man, and of his offices and duties, it has been the common opinion of all wise men, that, out of respect to the sweetness of her conversation, she is ever to be admitted in all sports and entertainments. And Plato, having invited her to his feast, we see after how gentle and obliging a manner, accommodated both to time and place, she entertained the company, though in a discourse of the highest and most important nature. By this method of instruction, my young pupil will be much more and better employed than his fellows of the college are. But as the steps we take in walking to and fro in a gallery, though three times as many, do not tire a man so much as those we employ in a formal journey, so our lesson, as it were accidentally occurring, without any set obligation of time or place, and falling naturally into every action, will insensibly insinuate itself. By which means our very exercises and recreations, running, wrestling, music, dancing, hunting, riding, and fencing, will prove to be a good part of our study. I would have his outward fashion and mien, and the disposition of his limbs, formed at the same time with his mind. 'Tis not a soul, 'tis not a body that we are training up, but a man, and we ought not to divide him. And, as Plato says, we are not to fashion one without the other, but make them draw together like two horses harnessed to a coach. By which saying of his, does he not seem to allow more time for, and to take more care of, exercises for the body, and to hold that the mind, in a good proportion, does her business at the same time too?

As to the rest, this method of education ought to be carried on with a severe sweetness, quite contrary to the practice of our pedants, who, instead of tempting and alluring children to letters by apt and gentle ways, do in truth present nothing before them but rods and ferules, horror and cruelty. Away with this violence! away with this compulsion! than which, I certainly believe nothing more dulls and degenerates a well-descended nature. If you would have him apprehend shame and chastisement, do not harden him to them: inure him to heat and cold, to wind and sun, and to dangers that he ought to despise; wean him from all effeminacy and delicacy in clothes and lodging, eating and drinking; accustom him to everything, that he may not be a Sir Paris, a carpet-knight, but a sinewy, hardy, and vigorous young man. I have ever from a child to the age wherein I now am, been of this opinion, and am still constant to it. But among other things, the strict government of most of our colleges has evermore displeased me; peradventure, they might have erred less perniciously on the indulgent side. 'Tis a real house of correction of imprisoned youth. They are made debauched, by being punished before they are so. Do but come in when they are about their lesson, and you shall hear nothing but the outcries of boys under execution, with the thundering noise of their pedagogues drunk with fury. A very pretty way this, to tempt these tender and timorous souls to love their book, with a furious countenance, and a rod in hand! A cursed and pernicious way of proceeding! Besides what Quintilian¹ has very well observed, that this imperious authority is often attended by very dangerous consequences, and particularly our way of chastising. How much more decent would it be to see their classes strewed with green leaves and fine flowers, than with the bloody stumps of birch and willows? Were it left to my ordering, I should paint the school with the pictures of joy and gladness. . . . Where their

As to Greek, of which I have but a mere smattering, my father also designed to have it taught me by a device, but a new one, and by way of sport; tossing our declensions to and fro, after the manner of those who, by certain games at tables and chess, learn geometry and arithmetic. For he, among other rules, had been advised to make me relish science and duty by an unforced will, and of my own voluntary motion, and to educate my soul in all liberty and delight, without any severity or constraint; which he was an observer of to such a degree, even of superstition, if I may say so, that some being of opinion that it troubles and disturbs the brains of children suddenly to wake them in the morning, and to snatch them violently and over-hastily from sleep (wherein they are much more profoundly involved than we), he caused me to be awakened by the sound of some musical instrument, and was never unprovided of a musician for that purpose. By this example you may judge of the rest, this alone being sufficient to recommend both the prudence and the affection of so good a father, who is not to be blamed if he did not reap fruits answerable to so exquisite a culture. Of this, two things were the cause: first, a sterile and improper soil; for, though I was of a strong and healthful constitution, and of a disposition tolerably sweet and tractable, yet I was, withal, so heavy, idle, and indisposed, that they could not rouse me from my sloth, not even to get me out to play. What I saw, I saw clearly enough, and under this heavy complexion nourished a bold imagination, and opinions above my age. I had a slow wit, that would go no faster than it was led; a tardy understanding, a languishing invention, and above all, incredible defect of memory; so that, it is no wonder, if from all these nothing considerable could be extracted. Secondly, like those, who, impatient of a long and steady cure, submit to all sorts of prescriptions and recipes, the good man being extremely timorous of any way failing in a thing he had so wholly set his heart upon, suffered himself at last to be overruled by the common opinions; which always follow their leader as a flight of cranes, and complying with the method of the time, having no more those persons he had brought out of Italy, and who had given him the first model of education, about him, he sent me at six years of age to the College of Guienne, at that time the best and most flourishing in France. And there it was not possible to add anything to the care he had to provide me the most able tutors, with all other circumstances of education, reserving also several particular rules contrary to the college practice; but so it was, that with all these precautions it was a college still. My Latin immediately grew corrupt, of which also by discontinuance I have since lost all manner of use; so that this new way of education served me to no other end, than only at my first coming to prefer me to the first forms; for at thirteen years old, that I came out of the college, I had run through my whole course (as they call it), and, in truth, without any manner of advantage, that I can honestly brag of, in all this time.

The first thing that gave me any taste for books, was the pleasure I took in reading the fables of Ovid's Metamorphoses, and with them I was so taken, that being but seven or eight years old, I would steal from all other diversions to read them, both by reason that this was my own natural language, the easiest book that I was acquainted with, and for the subject, the most accommodated to the capacity of my age: for, as for Lancelot of the Lake, Amadis of Gaul, Huon of Bordeaux, and such trumpery, which children are most delighted with, I had never so much as heard their names, no more than I yet know what they contain; so exact was the discipline wherein I was brought up. But this was enough to make me neglect the other lessons that were prescribed me; and here it was infinitely to my advantage, to have to do with an understanding tutor, who very well knew discreetly to connive at this and other truantries of the same nature; for by this means I ran through Virgil's Æneid, and then Terence, and then Plautus, and then some Italian comedies, allured by the sweetness of the subject; whereas had he been so foolish as to have taken me off this diversion, I do really believe, I had brought nothing away from the college but a hatred of books, as almost all our young gentlemen do. But he carried himself very discreetly in that business, seeming to take no notice, and allowing me only such time as I could steal from my other regular studies, which whetted my appetite to devour those books. For the chief things my father expected from their endeavors to whom he had delivered me for education, were affability and good humor; and, to say the truth, my manners had no other vice but sloth and want of mettle. . . .

Yet for all this heavy disposition of mine, my mind, when retired into itself, was not altogether without strong movements, solid and clear judgments about those objects it could comprehend, and could also, without any helps, digest them; but, among other things, I do really believe, it had been totally impossible to have made it to submit by violence and force. Shall I here acquaint you with one faculty of my youth? I had great assurance of countenance, and flexibility of voice and gesture, in applying myself to any part I undertook to act: I played the chief parts in the Latin tragedies of Buchanan, Guereute, and Muret, that were presented in our College of Guienne with great dignity; now Andreas Goveanus, our principal, as in all other parts of his charge, was, without comparison, the best of that employment in France; and I was looked upon as one of the best actors. 'Tis an exercise that I do not disapprove in young people of condition; and I have since seen our princes, after the example of some of the ancients, in person handsomely and commendably perform these exercises; it was even allowed to persons of quality to make a profession of it in Greece. Nay, I have always taxed those with impertinence who condemn these entertainments, and with injustice those who refuse to admit such comedians as are worth seeing into our good towns, and grudge the people that public diversion. Well-governed corporations take care to assemble their citizens, not only to the solemn duties of devotion, but also to sports and spectacles. They find society and friendship augmented by it; and, besides, can there possibly be allowed a more orderly and regular diversion than what is performed in the sight of every one, and, very often, in the presence of the supreme magistrate himself? And I, for my part, should think it reasonable, that the prince should sometimes gratify his people at his own expense, out of paternal goodness and affection; and that in populous cities there should be theaters erected for such entertainments, if but to divert them from worse and private actions.

To return to my subject, there is nothing like alluring the appetite and affections; otherwise you make nothing but so many asses laden with books; by dint of the lash, you give them their pocketful of learning to keep; whereas, to do well, you should not only lodge it with them, but make them espouse it.

Of Democritus and Heraclitus

The judgment is an utensil proper for all subjects, and will have an oar in everything: which is the reason, that in these essays I take hold of all occasions where, though it happen to be a subject I do not very well understand, I try however, sounding it at a distance, and finding it too deep for my stature, I keep me on the shore; and this knowledge that a man can proceed no further, is one effect of its virtue, yea, one of those of which it is most proud. One while in an idle and frivolous subject, I try to find out matter whereof to compose a body, and then to prop and support it; another while, I employ it in a noble subject, one that has been tossed and tumbled by a thousand hands, wherein a man can scarce possibly introduce anything of his own, the way being so beaten on every side that he must of necessity walk in the steps of another: in such a case, 'tis the work of the judgment to take the way that seems best, and of a thousand paths, to determine that this or that is the best. I leave the choice of my arguments to fortune, and take that she first presents to me; they are all alike to me, I never design to go through any of them; for I never see all of anything: neither do they who so largely promise to show it to others. Of a hundred members and faces that everything has, I take one, one while to look it over only, another while to ripple up the skin, and sometimes to pinch it to the bones: I give a stab, not so wide but as deep as I can, and am for the most part tempted to take it in hand by some new light I discover in it. Did I know myself less, I might perhaps venture to handle something or other to the bottom, and to be deceived in my own inability; but sprinkling here one word and there another, patterns cut from several pieces and scattered without design and without engaging myself too far, I am not responsible for them, or obliged to keep close to my subject, without varying at my own liberty and pleasure, and giving up myself to doubt and uncertainty, and to my own governing method, ignorance.

All motion discovers us: the very same soul of Cæsar, that made itself so conspicuous in marshaling and commanding the battle of Pharsalia, was also seen as solicitous and busy in the softer affairs of love and leisure. A man makes a judgment of a horse, not only by seeing him when he is showing off his paces, but by his very walk, nay, and by seeing him stand in the stable.

Among the functions of the soul, there are some of a lower and meaner form; he who does not see her in those inferior offices as well as in those of nobler note, never fully discovers her; and, peradventure, she is best shown where she moves her simpler pace. The winds of passions take most hold of her in her highest flights; and the rather by reason that she wholly applies herself to, and exercises her whole virtue upon, every particular subject, and never handles more than one thing at a time, and that not according to it, but according to herself. Things in respect to themselves have, peradventure, their weight, measures and conditions; but when we once take them into us, the soul forms them as she pleases. Death is terrible to Cicero, coveted by Cato, indifferent to Socrates. Health, conscience, authority, knowledge, riches, beauty, and their contraries, all strip themselves at their entering into us, and receive a new robe, and of another fashion, from the soul; and of what color, brown, bright, green, dark, and of what quality, sharp, sweet, deep, or superficial, as best pleases each of them, for they are not agreed upon any common standard of forms, rules, or proceedings; every one is a queen in her own dominions. Let us, therefore, no more excuse ourselves upon the external qualities of things; it belongs to us to give ourselves an account of them. Our good or ill has no other dependence but on ourselves. 'Tis there that our offerings and our vows are due, and not to fortune: she has no power over our manners; on the contrary, they draw and make her follow in their train, and cast her in their own mold. Why should not I judge of Alexander at table, ranting and drinking at the prodigious rate he sometimes used to do? Or, if he played at chess? what string of his soul was not touched by this idle and childish game? I hate and avoid it, because it is not play enough, that it is too grave and serious a diversion, and I am ashamed to lay out as much thought and study upon it as would serve to much better uses. He did not more pump his brains about his glorious expedition into the Indies, nor than another in unraveling a passage upon which depends the safety of mankind. To what a degree does this ridiculous diversion molest the soul, when all her faculties are summoned together upon this trivial account! and how fair an opportunity she herein gives every one to know and to make a right judgment of himself? I do not more thoroughly sift myself in any other posture than this: what passion are we exempted from in it? Anger, spite, malice, im-40 patience, and a vehement desire of getting the better in a concern wherein it were more excusable to be ambitious of being overcome; for to be eminent, to excel above the common rate in frivolous things, nowise befits a man of honor. What I say in this example may be said in all others. Every particle, every employment of man manifests him equally with any other.

Democritus and Heraclitus were two philosophers, of whom the first, finding human condition ridiculous and vain, never appeared abroad but with a jeering and laughing countenance; whereas Heraclitus commiserating that same condition of ours, appeared always with a sorrowful look, and tears in his eyes. I am clearly for the first humor: not because it is more pleasant to laugh than to weep, but because it expresses more contempt and condemnation than the other, and I think we can never be despised according to our full desert. Compassion and bewailing seem to imply some esteem of and value for the thing bemoaned; whereas the things we laugh at are by that expressed to be of no moment. I do not think that we are so unhappy as we are vain, or have in us so much malice as folly; we are not so full of mischief as inanity; nor so miserable as we are vile and mean. And therefore Diogenes, who passed away his time in rolling himself in his tub, and made nothing of the great Alexander esteeming us no better than flies, or bladders puffed up with wind, was a sharper and more penetrating, and, consequently in my opinion, a juster judge than Timon, surnamed the Man-hater; for what a man hates he lays to heart. This last was an enemy to all mankind, who passionately desired our ruin, and avoided our conversation as dangerous, proceeding from wicked and depraved natures: the other valued us so little that we could neither trouble nor infect him by our example; and left us to herd one with another, not out of fear, but from contempt of our society: concluding us as incapable of doing good as ill.

Of the same strain was Statilius' answer, when Brutus courted him into the conspiracy against Cæsar; he was satisfied that the enterprise was just, but he did not think mankind worthy of a wise man's concern; according to the doctrine of Hegasias, who said, that a wise man ought to do nothing but for himself, forasmuch as he only was worthy of it: and to the saying of Theodorus, that it was not reasonable a wise man should hazard himself for his country, and endanger wisdom for a company of fools. Our condition is as ridiculous as risible.

ACT I

SCENE I:—VALÈRE, ELISE

VAL. Eh, what! charming Elise, you are growing melancholy, after the kind assurances which you were good enough to give me of your love! Alas! I see you sighing in the midst of my joy! Tell me, is it with regret at having made me happy? And do you repent of that engagement to which my affection has induced you?

ELISE. No, Valère, I cannot repent of anything that I do for you. I feel myself attracted to it by too sweet a power, and I have not even the will to wish that things were otherwise. But, to tell you the truth, our success causes me uneasiness; and I am very much afraid of loving you a little more than I ought.

VAL. Eh! what is there to fear, Elise, in the affection you have for me?

ELISE. Alas! a hundred things at once: the anger of a father, the reproaches of my family, the censure of the world; but more than all, Valère, the change of your heart, and that criminal coolness with which those of your sex most frequently repay the too ardent proofs of an innocent love.

VAL. Ah! do not wrong me thus, to judge of me by others! Suspect me of anything, Elise, rather than of failing in my duty to you. I love you too well for that: and my affection for you will last as long as my life.

10 ELISE. Ah, Valère, everyone talks in the same strain! All men are alike in their words; their actions only show them to be different.

VAL. Since actions only can show what we are, wait then, at least, to judge of my heart by them; and do not search for crimes because you unjustly fear, and wrongly anticipate. Pray do not kill me with the poignant blows of an outrageous suspicion; and give me time to convince you, by many thousand proofs, of the sincerity of my 20 affection.

ELISE. Alas, how easily we are persuaded by those we love! Yes, Valère, I hold your heart incapable of deceiving me. I believe that you truly love me, and that you will be constant. I will no longer doubt of it, and I will confine my grief to the apprehensions of the blame which people may utter against me.

VAL. But why this uneasiness?

ELISE. I should have nothing to fear, if everyone
30 could see you with the eyes with which I look upon you; and in your own person I see sufficient to justify me in what I do for you. For its defense, my heart pleads all your merits, supported by the help of a gratitude with which Heaven has bound me to you. At every moment I call to mind that supreme danger which first made us acquainted with each other; that wonderful generosity which made you risk your life in order to snatch mine from the fury of the waves; those most tender 40 attentions which you lavished upon me, after having dragged me out of the water, and the assiduous homage of that ardent affection, which neither time nor obstacles have been able to discourage, and which, causing you to neglect relatives and country, detains you in this spot, and keeps your position unrecognized all on my account, and has reduced you to assume the functions of servant to my father, in order to see me. All this produces, no doubt, a marvelous effect on me, and quite sufficient to justify, in my own eyes, the engagement to which I have consented; but it is not perhaps enough to justify it in that of others, and I am not certain that the world will enter into my sentiments.

VAL. Of all that you have mentioned, it is only by my love that I pretended to deserve anything from you; and as for the scruples which you have; your father himself takes but too good care to justify you before the world; and the excess of his avarice, and the austere way in which he treats his children, might authorize stranger things still. Pardon me, charming Elise, for speaking thus before you. You know that, on that subject, no good can be said. But in short, if I can, as I hope I shall, find my relatives again, we shall have very little difficulty in rendering them favorable to us. I am impatient to receive some tidings of them; and should they be delayed much longer, I will myself go in search of them.

ELISE. Ah! Valère, do not stir from this, I beseech you; and think only how to ingratiate yourself with my father.

VAL. You see how I go about it, and the artful wheedling which I have been obliged to make use of to enter his service; beneath what mask of sympathy and affinity of sentiments I disguise myself, in order to please him; and what part I daily play with him, that I may gain his affection. I am making admirable progress in it; and experience teaches me that to find favor with men, there is no better method than to invest ourselves in their eyes with their hobbies; than to act according to their maxims, to flatter their faults and to applaud their doings. One needs not fear to overdo this complaisance; the way in which one fools them may be as palpable as possible; even the sharpest are the greatest dupes when flattery is in the question; and there is nothing too impertinent or too ridiculous for them to swallow, if it be only seasoned with praises. Sincerity suffers somewhat by the trade which I follow; but, when we have need of people, we must suit ourselves to their tastes; and since they are to be gained over only in that way, it is not the fault of those who flatter, but of those who wish to be flattered.

ELISE. But why do you not try to gain the support of my brother, in case the servant should take it into her head to reveal our secret?

VAL. There is no managing them both at once; and the disposition of the father and that of the son are so opposed to each other, that it becomes difficult to arrange a confidence with both. But you, on your part, act upon your brother, and make use of the affection between you two, to bring him over to our interests. He is just coming. I go. Take this opportunity of speaking to him, and reveal our business to him, only when you judge the fit time come.

ELISE. I do not know whether I shall have the courage to intrust this confidence to him.

SCENE II:—CLÉANTE, ELISE

CLÉAN. I am very glad to find you alone, sister; I was dying to speak to you, to unburden myself to you of a secret.

ELISE. You find me quite ready to listen, brother. What have you to tell me?

CLÉAN. Many things, sister, all contained in one word. I am in love.

ELISE. You are in love?

CLÉAN. Yes, I am in love. But before going farther, I know that I am dependent on my father, and that the name of son subjects me to his will; that we ought not to pledge our affection without the consent of those to whom we owe our life; that Heaven has made them the masters of our affection, and that we are enjoined not to dispose of it but by their direction; that, not being biased by any foolish passion, they are less likely to deceive themselves than we are, and to see much better what is proper for us; that we ought rather to be guided by the light of their prudence than by the blindness of our passion; and that the ardor of our youth often drags us to dangerous precipices. I tell you all this, sister, that you may save yourself the trouble of telling it to me; for, frankly, my love will not listen to anything, and I pray you not to make any remonstrances.

ELISE. Have you pledged yourself, brother, with her whom you love?

CLÉAN. No; but I am determined to do so, and I implore you, once more, not to advance any reasons to dissuade me from it.

ELISE. Am I then so strange a person, brother?

CLÉAN. No, sister; but you are not in love; you are ignorant of the sweet empire which a tender passion exercises over our hearts; and I dread your wisdom.

ELISE. Alas! dear brother, let us not speak of my wisdom; there is no one who does not fail in it, at least once in his life; and were I to open my heart to you, perhaps I would appear less wise in your eyes than yourself.

CLÉAN. Ah! would to Heaven that your heart, like mine . . .

ELISE. Let us first finish your affair, and tell me who it is whom you love.

CLÉAN. A young person, who has lately come to live in this neighborhood, and who seems to be made to inspire love in all who behold her. Nature, sister, has created nothing more amiable; and I felt myself carried away the moment I saw her. Her name is Mariane, and she lives under the protection of a good motherly woman who is nearly always ill, and for whom this dear girl entertains feelings of friendship not to be imagined. She waits upon her, concedes with her, and cheers her with a tenderness that would touch you to the very soul. She does things with the most charming air in the world; a thousand graces shine through her every action, a gentleness full of attraction, a most prepossessing kindness, an adorable simplicity, a . . . Ah! sister, I wish you could have seen her!

ELISE. I see much, brother, in the things you tell me; and to understand what she really is, it is sufficient that you love her.

CLÉAN. I have learned, secretly, that they are not too well off; and that even their careful way of living has some difficulty in making both ends meet with the small means at their command. Imagine, dear sister, the pleasure it must be to improve the condition of her whom we love; to convey, delicately, some small assistance to the modest wants of a virtuous family; and then conceive how annoying it is to me to find myself, through the avarice of a father, powerless to taste that joy, and to be unable to show this fair one any proof of my love.

ELISE. Yes, I can conceive well enough, brother, what must be your grief.

CLÉAN. Ah! sister, it is greater than you can believe. For, in short, can anything be more cruel than this rigorous meanness that is exercised over us, this strange niggardliness in which we are made to languish? What good will it do us to have means, when we shall no longer be of an age to enjoy them, and if, to maintain myself, I am now obliged to run in debt on all sides; if I, as well as you, am obliged to crave daily the aid of tradesmen in order to wear decent clothes? In short, I wished to speak to you to help me to sound my father upon my present feelings; and should I find him opposed to them, I am resolved to go elsewhere, with this dear girl, to enjoy whatever fortune providence may have in store for us. I have endeavored to raise money everywhere for this purpose, and if your affairs, sister, are similar to mine, and if our father runs counter to our wishes, we shall both leave him, and emancipate ourselves from that tyranny in which his insupportable avarice has so long held us.

ELISE. It is true enough that every day he gives us more cause to regret the death of our mother, and that . . .

CLÉAN. I hear his voice; let us go a little farther to finish our confidences; and afterwards we will join our forces to attack the ruggedness of his temper.

SCENE III:—HARPAGON, LA FLÈCHE

HARP. Clear out of this immediately, and let me have no reply! Get out of my house, you consummate cheat, you veritable gallow's bird!

LA FL. [aside]. I have never seen anything more vicious than this cursed old man; and I really think—I speak under correction—that he has got the devil in him.

HARP. You are muttering between your teeth!

LA FL. Why are you sending me away?

HARP. It well becomes you, you hangdog, to ask me my reasons. Out with you, quickly, that I may not knock you down.

LA FL. What have I done to you?

HARP. You have done so much to me that I wish you to get out.

LA FL. Your son, my master, has ordered me to wait.

HARP. Go and wait for him in the street, then; but do not remain in my house, planted bolt upright as a sentry, taking notice of everything that goes on, and making the best use of it. I will not have a spy over my concerns eternally before my eyes, a wretch, whose cursed eyes watch every one of my actions, covet all I have, and ferret about everywhere to see if there is nothing to pilfer.

LA FL. How the deuce could one manage to rob you? Are you a likely man to have aught stolen from you, when you lock up everything, and keep guard day and night?

HARP. I shall lock up whatever I think fit, and keep guard as long as I please. A nice pass it has come to with these spies, who take notice of everything one does. [Softly, aside.] I quake for fear he should suspect something about my money. [Aloud.] Ah! are you not just the fellow who would think nothing of bruiting the tale about that I have money hidden in my house?

LA FL. You have money hidden?

HARP. No, you scoundrel, I do not say that. [To himself.] I am bursting with rage. [Aloud.] I ask whether you would not, from sheer malice, bruit the story about that I have some.

LA FL. Eh! what does it matter to us whether you have any or not, as long as it comes to the same thing to us?

HARP. [lifting up his hand, to slap La Flèche's face.] You are arguing the matter! I will give you something for this reasoning on your ears. Once more, get out of this.

LA FL. Very well! I am going.

HARP. Wait: you are not taking anything away with you?

LA FL. What should I take from you?

HARP. I do not know until I look. Show me your hands?

LA FL. Here they are.

HARP. The others.

LA FL. The others?

HARP. Yes.

LA FL. Here they are.

HARP. [pointing to the breeches of La Flèche.] Have you put nothing in there?

LA FL. Look for yourself!

HARP. [feeling the outside of La Flèche's pockets.] Those wide breeches are just fit to become receivers for things purloined, and I wish one of them had been hanged at the gallows.

LA FL. [aside.] Ah, how a man like this well deserves the thing he fears! and how much pleasure I would have in robbing him!

HARP. Eh?

LA FL. What?

HARP. What are you muttering about robbing!

LA FL. I am saying that you feel carefully everywhere to see if I have robbed you.

HARP. That is what I mean to do. [HARPAGON fumbles in La Flèche's pockets.]

LA FL. [aside.] May the plague take avarice and all avaricious people!

HARP. What! what are you saying?

LA FL. What am I saying?

HARP. Yes; what are you saying about avarice and all avaricious people?

LA FL. I say may the plague take avarice and all avaricious people!

HARP. To whom are you alluding?

LA FL. To avaricious people.

HARP. And who are they, these avaricious people?

LA FL. Villains and curmudgeons.

HARP. But whom do you mean by that?

LA FL. What are you troubling yourself about?

HARP. I am troubling myself about what concerns me.

10 LA FL. Do you think that I am speaking of you?

HARP. I think what I think; but I wish you to tell me to whom you are addressing yourself when you say that.

LA FL. I am addressing myself . . . I am addressing myself to my cap.

HARP. And I might address myself to the head that is in it.

LA FL. Will you prevent me from cursing avaricious people?

HARP. No; but I will prevent you from jabbering, and from being insolent. Hold your tongue!

LA FL. I name no one.

HARP. I shall thrash you if you say another word.

LA FL. Whom the cap fits, let him wear it.

HARP. Will you hold your tongue?

LA FL. Yes, against my will.

HARP. Ah! Ah!

LA FL. [showing HARPAGON a pocket in his 30 doublet.] Just look, there is another pocket; are you satisfied?

HARP. Come, you had better give it up without my searching you.

LA FL. What?

HARP. What you have taken from me.

LA FL. I have taken nothing at all from you.

HARP. Assuredly?

LA FL. Assuredly.

HARP. Good-by, then, and go to the devil.

40 LA FL. [aside.] That is a pretty dismissal.

HARP. I leave you to your own conscience, at least.

SCENE IV:—HARPAGON, alone

There is a hangdog of a valet who is very much in my way; I do not at all care to see this limping cur about the place. It is certainly no small trouble to keep such a large sum of money in one's house; and he is a happy man who has all his well laid out at interest, and keeps only so much by him as is necessary for his expenses. One is not a little puzzled to contrive, in the whole house, a safe hiding-place; for, as far as I am concerned, I distrust safes, and would never rely on them. I look upon them just as a distinct bait to burglars; for it is always the first thing which they attack.

SCENE V:—HARPAGON; ELISE and CLÉANTE conversing together at the farther end of the stage

HARP. [still thinking himself alone]. For all that, I am not quite sure if I have done right in burying in my garden these ten thousand crowns, which were paid to me yesterday. Ten thousand golden crowns in one's house is a sum sufficient. . . . [Aside, perceiving ELISE and CLÉANTE]. Oh, Heavens! I have betrayed myself! The excitement has carried me too far, and I verily believe I have spoken aloud, while arguing to myself. [To CLÉANTE and ELISE.] What is the matter?

CLÉAN. Nothing, father.

HARP. Have you been there long?

ELISE. We were just coming in.

HARP. You have heard . . .

CLÉAN. What, father?

HARP. There . . .

ELISE. What?

HARP. What I said just now.

CLÉAN. No.

HARP. Yes, you have.

ELISE. I beg your pardon.

HARP. I see well enough that you overheard some words. I was talking to myself about the difficulty one experiences nowadays in finding money, and I was saying how pleasant it must be to have ten thousand crowns in the house.

CLÉAN. We hesitated to speak to you, for fear of interrupting you.

HARP. I am very glad to tell you this, so that you may not take things the wrong way, and imagine that I said that I myself had ten thousand crowns.

CLÉAN. We have no wish to enter into your concerns.

HARP. Would to Heaven that I had them, ten thousand crowns!

CLÉAN. I do not think . . .

HARP. It would be a capital affair for me.

ELISE. These are things . . .

HARP. I am greatly in need of them.

CLÉAN. I think . . .

HARP. That would suit me very well.

ELISE. You are . . .

HARP. And I should not have to complain as I do now, about the hard times.

CLÉAN. Good Heavens! father, you have no need to complain, and we know that you have wealth enough.

HARP. How! I wealth enough! Those who say so surely tell a lie. Nothing could be more false; and they are but a pack of rascals who spread all these reports about.

ELISE. Do not put yourself in a rage.

HARP. A strange thing, that my own children should betray me, and become my enemies.

CLÉAN. Is it becoming your enemy to say that you have wealth?

HARP. Yes. Such talk, and the expenses you indulge in will be the cause that one of these fine days people will come and cut my throat, in my own house, in the belief that I am stuffed with gold pieces.

CLÉAN. What great expenses do I indulge in?

HARP. Expenses? Can anything be more scandalous than this sumptuous attire, which you exhibit about the town? I scolded your sister yesterday; but this is much worse. This cries aloud to Heaven for vengeance; for, take you from top to toe, there is enough to ensure a handsome competency. I have told you twenty times, son, that all your manners displease me; you are furiously aping the aristocracy; and to go dressed as you do, you must rob me.

CLÉAN. Eh! how rob you?

HARP. How do I know? Where can you get the means of keeping up such an appearance?

CLÉAN. I, father? it is because I play; and, as I am very lucky, I put my winnings on my back.

HARP. That is very bad. If you are lucky at play, you should profit by it, and lay out the money you win at decent interest, that you may provide for a rainy day. I should much like to know, leaving all other things aside, what the good can be of all these ribbons with which you are decked out from head to foot, and if half-a-dozen tacks are not sufficient to fasten your breeches. Is it at all necessary to spend money upon wigs? when one can wear hair of home growth, which costs nothing! I would bet that your wig and ribbons cost far more than twenty pistoles, and twenty pistoles, at a little more than eight per cent, bring in eighteen livres, six pence, and eight groats a year.

CLÉAN. You are perfectly right.

HARP. Let us leave the subject, and talk of other things. [Perceiving that CLÉANTE and ELISE interchange glances.] Eh! [Softly, aside.] I believe that they are making signs to each other to rob me of my purse. [Aloud.] What mean those gestures?

ELISE. My brother and I are arguing who shall speak first. We have each something to say to you.

HARP. And I have something to say to you both.

CLÉAN. It is about marriage that we wish to speak to you, father.

HARP. And it is also about marriage that I wish to converse with you.

ELISE. Ah, father!

HARP. Why this cry? Is it the word, or the thing itself that frightens you, daughter?

CLÉAN. The way you may look at marriage may frighten us both; and we fear that your sentiments may not happen to chime in with our choice.

HARP. A little patience; do not alarm yourselves. I know what is good for you both, and neither the one nor the other shall have cause to complain of what I intend to do. To begin at one end of the story [to CLÉANTE], tell me, have you noticed a young person called Mariane, who lodges not far from here?

CLÉAN. Yes, father.

HARP. And you?

ELISE. I have heard her spoken of.

HARP. How do you like that girl, son?

CLÉAN. A very charming person.

HARP. What do you think of her countenance?

CLÉAN. Very genteel, and full of intelligence.

HARP. Her air and manner?

CLÉAN. Without doubt, admirable.

HARP. Do you not think that a girl like that deserves to be taken notice of?

CLÉAN. Yes, father.

HARP. That it would be a desirable match?

CLÉAN. Very desirable.

HARP. That she looks as if she would make a good wife?

CLÉAN. Undoubtedly.

HARP. And that a husband would have reason to be satisfied with her?

CLÉAN. Assuredly.

HARP. There is a slight difficulty. I fear that she has not as much money as one might reasonably pretend to.

CLÉAN. Ah! father, money is not worth considering when there is a question of marrying a respectable girl.

HARP. Not so, not so. But this much may be said, that if one finds not quite so much money as one might wish, there is a way of regaining it in other things.

CLÉAN. Of course.

HARP. Well, I am very glad to see that you share my sentiments; for her genteel behavior and her gentleness have quite gained my heart, and I have made up my mind to marry her, provided she has some dowry.

CLÉAN. Eh!

HARP. What now?

CLÉAN. You have made up your mind, you say . . .

HARP. To marry Mariane.

CLÉAN. Who? You, you?

HARP. Yes, I, I, I. What means this?

CLÉAN. I feel a sudden giddiness, and I had better go.

¹⁰ HARP. It will be nothing. Go quickly into the kitchen, and drink a large glassful of cold water.

SCENE VI:—HARPAGON, ELISE

HARP. A lot of flimsy sparks, with no more strength than chickens. Daughter, this is what I have resolved upon for myself. As for your brother, I intend him for a certain widow, of whom they spoke to me this morning; and you, I will give to M. Anselme.

²⁰ ELISE. To M. Anselme?

HARP. Yes, a staid, prudent, and careful man, who is not above fifty, and whose wealth is spoken of everywhere.

ELISE [making a curtsey]. I have no wish to get married, father, if you please.

HARP. [imitating her]. And I, my dear girl, my pet, I wish you to get married, if you please.

ELISE [curtseying once more]. I beg your pardon, father.

³⁰ HARP. [imitating ELISE]. I beg your pardon, daughter.

ELISE. I am M. Anselme's most humble servant [curtseying again]; but, with your leave, I shall not marry him.

HARP. I am your most humble slave, but [imitating ELISE], with your leave, you shall marry him not later than this evening.

ELISE. Not later than this evening?

HARP. Not later than this evening.

⁴⁰ ELISE [curtseying again]. That shall not be, father.

HARP. [imitating her again]. This shall be, daughter.

ELISE. No.

HARP. Yes.

ELISE. No, I tell you.

HARP. Yes, I tell you.

ELISE. That is a thing you shall not drive me to.

HARP. That is a thing I shall drive you to.

ELISE. I will kill myself sooner than marry such a husband.

HARP. You shall not kill yourself, and you shall marry him. But has such boldness ever been seen!

Has ever a daughter been heard to speak to her father in this manner?

ELISE. But has anyone ever seen a father give away his daughter in marriage in this manner?

HARP. It is a match to which no one can object; and I bet that everyone will approve of my choice.

ELISE. And I bet that no reasonable being will approve of it.

HARP. [perceiving VALÈRE in the distance]. Here comes Valère. Shall we make him judge betwixt us in this matter?

ELISE. I consent to it.

HARP. Will you submit to his judgment?

ELISE. Yes; I will submit to what he shall decide.

HARP. That is agreed.

SCENE VII:—VALÈRE, HARPAGON, ELISE

HARP. Come here, Valère. We have elected you to tell us who is in the right, my daughter or I.

VAL. You, Sir, beyond gainsay.

HARP. Are you aware of what we are talking?

VAL. No. But you could not be in the wrong. You are made up of right.

HARP. I intend, this evening, to give her for a husband a man who is as rich as he is discreet; and the jade tells me to my face that she will not take him. What say you to this?

VAL. What do I say to it?

HARP. Yes.

VAL. Eh! eh!

HARP. What?

VAL. I say, that in the main, I am of your opinion; and you cannot but be right. But on the other side, she is not altogether wrong, and . . .

HARP. How is that? M. Anselme is a desirable match; he is a gentleman who is noble, kind, steady, discreet, and very well to do, and who has neither chick nor child left him from his first marriage. Could she meet with a better match?

VAL. That is true. But she might say to you that it is hurrying things a little too much, and that you should give her some time at least to see whether her inclinations would agree with . . .

HARP. This is an opportunity which should be taken by the forelock. I find in this marriage an advantage which I could not find elsewhere; and he agrees to take her without a dowry.

VAL. Without a dowry?

HARP. Yes.

VAL. In that case, I say no more. Do you see, this is altogether a convincing reason; one must yield to that.

HARP. It is a considerable saving to me.

VAL. Assuredly; it cannot be gainsaid. It is true that your daughter might represent to you that marriage is a more important matter than you think; that it involves a question of being happy or miserable all one's life; and that an engagement which must last till death ought never to be entered upon except with great precautions.

HARP. Without a dowry!

VAL. You are right. That decides it all, of course. There are people who might tell you that on such an occasion the wishes of a daughter are something, no doubt, that ought to be taken into consideration; and that this great disparity of age, of temper, and of feelings makes a marriage subject to very sad accidents.

HARP. Without a dowry!

VAL. Ah! there is no reply to that; I know that well enough. Who the deuce could say anything against that? Not that there are not many fathers who would prefer to humor the wishes of their daughters to the money they could give them; who would not sacrifice them to their own interests, and who would, above all things, try to infuse into marriage that sweet conformity, which, at all times, maintains honor, peace, and joy; and which . . .

HARP. Without a dowry!

VAL. It is true; that closes one's mouth at once. Without a dowry! There are no means of resisting an argument like that.

HARP. [aside, looking towards the garden]. Bless my soul! I think I hear a dog barking. Most likely it is someone with a design upon my money. [To VALÈRE.] Do not stir; I am coming back directly.

SCENE VIII:—ELISE, VALÈRE

ELISE. Are you jesting, Valère, to speak to him in that manner?

VAL. It is in order not to sour his temper, and to gain my end the better. To run counter to his opinions is the way to spoil everything; and there are certain minds which cannot be dealt with in a straightforward manner; temperaments averse to all resistance; restive characters, whom the truth causes to rear, who always set their faces against the straight road of reason, and whom you cannot lead except by turning them with their back towards the goal. Pretend to consent to what he wishes, you will gain your end all the better; and . . .

ELISE. But this marriage, Valère!

VAL. We will find some pretext to break it off.

ELISE. But what to invent, if it is to be consummated this evening?

VAL. You must ask for a delay, and pretend to be ill.

ELISE. But the feint will be discovered, if they call in the doctors.

VAL. Are you jesting? What do they know about it? Come, come, with them you may have whatever illness you please; they will find you some reasons to tell you whence it proceeds.

SCENE IX:—HARPAGON, ELISE, VALÈRE

HARP. [aside, at the further end of the stage]. It is nothing, thank Heaven.

VAL. [not seeing HARPAGON]. In short, our last resource is flight, which will shelter us from everything; and if your love, fair Elise, be capable of acting with firmness . . . [Perceiving HARPAGON]. Yes, a daughter ought to obey her father. She ought not to look at the shape of a husband; and when the great argument of without a dowry is added to it, she must be ready to accept what is given to her.

HARP. Good: that is well spoken.

VAL. I crave your pardon, Sir, if I am a little warm, and take the liberty of speaking as I do.

HARP. How now! I am delighted with it, and I wish you to take an absolute control over her. [To ELISE]. Yes, you may run away as much as you like, I invest him with the authority which Heaven ³⁰ has given me over you, and I will have you do all that he tells you.

VAL. [to ELISE]. After that, resist my remonstrances.

SCENE X:—HARPAGON, VALÈRE

VAL. With your leave, Sir, I will follow her, to continue the advice which I was giving her.

HARP. Yes, you will oblige me. By all means . . .

VAL. It is as well to keep her tight in hand.

HARP. True. We must . . .

VAL. Do not be uneasy. I think that I shall succeed.

HARP. Do, do. I am going to take a little stroll in town, and I shall be back presently.

VAL. [addressing himself to ELISE, leaving by the door, through which she went out]. Yes, money is more precious than anything else in this world, and you ought to thank Heaven for having given you such an honest man for a father. He ⁵⁰ knows how to go through life. When anyone offers to take a girl without a dowry, one should look no farther. It sums up everything; and with- out dowry makes up for beauty, youth, birth, honor, wisdom, and probity.

HARP. Ah! the honest fellow! He speaks like an oracle. It is a rare piece of luck to have such a servant!

ACT II

SCENE I:—CLÉANTE, LA FLÈCHE

¹⁰ CLÉAN. Ah! wretch that you are! where have you been? Did I not give you the order . . .

LA FL. Yes, Sir; and I came here to wait for you without stirring: but your father, the most surly of men, ordered me out in spite of myself, at the risk of a thrashing.

CLÉAN. How is our affair getting on? Matters press more than ever, and since I have seen you, I have found out that my father is my rival.

LA FL. Your father in love?

CLÉAN. Yes; and I have had the utmost difficulty in concealing from him the trouble which these tidings have caused me.

LA FL. He meddle with love! What the devil put that in his head? Is he making fun of everyone? and has love been made for people like him?

CLÉAN. This passion must have got into his head to punish me for my sins.

LA FL. But for what reason do you keep your love a secret from him?

CLÉAN. In order to give him less suspicion, and to keep, if needs be, the means open for dissuading him from this marriage. What answer have they made to you?

LA FL. Upon my word, Sir, borrowers are very unlucky people; and one must put up with strange things, when one is compelled, like you, to pass through the hands of moneylenders.

CLÉAN. Will the affair fall through?

LA FL. I beg your pardon. Our Master Simon, ⁴⁰ the agent who has been recommended to us, an active and zealous man, says that he has done wonders for you, and he assures me that your face alone has won his heart.

CLÉAN. Shall I have the fifteen thousand francs which I want?

LA FL. Yes, but with some trifling conditions which you must accept, if you purpose that the affair should be carried through.

CLÉAN. Has he allowed you to speak to the person who is to lend the money?

LA FL. Ah! really, things are not managed in that way. He takes even more care to remain unknown than you do; and these things are much greater mysteries than you think. Simon would not tell me his name at all, and he will be confronted with you today in a house borrowed for the occasion, to be informed by you, personally, of your own substance and that of your family; and I have no doubt that the very name of your father may make things go smoothly.

CLÉAN. And above all our mother being dead, whose property cannot be alienated.

LA FL. Here are some clauses, which he has himself dictated to our go-between, to be shown to you before doing anything:—"Provided the lender see all his securities, and that the borrower be of age, and of a family whose estate is ample, solid, secure, and undoubted, and free from all encumbrance, a binding and correct bond shall be executed before a notary, the most honest man to be found, and who, for this purpose, shall be chosen by the borrower, to whom it is of the greatest importance that the instrument shall be regularly drawn up."

CLÉAN. There is nothing to object to that.

LA FL. "The lender, in order not to charge his conscience with the least scruple, will only lend his money at a little more than five and a half per cent."

CLÉAN. At a little more than five and a half per cent? Zounds! that is honest enough. There is no reason to complain.

LA FL. That is true. "But as the lender has not the sum in question by him, and as, to oblige the borrower, he is himself obliged to borrow it of someone at the rate of twenty per cent, it shall be agreed that the said first borrower shall pay this interest, without prejudice of the rest, seeing that it is only to oblige him that the said lender takes up the loan."

CLÉAN. What the devil! what Jew, what Arab is this? This is more than twenty-five per cent.

LA FL. It is true, that is what I have said. It is for you to see that.

CLÉAN. What can I see? I want the money, and I am bound to consent to everything.

LA FL. That is the answer which I made.

CLÉAN. There is something else still?

LA FL. Nothing but a small matter. "Of the fifteen thousand francs required, the lender can count down in cash only twelve thousand; and, for the remaining thousand crowns, the borrower will have to take them out in chattels, clothing, and jewelry, of which the following is the memorandum, and which the lender has set down honestly at the lowest possible price."

CLÉAN. What does this mean?

LA FL. Listen to the memorandum. "First, a four-post bed, elegantly adorned with Hungary-lace bands, with hangings of olive-colored cloth, with six chairs, and a counterpane of the same; the whole in very good condition, and lined with shot taffetas, red and blue. Item: a tester for this bed, of good Aumale, pale rose-colored serge, with large and small silk fringes."

CLÉAN. What does he want me to do with it?

LA FL. Wait. "Item: Tapestry hangings, representing the loves of Gombaud and Macée. Item: a large walnut wood table, with twelve columns or turned legs, which draws out at both sides, provided with six stools underneath it."

CLÉAN. What have I to do, egad! . . .

LA FL. Only have patience. "Item: three large muskets inlaid with mother-of-pearl, with the necessary rests. Item: a brick furnace, with two retorts, and three receivers very useful for those who have a turn for distilling."

CLÉAN. I am going mad.

LA FL. Gently. "Item: A Bologna lute with all its strings, or nearly all. Item: a troumadame table, a draughtboard, with the game of mother goose, restored from the Greeks, very agreeable to pass the time when one has nothing else to do. Item: a lizard's skin of three feet and a half, stuffed with hay: a very pretty curiosity to hang at the ceiling of a room. The whole of the above-mentioned, really worth more than four thousand five hundred francs, and brought down to the value of a thousand crowns, through the discretion of the lender."

CLÉAN. May the plague choke him with his discretion, the wretch, the cut-throat that he is! Has one ever heard of similar usury? Is he not satisfied with the tremendous interest which he demands, but must needs force me to take for the three thousand francs the old lumber which he picks up? I shall not get two hundred crowns for the whole of it; and nevertheless I must make up my mind to consent to what he wishes; for he has it in his power to make me accept anything: and the scoundrel holds me with a knife to my throat.

LA FL. Without offense, Sir, I see you exactly on the high road which Panurge took to ruin himself: taking money in advance, buying dear, selling cheap, and eating his corn whilst it was but grass.

CLÉAN. What am I to do? See to what young people are reduced by the cursed stinginess of their fathers, and then people are surprised when sons wish their fathers dead!

LA FL. One must confess that yours, with his stinginess, would incense the steadiest man in the world. I have, Heaven be praised, no very great inclination to be hanged; and, among my colleagues whom I see dabbling in many trifling things, I know well enough how to get cleverly out of a scrape, and to keep as clear as possible of those little amenities which savor more or less of the rope; but, to tell you the truth, he would, by his way of acting, give me the temptation to rob him; and I verily believe that, by doing so, I would commit a meritorious action.

CLÉAN. Give me this memorandum, that I may have another look at it.

SCENE II:—HARPAGON, MASTER SIMON; CLÉANTE and LA FLÈCHE at the farther end of the stage

SIM. Yes, Sir, it is a young man who is in want of money; his affairs compel him to find some, and he will consent to all that you dictate to him.

HARP. But think you, Master Simon, that there is no risk to run? and do you know the name, the property, and the family of him for whom you speak?

SIM. No. In reality I cannot well inform you about that, and it is only by chance that I have been recommended to him; but he will himself explain all these things to you, and his servant has assured me that you will be satisfied when you shall know him. All that I am able to tell you is that his family is very rich, that he has already lost his mother, and he will engage himself, if you wish it, that his father shall die before eight months are over.

HARP. That is something. Charity, Master Simon, enjoins us to be agreeable to people when we can.

SIM. That needs no comment.

LA FL. [softly, to CLÉANTE, recognizing MASTER SIMON]. Can anyone have told him who I am and are you perhaps betraying me?

SIM. [to CLÉANTE and LA FLÈCHE]. Ah, ah! you are in a great hurry! Who told you that it was here? [To HARPAGON]. It is not I, at least, Sir, who have given them your name and address; but, in my opinion, there is no great harm in this; they are discreet persons, and you can here come to an understanding with one another.

HARP. How?

SIM. [pointing to CLÉANTE]. This gentleman is the party who wishes to borrow the fifteen thousand francs of which I spoke.

HARP. What, hangdog, it is you who abandon yourself to these culpable extravagances!

CLÉAN. What! it is you, father, who lend yourself to these shameful deeds!

MASTER SIMON runs away, and LA FLÈCHE hides himself.

SCENE III:—HARPAGON, CLÉANTE

HARP. It is you who wish to ruin yourself by such censurable loans?

CLÉAN. It is you who seek to enrich yourself by such criminal usury?

HARP. Can you dare, after this, to appear before me?

CLÉAN. Can you dare, after this, to show your face to the world?

HARP. Are you not ashamed, tell me, to practice this sort of excess, to rush into these dreadful expenses, and to dissipate so shamefully the property which your parents have amassed for you by the sweat of their brow?

CLÉAN. Do you not blush to dishonor your station by the trade you are engaged in; to sacrifice glory and reputation to the insatiable desire of piling crown upon crown, and to surpass, in matters of interest, the most infamous tricks that were ever invented by the most notorious usurers?

HARP. Begone out of my sight, scoundrell! begone out of my sight!

CLÉAN. Who, think you, is the more criminal—he who buys the money of which he is in need, or he who steals money for which he has no use?

HARP. Begone, I say, and do not break the drums of my ears. [Alone]. After all, I am not so vexed about this adventure; it will be a lesson to me to keep more than ever an eye upon his proceedings.

SCENE IV:—FROSINE, HARPAGON

FROS. Sir.

HARP. Wait a moment: I shall be back directly to speak to you. [Aside]. I had better go and take a look at my money.

SCENE V:—LA FLÈCHE, FROSINE

LA FL. [without seeing FROSINE]. The adventure is altogether funny! He must have somewhere a large store of furniture; for we could recognize nothing here from what is in the memorandum.

FROS. Eh! is it you, my poor La Flèche! How comes this meeting?

LA FL. Ah! ah! it is you, Frosine! What brings you here?

FROS. The same that brings me everywhere else; to fetch and carry, to render myself serviceable to people, and to profit as much as possible by the small talents of which I am possessed. You know that in this world we must live by our wits, and that to persons like me, Heaven has given no other income than intrigue and industry.

LA FL. Have you any dealings with the master of this house?

FROS. Yes. I am arranging some small matter for ¹⁰ him, for which I expect a reward.

LA FL. From him? Ah! you will have to be wide-awake enough if you get anything out of him; and I warn you that money is very scarce in this house.

FROS. There are certain services that touch to the quick marvelously.

LA FL. I am your humble servant. You do not know M. Harpagon yet. M. Harpagon is of all human beings the least human, of all mortals the ²⁰ hardest and most close-fisted. There is no service that touches his gratitude deeply enough to make him unloose his purse-strings. Praise, esteem, kindness in words, and friendship, as much as you like; but money, nothing of the kind. There is nothing drier and more arid than his good graces and his caresses; and to give is a word for which he has such an aversion that he never says: I give you, but I lend you good day.

FROS. Gad! I have the art of drawing something ³⁰ out of people; I have the secret of entering into their affections, of tickling their hearts, and of finding out their most sensitive spots.

LA FL. Of no avail here. I defy you to soften the man we are speaking of, so that he will give money. Upon this subject he is a Turk, but of a turkishness to cause the despair of everyone; and one might starve, and he would not budge. In one word, he loves money better than reputation, than honor, and than virtue; and the very sight of one ⁴⁰ who asks for it sends him into fits; it is touching him in his mortal part, it is piercing his heart, it is tearing out his very entrails; and if . . . But he is coming back; I am going.

SCENE VI: HARPAGON, FROSINE

HARP. [aside]. Everything is going on right. [Aloud.] Well! what is it, Frosine?

FROS. Gad, how well you are looking; you are the very picture of health!

HARP. Who? I!

FROS. I never saw you with such a fresh and jolly complexion.

HARP. Really?

FROS. How? You never in your life looked so young as you do now; I see people of five-and-twenty who look older than you.

HARP. I am over sixty, nevertheless, Frosine.

FROS. Well! what does that signify, sixty years? that is nothing to speak of! It is the very flower of one's age, that is; and you are just entering the prime of manhood.

HARP. That is true; but twenty years less would do me no harm, I think.

FROS. Are you jesting? You have no need of that, and you are made of the stuff to live a hundred.

HARP. Do you think so?

FROS. Indeed I do. You show all the signs of it. Hold up your head a moment. Yes, it is there, well enough between your eyes, a sign of long life!

HARP. You are a judge of that sort of thing?

FROS. Undoubtedly I am. Show me your hand. Good heavens, what a line of life!

HARP. How?

FROS. Do you not see how far this line goes?

HARP. Well! what does it mean?

FROS. Upon my word, I said a hundred; but you shall pass six score.

HARP. Is it possible?

FROS. They will have to kill you, I tell you; and you shall bury your children, and your children's ³⁰ children.

HARP. So much the better! How is our affair getting on?

FROS. Need you ask? Does one ever see me meddle with anything that I do not bring to an issue? But for matchmaking, especially, I have a marvelous talent. There are not two people in the world whom I cannot manage, in a very short time, to couple together; and I believe that, if I took it into my head, I should marry the grand Turk to the republic of Venice. To be sure, there were no very great difficulties in this matter. As I am intimate with the ladies, I have often spoken of you to each of them; and I have told the mother of the design which you had upon Mariane, from seeing her pass in the street, and taking the fresh air at her window.

HARP. Who answered . . .

FROS. She has received your proposal with joy; and when I gave her to understand that you very ⁵⁰ much wished her daughter to be present this evening at the marriage-contract, which was to be signed for yours, she consented without difficulty, and has intrusted her to me for the purpose.

HARP. It is because I am obliged to offer a supper to M. Anselme; and I shall be glad that she share the treat.

FROS. You are right. She is to pay a visit after dinner to your daughter, whence she intends to take a turn in the fair, to come and sup here afterwards.

HARP. Well! they shall go together in my coach, which I will lend them.

FROS. That will do very nicely.

HARP. But, Frosine, have you spoken to the mother respecting the portion she can give her daughter? Have you told her that she must bestir herself a little; that she should make some effort; that she must even bleed herself a little on an occasion like that? For, after all, one does not marry a girl without her bringing something.

FROS. How something! She is a girl who brings you twelve thousand francs a year.

HARP. Twelve thousand francs!

FROS. Yes. To begin with; she has been brought up and accustomed to strict economy in feeding. She is a girl used to live on salad, milk, cheese, and apples; and who, in consequence, will neither want a well-appointed table, nor exquisite broths, nor peeled barley, at every turn, nor other delicacies which would be necessary to any other woman; and let these things cost ever so little, they always mount to about three thousand francs a year at the least. Besides this, she has no taste for anything but the utmost simplicity, and does not care for sumptuous dresses, or valuable jewels or magnificent furniture, to which other young ladies are so much given; and that comes to more than four thousand francs per annum. In addition, she has a terrible aversion to gambling, not a common thing in women of the present day; for I know one in our neighborhood who has lost more than twenty thousand francs this year at trente-et-quarante. But let us only estimate it at a fourth of that. Five thousand francs a year at play, and four thousand in jewelry and dresses, that makes nine thousand; and a thousand crowns, say, for the food: are there not your twelve thousand francs a year?

HARP. Yes: that is not so bad; but this reckoning contains, after all, nothing real.

FROS. Pardon me. Is it not something real to bring you for a marriage portion great sobriety, the inheritance of a great love for simplicity of dress, and the acquisition of a great hatred for gambling?

HARP. Surely it is a joke to wish to make up her dowry to me out of expenses to which she will not go. I am not going to give a receipt for what I do not receive; and I shall have to get something down on the nail.

FROS. Good gracious! you shall get enough; and they have spoken to me of a certain country where they have some property, whereof you will become the master.

HARP. That remains to be seen. But, Frosine, there is something else still which makes me uneasy. The girl is young, as you can see; and young people ordinarily love only their equals, and seek only their society. I am afraid that a man of my age may not be to her taste, and that this might produce certain little troubles in my house, which would not at all suit me.

FROS. Ah! how little you know her! This is another peculiarity which I had to mention to you. She has a frightful aversion to young people, and cares for none except for old men.

HARP. She?

FROS. Yes, she. I should like you to have heard her speak upon that subject. She cannot at all bear the sight of a young man; but nothing gives her greater delight, she says, than to behold a handsome old man with a majestic beard. The oldest are the most charming to her; so I warn you beforehand not to make yourself look younger than you really are. She wishes one at least to be a sexagenarian; and it is not more than four months ago, that, on the point of being married, she flatly broke off the match, when it came out that her lover was but fifty-six years of age, and that he did not put spectacles on to sign the contract.

HARP. Only for that?

FROS. Yes. She says fifty-six will not do for her; and that above all things she cares for noses that wear spectacles.

HARP. You certainly tell me something new there.

FROS. She carries it farther than I could tell you. One may see some pictures and a few prints in her room; but what do you think they are? Portraits of Adonis, of Cephalus, of Paris, and of Apollo? Not at all. Beautiful likenesses of Saturn, of King Priam, of old Nestor, and of good father Anchises on his son's back.

HARP. This is admirable. That is what I should never have thought, and I am very glad to hear that she is of that disposition. In fact, had I been a woman, I should never have cared for young men.

FROS. I should think so. A nice lot they are, these young men, to care for them! pretty beauties, indeed, these fine sparks to be enamored of! I should like to know what one can see in them!

HARP. As for me, I cannot understand it at all. I do not know how there are women who like them so much.

FROS. They must be downright fools. Does it sound like common sense to think youth amiable? Are they men at all, these young fops, and can one love such animals?

HARP. That is what I say every day; with their voices like chicken-hearted fellows, three small hairs in the beard twirled like a cat's whiskers; their tow-wigs, their breeches quite hanging down, and their open breasts!

FROS. Indeed! they are well built compared with a person like you! That is what I call a man; there is something there to please the sight; and that is the way to be made and dressed to inspire love.

HARP. Then you like my appearance?

FROS. Do I like your appearance! You are charming; your figure is worth painting. Turn round a little, if you please. Nothing could be better. Let me see you walk. That is a well-built body, free and easy as it ought to be, and without a sign of illness.

HARP. None to speak of, thank Heaven. Nothing but my cough, which worries me now and then.

FROS. That is nothing. It does not become you badly, seeing that you cough very gracefully.

HARP. Just tell me: has Mariane not seen me yet? She has not taken any notice of me in going past?

FROS. No; but we have spoken a great deal of you. I have tried to paint your person to her, and I have not failed to vaunt your merits, and the advantage which it would be to her to have a husband like you.

HARP. You have done well and I thank you for it.

FROS. I have, Sir, a slight request to make to you. I have a law-suit which I am on the point of losing for want of a little money [HARPAGON assumes a serious look]; and you might easily enable me to gain this suit by doing me a little kindness. You would not believe how delighted she will be to see you. [HARPAGON resumes his liveliness.] How you will charm her, and how this old-fashioned ruff will take her fancy! But above all things, she will like your breeches fastened to your doublet with tags; that will make her mad for you; and a lover who wears tags will be most acceptable to her.

HARP. Certainly, I am delighted to hear you say so.

FROS. Really, Sir, this law-suit is of the utmost consequence to me. [HARPAGON resumes his serious air.] If I lose it, I am ruined; and some little assistance would set my affairs in order. . . . I should like you to have seen her delight at hearing me speak of you. [HARPAGON resumes his liveliness.] Joy shone in her eyes at the enumeration of your good qualities; and, in short, I have made her very anxious to have this match entirely concluded.

HARP. You have pleased me very much, Frosine; and I confess that I am extremely obliged to you.

FROS. I pray you, Sir, to give me the little assistance which I ask of you. [HARPAGON resumes his serious air.] It will put me on my legs again, and I shall be for ever grateful to you.

HARP. Good-by. I am going to finish my letters.

FROS. I assure you, Sir, that you could never come to my relief in a greater need.

HARP. I will give orders that my coach be ready to take you to the fair.

FROS. I would not trouble you, if I were not compelled to it from necessity.

HARP. And I will take care that the supper shall be served early, so as not to make you ill.

FROS. Do not refuse me the service which I ask of you. You would not believe, Sir, the pleasure which . . .

HARP. I must be gone. Someone is calling me. Till by-and-by.

FROS. [alone]. May ague seize you, and send you to the devil, you stingy cur! The rascal has resisted firmly all my attacks. But I must, for all that, not abandon the attempt; and I have got the other side, from whom, at any rate, I am certain to draw a good reward.

ACT III

SCENE I:—HARPAGON, CLÉANTE, ELISE, VALÈRE, MISTRESS CLAUDE holding a broom, MASTER JACQUES, LA MERLUCHE, BRINDAVOINE

HARP. Come here, all of you, that I may give you my orders for just now, and tell everyone what he has to do. Come here, Mistress Claude; let us begin with you. [Looking at her broom.] That is right, arms in hand. I trust to you for cleaning up everywhere: and above all, take care not to rub the furniture too hard, for fear of wearing it out. Besides this, I appoint you to look after the bottles during the supper; and, if one is missing, or if something gets broken, I shall hold you responsible, and deduct it from your wages.

JACQ. [aside]. There is policy in that punishment.

HARP. [to MISTRESS CLAUDE]. You can go.

SCENE II:—HARPAGON, CLÉANTE, ELISE, VALÈRE, MASTER JACQUES, BRINDAVOINE, LA MERLUCHE.

HARP. You, Brindavoine, and you, La Merluche, I confide to you the care of rinsing the glasses, and of serving out the drink, but only when the people are thirsty, and not in the manner of these impertinent lackeys who come and provoke them, and put drinking into their heads when they have no thought of such a thing. Wait till you are asked for it more than once, and bear in mind always to bring a good deal of water.

JACQ. [aside]. Yes. Wine undiluted mounts to the head.

LA M. Shall we throw off our smocks, Sir?

HARP. Yes, when you see the people coming; and take care not to spoil your clothes.

BRIND. You know, Sir, that the front of my doublet is covered with a large stain of oil from the lamp.

LA M. And I, Sir, I have a large hole in the seat of my breeches, and saving your presence, people can see . . .

HARP. Peace; keep it adroitly to the side of the wall, and always show your front to the world. [To BRINDAVOINE, showing him how he is to keep his hat before his doublet, in order to hide the stain.] And you, always hold your hat thus while you are waiting upon the guests.

SCENE III:—HARPAGON, CLÉANTE, ELISE, VALÈRE, MASTER JACQUES

HARP. As for you, daughter, you will keep an eye upon what goes away from the table, and take care that nothing be wasted. It becomes girls to do so. Meanwhile, get yourself ready to receive my intended properly. She is coming to visit you, and will take you to the fair with her. Do you hear what I say to you?

ELISE. Yes, father.

SCENE IV:—HARPAGON, CLÉANTE, VALÈRE, MASTER JACQUES

HARP. And you, my foppish son, to whom I have been good enough to forgive what has happened just now, do not take it into your head to show her a sour face.

CLÉAN. I, father? a sour face? And for what reason?

HARP. Egad! we know the ways of children whose fathers marry again, and with what sort of eyes they are in the habit of looking at their so-called stepmothers. But if you wish me to lose the recollection of this last escapade of yours, I recommend you, above all, to show this lady a friendly countenance, and to give her, in fact, the best possible reception.

CLÉAN. To tell you the truth, father, I cannot promise you to be glad that she is to become my stepmother. I should tell a lie if I said so to you; but as for receiving her well and showing her a friendly countenance, I promise to obey you punctually on this head.

HARP. Take care you do, at least.

CLÉAN. You shall see that you shall have no cause to complain.

20 HARP. You had better.

SCENE V:—HARPAGON, VALÈRE, MASTER JACQUES

HARP. You will have to help me in this, Valère. Now, Master Jacques, draw near, I have left you for the last.

JACQ. Is it to your coachman, Sir, or to your cook, that you wish to speak? For I am both the one and the other.

HARP. It is to both.

JACQ. But to which of the two first?

HARP. To the cook.

JACQ. Then wait a minute, if you please.

MASTER JACQUES takes off his livery coat, and appears in a cook's dress.

HARP. What the deuce does that ceremony mean?

JACQ. You have but to speak now.

HARP. I have promised, Master Jacques, to give a supper tonight.

JACQ. [aside]. Most miraculous!

HARP. Just tell me: will you dish us up something good?

JACQ. Yes, if you give me plenty of money.

HARP. The deuce, always money. It seems to me as if they could speak of nothing else; money, money, money! It is the only word they have got on their lips; money! they always speak of money. That is their chief argument, money.

VAL. I have never heard a more impertinent answer than that. A great wonder to dish up something good with plenty of money! It is the easiest thing in the world; any fool can do as much; but a 'clever man should speak of dishing up something good with little money.

JACQ. Something good with little money!

VAL. Yes.

JACQ. [to VALÈRE]. Upon my word, Master Steward, you would oblige us by showing us that secret, and by taking my place as cook; you that are meddling with everything in this house, and playing the factotum.

HARP. Hold your tongue. What shall we want? ¹⁰ trouble.

JACQ. Apply to your steward here, who will dish you up something good for little money.

HARP. Enough! I wish you to answer me.

JACQ. How many people are to sit down?

HARP. We shall be eight or ten; but you must not count upon more than eight. If there is enough for eight, there is enough for ten.

VAL. That needs no comment.

JACQ. Very well! we must have four first-rate soups and five small dishes. Soups . . . En- ²⁰ trées . . .

HARP. What the devil! there is enough to feed a whole town.

JACQ. Roast . . .

HARP. [putting his hand over Jacques' mouth]. Hold! wretch, you will eat up all my substance.

JACQ. Side-dishes.

HARP. [putting his hand over Jacques' mouth again]. What! more still?

VAL. [to JACQUES]. Do you intend to make every- ³⁰ one burst? and think you that master has invited people with the intention of killing them with food? Go and read a little the precepts of health, and ask the doctors whether there is aught more prejudicial to man than eating to excess.

HARP. He is right.

VAL. Learn, Master Jacques, you and the like of you, that a table overloaded with viands is a cut-throat business; that, to show one's self the friend of those whom one invites, frugality should reign ⁴⁰ in the meals which one offers; and that according to the saying of an ancient, we must eat to live, and not live to eat.

HARP. Ah! how well that is said! Come here, that I may embrace you for that saying. This is the finest sentence that I ever heard in my life; one must live to eat, and not eat to li . . . No, that is not it. How do you put it?

VAL. That we must eat to live, and not live to eat.

HARP. [to MASTER JACQUES]. That is it. Do you hear it? [To VALÈRE.] Who is the great man who has said that?

VAL. I do not recollect his name just now.

HARP. Just remember to write down these words for me: I wish to have them engraved in letters of gold on the mantel-piece of my dining-room.

VAL. I shall not forget it. And as for your supper, you have but to leave it to me; I shall manage everything right enough.

HARP. Do so.

JACQ. So much the better! I shall have less

HARP. [to VALÈRE]. We must have some of these things of which people eat very little, and which fill quickly; some good fat beans, with a potted pie, well stuffed with chestnuts. Let there be plenty of that.

VAL. Depend upon me.

HARP. And now, Master Jacques, you must clean my coach.

JACQ. Wait; that is a matter for the coachman. [Puts his livery coat on.] You were saying . . .

HARP. That you must clean my coach, and hold the horses in readiness to drive to the fair. . . .

JACQ. Your horses, Sir? Upon my word, they are not at all in a fit state to go. I will not tell you that they are on the straw; the poor beasts have not got even that much, and it would not be telling the truth; but you make them keep such austere fasts that they are no longer anything but ghosts or shadows, with horses' shapes.

HARP. They are very ill, and yet they are doing nothing!

JACQ. And because they do nothing, Sir, must they not eat? It would be far better to work the poor brutes much, and to feed them the same. It breaks my heart to see them in such a wretched condition; for, after all, I have got tender feeling for my horses; it seems to me it is myself, when I see them suffer. Not a day passes but I take the meat out of my own mouth to feed them; and, Sir, it is being too cruel to have no pity for one's neighbor.

HARP. The work will not be very hard to go as far as the fair.

JACQ. No, Sir, I have not the heart to drive them, and I would not have it on my conscience to give them the whip in the state they are in. How can you wish them to draw a coach when they can hardly drag themselves along?

VAL. Sir, I will make our neighbor, Picard, take ⁵⁰ charge of them and drive them; he will be at the same time needed to get the supper ready.

JACQ. Be it so; I prefer their dying under other people's than under mine.

VAL. Master Jacques is getting considerate!

JACQ. Sir Steward is getting indispensable!

HARP. Peace.

JACQ. I cannot bear flatterers, Sir; and I see what he makes of it; that his perpetual looking after the bread, the wine, the wood, the salt, the candles, is done only with the view of currying favor with you, and getting into your good books. This drives me mad, and I am sorry to hear every day what the world says of you; for, after all, I have some feeling for you; and, after my horses, you are the person whom I love most.

HARP. Might I know, Master Jacques, what people say of me?

JACQ. Yes, Sir, if I could be sure that it would not make you angry.

HARP. No, not in the least.

JACQ. I beg your pardon; I know full well that I shall put you in a rage.

HARP. Not at all. On the contrary, it will be obliging me, and I shall be glad to learn how people speak of me.

JACQ. Since you will have it, Sir, I shall tell you frankly that people everywhere make a jest of you, that they pelt us with a thousand jokes from every quarter on your account, and that they are never more delighted than when holding you up to ridicule, and continually relating stories of your meanness. One says that you have special almanacs printed, in which you double the ember weeks and vigils, in order to profit by the fast days, which you compel your people to keep; another that you have always a quarrel ready for your servants at New Year's day, or when they leave you, so that you may find a reason for not giving them anything. That one tells that you once sued one of your neighbor's cats for having eaten the remainder of a leg of mutton; this one again that you were surprised one night in purloining the hay of your own horses, and that your coachman, that is, the one who was here before me, dealt you I do not know how many blows in the dark, of which you never broached a word. In short, shall I tell you? one can go nowhere without hearing you hauled over the coals on all sides. You are the byword and laughing-stock of everyone; and you are never spoken of, except under the names of miser, curmudgeon, hunks, and usurer.

HARP. [thrashing MASTER JACQUES]. You are a numskull, a rascal, a scoundrel, and an impudent fellow.

JACQ. Well! did I not say so beforehand? You would not believe me. I told you well enough that I should make you angry by telling you the truth.

HARP. That will teach you how to speak.

SCENE VI:—VALÈRE, MASTER JACQUES

VAL. [laughing]. From what I can see, Master Jacques, your candor is ill rewarded.

JACQ. Zounds! Master Upstart, who assume the man of consequence, it is not your business. Laugh at your cudgel-blows when you shall receive them, but do not come here to laugh at mine.

VAL. Ah! Sir Master Jacques, do not get angry, I beg of you.

JACQ. [aside]. He is knuckling under. I shall bully him, and, if he is fool enough to be afraid of me, I shall give him a gentle drubbing.

[Aloud]. Are you aware, Master Laughter, that I am not in a laughing humor, and that if you annoy me, I will make you laugh on the wrong side of your mouth? [MASTER JACQUES drives VALÈRE to the far end of the stage, threatening him.]

VAL. Eh! gently.

JACQ. How, gently? it does not suit me.

VAL. Pray.

JACQ. You are an impertinent fellow.

VAL. Sir Master Jacques . . .

JACQ. There is no Sir Master Jacques at all. If I had a stick, I would give you a good drubbing.

VAL. How, a stick! [VALÈRE makes MASTER JACQUES retreat in his turn.]

JACQ. Eh! I was not speaking of that.

VAL. Are you aware, Master Boaster, that I am the very man to give you a drubbing myself?

JACQ. I do not doubt it.

VAL. That you are, in all, nothing but a scrub of a cook?

JACQ. I am well aware of it.

VAL. And that you do not know me yet?

JACQ. I ask your pardon.

VAL. You will thrash me, say you?

JACQ. I said so only in jest.

VAL. And I say, that I do not relish your jests. [Thrashing him with a stick.] This will teach you, that you are but a sorry clown.

JACQ. [alone]. The plague take my candor! it is a bad business: I give it up for the future, and I will no more speak the truth. I might put up with it from my master; he has some right to thrash me; but as for this Master Steward, I will have my revenge if I can.

SCENE VII:—MARIANE, FROSINE, MASTER JACQUES

FROS. Do you know, Master Jacques, if your master is at home?

JACQ. Yes, indeed, he is; I know it but too well.
 FROS. Tell him, pray, that we are here.

SCENE VIII:—MARIANE, FROSINE

MAR. Ah! I feel very strange, Frosine! and, if I must tell you what I feel, I dread this interview!

FROS. But why, and whence this uneasiness?

MAR. Alas! can you ask me? and can you not imagine the alarms of anyone at the sight of the rack to which she is going to be tied?

FROS. I see well enough, that to die pleasantly, Harpagon is not exactly the rack which you would care to embrace; and I can see by your face, that this young spark, of whom you spoke to me, comes afresh into your head.

MAR. Yes! it is an accusation, Frosine, from which I shall not defend myself; and the respectful visits which he has paid us, have, I confess, made some impression on my heart.

FROS. But have you ascertained who he is?

MAR. No, I do not know who he is. But this I know, that he is made to be beloved: that, if things could be left to my choice, I would sooner have him than any other, and that he is the chief cause in making me feel that the husband whom they wish to give me is a terrible torment.

FROS. Egad, all these youngsters are agreeable, and play their part well enough, but most of them are as poor as church mice: it will be much better for you to take an old husband who will make you a good settlement. I grant you that the senses will not find their account so well on the side I speak of, and that there are some little distastes to overcome with such a spouse; but that cannot last, and his death, believe me, will soon put you in a position to take one who is more amiable, and who will mend all things.

MAR. Good gracious! Frosine, it is a strange thing that, to be happy, we should wish for or await the death of someone; the more so as death does not always accommodate itself to our projects.

FROS. Are you jesting? You marry him only on condition of soon leaving you a widow; and that must be one of the articles of the contract. It would be impertinent in him not to die within three months! Here he is himself!

MAR. Ah! Frosine, what a figure!

SCENE IX:—HARPAGON, MARIANE, FROSINE

HARP. [to MARIANE]. Do not be offended, my beauty, that I come to you with my spectacles on. I know that your charms strike the eye sufficiently, are visible enough by themselves, and that there is no need of spectacles to perceive them; but after all, it is through them that we look at the stars, and I maintain and vouch for it that you are a star; but a star, the brightest in the land of stars. Frosine, she does not answer a word, and does not testify, from what I can perceive, the slightest joy in seeing me.

FROS. It is because she is as yet taken all aback; and besides, girls are always ashamed to show at first sight what passes in their hearts.

HARP. You are right. [To MARIANE]. Here comes my daughter, sweet child, to welcome you.

SCENE X:—HARPAGON, ELISE, MARIANE, FROSINE

MAR. I am much behind, Madam, in acquitting myself of such a visit.

ELISE. You have done, Madam, what it was my duty to do, and it was my place to have been beforehand with you.

HARP. You see what a great girl she is; but ill weeds grow apace.

MAR. [in a whisper, to FROSINE]. Oh! what an unpleasant man!

HARP. [in a whisper, to FROSINE]. What says the fair one?

FROS. That she thinks you admirable.

HARP. You do me too much honor, adorable pet.

MAR. [aside]. What a brute!

HARP. I am much obliged to you for these sentiments.

MAR. [aside]. I can hold out no longer.

SCENE XI:—HARPAGON, MARIANE, ELISE, CLÉANTE, FROSINE, BRINDAVOINE

HARP. There comes my son also, to pay his respects to you.

MAR. [in a whisper, to FROSINE]. Ah! Frosine, what a meeting! It is the very person of whom I spoke to you.

FROS. [to MARIANE]. The adventure is wonderful.

HARP. I see that you are surprised at my having such grown-up children; but I shall soon be rid of one and the other.

CLÉAN. [to MARIANE]. Madam, to tell you the truth, this is an adventure, which no doubt, I did not expect; and my father has not a little astonished me, when, a short time ago, he communicated to me the plan which he had formed.

MAR. I may say the same thing. It is an unforeseen meeting which surprises me as much as it does you; and I was not at all prepared for such an adventure.

CLÉAN. It is true that my father, Madam, could not make a better choice, and that the honor of seeing you gives me unfeigned joy, but for all that, I cannot give you the assurance that I rejoice at the design which you may have of becoming my step-mother. I avow to you that it would be too much for me to pay you that compliment; and by your leave, it is a title which I do not wish you. This speech may become coarse to some; but I am sure that you will be the one to take it in the proper sense; that it is a marriage, Madam, for which, as you may well imagine, I can have only repugnance; that you are not unaware, knowing what I am, how it clashes with my interests; and that, in short, you will not take it amiss when I tell you, with the permission of my father, that, if matters depended upon me, this marriage would not take place.

HARP. This is a most impertinent compliment! What a pretty confession to make to her!

MAR. And I, in reply, must tell you, that things are pretty equal; and that, if you have any repugnance in seeing me your stepmother, I shall have, doubtless, no less in seeing you my step-son. Do not think, I pray you, that it is I who seek to give you that uneasiness. I should be very sorry to cause you any displeasure; and unless I see myself compelled to it by an absolute power, I give you my word that I shall not consent to a marriage that vexes you.

HARP. She is right. To a silly compliment, a similar retort is necessary. I beg your pardon, my dear, for the impertinence of my son; he is a young fool, who does not as yet know the consequence of what he says.

MAR. I promise you that what he has said has not at all offended me; on the contrary, he has pleased me by explaining thus his real feelings. I like such an avowal from his lips; and if he had spoken in any other way, I should have esteemed him the less for it.

HARP. It is too good of you to be willing thus to condone his faults. Time will make him wiser, and you shall see that he will alter his sentiments.

CLÉAN. No, father, I am incapable of changing upon that point, and I beg urgently of this lady to believe me.

HARP. But see what madness! he goes still more so strongly.

CLÉAN. Do you wish me to go against my own heart?

HARP. Again! Perhaps you will be kind enough to change the conversation.

CLÉAN. Well! since you wish to speak in a different manner, allow me, Madam, to put myself in my father's place, and to confess to you that I have seen nothing in the world so charming as you; that I conceive nothing equal to the happiness of pleasing you, and that the title of your husband is a glory, a felicity which I would prefer to the destinies of the greatest princes on earth. Yes, Madam, the happiness of possessing you is, in my eyes, the best of all good fortunes; the whole of my ambition points to that. There is nothing which I would shrink from to make so precious a conquest; and the most powerful obstacles . . .

HARP. Gently, son, if you please.

CLÉAN. It is a compliment which I pay for you to this lady.

HARP. Good Heavens! I have a tongue to explain myself, and I have no need of an interpreter like you. Come, hand chairs.

FROS. No; it is better that we should go to the fair now, so that we may return the sooner, and have ample time afterwards to converse with you.

HARP. [to BRINDAVOINE]. Have the horses put to the carriage.

SCENE XII:—HARPAGON, MARIANE, ELISE, CLÉANTE, VALÈRE, FROSINE

HARP. [to MARIANE]. I pray you to excuse me, fair child, if I forgot to offer you some refreshments before going.

CLÉAN. I have provided for it, father, and have ordered some plates of China oranges, sweet citrons, and preserves, which I have sent for in your name.

HARP. [softly to VALÈRE]. Valère!

VAL. [to HARPAGON]. He has lost his senses.

CLÉAN. Do you think, father, that it is not sufficient? This lady will have the goodness to excuse that, if it please her.

MAR. It was not at all necessary.

CLÉAN. Have you ever seen, Madam, a diamond more sparkling than the one which you see on my father's finger?

MAR. It sparkles much indeed.

CLÉAN. [taking the diamond off his father's finger, and handing it to MARIANE]. You must see it close.

MAR. It is no doubt very beautiful, and throws out a deal of light.

CLÉAN. [placing himself before MARIANE, who is about to return the diamond]. No, Madam, it is in hands too beautiful. It is a present which my father makes you.

HARP. I?

CLÉAN. Is it not true, father, that you wish this lady to keep it for your sake?

HARP. [softly to his son]. How?

CLÉAN. [to MARIANE]. A pretty request indeed! He has given me a sign to make you accept it.

MAR. I do not wish to . . .

CLÉAN. [to MARIANE]. Are you jesting? He does not care to take it back.

HARP. [aside]. I am bursting with rage!

MAR. It would be . . .

CLÉAN. [preventing MARIANE from returning the diamond]. No, I tell you; you would offend him.

MAR. Pray . . .

CLÉAN. Not at all.

HARP. [aside]. May the plague . . .

CLÉAN. He is getting angry at your refusal.

HARP. [softly to his son]. Ah! you wretch!

CLÉAN. [to MARIANE]. You see that he is getting desperate.

HARP. [in a suppressed tone to his son, threatening him]. Murderer that you are!

CLÉAN. It is not my fault, father. I am doing all that I can to make her keep it; but she is obstinate.

HARP. [in a great passion, whispering to his son]. Hangdog!

CLÉAN. You are the cause, Madam, or my father's upbraiding me.

HARP. [same as before, to his son]. The scoundrel!

CLÉAN. [to MARIANE]. You will make him ill. Pray, Madam, do not resist any longer.

FROS. [to MARIANE]. Good Heavens, what ceremonies! Keep the ring, since the gentleman wishes it.

MAR. [to HARPAGON]. Not to put you into a passion, I shall keep it now, and I shall take another opportunity of returning it to you.

SCENE XIII:—HARPAGON, MARIANE, ELISE, CLÉANTE, VALÈRE, FROSINE, BRINDAVOINE

BRIND. Sir, there is a man who wishes to speak to you.

HARP. Tell him that I am engaged, that he is to return at another time.

BRIND. He says that he brings you some money.

HARP. [to MARIANE]. I beg your pardon; I shall be back directly.

SCENE XIV:—HARPAGON, MARIANE, ELISE, CLÉANTE, VALÈRE, FROSINE, LA MERLUCHE

LA M. [running against HARPAGON, whom he knocks down]. Sir . . .

HARP. Oh! I am killed!

CLÉAN. What is it, father? have you hurt yourself?

HARP. The wretch has surely been bribed by my 10 debtors to make me break my neck.

VAL. [to HARPAGON]. That will be nothing.

LA M. [to HARPAGON]. I beg your pardon, Sir; I thought I was doing well in running quickly.

HARP. What have you come here for, you hangdog?

LA M. To tell you that your two horses have lost their shoes.

HARP. Let them be taken to the farrier immediately.

20 CLÉAN. While waiting for their being shod, I will do the honors of your house for you, father, and conduct this lady into the garden, whither I shall have the refreshments brought.

SCENE XV:—HARPAGON, VALÈRE

HARP. Valère, keep your eye a little on this, and take care, I pray you, to save as much of it as you can, to send back to the tradespeople.

VAL. I know.

30 HARP. [alone]. Oh, impertinent son! do you mean to ruin me?

ACT IV

SCENE I:—CLÉANTE, MARIANE, ELISE, FROSINE

CLÉAN. Let us go in here; we shall be much better. There is no suspicious person near us now, and we can converse freely.

40 ELISE. Yes, Madam, my brother has confided to me the affection which he feels for you. I am aware of the grief and unpleasantness which such obstacles are capable of causing; and it is, I assure you, with the utmost tenderness that I interest myself in your adventure.

MAR. It is a sweet consolation to see someone like you in one's interest; and I implore you, Madam, always to reserve for me this generous friendship, so capable of alleviating the cruelties 50 of fortune.

FROS. You are, upon my word, both unlucky people, in not having warned me before this of your affair. I would, no doubt, have warded off this uneasiness from you, and not have carried matters so far as they now are.

CLÉAN. Whose fault is it? It is my evil destiny that has willed it so. But fair Mariane, what have you resolved to do?

MAR. Alas! am I able to make any resolutions? And, in the dependent position in which you see me, can I form aught else than wishes?

CLÉAN. No other support in your heart for me than mere wishes? No strenuous pity? No helping kindness? No energetic affection?

MAR. What can I say to you? Put yourself in my place, and see what I can do. Advise, command yourself: I leave the matter to you; and I think you too reasonable to wish to exact from me aught but what may be consistent with honor and decency.

CLÉAN. Alas! to what straits do you reduce me by driving me back to what the annoying dictates of a rigorous honor and a scrupulous decency only will permit?

MAR. But what would you have me to do? Even if I could forego the many scruples to which my sex compels me, I have some consideration for my mother. She has always brought me up with the utmost tenderness, and I could not make up my mind to cause her any displeasure. Treat, transact with her; use all your means to gain her mind. You may say and do whatever you like, I give you full power; and if nothing is wanting but to declare myself in your favor, I am willing, myself, to make to her the avowal of all that I feel for you.

CLÉAN. Frosine, dear Frosine, will you try to serve us?

FROS. Upon my word, need you ask? I should like it with all my heart. You know that, naturally, I am kind-hearted enough. Heaven has not given me a heart of iron, and I have only too much inclination for rendering little services when I see people who love each other in all decency and honor. What can we do in this matter?

CLÉAN. Pray consider a little.

MAR. Give us some advice.

ELISE. Invent some means of undoing what you have done.

FROS. That is difficult enough. [To MARIANE.] As for your mother, she is not altogether unreasonable, and we might perhaps prevail upon her and induce her to transfer to the son the gift which she wished to make to the father. [To CLÉANTE.] But the mischief in it is that your father is your father.

CLÉAN. Of course.

FROS. I mean that he will bear malice if he finds that he is refused, and that he will not be of a mind afterwards to give his consent to your marriage. To do well, the refusal ought to come from himself, and she ought to try, by some means, to inspire him with a disgust towards her.

CLÉAN. You are right.

FROS. Yes, I am right; I know that well enough. That is what is wanted, but how the deuce can we find the means? Stop! Suppose we had some woman a little advanced in age who had my talent, and acted sufficiently well to counterfeited a lady of quality, by the help of a retinue made up in haste, and with an eccentric name of a marchioness or a viscountess, whom we will suppose to come from Lower Brittany, I would have skill enough to make your father believe that she was a person possessed of a hundred thousand crowns in ready money, besides her houses; that she was distractedly enamored of him, and had so set her mind upon being his wife, that she would make all her property over to him by marriage-contract. I do not doubt that he would lend an ear to this proposal. For, after all, he loves you much, I know it, but he loves money a little more; and when, dazzled with this bait, he had once given his consent in what concerns you, it would matter very little if he were afterwards disabused, when he wished to see more clearly into the property of our marchioness.

CLÉAN. All this is very well conceived.

FROS. Let me manage. I just recollect one of my friends who will suit us.

CLÉAN. Be assured of my gratitude, Frosine, if you carry out this matter. But, charming Mariane, let us begin, I pray you, by gaining over your mother; it is doing much, at any rate, to break off this match. Make every possible effort on your part, I entreat you. Employ all the power which her tenderness for you gives you over her. Show her unreserved, the eloquent graces, the all-powerful charms, with which Heaven has endowed your eyes and your lips; and please do not overlook any of these tender words, of these sweet prayers, and of these winning caresses to which, I am persuaded, nothing can be refused.

MAR. I will do my best, and forget nothing.

SCENE II:—HARPAGON, CLÉANTE, MARIANE, ELISE, FROSINE

HARP. [aside, without being seen.] Hey day! my son kisses the hand of his intended stepmother; and his intended stepmother does not seem to take it much amiss! Can there be any mystery underneath this?

ELISE. Here is my father.

HARP. The carriage is quite ready; you can start as soon as you like.

CLÉAN. Since you are not going, father, permit me to escort them.

HARP. No: remain here. They will do well enough by themselves, and I want you.

SCENE III:—HARPAGON, CLÉANTE

HARP. Now, tell me, apart from becoming your stepmother, what think you of this lady?

CLÉAN. What do I think of her?

HARP. Yes, of her air, of her figure, of her beauty, of her mind?

CLÉAN. So, so.

HARP. That is no answer.

CLÉAN. To speak to you candidly, I have not found her what I expected. Her air is that of a downright coquette, her figure is sufficiently awkward, her beauty very so-so, and her mind quite ordinary. Do not think, father, that this is said to give you a distaste for her; for, stepmother for stepmother, I would as soon have her as any other.

HARP. You said to her just now, however . . .

CLÉAN. I have said some sweet nothings to her in your name, but it was to please you.

HARP. So much so, that you would not feel any inclination towards her?

CLÉAN. I? not at all.

HARP. I am sorry for it; for it does away with an idea that came into my head. In seeing her here, I have reflected upon my age; and I thought that people might find something to cavil at in seeing me marry so young a girl. This consideration has made me abandon the plan; and as I have made the demand of her hand, and am engaged to her by my word, I would have given her to you, had it not been for the aversion which you show.

CLÉAN. To me?

HARP. To you.

CLÉAN. In marriage?

HARP. In marriage.

CLÉAN. Listen. It is true that she is not much to my taste; but to please you, father, I would make up my mind to marry her, if you wish it.

HARP. I, I am more reasonable than you give me credit for. I will not force your inclination.

CLÉAN. Pardon me; I will make this effort for your sake.

HARP. No, no. No marriage can be happy where there is no inclination.

CLÉAN. Perhaps it will come afterwards, father; they say that love is often the fruit of wedlock.

HARP. No. From the side of the man, one must not risk such a thing; it generally brings grievous consequences, to which I do not care to commit myself. Had you felt any inclination for her, it would have been a different thing; I should have made you marry her instead of me; but, that not being the case, I will follow up my first plan, and marry her myself.

CLÉAN. Well! father, since matters are so, I must lay open my heart to you; I must reveal our secret to you. The truth is, I love her, since, on a certain day, I saw her walking; that my plan was, a short while ago, to ask her to become my wife, and that nothing restrained me but the declaration of your sentiments, and the fear of displeasing you.

HARP. Have you paid her any visits?

CLÉAN. Yes, father.

HARP. Many times?

CLÉAN. Just enough, considering the time of our acquaintance.

HARP. Have you been well received?

CLÉAN. Very well, indeed, but without her knowing who I was; and that is what just now caused the surprise of Mariane.

HARP. Have you declared your passion to her, and the design you had to marry her?

CLÉAN. Indeed yes; and I even made some overtures to her mother about it.

HARP. Has she listened to your proposal for her daughter?

CLÉAN. Yes, very civilly.

HARP. And does the girl much reciprocate your love?

CLÉAN. If I am to believe appearances, I flatter myself, father, that she has some affection for me.

HARP. [softly, to himself]. I am glad to have found out such a secret; that is just what I wished. [Aloud.] Hark you, my son, do you know what you will have to do? You must think, if you please, of getting rid of your love, of ceasing from all pursuits of a person whom I intend for myself, and of marrying shortly the one who has been destined for you.

CLÉAN. So, father; it is thus that you trick me! Well! since matters have come to this pass, I declare to you, that I will not get rid of my love for Mariane; that there is nothing from which I shall shrink to dispute with you her possession; and that, if you have the consent of a mother on your side, I have other resources, perhaps, which will combat on mine.

HARP. What, hang-dog, you have the audacity to poach on my preserves!

CLÉAN. It is you that are poaching on mine. I am the first comer.

HARP. Am I not your father, and do you not owe me respect?

CLÉAN. This is not a matter in which a child is obliged to defer to his father, and love is no ¹⁰ respecter of persons.

HARP. I will make you respect me well enough with some sound cudgel-blows.

CLÉAN. All your threats will do nothing.

HARP. You shall renounce Mariane.

CLÉAN. I shall do nothing of the kind.

HARP. Give me a stick immediately.

SCENE IV:—HARPAGON, CLÉANTE, MASTER JACQUES

JACQ. Eh, eh, eh, gentlemen, what is all this? ²⁰ what are you thinking about?

CLÉAN. I do not care a straw.

JACQ. [to CLÉANTE]. Come, Sir, gently.

HARP. To speak to me with such impertinence!

JACQ. [to HARPAGON]. Pray, Sir, pray!

CLÉAN. I will not bate a jot.

JACQ. [to CLÉANTE]. Eh what! to your father?

HARP. Let me alone.

JACQ. [to HARPAGON]. What! to your son? I could overlook it to myself.

HARP. I will make yourself, Master Jacques, judge in this affair, to show you that I am in the right.

JACQ. I consent. [To CLÉANTE]. Get a little farther away.

HARP. I love a girl whom I wish to marry; and the hang-dog has the insolence to love her also, and to aspire to her hand in spite of my commands.

JACQ. He is wrong there.

HARP. Is it not a dreadful thing for a son to wish to enter into rivalry with his father? and ought he not, out of respect, to abstain from meddling with my inclinations?

JACQ. You are right. Let me speak to him, while you remain here.

CLÉAN. [to MASTER JACQUES, who is approaching him]. Well! yes, since he chooses you as judge, I shall not draw back; it matters not to me who it may be; and I am willing to refer to you, Master ³⁰ Jacques, in this our quarrel.

JACQ. You do me much honor.

CLÉAN. I am smitten with a young girl who returns my affection, and tenderly accepts the offer of my love: and my father takes it into his head to come and trouble our passion, by asking for her hand.

JACQ. He is assuredly wrong.

CLÉAN. Is he not ashamed at his age to think of marrying? Does it still become him to be in love, and should he not leave this pastime to young people?

JACQ. You are right. He is only jesting. Let me speak a few words to him. [To HARPAGON]. Well! your son is not so strange as you make him out, and he is amenable to reason. He says that he knows the respect which he owes you, that he was only carried away by momentary warmth; and that he will not refuse to submit to your pleasure, provided you will treat him better than you do, and give him someone for a wife with whom he shall have reason to be satisfied.

HARP. Ah! tell him, Master Jacques, that, if he looks at it in that way, he may expect everything of me, and that, except Mariane, I leave him free to choose whom he likes.

JACQ. Let me manage it. [To CLÉANTE]. Well! your father is not so unreasonable as you make him out; and he has shown me that it was your violence that made him angry; that he objects only to your behavior; and that he will be very much disposed to grant you what you wish, provided ⁴⁰ you shall do things gently, and show him the deference, the respect, and the submission which a son owes to his father.

CLÉAN. Ah! Master Jacques, you may assure him that if he grants me Mariane, he will always find me the most submissive of beings, and that I never shall do anything except what he wishes.

JACQ. [to HARPAGON]. That is done. He consents to what you say.

HARP. Then things will go in the best possible ⁴⁰ way.

JACQ. [to CLÉANTE]. Everything is arranged; he is satisfied with your promises!

CLÉAN. Heaven be praised!

JACQ. Gentlemen, you have but to talk the matter over: you are agreed now, and you were going to quarrel for want of understanding each other.

CLÉAN. My dear Master Jacques, I shall be obliged to you all my life.

JACQ. Do not mention it, Sir.

HARP. You have given me great pleasure, Master Jacques; and that deserves a reward. [HARPAGON fumbles in his pockets; MASTER JACQUES holds out his hand, but HARPAGON only draws out his hand kerchief.] Go now, I shall remember this, I assure you.

JACQ. I kiss your hands.

SCENE V:—HARPAGON, CLÉANTE

CLÉAN. I ask your pardon, father, for the passion which I have displayed.

HARP. Never mind.

CLÉAN. I assure you that I regret it exceedingly.

HARP. And I, I have the greatest delight in seeing you reasonable.

CLÉAN. How good of you to forget my fault so quickly!

HARP. The faults of children are easily forgotten, when they return to their duty.

CLÉAN. What! not retain any resentment for all my extravagance?

HARP. You compel me to it, by the submission and the respect to which you pledge yourself.

CLÉAN. I promise you, father, that I shall carry the recollection of your goodness to my grave with me.

HARP. And I, I promise you, that you may obtain anything from me.

CLÉAN. Ah! father, I ask for nothing more; you have given me enough by giving me Mariane.

HARP. How!

CLÉAN. I say, father, that I am too well pleased with you, and that I find everything in your kindness in giving me Mariane.

HARP. Who says anything to you of giving you Mariane?

CLÉAN. You, father.

HARP. I!

CLÉAN. Undoubtedly.

HARP. What! it is you who have promised to renounce her.

CLÉAN. I renounce her!

HARP. Yes.

CLÉAN. Not at all.

HARP. You have not given up your pretensions to her?

CLÉAN. On the contrary, I am more determined than ever upon them.

HARP. What! hang-dog, you begin afresh?

CLÉAN. Nothing can change my mind.

HARP. Let me get at you, wretch.

CLÉAN. Do what you like.

HARP. I forbid you ever to come within my sight.

CLÉAN. All right.

HARP. I abandon you.

CLÉAN. Abandon as much as you like.

HARP. I disown you as my son.

CLÉAN. Be it so.

HARP. I disinherit you.

CLÉAN. Whatever you please.

HARP. And I give you my malediction.

CLÉAN. I want none of your gifts.

SCENE VI:—CLÉANTE, LA FLÈCHE

LA FL. [coming from the garden with a casket under his arm]. Ah! Sir, I find you in the nick of time! Follow me quickly.

CLÉAN. What is the matter?

LA FL. Follow me, I tell you; we are all right.

CLÉAN. How?

LA FL. Here is your affair.

CLÉAN. What?

LA FL. I kept my eye upon this the whole day.

CLÉAN. What is it?

LA FL. Your father's treasure, which I have laid hands on.

CLÉAN. How did you manage?

LA FL. You shall know all. Let us fly; I hear his shouts.

SCENE VII:—HARPAGON, aloud, shouting in the garden, rushing in without his hat

Thieves! Thieves! Murder! Stop the murderers! Justice! just Heaven! I am lost! I am killed; they have cut my throat; they have stolen my money. Who can it be? What has become of him? Where is he? Where does he hide himself? What shall I do to find him? Where to run? Where not to run? Is he not there? Who is it? Stop! [To himself, pressing his own arm.] Give me back my money, scoundrel. . . . Ah, it is myself! My senses are wandering, and I do not know where I am, who I am, and what I am doing. Alas! my poor money! my poor money! my dearest friend, they have deprived me of you; and as you are taken from me, I have lost my support, my consolation, my joy: everything is at an end for me, and I have nothing more to do in this world. Without you, life becomes impossible. It is all over; I am utterly exhausted; I am dying; I am dead; I am buried. Is there no one who will resuscitate me by giving me back my beloved money, or by telling me who has taken it? Eh! what do you say? There is no one. Whoever he is who has done this, he must have carefully watched his hour; and he has just chosen the time when I was speaking to my wretch of a son. Let us go. I must inform the authorities, and have the whole of my household examined; female-servants, male-servants, son, daughter, and myself also. What an assembly! I do not look at anyone whom I do not suspect, and everyone seems to be my thief. Eh! what are they speaking of yonder? of him who has robbed me? What noise is that up there? Is it my thief who is there? For pity's sake, if you know any news of my thief, I implore you to tell me. Is he not hidden among you? They are all looking at me, and laughing in my face. You will see that they have, no doubt, a share in the robbery. Come quickly, magistrates, police-officers, provosts, judges, instruments of torture, gibbets, and executioners. I will have the whole world hanged; and if I do not recover my money, I will hang myself afterwards.

ACT V

SCENE I:—HARPAGON, A Magistrate

MAG. Let me manage it; I know my business, thank Heaven. Today is not the first time that I am engaged in discovering robberies; and I should like to have as many bags of a thousand francs as the number of people I have helped hang.

HARP. Every magistrate must have an interest in taking this matter in hand; and, if they do not enable me to find my money again, I shall demand justice upon the authorities themselves.

MAG. We must take all the needful steps. You said that there was in this box . . .

HARP. Ten thousand crowns in cash.

MAG. Ten thousand crowns!

HARP. [crying]. Ten thousand crowns.

MAG. The robbery is considerable!

HARP. There is no punishment great enough for the enormity of this crime; and, if it remain unpunished, the most sacred things are no longer safe.

MAG. And in what coin was this sum?

HARP. In good louis d'or and pistoles without a flaw.

MAG. Whom do you suspect of this robbery?

HARP. Everyone; and I wish you to arrest the town and the suburbs.

MAG. You must, if you will take my opinion, scare nobody, but endeavor gently to collect some proofs, in order to act afterwards, by severer process, to recover the coin which has been taken from you.

SCENE II:—HARPAGON, A Magistrate, MASTER JACQUES

JACQ. [at the far end of the stage, turning towards the door by which he entered]. I am coming back directly. Let its throat be cut immediately; let them singe me its feet; let them put it in boiling water, and let them hang it from the ceiling.

HARP. Who? he who has robbed me?

JACQ. I am speaking of a sucking pig which your steward has just sent in, and I wish to dress it for you after my own fancy.

HARP. There is no question of that; and this is a gentleman to whom you must speak of something else.

MAG. [to MASTER JACQUES]. Do not be alarmed. I am not the man to cause any scandal, and matters will be managed in a gentle way.

JACQ. Is this gentleman of the supper party?

MAG. In this case, dear friend, you must hide nothing from your master.

JACQ. Upon my word, Sir, I shall show all I know, and I shall treat you in the best possible way.

HARP. That is not the question.

JACQ. If I do not dish you up something as good as I could wish, it is the fault of your Master Steward, who has clipped my wings with the scissors of his economy.

HARP. You wretch! It concerns something else than the supper; and I wish you to give me some information respecting the money that has been stolen from me.

JACQ. They have stolen some money from you?

HARP. Yes, you scoundrel; and I shall have you hanged if you do not give it me back again.

MAG. [to HARPAGON]. Good Heavens! do not ill-use him. I perceive by his face that he is an honest man, and that, without having him locked up, he will inform you of what you wish to know. Yes, my friend, if you confess the matter to me, no harm will come to you, and you will be suitably rewarded by your master. He has been robbed of his money today; and it is scarcely possible that you do not know something of the matter.

JACQ. [aside to himself]. This is just what I wish, in order to revenge myself on our steward. Since he has set foot in this house, he is the favorite; his counsels are the only ones listened to; and the cudgel-blows, just now received, are also sticking in my throat.

HARP. What are you muttering to yourself about?

MAG. [to HARPAGON]. Leave him alone. He is preparing to give you satisfaction; and I told you that he was an honest man.

JACQ. If you wish me to tell you things as they are, Sir, I believe that it is your dear steward who has done this.

HARP. Valère!

JACQ. Yes.

HARP. He! who seemed so faithful to me?

JACQ. Himself. I believe that he is the one who robbed you.

HARP. And upon what do you base your belief?

JACQ. Upon what?

HARP. Yes.

JACQ. I believe it . . . because I believe it.

MAG. But it is necessary to mention the evidence which you have.

HARP. Have you seen him hang about the spot where I had put my money?

JACQ. Yes, indeed. Where was your money?

HARP. In the garden.

JACQ. That is just where I have seen him hanging about, in the garden. And what was this money in?

HARP. In a cash-box.

JACQ. The very thing. I have seen him with a cash-box.

HARP. And this cash-box, how is it made? I shall soon see if it be mine.

JACQ. How is it made?

HARP. Yes.

JACQ. It is made . . . It is made like a cash-box.

MAG. Of course. But just describe it a little, that I may see.

JACQ. It is a large cash-box.

HARP. The one that has been stolen from me is a small one.

JACQ. Eh! Yes, it is small, if you take it in that way; but I call it large on account of its contents.

MAG. And what color is it?

JACQ. What color?

MAG. Yes.

JACQ. It is of a color . . . of a certain color. Could you not help me to say?

HARP. Ah!

JACQ. Is it not red?

HARP. No, gray.

JACQ. Yes, that is it, grayish-red; that is what I meant.

HARP. There is no longer any doubt; it is the one assuredly. Write down, Sir, write down his deposition. Heavens! whom is one to trust henceforth! One must no longer swear to anything; and I verily believe, after this, that I am the man to 50 rob myself.

JACQ. [to HARPAGON]. He is just coming back, Sir. Do not tell him, at least, that it is I who have revealed all this.

SCENE III:—HARPAGON, Magistrate, VALÈRE, MASTER JACQUES

HARP. Come near, and confess to the blackest deed, the most horrible crime that ever was committed.

VAL. What do you wish, Sir?

HARP. How, wretch! you do not blush for your crime?

10 VAL. Of what crime are you talking?

HARP. Of what crime am I talking, infamous monster! as if you did not know what I mean! It is in vain that you attempt to disguise it; the thing has been discovered, and I have just learned all. How could you thus abuse my kindness, and introduce yourself into my house expressly to betray me, to play me a trick of that sort?

VAL. Since everything has been revealed to you, Sir, I will not prevaricate, and deny the matter to 20 you.

JACQ. [aside]. Oh! Oh! Could I unconsciously have guessed aright!

VAL. It was my intention to speak to you about it, and I wished to wait for a favorable opportunity; but, since matters are so, I implore you not to be angry, and to be willing to listen to my motives.

HARP. And what pretty motives can you advance, infamous thief?

30 VAL. Ah! Sir, I have not deserved these names. It is true that I have committed an offense against you; but after all, the fault is pardonable.

HARP. How! pardonable? A trap, a murder like that?

VAL. For pity's sake, do not get angry. When you have heard me, you will see that the harm is not so great as you make it.

HARP. The harm is not so great as I make it! What! my blood, my very heart, hang-dog!

40 VAL. Your blood, Sir, has not fallen into bad hands. I am of a rank not to do it any injury; and there is nothing in all this but what I can easily repair.

HARP. That is what I intend, and that you should restore to me what you have robbed me of.

VAL. Your honor shall be amply satisfied, Sir.

HARP. There is no question of honor in it. But tell me, who has driven you to such a deed?

VAL. Alas! need you ask me?

HARP. Yes, indeed, I do ask you.

VAL. A god who carries his excuse for all he makes people do. Love.

HARP. Love?

VAL. Yes.

HARP. A pretty love, a pretty love, upon my word! the love for my gold pieces!

VAL. No, Sir, it is not your wealth that has tempted me; it is not that which has dazzled me; and I protest that I have not the slightest design upon your property, provided you leave me that which I have got.

HARP. No, by all the devils I shall not leave it to you. But see what insolence to wish to keep that of which he has robbed me!

VAL. Do you call that robbery?

HARP. If I call it a robbery? a treasure like that!

VAL. It is a treasure, that is true, and the most precious which you have got, no doubt; but it would not be losing it to leave it to me. I ask you for it on my knees, this treasure full of charms; and to do right, you should grant it to me.

HARP. I shall do nothing of the kind. What does it all mean?

VAL. We have pledged our faith to each other, ²⁰ and have sworn never to part.

HARP. The oath is admirable, and the promise rather funny.

VAL. Yes, we have bound ourselves to be all in all to each other for ever.

HARP. I shall hinder you from it, I assure you.

VAL. Nothing but death shall separate us.

HARP. It is being devilishly enamored of my money.

VAL. I have told you already, Sir, that interest ³⁰ did not urge me to do what I have done. My heart did not act from the motives which you imagine; a nobler one inspired me with this resolution.

HARP. You shall see that it is from Christian charity that he covets my property! But I shall look to that; and the law will give me satisfaction for all this, you bare-faced rogue.

VAL. You shall act as you like, and I am ready to bear all the violence you please; but I implore you to believe, at least, that if harm has been done, ⁴⁰ I only am to be blamed, and that in all this, your daughter is in nowise culpable.

HARP. Indeed, I believe you! it would be very strange if my daughter had had a part in this crime. But I will have my property back again, and I will have you confess where you have carried it away to.

VAL. I? I have not carried it away at all. It is still in your house.

HARP. [aside]. O! my beloved cash-box! [Aloud.] ⁵⁰ Then it has not gone out of my house?

VAL. No, Sir.

HARP. Just tell me that you have not made free with it?

VAL. I make free with it! Ah! you wrong us both; and it is with a wholly pure and respectable ardor that I burn.

HARP. [aside]. Burn for my cash-box!

VAL. I would sooner die than show her any offensive thought; she is too prudent and honorable for that.

HARP. [aside]. My cash-box too honorable!

VAL. All my wishes are confined to enjoy the ¹⁰ sight of her; and nothing criminal has profaned the passion with which her beautiful eyes have inspired me.

HARP. [aside]. The beautiful eyes of my cash-box! He speaks of her as a lover speaks of his mistress.

VAL. Mistress Claude, Sir, knows the truth of this affair; and she can testify to it.

HARP. What! my servant is an accomplice in the matter?

VAL. Yes, Sir; she was a witness to our engagement; and it is after having known the honorable intent of my passion, that she has assisted me in persuading your daughter to plight her troth, and receive mine.

HARP. [aside]. He? Does the fear of justice make him rave? [To VALÈRE.] What means all this gibberish about my daughter?

VAL. I say, Sir, that I have had all the trouble in the world to bring her modesty to consent to what ³⁰ my love wished for.

HARP. The modesty of whom?

VAL. Of your daughter; and it is only yesterday that she could make up her mind to sign a mutual promise of marriage.

HARP. My daughter has signed you a promise of marriage?

VAL. Yes, Sir, as I have signed her one.

HARP. O Heaven! another disgrace!

JACQ. [to the Magistrate]. Write, Sir, write.

HARP. More harm! additional despair! [To the Magistrate.] Come, Sir, do the duty of your office, and draw up for him his indictment as a felon and a suborner.

JACQ. As a felon and a suborner.

VAL. These are names that do not belong to me; and when people shall know who I am . . .

SCENE IV:—HARPAGON, ELISE, MARIANE, VALÈRE, FROSINE, MASTER JACQUES, A Magistrate

HARP. Ah! graceless child! daughter unworthy of a father like me! it is thus that you carry out the lessons which I have given you? You allow yourself to become smitten with an infamous thief; and you pledge him your troth without my consent! But you shall both find out your mistake. [To ELISE.] Four strong walls will answer for your conduct; [to VALÈRE] and a good gibbet will give me satisfaction for your audacity.

VAL. It will not be your passion that shall judge this matter; and I shall get at least a hearing before being condemned.

HARP. I have made a mistake in saying a gibbet; you shall be broken alive on the wheel.

ELISE [at Harpagon's knees]. Ah! father, show a little more humanity in your feelings, I beseech you, and do not push matters with the utmost violence of paternal power. Do not give way to the first movements of your passion, and give yourself time to consider what you do. Take the trouble to know better him whom you believe to have offended you. He is quite different from what he appears in your eyes; and you will find it less strange that I have given myself to him, when you know that, had it not been for him, you would long ago have had me no longer. Yes, father, it is he who saved me from the great peril I was in when I fell into the water, and to whom you owe the life of that very daughter, who . . .

HARP. All that is nothing; and it would have been much better for me, had he allowed you to be drowned, than to do what he has done.

ELISE. I implore you, father, by your paternal love, to . . .

HARP. No, no; I will hear nothing, and justice must have its course.

JACQ. You shall pay me my cudgel-blows.

FROS. [aside]. What strange confusion is this!

SCENE V:—ANSELME, HARPAGON, ELISE, MARIANE, FROSINE, VALÈRE, A Magistrate, MASTER JACQUES

ANSEL. What is the matter, M. Harpagon? I find you quite upset.

HARP. Ah! M. Anselme, I am the most unfortunate of men; and there is a great deal of trouble and disorder connected with the contract which you have come to sign! I am attacked in my property, I am attacked in my honor; and behold a wretch, a scoundrel who has violated the most sacred rights; who has introduced himself into my house as a servant to rob me of my money, and to tamper with my daughter.

VAL. Who is thinking of your money, of which you make such a cock-and-bull story?

HARP. Yes, they have given each other a promise of marriage. This insult concerns you, M. Anselme, and it is you who ought to take up the cudgels against him, and employ all the rigors of the law, to revenge yourself upon him for his insolence.

ANSEL. It is not my intention to make anyone marry me by compulsion, and to lay claim to a heart which has already pledged itself; but, as far as your interests are concerned, I am ready to espouse them, as if they were my own.

HARP. This gentleman here is an honest magistrate who will forget nothing, from what he has said to me, of the duties of his office. [To the Magistrate.] Charge him, Sir, in the right fashion, and make matters very criminal.

VAL. I do not see what crime can be made out against me of the affection which I entertain for your daughter, and to what punishment you think I can be condemned on account of our engagement when it shall be known who I am. . . .

HARP. I do not care about any of these stories; in our days the world is full of these assumed noblemen; of these impostors, who take advantage of their obscurity, and with the greatest insolence adopt the first illustrious name which comes into their head.

VAL. I would have you to know that I am too upright to deck myself with anything that does not belong to me; and that all Naples can bear testimony to my birth.

ANSEL. Gently! take care what you are going to say. You run a greater risk in this than you think; you are speaking before a man to whom all Naples is known, and who can easily see through your story.

VAL. [proudly putting his hat on]. I am not the man to fear anything; and if you know Naples, you know who was Don Thomas d'Alburci.

ANSEL. No doubt, I know; and few people have known him better than I.

HARP. I do not care for Don Thomas nor Don Martin. [Seeing two candles burning, blows one out.]

ANSEL. Pray let him speak; we shall hear what he means to say about him.

VAL. I mean to say that to him I owe my birth.

ANSEL. To him?

VAL. Yes.

ANSEL. Come; you are jesting. Invent some other story which may succeed better, and do not attempt to save yourself by this imposture.

VAL. Learn to speak differently! It is not an imposture, and I advance nothing but what can be easily proved by me.

ANSEL. What! you dare call yourself the son of Don Thomas d'Alburci?

VAL. Yes, I dare; and I am prepared to maintain this truth against anyone.

ANSEL. The audacity is marvelous! Learn to your confusion, that it is sixteen years at least since the man you speak of perished at sea with his wife and children, while endeavoring to save their lives from the cruel persecutions which accompanied the troubles at Naples, and which caused the exile of several noble families.

VAL. Yes; but learn, to your confusion, you, that his son, seven years of age, with a servant, was saved from the wreck by a Spanish vessel, and that this son, who was saved, is the person who speaks to you. Learn that the captain of that ship, pitying my misfortune, conceived a friendship for me; that he had me educated as his own son, and that I was trained to the profession of arms ever since I was old enough; that I have learned lately that my father is not dead, as I always believed; that passing through here to go in search of him, an accident, arranged by Heaven, brought me into contact with the charming Elise; that the sight of her made me a slave to her beauty, and that the violence of my passion and the harshness of her father made me resolve to introduce myself into his house, and to send someone else in quest of my parents.

ANSEL. But what other proofs than your words can guarantee to us that this is not a fable based upon truth?

VAL. The Spanish captain; a ruby seal which belonged to my father; an agate bracelet which my mother had on her arm; old Pedro, the servant, who was saved with me from the wreck.

MAR. Alas! to your words I can answer, I, that you are not imposing, and all that you say shows me clearly that you are my brother.

VAL. You, my sister!

MAR. Yes. My heart was touched the moment you opened your lips; and our mother, who will be overjoyed at seeing you, has thousands of times related to me the misfortunes of our family. Heaven also permitted us not to perish in this dreadful shipwreck; but our lives were saved only at the cost of our liberty; and they were pirates that picked us up, my mother and me, on a plank of our vessel. After ten years of slavery, a happy accident regained for us our freedom; and we returned to Naples, where we found all our property sold, without being able to gather any news of our father. We then traveled to Genoa, whither my mother went to pick up some miserable remains of an inheritance of which she had been despoiled; and thence, flying from the barbarous injustice of her relatives, she came hither, where she has barely been able to drag on her life.

ANSEL. O Heaven! how great is the evidence of thy power! and how well showest thou that it belongs only to thee to perform miracles? Embrace me, my children, and share your joys with those of your father.

VAL. You are our father?

MAR. It is you whom my mother has so much bewailed.

ANSEL. Yes, my daughter; yes, my son; I am Don Thomas d'Alburci, whom Heaven saved from the waves, with all the money which he carried with him, and who, believing you all dead during more than sixteen years, prepared, after long journeying, to seek, in the union with a gentle and discreet girl, the consolation of a new family. The little safety which I found for my life in Naples has made me for ever abandon the idea of returning; and having found means to sell all that I possessed there, I became used to this place, where, under the name of Anselme, I wished to get rid of the sorrows of this other name, which caused me so many misfortunes.

HARP. [to ANSELME]. Is this your son?

ANSEL. Yes.

HARP. Then I hold you responsible for paying me ten thousand crowns of which he has robbed 30 me.

ANSEL. He has robbed you!

HARP. Himself.

VAL. Who tells you this?

HARP. Master Jacques.

VAL. [to MASTER JACQUES]. Is it you who say this?

JACQ. You see that I say nothing.

HARP. Yes. There is the Magistrate who has received his deposition.

VAL. Can you believe me capable of so base an action?

HARP. Capable or not capable, I want my money back again.

SCENE VI:—HARPAGON, ANSELME, ELISE, MARIANE, CLÉANTE, VALÈRE, FROSINE, A Magistrate, MASTER JACQUES, LA FLÈCHE

CLÉAN. Do not worry yourself any longer, father, and accuse no one. I have discovered tidings of your affair; and I have come to tell you, that if you will make up your mind to let me marry Mariane, your money shall be returned to you.

HARP. Where is it?

CLÉAN. Do not grieve about that. It is in a spot for which I answer; and everything depends upon me. It is for you to say what you resolve; and you can choose, either to give me Mariane, or to lose your cash-box.

HARP. Has nothing been taken out?

CLÉAN. Nothing at all. Now make up your mind whether you will subscribe to this marriage, and join your consent to that of her mother, who leaves her free to choose between us two.

MAR. [to CLÉANTE]. But you do not know that this consent is no longer sufficient; and that Heaven restores to me not only a brother [pointing to VALÈRE] but also [pointing to ANSELME] a father, from whom you must obtain me.

ANSEL. Heaven has not restored me to you, my children, to go contrary to your desires. M. Harpagon, you are well aware that the choice of a young girl will fall upon the son rather than upon the father; come, do not oblige people to say what it is not necessary to hear; and consent, as well as I do, to this double match.

HARP. To be well advised, I must see my cash-box.

CLÉAN. You shall see it safe and sound.

HARP. I have no money to give my children in marriage.

ANSEL. Well! I have some for them; do not let that trouble you.

HARP. Will you undertake to defray all the expenses of these two weddings?

ANSEL. Yes, I undertake it. Are you satisfied?

HARP. Yes, provided that you will order me a suit for the nuptials.

ANSEL. That is agreed. Let us go and rejoice in the happiness which this day brings us.

MAG. Hullo! gentlemen, hullo! Gently, if you please. Who is to pay for my writing?

HARP. We have nothing to do with your writings.

MAG. Yes! but I do not pretend to have written for nothing.

HARP. [pointing to MASTER JACQUES]. For your payment, there is a man of whom I make you a present; and you may hang him.

JACQ. Alas! how must one act? I get cudgel-blows for speaking the truth; and they wish to hang me for telling a lie!

ANSEL. M. Harpagon, you must forgive him this imposture.

HARP. Will you pay the magistrate, then?

ANSEL. Be it so. Come, let us go quickly to share our joy with your mother.

HARP. And I, to see my dear cash-box.

ACT I

Enter HIPPOLYTUS and THERAMENES.

HIPP. My mind is settled, dear Theramenes, And I must stay no more in lovely Træzen, Racking my soul in doubt and mortal anguish. I am ashamed of my long idleness. Look you, my father gone six months and more— One so dear gone,—and to what fate befallen 6 I do not know, nor do I know what corner

Racine, Phædra. Translated by Robert Henderson. Jean Racine, literary rival of Corneille, friend of Molière and La Fontaine, was born in 1639 and died in 1699. Previous to Phædra (Phèdre) he had written a number of tragic dramas, among them Andromache and Britannicus. Discouraged by the reception which Phædra received, Racine turned to sacred themes. Esther and Athaliah appeared in 1689 and 1691.

Of all the wide earth hides him!

HERA. Ah, my prince,—
And where, then, would you seek him? I have sailed

Over the seas on either side of Corinth. 10
Where Acheron is lost among the Shades
I asked, indeed, if aught were known of Theseus!
And to content you, I have gone to Elis,
Rounded Tœnarus, sailed to the far waters
Where Icarus once fell. What newer hope . . . ?
Under what favored sky would you think now 16
To trace his footsteps? Who knows if your father
Wishes the secret of his absence known?

Perhaps while we are trembling for his life
The hero calmly plots a fresh intrigue, 20
And only waits till the deluded lady—

HIPP. Peace, good Theramenes! Respect his name.

The waywardness of youth is his no longer,
And nothing so unworthy should detain him.
Now for a long time, Phædra has held that heart
Inconstant once, and she need fear no rival. 26
And if I seek him, it is but my duty.

I leave a place I dare no longer see!

HERA. Indeed! When, prince, did you begin to dread

These peaceful haunts, so dear to happy childhood, 30

Where I have often known you rather stay
Than face the tumult and the pomp of Athens?
What danger do you shun? Or is it grief?

HIPP. All things are changed. That happy past is gone.

Since then, the gods sent Phædra!

HERA. Now I see! 35
It is the queen whose sight offends you. Yes,—
For with a step-dame's spite she schemed your exile

At her first sight of you. But then, her hatred
Is somewhat milder, if not wholly vanished.
A dying woman—one who longs for death! 40
What danger can she bring upon your head?
Weary of life, and weary of herself,—
Sick with some ill she will not ever speak of,—
Can Phædra then lay plots?—

HIPP. I do not fear
The hatred of the queen. There is another 45
From whom I fly, and that is young Aricia,
The sole survivor of an impious race.

HERA. What! You become her persecutor, too?
The gentle sister of the cruel sons
Of Pallas, did not share their perfidy. 50
Why should you hate such charming innocence?

HIPP. If it were hate, I should not need to fly.

HERA. Then will you tell me what your flying means?

Is this the proud Hippolytus I see?
Love's fiercest foe alive?—the fiercest hater 55
Of Theseus' well-worn yoke?—Now can it be
That Venus, scorned, will justify your father?
And is Hippolytus, like other mortals,
To bow, perforce, and offer incense to her?—
And can he love? . . .

HIPP. My friend, you must not ask me.
You who have known my heart through all my life, 61

And known it to be proud and most disdainful,—
You will not ask that I should shame myself
By now disowning all that I professed.

My mother was an Amazon,—my wildness, 65
Which you think strange, I suckled at her breast,
And as I grew, why, Reason did approve
What Nature planted in me. Then you told me
The story of my father, and you know
How, often, when I listened to your voice 70
I kindled, hearing of his noble acts,—

And you would tell how he brought consolation
To mortals for the absence of Alcides,
And how he cleared the roads of monsters,—robbers,—

Procrustes, Cercyon, Sciro, Sinis slain, 75
Scattered the Epidaurian giant's bones,
And how Crete ran with blood of the Minotaur!
But when you told me of less glorious deeds,—
Troth plighted here and there and everywhere,
Young Helen stolen from her home at Sparta, 80
And Peribœa's tears in Salamis,

And many other trusting ones deceived,
Whose very names he cannot now remember,—
Lone Ariadne, crying to the rocks,—
And last of all this Phædra, bound to him 85
By better ties,—You know that with regret
I heard, and urged that you cut short the tale.

I had been happier, could I erase
This one unworthy part of his bright story
Out of my memory. Must I in turn 90
Be made love's slave, and brought to bend so low?
It is the more contemptible in me,

For no such brilliance clings about my name
As to the name of Theseus,—no monsters quelled
Have given me the right to share his weakness.
And if I must be humbled for my pride, 96
Aricia should have been the last to tame me!
Was I not mad that I should have forgotten
Those barriers which must keep us far apart
Eternally? For by my father's order 100

Her brothers' blood must never flow again
 In a child of hers. He dreads a single shoot
 From any stock so guilty, and would bury
 Their name with her; so even to the tomb
 No torch of Hymen may be lit for her. 105
 Shall I espouse her rights against my father,
 Provoke his wrath, launch on a mad career?—

THERA. But if your time has come, dear prince, the gods
 Will care but little for your guiding reason.
 Theseus would shut your eyes;—he but unseals
 them. 110

His hatred kindles you to burn, rebellious,
 And only lends his enemy new charms.
 Then, too, why should you fear a guiltless passion?
 Do you not dare this once to try its sweetness, 114
 Rather than follow such a hair-drawn scruple?—
 Afraid to stray where Hercules has wandered?—
 What heart so stout that Venus has not won it?
 And you, so long her foe, where would you be
 Had your own mother, always scorning love,
 Never been moved with tenderness for Theseus?
 What good to act a pride you do not feel? 121
 If you are changed, confess it! For some time
 You have been seldom seen urging the car
 With wild delight, rapid, along the shore,
 Or, skillful in the art that Neptune taught, 125
 Making th' unbroken steed obey the bit.
 The forest has flung back our shouts less often.
 A secret burden, cast upon your spirits,
 Has dimmed your eye.—Can I then doubt your love?

It is in vain that you conceal your hurt. 130
 Tell me, has not Aricia touched your heart?

HIPP. Theramenes, I go to find my father.

THERA. Will you not see the queen before you leave?

HIPP. So I intend. And you may tell her so.
 Yes, I will see her, since it is my duty. 135
 But what new ill vexes her dear CENONE?

Enter CENONE.

CENONE. Alas, my lord, what grief was e'er like mine?

The queen has almost touched the gates of death.
 It is in vain I watch her night and day,
 In my very arms this secret malady 140
 Is killing her—her mind is all disordered.
 She rises from her bed, weary yet restless,
 Pants for the outer air, yet she commands me
 That none should see her in her misery.
 She comes! 145

HIPP. That is enough. I shall not vex her
 Nor make her see the face of one she hates.

[Exeunt HIPPLYTUS and THERAMENES. Enter

PHÆDRA.

PHÆDRA. Yes, this is far enough. Stay here,
 CENONE.

My strength is failing. I must rest a little.
 I am dazzled with the light; it has been long 150
 Since I have seen it. Ah, and my trembling knees
 Are failing me—

CENONE. Dear Heaven, I would our tears
 Might bring relief.

PHÆDRA. And how these clumsy trinkets, 155
 These veils oppress me! Whose officious hand
 Tied up these knots, and gathered all these coils
 Over my brow? All things conspire against me
 And would distress me more!

CENONE. That which you wish 160
 This moment, frets you next! Did you not ask
 A minute past, that we should deck you out,
 Saying you felt your energy return,
 Saying you sickened of your idleness,
 And wished to go and see the light of day? 165
 You sought the sun, and now you see it here,—
 And now you would be hidden from its shining!

PHÆDRA. O splendid author of a hapless race,—
 You whom my mother boasted as her father,—
 Well may you blush to see me in such plight. 170
 For the last time I look on thee, O Sun!

CENONE. So! And are you still in love with death?

Will you not ever make your peace with life,
 And leave these cruel accents of despair?

PHÆDRA. I wish that I were seated in the forest.
 When may I follow with delighted eye, 176
 Through glorious dust, flying in full career,—
 A chariot?—

CENONE. Madam?

PHÆDRA. Have I lost my wits? 180
 What did I say? Where am I? Ah, and where Do my vain wishes wander? For the gods
 Have made me mad! And now I blush, CENONE,—
 I hide my face, for you have seen too clearly
 The grief and shame, that, quite in spite of me,
 Will overflow my eyes. 186

CENONE. If you must blush,
 Blush at the silence that inflames your grief.
 Deaf to my voice, you will not have my care.
 Then will you have no pity on yourself, 190
 But let your life be ended in mid-course?
 What evil spell has drained its fountains dry?
 Night-shadows thrice have darkened all the heavens

Since sleep came to your eyes, and now three times
The dawn has chased the darkness back again
Since your pale lips knew food. You faint, are languid,— 196

What awful purpose have you in your heart?
How do you dare attempt to lose your life
And so offend the gods who gave it you,—
And so prove false to Theseus and your marriage?— 200

Yes, and betray your most unhappy children,
Bending their necks yourself, beneath the yoke?
That day, be sure, which robs them of their mother
Will give his high hopes back to the stranger's son,—

To that proud enemy of you and yours, 205
Born of an Amazon,—Hippolytus!—

PHÆDRA. You gods!

CENONE. Ah, this is a reproach to move you!

PHÆDRA. Unhappy one, what name have your lips spoken? 209

CENONE. Your anger is most just, and it is well
That hated name can rouse such rage! Then live,
And hear again the claims of love and duty!
Live, then,—and stop this son of Scythia
From crushing down your children by his sway,
Ruling the noblest offspring of the gods,— 215
The purest blood of Greece! Never delay!
Death threatens every moment! Now restore
Your shattered strength, while the dim torch of life
Burns, and can yet be fanned into a flame.

PHÆDRA. I have endured its guilt and shame too long. 220

CENONE. Why? What remorse is gnawing at your heart?

What crime can have disturbed you so? Your hands

Have not been stained with the blood of innocence.

PHÆDRA. No, I thank Heaven my hands are free from stain,—

I would my soul were innocent as they! 225

CENONE. Why then, what awful plan have you been scheming,

At which your conscience still should be afraid?

PHÆDRA. Have I not said enough? Spare me the rest!

I die to save myself a full confession.

CENONE. Die, then,—and keep a silence more than human!— 230

But seek some other hand to close your eyes,
For I will go before you to the Shades.

There are a thousand highways always open,
And since you have so little faith in me,

I'll go the shortest! When has my love failed you?
Remember, in my arms you lay, new-born. 236
For you I left my country and my children,—
And is this payment for my service to you?

PHÆDRA. What will you gain from words that are so bitter? 239

Were I to speak, horror would freeze your blood.

CENONE. What can you say more terrible to me
Than to behold you die before my eyes?

PHÆDRA. If you should know my sin, I still should die,

But with guilt added—

CENONE. Oh, my dearest lady, 245
By all the tears that I have wept for you,
By these poor knees I clasp, now ease my mind
From doubt and torture!

PHÆDRA. As you wish. Then rise.

CENONE. I hear you. Speak. 250

PHÆDRA. Ah, how shall I begin?

CENONE. Leave off your fears,—you hurt me with distrust.

PHÆDRA. O malice of great Venus! Into what madness,

What wild distractions, did she cast my mother!

CENONE. Let them be blotted from all memory,
Buried in silence, for all times to come. 256

PHÆDRA. My sister, Ariadne, what was the love
Which brought you death, forsaken on lone shores?

CENONE. Madam, what deep pain is it prompts reproaches

Thus against all your kin—? 260

PHÆDRA. It is her will—

It is the will of Venus, and I perish,

Last and least happy of a family

Where all were wretched!

CENONE. Do you love? 265

PHÆDRA. I feel

All of its fever—

CENONE. Ah! For whom?

PHÆDRA. Now hear

The final horror. Yes, I love. My lips 270
Tremble to name him.

CENONE. Whom?

PHÆDRA. And do you know him?—

He whom I tortured long,—the Amazon's son!

CENONE. Hippolytus! Great gods! 275

PHÆDRA. Yes, you have named him.

CENONE. Blood freezes in my veins! O cursed race!

Ill-omened journey! Land of misery,

Why did we ever reach these dangerous shores?

PHÆDRA. My wound is not a new one. Scarcely had I 280

Been bound to Theseus by our marriage tie,
With peace and happiness seeming so well secured,
Until at Athens I saw my enemy.

I looked, I first turned pale, then blushed to see
him,

And all my soul was in the greatest turmoil; 285
A mist made dim my sight, and my voice faltered,
And now my blood ran cold, then burned like fire.
In all my fevered body I could feel

Venus, whose fury had pursued so many
Of my sad race. I sought to shun her torments
With fervent vows. I built a shrine for her, 291

And there, 'mid many victims did I seek
The reason I had lost; but all for nothing.
I found no remedy for pain of love!

I offered incense vainly on her altars, 295
I called upon her name, and while I called her,
I loved Hippolytus, always before me!

And when I made her altars smoke with victims,
'Twas for a god whose name I dared not utter,—
And still I fled his presence, only to find him— 300

(The worst of horrors)—in his father's features!
At last I raised revolt against myself,
And stirred my courage up to persecute
The enemy I loved. To banish him

I wore a harsh and jealous step-dame's manner,
And ceaselessly I clamored for his exile, 306
Till I had torn him from his father's arms!

I breathed once more, CENONE. In his absence
The days passed by less troubled than before—
Innocent days! I hid my bitter grief, 310

Submitted to my husband, cherished the fruits
Of our most fatal marriage,—and in vain!
Again I saw the one whom I had banished,

Brought here by my own husband, and again
The old wound bled. And now it is not love 315
Hid in my heart, but Venus in her might

Seizing her prey. Justly I fear my sin!
I hate my life, and hold my love in horror.
I die:—I would have kept my name unsullied,

Burying guilty passion in the grave; 320
But I have not been able to refuse you;
You weep and pray, and so I tell you all,

And I shall be content, if as I perish,
You do not vex me with unjust reproaches,
Nor vainly try to snatch away from death 325

The last faint sparks of life, yet lingering!

Enter PANOPE.

PANOPE. I wish that I might hide sad tidings from you,
But 'tis my duty, madam, to reveal them.

The hand of death has seized your peerless husband.

You are the last to hear it. 330

CENONE. What is this?

PANOPE. The queen begs Heaven for the safe return

Of Theseus, but she trusts, indeed, in vain—
She is deceived. Hippolytus, his son,
Has learned from vessels newly come to port 335
That Theseus is dead.

PHÆDRA. Oh, gods!

PANOPE. At Athens

Opinions are divided; some would have it
Your child should rule, and some, despite the law,
Are bold, and dare support the stranger's son, 341

While one presuming faction, it is said,
Would crown Aricia, and the house of Pallas.
I thought it well to warn you of this danger.

Hippolytus is ready, now, to start, 345
And if he chance to show himself in Athens,
The crowd, I fear, will follow in his lead.

CENONE. It is enough. The queen has heard your message,

And she will not neglect your timely warning.
[Exit PANOPE.]

Dear lady, I had almost ceased from urging 350
That you should wish to live. I thought to follow
My mistress to that tomb from which my pleading

Had failed to turn her,—but this new misfortune
Changes the aspect of affairs, and prompts us
To take fresh measures. Madam, Theseus is gone,

And you must fill his place. He leaves a son,— 356
Slave if you die, but if you live, a king!
Upon whom can he lean, but you, his mother?

There is no hand but yours to dry his tears.
Live then, for him, or else his guiltless weeping
Will move the gods to wrath against his mother.

Live, for no blame is in your passion now. 362
The king is dead, you bear the bonds no longer
Which made your love a thing of crime and horror.

You need no longer dread Hippolytus, 365
For you may see him, now, without reproach.
Perhaps, if he is certain of your hatred,

He means to lead the rebels. Undeceive him!
Soften his callous heart, and bend his pride!
King of this fertile land, his portion lies 370

Here in his Træzen, yet he knows the laws,—
They give your son these walls Minerva built,
Aye, and protects,—but if a common foe

Threatens you both, you had best be united.
For you must thwart Aricia! 375

PHÆDRA. I consent.

Yes, I will live, if life can yet be mine,—
 If my affection for a son has power
 To rouse my sinking heart, at such a dangerous hour! [Exeunt.]

ACT II

Enter ARICIA and ISMENE.

ARICIA. Hippolytus has asked to see me here?
 Hippolytus has asked to bid farewell? 381
 'Tis true, Ismene? You are not deceived?

ISMENE. This is the first result of Theseus' death,
 And you may look to see from every side
 Hearts that he kept away, now turning to you. 385
 Aricia soon shall find all Greece low-bending
 To do her homage.

ARICIA. Then it is not only
 An idle tale? Am I a slave no longer?
 Have I no enemies? 390

ISMENE. The gods, Aricia,
 Trouble your peace no more, for Theseus' soul
 Is with your brothers, now.

ARICIA. Does rumor tell
 How Theseus died? 395

ISMENE. Tales most incredible
 Are spread. Some say, that, seizing a new bride,
 The faithless man was swallowed by the waves.
 Others have said, and this report prevails,
 That he, together with Pirithous, 400
 Went to the world below, seeking the shores
 Of Cocytus, showing his living self
 To the pale ghosts, but could not leave the gloom,
 For they who enter there abide forever.

ARICIA. Can I believe a mortal may descend
 Into that gulf before his destined hour? 406
 What lure could ever overcome its terrors?

ISMENE. Nay, he is dead; 'tis only you who doubt it.

The men of Athens all bewail his loss.
 Træzen already hails Hippolytus, 410
 And Phædra, fearing for her children's rights,
 Asks counsel of such friends as share her troubles,
 Here in this palace!

ARICIA. Will Hippolytus
 Prove kinder than his father, make my chains light, 415

And pity my misfortunes?

ISMENE. Yes, I think so.

ARICIA. Indeed, I think you do not know him well,

Or you would not believe a heart so hard
 Could ever pity, or could look on me 420
 As one not sharing in the scorn he feels

For all our sex. Does he not still avoid Whatever place we go?

ISMENE. I know the stories
 Of proud Hippolytus, but I have seen him 425
 When he was near to you, and watched to see
 How one supposed so cold would bear himself.
 I found his manners not at all like those
 Which I had looked to see, for in his face
 Was great confusion, at your slightest glance. 430
 He could not turn his languid eyes away,
 But still looked back again to gaze at you.
 Love is a word that may offend his pride,
 But though the tongue deny it, looks betray!

ARICIA. How eagerly my heart hears what you say, 435

Though it may be delusion, dear Ismene!
 Did it seem possible to you, who know me,
 That I, poor toy of unrelenting fate,
 Fed upon bitter tears by night and day,
 Could ever taste the maddening draught of love?
 I am the last frail offspring of my race— 441
 My royal race, the Children of the Earth,
 And of them, I alone survive war's fury.
 Yes, I have lost six brothers, in their youth,—
 Mown by the sword, cut off in their first flower!
 They were the hope of an illustrious house. 446
 Earth drank their blood with sorrow; it was kin
 To his whom she brought forth. And well you know,

Since then, no heart in Greece could sigh for me,
 Lest, by a sister's flame, her brothers' ashes 450
 Might chance to blaze again. And, too, you know
 How I disdained the cautions of my captor,
 His care, and his suspicion, and you know
 How often I have thanked the king's injustice,
 Since I had never loved the thought of love. 455
 He happily confirmed my inclinations,—
 But then, I never yet had seen his son!
 It is not merely that my eye is caught,
 And that I love him for his grace and beauty,— Charms which he does not know, or seems to scorn,— 460

I love him for a kind of wealth that's rarer.
 He has his father's virtues, not his faults.
 I love, and I must grant it, that high pride
 Which never stooped beneath the yoke of love.
 Phædra gains little glory from a lover 465
 Free of his sighs; I am too proud, I think,
 To share devotion with a thousand others,
 Or enter in a door that's never shut.
 But to make one who never stooped before 469
 Bend his proud neck,—to pierce a heart of stone,
 And bind one captive, whom his chains astonish,

Who struggles vainly in his pleasant bonds,—
That takes my fancy, and I long for it.
The god of strength was easier disarmed
Than this Hippolytus, for Hercules 475
Yielded so often to the eyes of beauty
That he made triumph cheap. But, dear Ismene,
I take too little heed of a resistance
Which I may never quell. If I am humbled,
And if I find defeat, then you will hear me 480
Speak ill of that same pride I so admire!
What! can he love? And have I been so happy
That I have bent—?

ISMENE. He comes,—and you shall hear him.

Enter HIPPOLYTUS.

HIPP. Lady, before you go, it is my duty 485
To tell you of the changes of your fortune.
What I have feared is true; my sire is dead.
Yes, his long stay was what I had supposed it.
For only death, which came to end his labors, 489
Could keep him hidden from the world so long.
The gods at last have doomed Alcides' friend—
His friend, and his successor. Since your hatred
I think will grant his virtues, it can hear
Some praise for him, without resenting it,
Knowing that it is due. I have one hope 495
To soothe me in my sorrow. I can free you.
Now I revoke the laws, whose strictness moved me
To pity for you; you are your own mistress
Of heart and hand. Here in my heritage,
In Træzen, here where Pitheus once reigned, 500
And where I now am king, by my own right,
I leave you free, free as myself,—and more.

ARICIA. Your kindness is too great; it overcomes me.

A goodness which will pay disgrace with honor
Can give a greater force than you would think 505
To the harsh laws from which you would release me.

HIPP. Athens, not knowing how to fill the throne
Left empty, speaks of you, and then of me,
And then of Phædra's son.

ARICIA. Of me, my lord?

HIPP. I know that by the law it is not mine,
For Greece reproaches me my foreign mother. 511
But if my brother were my only rival,
My rights are clearly truer ones than his,
So that I should not care for twists of the law.
There is a juster claim to check my boldness. 515
I yield my place to you, or rather, grant
That you should have it,—you should hold the scepter,

Bequeathed to you from Earth's great son, Erech-theus.

It came, then, to Ægeus, and the city 520
Which was protected and increased by him
Was glad to welcome such a king as Theseus,
Leaving your luckless brothers out of mind.
Now Athens calls you back within her walls.
Long strife has cost her groans enough already,
Her fields are glutted with your kinsmen's blood,
Fattening those same furrows whence it sprang.
I will rule here in Træzen; Phædra's son 527
Has his rich kingdom waiting him in Crete.
Athens is yours, and I will do my best
To bring to you the votes which are divided 530
Between us two.

ARICIA. I fear a dream deceives me.
For I am stunned, my lord, at what I hear.
Am I, indeed, awake? Can I believe
Such generosity as this? What god
Has put it in your heart? Well you deserve 535
That fame you have, yet it falls short of you.
For me, you will be traitor to yourself!
Was it not grace enough never to hate me,
To have been free so long from enmity,
Which some have harbored—

HIPP. Hate you? I to hate you?
However darkly you have seen my pride, 541
Did you suppose a monster gave me birth?
What savagery, what hatred, full of venom
Would not become less evil, seeing you?

Could I resist this charm which caught my soul—
ARICIA. Why, what is this, sir? 546

HIPP. I have said too much
Not to say more. No prudence can resist
The violence of passion. Now, at last,
Silence is broken. I must tell you now 550
The secret that my heart can hold no longer.
You see before you an unhappy victim
Of hasty pride,—a prince who begs compassion.
For I was long the enemy of love.

I mocked his fetters, I despised his captives, 555
And while I pitied these poor, shipwrecked mortals,

I watched the storms, and seemed quite safe on land.

And now I find that I have such a fate,
And must be tossed upon a sea of troubles!
My boldness is defeated in a moment, 560
And all my boasted pride is humbleness.
For nearly six months past, ashamed, despairing,
Carrying with me always that sharp arrow
Which tears my heart, I struggle quite in vain
To free me, both from you and from myself. 565

I leave your presence;—leaving, I find you near,
 And in the forest's darkness see your form.
 Black night, no less than daylight brings the vision
 Of charms that I avoid. All things conspire
 To make Hippolytus your slave. The fruit 570
 Of all my sighs is only that I cannot Find my own self again. My bow, my spear,
 Please me no longer. I have quite forgotten
 My chariot, and the teaching of the Sea God.
 The woods can only echo back my groans, 575
 Instead of flinging back those joyous shouts
 With which I urged my horses. Hearing this,
 A tale of passion so uncouth, you blush
 At your own handiwork. These are wild words
 With which I offer you my heart, a captive 580
 Held, strangely, by a silken jess. And yet
 The offering should be dearer to your eyes,
 Since such words come as strangers to my lips.
 Nor do not scorn my vows, so poorly spoken 584
 Since, but for you, they never had been formed.

Enter THERAMENES.

THERA. My lord, I came to tell you of the queen.
 She comes to seek you.

HIPP. Me?

THERA. And what she wishes
 I do not know. I speak at her request, 590
 For she would talk with you before you go.

HIPP. What shall I say to her? Can she expect—?

ARICIA. You cannot, noble prince, refuse to hear
 her,
 Though you are sure she is your enemy.
 There is a shade of pity due her tears. 595

HIPP. Shall we part so? And will you let me leave you

Not knowing if I have offended you,—
 The goddess I adore,—with all this boldness?
 Or if this heart, which I now leave with you—

ARICIA. Go now, my prince, and do whatever deeds 600

Your generosity would have you do.
 Make Athens own my scepter. All these gifts
 I will accept. But the high throne of Empire
 Is not the thing most precious to my eyes!

[Exeunt ARICIA and ISMENE.]

HIPP. Friend, are we ready?—But the queen is coming. 605

See that the ship is trimmed and fit to sail.
 Hurry, gather the crew, and hoist the signal,
 And then return, the sooner to release me
 From a most irksome meeting.

[Exit THERAMENES. Enter PHÆDRA and CENONE.]

PHÆDRA [to CENONE]. Look, I see him! 610
 My blood forgets to flow,—tongue will not speak
 What I have come to say!

CENONE. Think of your son.

And think that all his hopes depend on you.

PHÆDRA. They tell me that you leave us, hastily.
 I come to add my own tears to your sorrow, 616
 And I would plead my fears for my young son.
 He has no father, now; 'twill not be long
 Until the day that he will see my death,
 And even now, his youth is much imperiled 620
 By a thousand foes. You only can defend him.
 And in my inmost heart, remorse is stirring,—
 Yes, and fear, too, lest I have shut your ears
 Against his cries; I fear that your just anger
 May, before long, visit on him that hatred 625
 His mother earned.

HIPP. Madam, you need not fear.
 Such malice is not mine.

PHÆDRA. I should not blame you
 If you should hate me; I have injured you. 630
 So much you know;—you could not read my heart.

Yes, I have tried to be your enemy,
 For the same land could never hold us both.
 In private and abroad I have declared it;—
 I was your enemy! I found no peace 635
 Till seas had parted us; and I forbade
 Even your name to be pronounced to me.
 And yet, if punishment be meted out
 Justly, by the offense;—if only hatred
 Deserves a hate, then never was there woman 640
 Deserved more pity, and less enmity.

HIPP. A mother who is jealous for her children
 Will seldom love the children of a mother
 Who came before her. Torments of suspicion
 Will often follow on a second marriage. 645
 Another would have felt that jealousy
 No less than you; perhaps more violently.

PHÆDRA. Ah, prince, but Heaven made me quite exempt

From what is usual, and I can call
 That Heaven as my witness! 'Tis not this— 650
 No, quite another ill devours my heart!

HIPP. This is no time for self-reproaching, madam.

Perhaps your husband still beholds the light,
 Perhaps he may be granted safe return
 In answer to our prayers; his guarding god 655
 Is Neptune, whom he never called in vain.

PHÆDRA. He who has seen the mansions of the dead
 Returns not thence. Since Theseus has gone

Once to those gloomy, dreary shades, we need not hope,
 For Heaven will not send him back again. 660
 Prince, there is no release from Acheron;—
 It is a greedy maw,—and yet I think
 He lives and breathes in you,—and still I see him
 Before me here; I seem to speak to him—
 My heart—! Oh, I am mad! Do what I will, 665
 I cannot hide my passion.

HIPP. Yes, I see
 What strange things love will do, for Theseus,
 dead,

Seems present to your eyes, and in your soul
 A constant flame is burning. 670

PHÆDRA. Ah, for Theseus
 I languish and I long, but not, indeed,
 As the Shades have seen him, as the fickle lover
 Of a thousand forms, the one who fain would ravish

The bride of Pluto;—but one faithful, proud, 675
 Even to slight disdain,—the charm of youth
 That draws all hearts, even as the gods are painted,—

Or as yourself. He had your eyes, your manner,—
 He spoke like you, and he could blush like you,
 And when he came across the waves to Crete, 680
 My childhood home, worthy to win the love
 Of Minos' daughters,—what were you doing then?

Why did my father gather all these men,
 The flower of Greece, and leave Hippolytus? 684
 Oh, why were you too young to have embarked
 On board the ship that brought your father there?
 The monster would have perished at your hands,
 Despite the windings of his vast retreat.

My sister would have armed you with the clue 689
 To guide your steps, doubtful within the maze.—
 But no—for Phædra would have come before her,
 And love would first have given me the thought,
 And I it would have been, whose timely aid
 Had taught you all the labyrinthine ways!
 The care that such a dear life would have cost me!
 No thread could satisfy my lover's fears. 696

I would have wished to lead the way myself,
 And share the peril you were sure to face.
 Yes, Phædra would have walked the maze with you,—

With you come out in safety, or have perished!

HIPP. Gods! What is this I hear? Have you forgotten 701

That Theseus is my father and your husband?

PHÆDRA. Why should you fancy I have lost remembrance

And that I am regardless of my honor?

HIPP. Forgive me, madam! With a blush I own

That I mistook your words, quite innocent. 706
 For very shame I cannot see you longer—
 Now I will go—

PHÆDRA. Ah, prince, you understood me,—
 Too well, indeed! For I had said enough. 710
 You could not well mistake. But do not think
 That in those moments when I love you most
 I do not feel my guilt. No easy yielding
 Has helped the poison that infects my mind.

The sorry object of divine revenge, 715
 I am not half so hateful to your sight
 As to myself. The gods will bear me witness,—

They who have lit this fire within my veins,—
 The gods who take their barbarous delight
 In leading some poor mortal heart astray! 720

Nay, do you not remember, in the past,
 How I was not content to fly?—I drove you
 Out of the land, so that I might appear
 Most odious—and to resist you better

I tried to make you hate me—and in vain! 725
 You hated more, and I loved not the less,
 While your misfortunes lent you newer charms.

I have been drowned in tears and scorched by fire!
 Your own eyes might convince you of the truth
 If you could look at me, but for a moment! 730

What do I say? You think this vile confession
 That I have made, is what I meant to say?

I did not dare betray my son. For him
 I feared,—and came to beg you not to hate him.

This was the purpose of a heart too full 735
 Of love for you to speak of aught besides.

Take your revenge, and punish me my passion!
 Prove yourself worthy of your valiant father,
 And rid the world of an offensive monster!

Does Theseus' widow dare to love his son? 740
 Monster indeed! Nay, let her not escape you!

Here is my heart! Here is the place to strike!
 It is most eager to absolve itself!

It leaps impatiently to meet your blow!—
 Strike deep! Or if, indeed, you find it shameful
 To drench your hand in such polluted blood,—

If that be punishment too mild for you,— 747
 Too easy for your hate,—if not your arm,
 Then lend your sword to me.—Come! Give it now!—

CENONE. What would you do, my lady? Oh, just gods! 750

But someone comes;—go quickly. Run from shame.

You cannot fly, if they should find you thus.

[Exit PHÆDRA and CENONE. Enter THE-

RAMENES.

Thera. Is that the form of Phædra that I see
Go hurrying? What are these signs of sorrow?
Where is your sword? Why are you pale and shaken? 755

Hipp. Friend, let us fly. Indeed, I am confused
With greatest horror and astonishment.
Phædra—but no; gods, let this dreadful secret
Remain forever buried and unknown.

Thera. The ship is ready if you wish to sail,
But Athens has already cast her vote. 761
Their leaders have consulted all the tribes.
Your brother is elected;—Phædra wins!

Hipp. Phædra?

Thera. A herald bringing a commission 765
Has come from Athens, placing the reins of power
In Phædra's hands. Her son is king.—

Hipp. O gods,—
O ye who know her, is it thus, indeed,
That ye reward her virtue? 770

Thera. Meanwhile rumor
Is whispering that Theseus is not dead,—
That there are those who saw him in Epirus,—
But I have searched, and I know all too well—

Hipp. No matter. Let no chances be neglected.
This rumor must be hunted to its source, 776
And if it be not worthy of belief
Let us then sail, and at whatever cost,
We'll trust the scepter to deserving hands.

[Exeunt.]

ACT III

Enter PHÆDRA and CENONE.

Phædra. Ah, let them take away the worthless honors 780
They bring to me;—why urge that I should see
them?

What flattery can soothe my wounded heart?
Far rather hide me. I have said too much.
My madness bursting like a stream in flood, 784
I spoke what never should have reached his ears.
Oh, gods! The way he heard me! How reluctant
To take my meaning,—dull and cold as marble,
And only eager for a quick retreat!
And how his blushes made my shame the deeper!
Why did you turn me from the death I sought? 790
Ah, when his sword was pointed at my breast,
Did he grow pale?—or try to snatch it from me?
That I had touched it was enough for him
To make it seem forever horrible,
And to defile whatever hand should hold it. 795

Cenone. When you will brood upon your bitter grief,

You only fan a fire that must be quenched.
Would it not more become the blood of Minos
To find you peace in cares that are more noble?—
And in defiance of this wretch, who flies 800
From what he hates, reign on the throne you're offered?

Phædra. I reign?—And shall I hold the rod of empire,
When reason can no longer reign in me?
When I have lost control of mine own senses?
When I do gasp beneath a shameful yoke? 805
When I am dying?—

Cenone. Fly!

Phædra. I cannot leave him.

Cenone. You dare not fly from one you dared to banish?

Phædra. That time is past. He knows how I am frenzied, 810

For I have overstepped my modesty,
And blazoned out my shame before his eyes.
Against my will, hope crept into my heart.
Did you not call my failing powers to me?
Was it not you, yourself, called back my soul 815
Which fluttered on my lips, and with your counsel Lent me new life? Who told me I might love
him?

Cenone. Blame me or blame me not for your misfortunes,—

What could I not have done if it would save you?
But if your anger ever was aroused 820
By insult, can you pardon him his scorn?
How cruel were his eyes, severe and fixed,
Surveying you, half prostrate at his feet!
How hateful, then, his savage pride appeared!
Why did not Phædra see as I saw then? 825

Phædra. This pride that you detest may yield to time.

The rudeness of the forest clings about him,
For he was bred there by the strictest laws.
Love is a word he never knew before.
Perhaps it was surprise that stunned him so;—
There was much vehemence in all I said. 831

Cenone. Remember that his mother was barbaric—

Phædra. She was a Scythian, but she learned to love.

Cenone. He has a bitter hate for all our sex.

Phædra. Well, then no rival ever rules his heart.
Your counsel comes a little late, Cenone. 836
Now you must serve my madness, not my reason.
Love cannot find a way into his heart,
So let us take him where he has more feeling. 839
The lure of power seemed somewhat to touch him.

He could not hide that he was drawn to Athens,—
 His vessels' prows were pointed there already,
 With sails all set to run before the breeze.
 Go, and on my behalf, touch his ambition,—
 Dazzle his eyes with prospects of the crown. 845
 The sacred diadem shall grace his brow,—
 My highest honor is to set it there,
 And he shall have the power I cannot keep.
 He'll teach my son how men are ruled.—It may be
 That he will deign to be a father to him. 850
 He shall control both son and mother;—try him,—
 Try every means to move him, for your words
 Should meet more favor than my own could find.
 Urge him with groans and tears,—say Phædra's dying,
 Nor blush to speak in pleading terms with him.
 My last hope is in you,—do what you will, 856
 I'll sanction it,—the issue is my fate!

[Exit CENONE.

PHÆDRA [alone]. Venus implacable, thou seest me shamed,
 And I am sore confounded. Have I not
 Been humbled yet enough? Can cruelty 860
 Stretch farther still? Thine arrows have struck home!
 It is thy victory! Wouldst gain new triumphs?—
 Then seek an enemy more obdurate,—
 Hippolytus neglects thee, braves thine anger.
 He never bows his knee before thine altars. 865
 Thy name offends his proud, disdainful hearing.
 Our interests are alike,—avenge thyself,
 Force him to love— But what is this, CEnone?
 Already back? Then it must be he hates me,
 And will not hear you speak— 870

Enter CENONE.

CENONE. Yes, you must stifle
 A love that's vain, and best call back your virtue.
 The king we thought was dead will soon appear
 Here to your eyes. Yes, Theseus will be here,
 For he has come again. The eager people 875
 Are hastening to see him. I had gone
 As you commanded, seeking for the prince,
 When all the air was torn,—a thousand shouts—

PHÆDRA. My husband living! 'Tis enough,
 CEnone.

I owned a passion that dishonors him. 880
 He is alive. I wish to know no more.

CENONE. What is it?

PHÆDRA. What I prophesied to you,—
 What you refused to hear, while with your weeping
 You overcame repentance. Had I died 885

I had deserved some pity, earlier.
 I took your counsel, and I die dishonored.

CENONE. You die?

PHÆDRA. Just Heavens! What I have done today!
 My husband comes, and with him comes his son,
 And I shall see the witness of my passion, 891
 The object of my most adulterous flame
 Watch with what face I make his father welcome,
 Knowing my heart is big with sighs he scorned,
 And my eyes wet with tears that could not move
 him. 895

Will his respect for Theseus make him hide it?—
 Conceal my madness?—not disgrace his father?
 And do you think he can repress the horror
 Which he must have for me? A fruitless silence!
 I know my treason, and I lack the boldness 900
 Of those abandoned women, who can feel
 Tranquillity in crime,—can show a forehead
 All unashamed. I know my madness well,
 Recall it all. I think that these high roofs
 And all these walls can speak. They will accuse
 me. 905

They only wait until my husband comes,
 And then they will reveal my perfidy.
 'Tis death alone can take away this horror.
 Is it so great an ill to cease to live?
 Death holds no fear for those in misery. 910
 I tremble only for the name I leave,—
 My son's sad heritage. The blood of Jove
 Might justly swell the pride of those who boast it,
 But what a heavy weight a mother's guilt
 Leaves for her children! Yes, I dread that scorn
 For my disgrace, which will be cast on them 916
 With too much truth. I tremble when I think
 How they will never dare to raise their heads,
 Crushed with that curse.—

CENONE. Nay, do not doubt my pity. 920
 There never was a juster fear than yours.
 Then why do you expose them to this shame?
 And why must you accuse yourself, destroying
 The one hope left. It will be said of Phædra
 That she well knows of her own perfidy, 925
 That she has fled from out her husband's sight,—
 And proud Hippolytus may well rejoice
 That, dying, you should lend his tale belief.
 What answer can I make him? It will be
 For him, a story easy to deny, 930
 And I shall hear him, while triumphantly
 He tells your shame to every open ear.
 Why, I had sooner Heaven's fire consumed me!
 Deceive me not! And do you love him still? 934
 What think you now of this contemptuous prince?

PHÆDRA. As of a monster fearful to mine eyes!

CENONE. Why do you give him easy victory?
 You are afraid! Dare to accuse him first!
 Say he is guilty of the charge he brings
 This day against you. Who shall say it's false? 940
 All things conspire against him. In your hands
 His sword, which he most happily forgot,—
 Your present trouble, and your past distress,—
 Your warnings to his father,—and his exile
 Which you accomplished with your earnest prayers— 945

PHÆDRA. So! You would have me slander innocence!

CENONE. My zeal asks nothing from you but your silence.

I also tremble. I am loath to do it.
 I'd face a thousand deaths more willingly.
 But since, without this bitter deed, I lose you, 950
 And since, for me, your life outweighs all else,
 Why, I will speak. Theseus, however angry,
 Will do no worse than banish him again.
 A father, punishing, remains a father.
 His anger will be soothed with easy penance. 955
 But even if some guiltless blood be spilt,
 Is not your honor of a greater worth,—
 A treasure far too precious to be risked?
 You must submit, no matter what is needful,
 For when your reputation is at stake, 960
 Then you must sacrifice your very conscience.
 But someone comes. 'Tis Theseus—

PHÆDRA. Look, I see
 Hippolytus most stern, and in his eyes
 There is my ruin written. I am helpless. 965
 My fate is yours. Do with it as you will.

Enter THESEUS, HIPPOLYTUS and THERAMENES.

THESEUS. Fortune will fight no longer with my wishes,

But to your arms it brings me back—

PHÆDRA. Wait, Theseus.
 Nay, do not hurry to profane caresses 970
 One time so sweet, which I am now not worthy
 Even to taste of, for you have been wronged.
 Fortune has proved most spiteful. In your absence
 It has not spared your wife. I am not fit
 To meet you tenderly, and from this time 975
 I only care how I shall bear my shame.

[Exeunt PHÆDRA and CENONE.]

THESEUS. Strange welcome for your father, is it not?

What does it mean, my son?

HIPP. Why, only Phædra
 Can solve that mystery. If I can move you 980
 By any wish, then let me never see her.

Hippolytus begs leave to disappear,—
 To leave the home that holds your wife, forever.

THESEUS. You, my son! Leave me?

HIPP. 'Twas not I who sought her. 985
 You were the one to lead her to these shores!
 My lord, at your departure you thought fit
 To leave Aricia and the queen in Træzen,
 And I, myself, was charged with their protection.
 But now, what cares will need to keep me here?
 My idle youth has shown what skill it has 991
 Over such petty foes as roam the woods.
 May I not leave this life of little glory,—
 Of ease—and dip my spear in nobler blood?
 Before you reached my age, more than one tyrant,
 More than one monster had already felt 996
 The force of your good arm. You had succeeded
 In whipping insolence; you had removed
 All of the dangers lurking on our coasts.
 The traveler no longer feared for outrage, 1000
 And Hercules, himself, who knew your deeds,
 Relied on you, and rested from his labors.
 But I—the son of such a noble father,—
 I am unknown, and I am far behind
 Even my mother's footsteps. Let my courage 1005
 Have scope to act. If there is yet some monster
 Escaped from you, then let me seek for glory,
 Bringing the spoils to you; or let it be
 That memory of death well met with courage
 Shall keep my name a living one,—shall prove
 To all the world I am my father's son. 1011

THESEUS. Why, what is this? What terror can have seized you?

What makes my kindred fly before my face?
 If I return to find myself so feared,
 To find so little welcome in my home, 1015
 Then why did Heaven free me from my prison?
 My only friend, misled by his own passion
 Set out to rob the tyrant of Epirus,—
 To rob him of his wife! Regretfully
 I gave the lover aid. Fate blinded us,— 1020
 Myself as well as him. The tyrant seized me, Defenseless and unarmed. With tears I saw
 Pirithous cast forth to be devoured
 By savage beasts, that lapped the blood of men.
 He shut me in a gloomy cave, far down, 1025
 Deep in the earth, near to the realm of Pluto.
 I lay six months, before the gods had pity,
 Then I escaped the eyes that guarded me.
 I purged the world of this, its enemy,
 And he, himself has fed his monsters' hunger.
 But when I come, with an expectant joy, 1031
 When I draw close to all that is most precious
 Of what the gods have left me,—when my soul

Looks for its happiness in these dear places,
 Then I am welcome only with a shudder, 1035
 With turning from me, and with hasty flight.
 And since it seems that I inspire such terror,
 Would I were still imprisoned in Epirus!
 Phædra complains that I have suffered outrage.
 Who has betrayed me? Speak! Was I avenged?
 Why was I not? Has Greece, to whom mine arm 1041
 Has often brought good help, sheltered my foe?
 You do not answer. Is it that my son,—
 My own son—has he joined mine enemies?
 I'll enter, for I cannot bear to wonder. 1045
 I'll learn at once the culprit and the crime,
 And Phædra must explain her trouble to me.

[Exit.

HIPP. What mean these words? They freeze my very blood!
 Will Phædra, in her frenzy, blame herself,—
 Make sure of her destruction? And the king,—
 What will he say? O gods! The fatal poison 1051 That love has spread through all my father's house!

I burn with fires his hatred disapproves.
 How changed he finds me from the son he knew!
 My mind is much alarmed with dark forebodings,
 But surely innocence need never fear. 1056
 Come, let us go, and in some other place
 Consider how I best may move my father
 To make him tender, and to tell a love 1059
 Troubled, but never vanquished, by his frown.

[Exeunt.

ACT IV

Enter THESEUS AND CENONE.

THESEUS. Ah, what is this I hear? Presumptuous traitor!
 And would he have disgraced his father's honor?
 With what relentless footsteps Fate pursues me!
 I know not where I go, nor where I am!
 My kindest love, how very ill repaid! 1065
 Bold scheme! Oh, most abominable thought!
 A wretch who did not shrink from violence
 To reach the object of his evil passion!
 I know this sword,—it served to arm his fury,—
 The sword I gave him for a nobler use! 1070
 And could the sacred ties of blood not stop him?
 And Phædra,—was she loath to have him punished?
 She held her silence. Was it to spare his guilt?
 CENONE. Only to spare a most unhappy father.
 She knew it shameful that her eyes had kindled

So infamous a love,—had prompted him 1076
 To such a crime,—and Phædra would have died.
 I saw her raise her arm, and ran to save her.
 To me alone you owe it that she lives.
 And since I pity her, and pity you 1080
 I came, unwilling, to explain her tears.

THESEUS. The traitor! Well indeed might he turn pale!

It was for fear he trembled when he saw me!
 I was amazed that he should show no gladness.
 The coldness of his greeting chilled my love. 1085
 But was this guilty passion that consumes him
 Declared before I banished him from Athens?

CENONE. Remember, sire, how Phædra urged it on you.

It was illicit love that caused her hatred.

THESEUS. And then this flame burst out again at Træzen? 1090

CENONE. Sire, I have told you all there is. The queen

Is left to bear her grief alone too long.

Let me now leave you. I will wait on her.

[Exit. Enter HIPPOLYTUS.

THESEUS. Ah, there he is! Great gods! That noble manner

Might well deceive an eye less fond than mine!
 Why should the sacred mark of virtue shine 1096
 Bright on the forehead of an evil wretch?
 Why should the blackness of a traitor's heart
 Not show itself by sure and certain signs?

HIPP. My father, may I ask what fatal cloud
 Has troubled so the face of majesty? 1101
 Dare you not trust this secret to your son?

THESEUS. Traitor, how dare you show yourself before me?

Monster, whom Heaven's bolts have spared too long!

A last survivor of that robber band 1105
 Whereof I cleansed the earth, your brutal lust
 Scorned to respect even my marriage bed!
 And now you dare,—my hated foe,—to come Here to my presence, here where all things are filled

And foul with infamy, instead of seeking 1110
 Some unknown land, that never heard my name.
 Fly, traitor, fly! Stay not to tempt my wrath!
 I scarce restrain it. Do not brave my hatred.

I have been shamed forever; 'tis enough
 To be the father of so vile a son, 1115
 Without your death, to stain indelibly
 The splendid record of my noble deeds.
 Fly! And unless you yearn for punishment
 To make you yet another villain slain,

Take heed that this sun, shining on us now 1120
 Shall see your foot no more upon this soil.
 I say it once again,—fly!—and in haste!
 Rid all my realms of your detested person.
 On thee,—on thee, great Neptune, do I call!
 If once I cleared thy shores of murderers, 1125
 Remember, then, thy promise to reward me
 For these good deeds, by granting my first prayer.
 I was held long in close captivity.
 I did not then demand thy mighty aid,
 For I have saved so great a privilege 1130
 To use in greatest need. That time is come.
 And now I ask,—avenge a wretched father!
 I leave this traitor subject to thy wrath.
 I ask that thou shouldst quench his fires in blood,
 And by thy fury, I will judge thy favor! 1135

HIPP. Phædra accuses me of wanton passion!
 A final horror to confuse my soul!
 Such blows, unlooked for, falling all at once,
 Have crushed me, choked me, struck me into silence!

THESEUS. Traitor, you thought that in a timid silence 1140

Phædra would cover your brutality.
 But, though you fled, you still should not have left
 her
 Holding the sword that seals your condemnation.
 Or rather, to complete your perfidy,
 You should have robbed her both of speech and life! 1145

HIPP. Most justly angered at so black a lie,
 I might be pardoned, should I speak the truth.
 But it concerns your honor to conceal it.
 Welcome that reverence which stops my tongue,
 And, without seeking to increase your troubles,
 Look closely at my life, as it has been. 1151
 Great crimes come never singly; they are linked
 To sins that went before. Who once has sinned,
 May, at the last, do greater violence
 To all that men hold sacred. Vice, like virtue, 1155
 Grows in small steps, and no true innocence
 Can ever fall at once to deepest guilt.
 No man of virtue, in a single day,
 Can turn himself to treason, murder, incest!
 I am the son of one both chaste and brave. 1160
 I have not proved unworthy of my birth.
 Pittheus, one by all men reckoned wise,
 Deigned to instruct me, when I left her keeping.
 I do not wish to boast upon my merits,
 But if I may lay claim to any virtue, 1165
 I think I have displayed, beyond all else,
 That I abhor those sins with which you charge me.
 Look you, Hippolytus is known in Greece

As one so continent he's thought austere,
 And all men know how I abstain, unbending.
 The daylight is not purer than my heart. 1171
 Then how could I, if burning so profanely,—

THESEUS. Villain, it is that very pride condemns
 you!

I see the hateful reason for your coldness,
 For only Phædra charmed your shameless eyes.
 Your heart, quite cold to other witcheries, 1176
 Refused the pure flame of a lawful love.

HIPP. No, father, I have hidden it too long.
 This heart has not disdained its sacred flame.
 Here, at your feet, I'll tell my real offense. 1180
 I love, and love, indeed, where you forbid it.
 My heart's devotion binds me to Aricia,—
 The child of Pallas has subdued your son!
 Her I adore, rebellious to your laws.

For her alone I breathe my ardent sighs. 1185

THESEUS. You love her? Gods! But no,—I see the truth.

You play this crime to justify yourself.

HIPP. Sir, for six months I kept me from her presence,

And still I love her. I have come to tell it,— 1189
 Trembling I come—! Can nothing free your mind
 Of such an error? Can my oaths not soothe you?
 By Heaven—Earth,—by all the powers of Nature—

THESEUS. The wicked will not ever shrink from lying.

Be still, and spare me tiresome vows and pleadings,
 Since your false virtue knows no other way. 1195

HIPP. Although you think it false and insincere, Phædra has cause enough to know it true.

THESEUS. Ah, how your boldness rouses all my anger!

HIPP. What is my term and place of banishment? 1199

THESEUS. Were you beyond the Pillars of Alcides,
 Your perjured presence still were far too near me!

HIPP. What friends will pity me, if you forsake
 me

And think me guilty of so vile a crime?

THESEUS. Go seek for friends who praise adultery,

And look for those who clap their hands at incest!—

Low traitors, lawless,—steeped in infamy,— 1206
 Fit comforters for such an one as you!

HIPP. Are incest and adultery the words
 Which you will cast at me? I hold my peace. 1209
 Yet think what mother Phædra had—remember
 Her blood, not mine, is tainted with these horrors!

THESEUS. So then! Before my eyes your rage bursts out,
And loses all restraint. Go from my sight!—
This last time I will say it,—traitor, go!
And do not wait until a father's anger 1215
Drives you away in public execration!

[Exit HIPPOLYTUS.]

THESEUS [alone]. Wretch! Thou must meet inevitable ruin!
Neptune has sworn by Styx,—an oath most dreadful
Even to gods,—and he will keep his promise.
Thou canst not ever flee from his revenge. 1220
I loved thee, and in spite of this offense
My heart is moved by what I see for thee.
Nay, but thy doom is but too fully earned.
Had father ever better cause for rage?
O you just gods, who see my crushing grief, 1225
Why was I cursed with such an evil son?

Enter PHÆDRA.

PHÆDRA. I come to you, my lord, in proper dread,
For I have heard your voice raised high in anger,
And much I fear that deeds have followed threats.
Oh, spare your child, if there is still some time! 1230
Respect your race, your blood, I do beseech you.
I would not hear that blood cry from the earth!
Save me the horror and the lasting shame
Of having caused his father's hand to shed it!

THESEUS. No, madam, I am free from such a stain. 1235
But still the wretch has not escaped my vengeance.
The hand of an Immortal holds his doom,
And pledges his destruction. 'Tis a debt
That Neptune owes me. You shall be avenged.

PHÆDRA. A debt to you? Prayers made in anger— 1240

THESEUS. Fear not.
They will not fail. But join your prayers to mine,
And paint his crimes for me in all their blackness,
To fan my sluggish wrath to whitest heat.
You do not know of all his villainy. 1245
His rage against you feeds itself on slanders.
Your words, he says, are full of all deceit.
He says Aricia has his heart and soul,
That he loves only her—

PHÆDRA. Aricia?— 1250

THESEUS. Yes.
He said it to my face:—an idle pretext!
A trick I am not caught by. Let us hope
That Neptune does swift justice. I am going
Now to his altars, urging he keep his oath. 1255

[Exit THESEUS.]

PHÆDRA [alone]. So he is gone! What words have struck mine ears?

What smothered fires are burning in my heart?
What fatal stroke falls like a thunder-bolt?
Stung with remorse that would not give me peace,
I tore myself from out CENONE's arms 1260
And hurried here to help Hippolytus,
With all my soul and strength. Who knows, indeed,

But that new-found repentance might have moved me

To speak in accusation of myself?—
And if my voice had not been choked with shame,
Perhaps I might have told the frightful truth. 1266
Hippolytus can feel—but not for me!
Aricia has his heart, his plighted word!
You gods! I thought his heart could not be touched

By any love, when, deaf to all my tears, 1270
He armed his eye with scorn, his brow with threats.

I thought him strong against all other women,
And yet another has prevailed upon him!
She tamed his pride, and she has gained his favor!
Perhaps he has a heart that's quick to melt, 1275
And I alone am she he cannot bear!
Then shall I charge myself with his protection?

Enter CENONE.

PHÆDRA. Dear nurse, and do you know what I have learned?

CENONE. No, but in truth I come with trembling limbs.

I dreaded what you planned when you went out,
And fear of fatal madness turned me pale. 1281

PHÆDRA. Who would have thought it, nurse? I had a rival.

CENONE. A rival?

PHÆDRA. Yes, he loves. I cannot doubt it.
This wild Hippolytus I could not tame,— 1285
Who scorned to be admired, and who was wearied
With lovers' sighs,—this tiger whom I dreaded
Fawns on the hand of one who broke his pride.
Aricia found the entrance to his heart!

CENONE. Aricia? 1290

PHÆDRA. 'Tis a torture yet untried!
Now for what other pains am I reserved?
All I have suffered,—ecstasies of passion,
Longings and fears, the horrors of remorse,
The shame of being spurned with contumely, 1295
Were feeble tastes of what is now my torment.
They love each other! By what secret charm

Have they deceived me? When and where and how Did they contrive to meet? You knew it all,—

And why, then, was I kept from knowing of it?
You never told me of their stolen hours 1301
Of love and of delight. Have they been seen Talking together often?—did they seek
The forest shadows? Ah, they had full freedom
To be together. Heaven watched their sighs. 1305
They loved,—and never felt that they were guilty.
The morning sun shone always clear for them,
While I,—an outcast from the face of Nature, Shunned the bright day, and would have hid myself,—

Death the one god whom I dared ask for aid!
I waited for the freedom of the grave. 1311
My woe was fed with bitterness, and watered
With many tears. It was too closely watched.
I did not dare to weep without restraint,
And knowing it a solace perilous, 1315
I feared it, and I hid my mortal terror
Beneath a face most tranquil. Oftentimes
I stopped my tears, and made myself to smile—

CENONE. What fruit can they desire from fruitless love?

For they can meet no more. 1320

PHEDRA. That love will stay,
And it will stay forever. While I speak—
O dreadful thought—they laugh and scorn my madness

And my distracted heart. In spite of exile,
In spite of that which soon must come to part
them, 1325

They make a thousand oaths to bind their union.
Cenone, can I bear this happiness

Which so insults me? I would have your pity.
Yes, she must be destroyed. My husband's fury
Against her hated race shall be renewed. 1330
The punishment must be a heavy one.

Her guilt outruns the guilt of all her brothers.
I'll plead with Theseus, in my jealousy,—
What do I say? Oh, have I lost my senses?
Is Phædra jealous? will she, then, go begging 1335
For Theseus' help? He lives,—and yet I burn.
For whom? Whose heart is this I claim as mine?
My hair stands up with horror at my words,
And from this time, my guilt has passed all bounds!

Hypocrisy and incest breathe at once 1340
Through all I do. My hands are ripe for murder,
To spill the guiltless blood of innocence.
Do I still live, a wretch, and dare to face
The holy Sun, from whom I have my being?

My father's father was the king of gods; 1345
My race is spread through all the universe.—

Where can I hide? In the dark realms of Pluto?
But there my father holds the fatal urn.
His hands award the doom irrevocable.—
Minos is judge of all the ghosts in hell. 1350
And how his awful shade will start and shudder
When he shall see his daughter brought before
him,

And made confess such many-colored sins,
Such crimes, perhaps, as hell itself knows not!
O father, what will be thy words at seeing 1355
So dire a sight? I see thee drop the urn, Turning to seek some punishment unheard of,—
To be, thyself, mine executioner!

O spare me! For a cruel deity
Destroys thy race. O look upon my madness, 1360
And in it see her wrath. This aching heart
Gathers no fruit of pleasure from its crime.
It is a shame which hounds me to the grave,
And ends a life of misery in torment.

CENONE. Ah, madam, drive away this groundless fear. 1365

Look not so hard upon a little sin.
You love. We cannot conquer destiny.
Why, you were drawn as by a fatal charm;—
Is that a marvel we have never seen?
Has love, then, come to triumph over you, 1370
And no one else? By nature man is weak.
You are a mortal,—bow to mortal fortune.
You chafe against a yoke that many others
Have borne before you. They upon Olympus,—
The very gods themselves, who make us tremble
For our poor sins, have burned with lawless passions. 1376

PHEDRA. What words are these? What counsels do you give me?

Why will you still pour poison in mine ears?
You have destroyed me. You have brought me back

When I should else have left the light of day.
You made me to forget my solemn duty, 1381
And see Hippolytus, whom I had shunned.
What have you done? Why did those wicked lips
Slander his faultless life with blackest lies?
It may be you have murdered him. By now 1385
The prayer unholy of a heartless father
May have been granted. I will have no words!
Go, monster! Leave me to my sorry fate.
May the just gods repay you properly,
And may your punishment remain forever 1390
To strike with fear, all such as you, who strive
To feed the frailty of the great with cunning,

To push them to the very brink of ruin
 To which their feet incline,—to smooth the path
 Of guilt. Such flatterers the gods, in anger, 1395
 Bestow on kings as their most fatal gift!

[Exit PHÆDRA.

CENONE [alone]. O gods! What is there I've not done to serve her?

And this is the reward that I have won! [Exit.

ACT V

Enter HIPPOLYTUS and ARICIA.

ARICIA. Can you keep silent in this mortal danger?

Your father loves you. Will you leave him so—
 When he is thus deceived? If you are cruel,— 1401

If, in your heart, you will not see my tears,
 Why then, content,—and do not ever see me.

Abandon poor Aricia,—but at least

If you must go, make sure your life is safe. 1405

Defend your honor from a shameful stain,

And force your father to recall his prayers.

There still is time. Why, for a mere caprice,

Should you leave open way for Phædra's slanders?

Let Theseus know the truth. 1410

HIPP. Could I say more

And not expose him to a great disgrace?

How should I dare, by speaking what I know,

To make my father's brow blush red with shame?

You only know the hateful mystery. 1415

I have not showed my heart to any other

But you and Heaven. Judge, then, if I love you,

Since you have seen I could not hide from you

All I would fain have hidden from myself!

Remember under what a seal I spoke. 1420

Forget what I have said, if that may be,

And never let so pure a mouth give voice

To such a secret. Let us trust to Heaven

To give me justice, for the gods are just. 1424

For their own honor they will clear the guiltless.

The time will come for Phædra to be punished.

She cannot always flee the shame she merits.

I ask no other favor than your silence.

In all besides, I give my wrath free scope.

Make your escape from this captivity, 1430

Be bold, and come with me upon my flight.

Oh, do not stay on this accursed soil

Where virtue breathes the air of pestilence.

To hide your leaving, take the good advantage

Of all this turmoil, roused by my disgrace. 1435

I promise you the means of flight are ready.

You have, as yet, no other guards than mine.

Defenders of great strength will fight our quarrel.

Argos has open arms, and Sparta calls us.

Let us appeal for justice to our friends, 1440

And let us not stand by while Phædra joins us

Together in one ruin, driving us

Down from the throne,—and swells her son's possessions

By robbing us. Come, take this happy chance.

What fear can hold you back? You seem to pause.

Only your better fortune makes me urge 1446

That we be bold. When I am all a-fire,

Why are you ice? Are you afraid to follow

One who is banished?

ARICIA. Ah, but such an exile 1450

Would be most dear to me. For with what joy

I'd live, if I could link my fate to yours,

And be forgot by all the world. But still

We are not bound by that sweet tie together.

Then how am I to steal away with you? 1455

I know the strictest honor need not stop me

From seeking freedom from your father's hands,

For this, indeed, is not my parents' home,

And flight is lawful, when one flies from tyrants.

But you, sir, love me, and my virtue shrinks— 1460

HIPP. No, no! To me your honor is as dear

As it is to yourself. A nobler purpose

Brings me to you. I ask you leave your foes

And follow with your husband. That same Heaven

Which sends these woes, sets free the pledge between us 1465

From human hands. There are not always torches

To light the face of Hymen. Come with me—

Beside the gates of Trœzen is a temple,

Amid the ancient tombs of princes, buried.

They who are false can never enter there, 1470

And there no mortal dares make perjured oaths,

For instant punishment will come on guilt.

There is not any stronger check to falsehood

Than what is present there,—fear of a death

That cannot be escaped. There we shall go, 1475

If you consent, and swear eternal love,

And call the god who watches there to witness

Our solemn vows, and ask his guarding care.

I will invoke the holiest of powers— 1479

The chaste Diana and the Queen of Heaven,—

Yes, all the gods, who know my inmost heart,

Will answer for my sacred promises.

ARICIA. Here is the king. Away—make no delay.

I linger yet a while to hide my flight.

Go you, and leave me with some trusted one

To lead my timid footsteps to your side. 1486

[Exit HIPPOLYTUS. Enter THESEUS and ISMENE.

His last desire,—a melancholy task.—
But here his mortal enemy is coming.

Enter PHÆDRA and Guards.

THESEUS. Madam, you've triumphed, and my son is killed! 1675

Ah, but what room have I for fear! How justly
Suspicion racks me that in blaming him
I erred! But he is dead; accept your victim,
Rightly or wrongly slain. Your heart may leap.
For me, my eyes shall be forever blind. 1680
Since you have said it, I'll believe him guilty.
His death is cause enough for me to weep.
It would be folly, should I seek a light
Which could not bring him back to soothe my grief,

And which might only make me more unhappy.
I will go far from you and from this shore, 1686
For here the vision of my mangled son
Would haunt my memory, and drive me mad.
I wish I might be banished from the world,
For all the world must rise in judgment on me.
Even my glory weights my punishment, 1691
For if I bore a name less known to men,
'Twere easier to hide me. Ah, I mourn
And hate all prayers the gods have granted me.
Nor will I ever go to them again 1695
With useless pleadings. All that they can give
Is far outweighed by what they took from me.

PHÆDRA. My lord, I cannot hear you and be silent.

I must undo the wrong that he has suffered,—
Your son was innocent. 1700

THESEUS. Unhappy father!
And I condemned him for a word of yours!
You think I can forgive such cruelty—?

PHÆDRA. Moments are precious to me; let me speak.

'Twas I who cast an eye of lawless passion 1705
On chaste and dutiful Hippolytus.
The gods had lit a baleful fire in me,
And vile CEnone's cunning did the rest.
She feared Hippolytus,—who knew my madness,—
Would tell you of that passion which he hated.
And so she took advantage of my weakness 1711
And hastened, that she might accuse him first.
She has been punished now, but all too lightly.
She sought to flee my anger,—cast herself
Into the waves. The sword had long since cut
My thread of life, but still I heard the cry 1716
Of slandered innocence, and I determined
To die a slower way, and first confess
My penitence to you. There is a poison
Medea brought to Athens, in my veins. 1720
The venom works already in my heart.
A strange and fatal chill is spreading there.
I see already, through a gathering mist,
The husband whom I outrage with my presence.
Death veils the light of Heaven from mine eyes,
And gives it back its purity, defiled. 1726

PANOPE. She dies, my lord.

THESEUS. I would the memory
Of her disgraceful deed might perish with her!
Ah! I have learned too late! Come, let us go, 1730
And with the blood of mine unhappy son
Mingle our tears,—embrace his dear remains,
Repenting deeply for a hated prayer.
Let him have honor such as he deserves,
And, to appease his sore-offended spirit, 1735
No matter what her brothers' guilt has been,
From this day forth, Aricia is my daughter.

[Exeunt.]

JEAN DE LA FONTAINE

Fables

The Two Doves

Two doves once cherished for each other
The love that brother hath for brother.

But one, of scenes domestic tiring,
To see the foreign world aspiring,
Was fool enough to undertake
A journey long, o'er land and lake.

5

Fables. Translated by E. Wright. Jean de La Fontaine (1621-1695) spent most of his life in Paris. Though he studied for the church, he soon devoted himself to miscellaneous writing. Only his fables are important.

"What plan is this?" the other cried;
 "Wouldst quit so soon thy brother's side?
 This absence is the worst of ills;
 Thy heart may bear, but me it kills.
 Pray, let the dangers, toil, and care,
 Of which all travelers tell,
 Your courage somewhat quell.
 Still if the season later were—
 O wait the zephyrs!—hasten not—"

Just now the raven, on his oak,
 In hoarser tones than usual spoke:
 "My heart forebodes the saddest lot,—
 The falcons, nets— Alas, it rains!
 My brother, are thy wants supplied?—
 Provisions, shelter, pocket-guide,
 And all that unto health pertains?"
 These words occasioned some demur
 In our imprudent traveler.
 But restless curiosity
 Prevailed at last; and so said he,—
 "The matter is not worth a sigh;
 Three days, at most, will satisfy,
 And then returning, I shall tell
 You all the wonders that befell,—
 With scenes enchanting and sublime
 Shall sweeten all our coming time.
 Who seeth nought, hath nought to say.
 My travel's course, from day to day,
 Will be the source of great delight.
 A store of tales I shall relate,—
 Say there I lodged at such a date,
 And saw there such and such a sight.
 You'll think it all occurred to you.
 On this, both, weeping, bade adieu.
 Away the lonely wanderer flew.
 A thunder-cloud began to lower;
 He sought, as shelter from the shower
 The only tree that graced the plain,
 Whose leaves ill turned the pelting rain.
 The sky once more serene above,
 On flew our drenched and dripping dove,
 And dried his plumage as he could.
 Next, on the borders of a wood,
 He spied some scattered grains of wheat,
 Which one, he thought, might safely eat;
 For there another dove he saw.
 He felt the snare around him draw!
 This wheat was but a treacherous bait
 To lure poor pigeons to their fate.
 The snare had been so long in use,
 With beak and wings he struggled loose:
 Some feathers perished while it stuck;
 But, what was worst in point of luck,

A hawk, the cruelest of foes,
 Perceived him clearly as he rose,
 Off dragging, like a runaway,
 A piece of string. The bird of prey
 Had bound him, in a moment more,
 Much faster than he was before,
 But from the clouds an eagle came,
 And made the hawk himself his game.

By war of robbers profiting,
 The dove for safety plied the wing,
 And, lighting on a ruined wall,
 Believed his dangers ended all.
 A roguish boy had there a sling,
 (Age pitiless!
 We must confess)
 And, by a most unlucky fling,
 Half killed our hapless dove;
 Who now, no more in love
 With foreign traveling,
 And lame in leg and wing,
 Straight homeward urged his crippled flight,
 Fatigued, but glad, arrived at night,
 In truly sad and piteous plight.

The doves rejoined, I leave you all to say
 What pleasure might their pains repay.
 Ah, happy lovers, would you roam?
 Pray, let it not be far from home.
 To each the other ought to be
 A world of beauty ever new;
 In each the other ought to see
 The whole of what is good and true.

Myself have loved; nor would I then,
 For all the wealth of crownèd men,
 Or arch celestial, paved with gold,
 The presence of those woods have sold,
 And fields, and banks, and hillocks, which
 Were by the joyful steps made rich,
 And smiled beneath the charming eyes
 Of her who made my heart a prize—
 To whom I pledged it nothing loath,
 And sealed the pledge with virgin oath.
 Ah, when will time such moments bring again?
 To me are sweet and charming objects vain—
 My soul forsaking to its restless mood?
 O, did my withered heart but dare
 To kindle for the bright and good,
 Should not I find the charm still there?
 Is love, to me, with things that were?

The Oak and the Reed

The oak one day addressed the reed:—
 "To you ungenerous indeed

Has nature been, my humble friend,
 With weakness aye obliged to bend.
 The smallest bird that flits in air
 Is quite too much for you to bear;
 The slightest wind that wreathes the lake
 Your ever-trembling head doth shake.

The while, my towering form
 Dares with the mountain top
 The solar blaze to stop,
 And wrestle with the storm.
 What seems to you the blast of death,
 To me is but a zephyr's breath.
 Beneath my branches had you grown,
 That spread far round their friendly bower,
 Less suffering would your life have known,
 Defended from the tempest's power.
 Unhappily you oftenest show
 In open air your slender form,
 Along the marshes wet and low,
 That fringe the kingdom of the storm.
 To you, declare I must,
 Dame Nature seems unjust."

Then modestly replied the reed:
 "Your pity, sir, is kind indeed,
 But wholly needless for my sake.
 The wildest wind that ever blew
 Is safe to me compared with you.
 I bend, indeed, but never break.
 Thus far, I own the hurricane
 Has beat your sturdy back in vain;
 But wait the end." Just at the word,
 The tempest's hollow voice was heard.
 The North sent forth her fiercest child,
 Dark, jagged, pitiless, and wild.
 The oak, erect, endured the blow;
 The reed bowed gracefully and low.
 But, gathering up its strength once more,
 In greater fury than before,
 The savage blast
 O'erthrew, at last,
 That proud, old, sky-encircled head,
 Whose feet entwined the empire of the dead!

The Wolf and the Lamb

That innocence is not a shield,
 A story teaches, not the longest.
 The strongest reasons always yield
 To reasons of the strongest.

A lamb her thirst was slaking,
 Once, at a mountain rill.

A hungry wolf was taking
 His hunt for sheep to kill,
 When, spying on the streamlet's brink
 This sheep of tender age,
 He howled in tones of rage,
 "How dare you roil my drink?
 Your impudence I shall chastise!"
 "Let not your majesty," the lamb replies,
 "Decide in haste or passion!
 For sure 'tis difficult to think
 In what respect or fashion
 My drinking here could roil your drink
 Since on the stream your majesty now faces
 I'm lower down, full twenty paces."
 "You roil it," said the wolf; "and more I know,
 You cursed and slandered me a year ago."
 "O no! how could I such a thing have done!
 A lamb that has not seen a year,
 A suckling of its mother dear?"
 "Your brother then." "But brother I have none."
 "Well, well, what's all the same,
 'Twas someone of your name.
 Sheep, men, and dogs of every nation,
 Are wont to stab my reputation,
 As I have truly heard."

Without another word,
 He made his vengeance good,—
 Bore off the lambkin to the wood,
 And there, without a jury,
 Judged, slew, and ate her in his fury.

The Council Held by the Rats

Old Rodilard, a certain Cat,
 Such havoc of the Rats had made,
 'Twas difficult to find a Rat
 With nature's debt unpaid.
 The few that did remain,
 To leave their holes afraid,
 From usual food abstain,
 Not eating half their fill.
 And wonder no one will
 That one who made of Rats his revel,
 With Rats pass'd not for Cat, but Devil.
 Now, on a day, this dread Rat-eater,
 Who had a wife, went out to meet her;
 And while he held his caterwauling,
 The unkill'd Rats, their chapter calling,
 Discuss'd the point, in grave debate,
 How they might shun impending fate.
 Their dean, a prudent Rat,
 Thought best, and better soon than late,
 To bell the fatal Cat;

That, when he took his hunting round,
 The Rats, well caution'd by the sound,
 Might hide in safety under ground;
 Indeed he knew no other means.
 And all the rest 25
 At once confess'd
 Their minds were with the dean's.
 No better plan, they all believed,
 Could possibly have been conceived,
 No doubt the thing would work right well, 30
 If anyone would hang the bell.
 But, one by one, said every Rat,
 "I'm not so big a fool as that."
 The plan, knock'd up in this respect,
 The council closed without effect. 35
 To argue or refute,
 Wise counselors abound;
 The man to execute
 Is harder to be found.

The Cobbler and the Rich Man

A Cobbler sang from morn till night;
 'Twas sweet and marvelous to hear;
 His trills and quavers told the ear
 Of more contentment and delight,
 Enjoy'd by that laborious wight 5
 Than e'er enjoy'd the sages seven,
 Or any mortals short of heaven.
 His neighbor, on the other hand,
 With gold in plenty at command,
 But little sang, and slumber'd less— 10
 A Financier of great success.
 If e'er he dozed, at break of day,
 The Cobbler's song drove sleep away;
 And much he wish'd that Heaven had made
 Sleep a commodity of trade, 15
 In market sold, like food and drink,
 So much an hour, so much a wink.
 At last, our songster did he call
 To meet him in his princely hall.
 Said he, "Now, honest Gregory, 20
 What may your yearly earnings be?"

"My yearly earnings! faith, good sir,
 I never go, at once, so far,"
 The cheerful Cobbler said,
 And queerly scratched his head,— 25
 "I never reckon in that way,
 But cobble on from day to day,
 Content with daily bread."
 "Indeed! Well, Gregory, pray,
 What may your earnings be per day?" 30
 "Why, sometimes more and sometimes less.
 The worst of all, I must confess,
 (And but for which our gains would be A pretty sight, indeed, to see.)
 Is that the days are made so many 35
 In which we cannot earn a penny—
 The sorest ill the poor man feels:
 They tread upon each other's heels,
 Those idle days of holy saints!
 And though the year is shingled o'er, 40
 The parson keeps a-finding more!"
 With smiles provoked by these complaints,
 Replied the lordly Financier,
 "I'll give you better cause to sing.
 These hundred pounds I hand you here 45
 Will make you happy as a king.
 Go, spend them with a frugal heed;
 They'll long supply your every need."
 The Cobbler thought the silver more
 Than he had ever dream'd before, 50
 The mines for ages could produce,
 Or world, with all its people, use.
 He took it home, and there did hide—
 And with it laid his joy aside.
 No more of song, no more of sleep, 55
 But cares, suspicions in their stead,
 And false alarms, by fancy fed.
 His eyes and ears their vigils keep,
 And not a cat can tread the floor
 But seems a thief slipp'd through the door. 60
 At last, poor man!
 Up to the Financier he ran,—
 Then in his morning nap profound:
 "O, give me back my songs," cried he,
 "And sleep, that used so sweet to be, 65
 And take the money, every pound!"

LA ROCHEFOUCAULD

Reflections; or, Sentences and Moral Maxims

What we term virtue is often but a mass of various actions and divers interests, which fortune, or our own industry, manage to arrange; and it is not always from valor or from chastity that men are brave, and women chaste.

Self-love is the greatest of flatterers.

Passion often renders the most clever man a fool, and even sometimes renders the most foolish man clever.

Great and striking actions which dazzle the eyes ¹⁰ are represented by politicians as the effect of great designs, instead of which they are commonly caused by the temper and the passions. Thus the war between Augustus and Antony, which is set down to the ambition they entertained of making themselves masters of the world, was probably but an effect of jealousy.

Passions often produce their contraries: avarice sometimes leads to prodigality, and prodigality to avarice; we are often obstinate through weakness ²⁰ and daring through timidity.

Whatever care we take to conceal our passions under the appearances of piety and honor, they are always to be seen through these veils.

The clemency of princes is often but policy to win the affections of the people.

This clemency, of which they make a merit, arises oftentimes from vanity, sometimes from idleness, oftentimes from fear, and almost always from all three combined.

We have all sufficient strength to support the misfortunes of others. ³⁰

The constancy of the wise is only the talent of concealing the agitation of their hearts.

Those who are condemned to death affect sometimes a constancy and contempt for death which is only the fear of facing it; so that one may say that this constancy and contempt are to their mind what the bandage is to their eyes.

Few people know death, we only endure it, usually from determination, and even from stupidity and custom; and most men only die because they know not how to prevent dying. ⁴⁰

We need greater virtues to sustain good than evil fortune.

Neither the sun nor death can be looked at without winking.

People are often vain of their passions, even of the worst, but envy is a passion so timid and shame-faced that no one ever dare avow her.

The evil that we do does not attract to us so much persecution and hatred as our good qualities. ^{ties.}

Jealousy lives upon doubt; and comes to an end or becomes a fury as soon as it passes from doubt to certainty.

It would seem that nature, which has so wisely ordered the organs of our body for our happiness, has also given us pride to spare us the mortification of knowing our imperfections.

Those who apply themselves too closely to little things often become incapable of great things.

A man often believes himself leader when he is led; as his mind endeavors to reach one goal, his heart insensibly drags him towards another.

Whatever difference there appears in our fortunes, there is nevertheless a certain compensation of good and evil which renders them equal.

The contempt of riches in philosophers was only a hidden desire to avenge their merit upon the injustice of fortune, by despising the very goods of which fortune had deprived them; it was a secret to guard themselves against the degradation of poverty, it was a back way by which to arrive at that distinction which they could not gain by riches.

To establish ourselves in the world we do everything to appear as if we were established.

Although men flatter themselves with their great actions, they are not so often the result of a great design as of chance.

Happiness is in the taste, and not in the things themselves; we are happy from possessing what we like, not from possessing what others like.

We are never so happy or so unhappy as we suppose.

Nothing should so much diminish the satisfaction which we feel with ourselves as seeing that we disapprove at one time of that which we approve of at another.

There is no disguise which can long hide love where it exists, nor feign it, where it does not.

We may find women who have never indulged in an intrigue, but it is rare to find those who have intrigued but once.

There is only one sort of love, but there are a thousand different copies.

It is more disgraceful to distrust than to be deceived by our friends.

In the intercourse of life, we please more by our faults than by our good qualities.

To awaken a man who is deceived as to his own merit is to do him as bad a turn as that done to the Athenian madman, who was happy in believing that all the ships touching at that port belonged to him.

Ideas often flash across our minds more complete than we could make them after much labor.

If we never flattered ourselves we should have but scant pleasure.

We often boast that we are never bored, but yet we are so conceited that we do not perceive how often we bore others.

As it is the mark of great minds to say things in a few words, so it is that of little minds to use many words to say nothing.

Usually we only praise to be praised.

The refusal of praise is only the wish to be praised twice.

There are persons whose only merit consists in saying and doing stupid things at the right time, and who ruin all if they change their manners.

Avarice is more opposed to economy than to liberality.

However deceitful Hope may be, yet she carries us on pleasantly to the end of life.

It is far better to accustom our mind to bear the ills we have than to speculate on those which may befall us.

There are two kinds of constancy in love, one arising from incessantly finding in the loved one fresh objects to love, the other from regarding it as a point of honor to be constant.

Perseverance is not deserving of blame or praise, as it is merely the continuance of tastes and feelings which we can neither create nor destroy.

Thoughts

Let man then contemplate nature as a whole, in all her exalted majesty; let him avert his eyes from the low objects that surround him; let him observe that brilliant light set as a lamp to illumine the universe eternally; let him see that the earth is but a point in comparison with the vast orbit of that star; and let him consider with amazement that this vast orbit itself is only a minute point when compared with those traversed by the stars which revolve in the firmament.

If our vision ends there, let imaginations pass beyond; it will exhaust its power of conception sooner than what nature offers it. The whole visible world is only an imperceptible speck in the wide bosom of nature. No idea approaches it. Expand our conception as we may beyond imaginable space, we beget only atoms in comparison with the reality of things. It is an infinite sphere whose center is everywhere, its circumference nowhere. In brief, it is the greatest sensible mark of the omnipotence of God, that our imagination loses itself in this thought.

Then, let man, having returned to himself, consider what he is in comparison with that which is; let him regard himself as astray in this remote district of nature, and from the little dungeon in which he finds himself lodged—I mean the universe—let him learn to rate at their true value the earth, kingdoms, cities, and himself.

Thoughts. Blaise Pascal (1623-1662) was reared and educated in Paris. He did distinguished work in science and mathematics until, in 1654, he was converted to Christianity and renounced science. He joined the religious community of Port-Royal and passed the rest of his life in religious thought and writing.

What is man in the infinite?

But to exhibit to him another wonder quite as amazing, let him examine the most minute things he knows. A mite will show him, in its diminutive body, parts incomparably smaller—limbs with their joints, veins in these limbs, blood in the veins, humors in the blood, drops in the humors, vapors in the drops. Dividing these, again, let him exhaust his power of forming such conceptions, and then let us consider the last, least object at which he can arrive. Perhaps he will think that it is the limit of littleness in nature. But I will show him within this a new abyss. I will paint for him not only the visible universe, but all the immensity of nature that one can conceive, within the bounds of this epitome of an atom. He may see an infinity of universes, each with its firmament, its planets, its earth, in the same proportion as in the visible world; in the earth animals and finally mites in which he will find again what he found in the first; and finding in others yet the same things without end and without rest, let him lose himself in these wonders, as astonishing in their littleness as were the others from their magnitude. For who will not be amazed that our body, which just now was not perceptible in a universe itself imperceptible in the bosom of the all, has become a colossus, a world, or rather an all as compared with the nothing to which one cannot attain?

For what, in brief, is man in nature? A nothing in comparison with the infinite; an all in comparison with the nothing; a mean between nothing and all. Infinitely far from comprehending the extremes, the end of things and their first principle are for him absolutely hidden in impenetrable mystery: he is equally incapable of seeing the nothing whence he came and the infinite in which he is engulfed.

What can he do, then, except perceive a certain appearance of the midst of things, in eternal despair of knowing either their principle or their end? All things proceed from the nothing and are borne on to the infinite. Who can follow these amazing processes? The author of these wonders comprehends them; no one else can.

One naturally fancies that one is better able to get at the center of things than to embrace their circumference. The visible extent of the world stretches perceptibly beyond us; but since we ourselves surpass in the same way the minutest things, we imagine that we are more capable of grasping them; and yet it requires no less capacity to reach the nothing than to reach the all. One must be infinite to do either; and it seems to me that he who should comprehend the ultimate principles of things would be able also to attain to the knowledge of the infinite. The one depends upon the other, and the one leads to the other. The extremes touch and reunite by virtue of their very separation; but they meet in God, and in God alone.

Let us then recognize our scope; we are something, but not all. The being that we have deprives us of the knowledge of the first principles which arise from the nothing, and its littleness conceals from us the vision of the infinite.

Our intelligence holds in the order of intelligible things the same place that is held by our body in the extent of nature.

Our senses cannot perceive an extreme. Too much noise deafens us; too much light dazzles us; too great distance or proximity hinders vision; excessive prolixity or brevity in a discourse makes it obscure; too much truth amazes us. I know people who cannot comprehend that if one takes four from zero, zero is left. First principles are too evident for us. Too much pleasure disturbs; too many concords in music displease; too many benefits irritate; we wish to have the means of overpaying the debt.

In short, extremes are for us non-existent, and we are non-existent in relation to them; they escape us, or we them.

This, then, is our true state; this it is that renders us incapable of knowing with certainty and of being absolutely ignorant. We float over a vast middle region, always uncertain and tossed about, driven from one extreme to the other. If we think to attach ourselves and remain fixed at some point, it gives way and abandons us; and if we pursue it, it escapes our grasp, slips away from us, and flies from us forever. This is our natural state, and yet it is one that is most opposed to our inclinations. We burn with desire to find a firm resting-place—a fixed and final base—that we may build a tower that will reach the infinite; but our whole foundation cracks, and the earth yawns to the abyss.

If this is understood, one will, I think, remain quietly in the state in which nature has placed him. Since the mean which has fallen to our lot is always distant from the extremes, of what moment is it that a man has a little greater knowledge of things? If he has, he only grasps them a little higher up. Is he not always infinitely distant from the end, and is not the duration of our life just as infinitely far from eternity, even if it lasts ten years longer?

The pursuit of glory is man's greatest baseness; but it is also the greatest mark of his excellence. For whatever possessions he may have on earth, whatever degree of health and comfort, he is not satisfied if he does not possess the esteem of his fellow men. He values human reason so highly that whatever other advantages he may have in the world, if he is not also advantageously placed in the opinion of men, he is not content. That is the finest position in the world; nothing can turn him from this desire, this is the most ineffaceable characteristic of the human heart. Even those who despise men most, and think them to be no better than the brutes, wish to be admired and believed, and thus contradict themselves by their own feelings—their nature, which is stronger than all else, convincing them of the greatness of man more strongly than reason convinces them of his baseness.

God's justice must be as vast as his compassion; but justice toward the reprobate is less vast and should be less startling than compassion toward the elect.

We know that there is an infinite, but we are ignorant of its nature. Thus we know that it is false that numbers are finite; hence it is true that there is an infinite in number, but we do not know what it is. It is false that it is even; it is false that it is odd; for if unity be added to it, its nature is not changed. Yet it is a number, and every number is either even or odd; this is true, certainly, of all finite numbers. Thus we may know that there is a God without knowing what he is.

Let us speak now according to the light of nature. If there is a God, he is infinitely incomprehensible, since, having neither parts nor limits, he has no relation to us; we are then incapable of knowing either what he is or if he is. This being so, who will venture to undertake to solve this question? Not we, who have no relation to him.

Who, then, shall blame Christians for their inability to give a reason for their belief—blame those who profess a religion of which they cannot render a reason? They declare in exhibiting it to the world that it is foolishness, stultitiam. And yet you complain that they do not prove it! If they should prove it they would falsify their own words. Their lack of proofs shows that they do not lack sense. Yes; but while this excuses those who offer it as such, and removes from them the blame of setting it forth without reason, it does not excuse those who receive it.

Let us, then, examine this point and let us say: God either is, or is not. But to which side shall we incline? Reason cannot settle the matter. An infinite abyss separates us. At the extremity of this infinite distance a game is being played in which either heads or tails will turn up. What do you wager? You cannot rationally choose one or the other—there is no reason for fixing upon either.

Do not, then, accuse of error those who have made a choice, for you know nothing about it.—No, but I blame them for making not this choice, but any choice; for he who chooses "heads" and he who chooses "tails" commit the same error—they are both at fault: the proper thing is not to wager at all.

Yes, but you must wager; it is not a matter of volition; you are embarked. Which will you take, then? Let us see—since you cannot help choosing—let us see which interests you least. You have two things to lose, the true and the good; two things to stake, your reason and your will, your knowledge and your happiness; and your nature has two things to shun, error and misery. Since it is necessary to choose, your reason is no more hurt in taking one than in taking the other. That is one point settled—but your happiness?

Let us weigh the gain and the loss in choosing "heads"—that God is. Compare these two chances: if you win you win everything; if you lose you lose nothing. Wager, then, without hesitation, that he is.—This is admirable! Yes, I must wager, but perhaps I stake too much.—Let us see. Since there is an equal chance of winning and losing, if you had only to gain two lives for one you might still wager. But if there were three to be won, it would be necessary to play (since you are obliged to play whether you will or not), and you would use bad judgment (since you are forced to play) not to hazard your life to win three in a game in which the chances of gain and loss are even. But there is an eternity of life and happiness at stake; and since this is the case, if there were an infinity of chances of which one only was in your favor, you would still be right in wagering one for two, and you would act with the imprudent (since you are forced to play) to refuse to play one life against three in a game in which of an infinity of chances you have one, if there is an infinity of infinitely happy life to be won. But here there is an infinitely happy infinite life to be won; one chance of winning against a finite number of chances of loss; and what you stake is finite. That is fixed: where there is an infinite, and there is not an infinity of chances of loss against those of winning, there is no ground for deliberation—you must give all. And so, since one is obliged to play, it is irrational to guard one's life rather than risk it for an infinite gain which may as likely happen as a loss which is a loss of nothing.

For there is no sense in saying that it is uncertain that one will win, while it is certain that one risks; and that the infinite distance which separates the certainty that one risks for the uncertainty that one will win renders the finite good which one certainly stakes equal to the uncertain infinite. This is not so every player runs a certain risk, to win an uncertainty; and yet he risks a finite certainty to win a finite uncertainty without doing violence to his reason. There is not an infinite distance between the certainty of the risk and the uncertainty of winning; that statement is false. There is, in truth, an infinity between the certainty of winning and the certainty of losing. But the uncertainty of winning is proportioned to the certainty of the risk, according to the proportion of the chances of gain and loss; and hence if there are as many chances on one side as the other, the game is even; and then the certainty of the risk is equal to the uncertainty of winning: so far is it from being infinitely distant. And thus our proposition has an infinite force, when a finite is risked in a game in which the chances of winning and losing are equal and there is an infinite to be won. That is demonstrable; and if men are capable of grasping any truths, this is one of them.

I confess it, I grant it. But is there no way of seeing behind the game?—Yes, Scripture and the rest.

Yes, but my hands are bound and my mouth is dumb; I am forced to wager, and I am not free; no one releases me, and I am so constituted that I cannot believe. What, then, would you have me do?

That is true. But at least recognize your powerlessness to believe, since reason leads you to believe, and yet you cannot. Strive then to convince yourself, not by argumentation and proofs of the being of God, but by the lessening of your passions. You wish to attain to faith, and you do not know the way; you desire to be cured of infidelity, and you ask for remedies. Learn of those who have been bound as you are, and who now are staking all that they possess: these are they who know the road that you would follow and have been cured of the disease of which you would be cured. Begin as they did—namely, acting as if they believed, taking holy water, having masses said, etc. This, naturally, will make you believe and dull you at the same time.—But that is just what I fear.—Why? What have you to lose?

"I would soon have given up pleasure," they say, "if I had had faith." I say to you, on the other hand: "You would soon have had faith if you had given up pleasure. But it is for you to begin. If I could, I would give you faith. This I cannot do, neither can I test the truth of what you say. But you can easily give up pleasure and prove that what you say is true."

If one ought not to act except upon a certainty, one ought not to do anything in religion; for it is not a certainty. But how many things one has to do on an uncertainty!—voyages, battles! I assert, accordingly, that in this case, nothing at all should be done, for nothing is certain, and that there is more certainty in religion than there is in the hope that we shall see the morrow; for it is not certain that we shall see the morrow, but it is certainly possible that we shall not see it. One cannot say the same of religion. It is not certain that it is, but who will venture to say that it is certainly possible that it is not? But when one labors for the morrow and the uncertain, one acts rationally.

This is what I see and what troubles me. I look on all sides, and everywhere see nothing but obscurity. Nature offers me nothing that is not a subject of doubt and disquietude. If I saw nothing there which indicated a Deity, I would decide not to believe in him. If I saw everywhere evidences of a Creator, I would rest peacefully in faith. But seeing too much for denial and too little for assurance, I am in a lamentable state, and have wished a hundred times that if there is a God behind nature he would indicate the fact unequivocally, and that if the evidences of him which nature gives are deceptive she would suppress them entirely—that she would tell all or nothing, so that I might see the course which I should follow. Instead of this, in my present state—ignorant of what I am and of what I ought to do—I know neither my condition nor my duty. My heart desires utterly to know where the true good is, that I may pursue it. Nothing would, for me, be too costly for eternity.

VOLTAIRE

Candide

[The first four chapters tell of Candide's rearing in a beautiful castle and of his being sent away from it; of his experiences in Bulgaria; and of his meeting with the learned Doctor Pangloss.]

V

TEMPEST, SHIPWRECK, EARTHQUAKE, AND WHAT BECAME OF DOCTOR PANGLOSS, CANDIDE, AND JAMES THE ANABAPTIST

Half dead of that inconceivable anguish which the rolling of a ship produces, one-half of the passengers were not even sensible of the danger. The other half shrieked and prayed. The sheets were rent, the masts broken, the vessel gaped. Work who would, no one heard, no one commanded. The Anabaptist being upon deck bore a hand; when a brutish sailor struck him roughly and laid him sprawling; but with the violence of the blow he himself tumbled head foremost overboard, and stuck upon a piece of the broken mast. Honest James ran to his assistance, hauled him up, and from the effort he made was precipitated into the sea in sight of the sailor, who left him to perish, without deigning to look at him. Candide drew near and saw his benefactor, who rose above the water one moment and was then swallowed up forever. He was just going to jump after him, but was prevented by the philosopher Pangloss, who demonstrated to him that the Bay of Lisbon had been made on purpose for the Anabaptist to be drowned. While he was proving this a priori, the ship foundered; all perished except Pangloss, Candide, and that brutal sailor who had drowned the good Anabaptist. The villain swam safely to the shore, while Pangloss and Candide were borne thither upon a plank.

As soon as they recovered themselves a little they walked toward Lisbon. They had some money left, with which they hoped to save themselves from starving, after they had escaped drowning. Scarcely had they reached the city, lamenting the death of their benefactor, when they felt the earth tremble under their feet. The sea swelled and foamed in the harbor, and beat to pieces the vessels riding at anchor. Whirlwinds of fire and ashes covered the streets and public places; houses fell, roofs were flung upon the pavements, and the pavements were scattered. Thirty thousand inhabitants of all ages and sexes were crushed under the ruins. The sailor, whistling and swearing, said there was booty to be gained here.

10 "What can be the sufficient reason of this phenomenon?" said Pangloss.

"This is the Last Day!" cried Candide.

The sailor ran among the ruins, facing death to find money; finding it, he took it, got drunk, and having slept himself sober, purchased the favors of the first good-natured wench whom he met on the ruins of the destroyed houses, and in the midst of the dying and the dead. Pangloss pulled him by the sleeve.

"My friend," said he, "this is not right. You sin against the universal reason; you choose your time badly."

"S'blood and fury!" answered the other; "I am a sailor and born at Batavia. Four times have I trampled upon the crucifix in four voyages to Japan; a fig for thy universal reason."

Some falling stones had wounded Candide. He lay stretched in the street covered with rubbish.

30 "Alas!" said he to Pangloss, "get me a little wine and oil; I am dying."

"This concussion of the earth is no new thing," answered Pangloss. "The city of Lima, in America, experienced the same convulsions last year; the same cause, the same effects; there is certainly a train of sulphur under ground from Lima to Lisbon."

"Nothing more probable," said Candide; "but for the love of God a little oil and wine."

"How, probable?" replied the philosopher. "I maintain that the point is capable of being demonstrated."

Candide fainted away, and Pangloss fetched him some water from a neighboring fountain. The Voltaire, Candide. François Marie Arouet (1694-1778) was born and died in Paris. He assumed the name of Voltaire. He was celebrated as a writer of dramas, epic poetry, and satirical works. His last years were largely spent in Switzerland.

so imperious an air, and stalked with such intolerable pride, that those who saluted him were strongly inclined to give him a good drubbing. Cunegonde appeared to him the most beautiful he had ever met. The first thing he did was to ask whether she was not the captain's wife. The manner in which he asked the question alarmed Candide; he durst not say she was his wife, because indeed she was not; neither durst he say she was his sister, because it was not so; and although this obliging lie had been formerly much in favor among the ancients, and although it could be useful to the moderns, his soul was too pure to betray the truth.

"Miss Cunegonde," said he, "is to do me the honor to marry me, and we beseech your excellency to deign to sanction our marriage."

Don Fernando d'Ibaraa, y Figueora, y Mascarenes, y Lampourdos, y Souza, turning up his mustachios, smiled mockingly, and ordered Captain Candide to go and review his company. Candide obeyed, and the Governor remained alone with Miss Cunegonde. He declared his passion, protesting he would marry her the next day in the face of the church, or otherwise, just as should be agreeable to herself. Cunegonde asked a quarter of an hour to consider of it, to consult the old woman, and to take her resolution.

The old woman spoke thus to Cunegonde:

"Miss, you have seventy-two quarterings, and not a farthing; it is now in your power to be wife to the greatest lord in South America, who has very beautiful mustachios. Is it for you to pique yourself upon inviolable fidelity? You have been ravished by Bulgarians; a Jew and an Inquisitor have enjoyed your favors. Misfortune gives sufficient excuse. I own, that if I were in your place, I should have no scruple in marrying the Governor and in making the fortune of Captain Candide."

While the old woman spoke with all the prudence which age and experience gave, a small ship entered the port on board of which were an Alcalde and his alguazils, and this was what had happened.

As the old woman had shrewdly guessed, it was a Gray Friar who stole Cunegonde's money and jewels in the town of Badajos, when she and Candide were escaping. The Friar wanted to sell some of the diamonds to a jeweler; the jeweler knew them to be the Grand Inquisitor's. The Friar before he was hanged confessed he had stolen them. He described the persons, and the route they had taken. The flight of Cunegonde and Candide was already known. They were traced to Cadiz. A vessel was immediately sent in pursuit of them. The vessel was already in the port of Buenos Ayres. The report spread that the Alcalde was going to land, and that he was in pursuit of the murderers of my lord the Grand Inquisitor. The prudent old woman saw at once what was to be done.

"You cannot run away," said she to Cunegonde, "and you have nothing to fear, for it was not you that killed my lord; besides the Governor who loves you will not suffer you to be ill-treated; therefore stay."

Then she ran immediately to Candide.

"Fly," said she, "or in an hour you will be burnt."

There was not a moment to lose; but how could he part from Cunegonde, and where could he flee for shelter?

XIV

HOW CANDIDE AND CACAMBO WERE RECEIVED BY THE JESUITS OF PARAGUAY

Candide had brought such a valet with him from Cadiz, as one often meets with on the coasts of Spain and in the American colonies. He was a quarter Spaniard, born of a mongrel in Tucuman; he had been singing-boy, sacristan, sailor, monk, peddler, soldier, and lackey. His name was Cacambo, and he loved his master, because his master was a very good man. He quickly saddled the two Andalusian horses.

"Come, master, let us follow the old woman's advice; let us start, and run without looking behind us."

Candide shed tears.

"Oh! my dear Cunegonde! must I leave you just at a time when the Governor was going to sanction our nuptials? Cunegonde, brought to such a distance, what will become of you?"

"She will do as well as she can," said Cacambo; "the women are never at a loss; God provides for them. Let us run."

"Whither art thou carrying me? Where shall we go? What shall we do without Cunegonde?" said Candide.

"By St. James of Compostella," said Cacambo, "you were going to fight against the Jesuits; let us go to fight for them; I know the road well, I'll conduct you to their kingdom, where they will be charmed to have a captain that understands the Bulgarian exercise. You'll make a prodigious fortune; if we cannot find our account in one world, we shall in another. It is a great pleasure to see and do new things."

"You have before been in Paraguay, then?" said Candide.

"Aye, sure," answered Cacambo, "I was servant in the College of the Assumption, and am acquainted with the government of the good Fathers as well as I am with the streets of Cadiz. It is an admirable government. The kingdom is upwards of three hundred leagues in diameter, and divided into thirty provinces; there the Fathers possess all, and the people nothing; it is a masterpiece of reason and justice. For my part I see nothing so divine as the Fathers who here make war upon the kings of Spain and Portugal, and in Europe confess those kings; who here kill Spaniards, and in Madrid send them to heaven; this delights me, let us push forward. You are going to be the happiest of mortals. What pleasure will it be to those Fathers to hear that a captain who knows the Bulgarian exercise has come to them!"

As soon as they reached the first barrier, Cacambo told the advanced guard that a captain wanted to speak with my lord the Commandant. Notice was given to the main guard, and immediately a Paraguayan officer ran and laid himself at the feet of the Commandant, to impart this news to him. Candide and Cacambo were disarmed, and their two Andalusian horses seized. The strangers were introduced between two files of musketeers; the Commandant was at the further end, with the three-cornered cap on his head, his gown tucked up, a sword by his side, and a spontoon in his hand. He beckoned, and straightway the newcomers were encompassed by four-and-twenty soldiers. A sergeant told them they must wait, that the Commandant could not speak to them, and that the reverend Father Provincial does not suffer any Spaniard to open his mouth but in his presence, or to stay above three hours in the province.

"And where is the reverend Father Provincial?" said Cacambo.

"He is upon parade just after celebrating mass," answered the sergeant, "and you cannot kiss his spurs till three hours hence."

"However," said Cacambo, "the captain is not a Spaniard, but a German, he is ready to perish with hunger as well as myself; cannot we have something for breakfast, while we wait for his reverence?"

The sergeant went immediately to acquaint the Commandant with what he had heard.

"God be praised!" said the reverend Commandant, "since he is a German, I may speak to him; take him to my arbor."

Candide was at once conducted to a beautiful summerhouse, ornamented with a very pretty colonnade of green and gold marble, and with trellises, enclosing parraquets, humming-birds, fly-birds, guinea-hens, and all other rare birds. An excellent breakfast was provided in vessels of gold; and while the Paraguayans were eating maize out of wooden dishes, in the open fields and exposed to the heat of the sun, the reverend Father Commandant retired to his arbor.

He was a very handsome young man, with a full face, white skin but high in color; he had an arched eyebrow, a lively eye, red ears, vermilion lips, a bold air, but such a boldness as neither belonged to a Spaniard nor a Jesuit. They returned their arms to Candide and Cacambo, and also the two Andalusian horses; to whom Cacambo gave some oats to eat just by the arbor, having an eye upon them all the while for fear of a surprise.

Candide first kissed the hem of the Commandant's robe, then they sat down to table.

"You are, then, a German?" said the Jesuit to him in that language.

"Yes, reverend Father," answered Candide.

As they pronounced these words they looked at each other with great amazement, and with such an emotion as they could not conceal.

"And from what part of Germany do you come?" said the Jesuit.

"I am from the dirty province of Westphalia," answered Candide; "I was born in the Castle of Thunder-ten-Tronckh."

"Oh! Heavens! is it possible?" cried the Commandant.

"What a miracle!" cried Candide.

"Is it really you?" said the Commandant.

"It is not possible!" said Candide.

They drew back; they embraced; they shed rivulets of tears.

"What, is it you, reverend Father? You, the brother of the fair Cunegonde! You, that was slain by the Bulgarians! You, the Baron's son! You, a Jesuit in Paraguay! I must confess this is a strange world that we live in. Oh, Pangloss! Pangloss! how glad you would be if you had not been hanged!"

The Commandant sent away the negro slaves and the Paraguayans, who served them with liquors in goblets of rock-crystal. He thanked God and St. Ignatius a thousand times; he clasped Candide in his arms; and their faces were all bathed with tears.

"You will be more surprised, more affected, and transported," said Candide, "when I tell you that Cunegonde, your sister, whom you believe to have been ripped open, is in perfect health."

"Where?"

"In your neighborhood, with the Governor of Buenos Ayres; and I was going to fight against you."

Every word which they uttered in this long conversation but added wonder to wonder. Their souls fluttered on their tongues, listened in their ears, and sparkled in their eyes. As they were Germans, they sat a good while at table, waiting for the reverend Father Provincial, and the Commandant spoke to his dear Candide as follows.

HOW CANDIDE KILLED THE BROTHER OF HIS DEAR CUNEGONDE

"I shall have ever present to my memory the dreadful day, on which I saw my father and mother killed, and my sister ravished. When the Bulgarians retired, my dear sister could not be found; but my mother, my father, and myself, with two maid-servants and three little boys all of whom had been slain, were put in a hearse, to be conveyed for interment to a chapel belonging to the Jesuits, within two leagues of our family seat. A Jesuit sprinkled us with some holy water; it was³⁰ horribly salt; a few drops of it fell into my eyes; the father perceived that my eye-lids stirred a little; he put his hand upon my heart and felt it beat. I received assistance, and at the end of three weeks I recovered. You know, my dear Candide, I was pretty; but I grew much prettier, and the reverend Father Didrie, Superior of that House, conceived the tenderest friendship for me; he gave me the habit of the order, some years after I was sent to Rome. The Father-General needed new levies of⁴⁰ young German-Jesuits. The sovereigns of Paraguay admit as few Spanish Jesuits as possible; they prefer those of other nations as being more subordinate to their commands. I was judged fit by the reverend Father-General to go and work in this vineyard. We set out—a Pole, a Tyrolese, and myself. Upon my arrival I was honored with a sub-deaconship and a lieutenancy. I am today colonel and priest. We shall give a warm reception to the King of Spain's troops; I will answer for it that⁵⁰ they shall be excommunicated and well beaten. Providence sends you here to assist us. But is it, indeed, true that my dear sister Cunegonde is in the neighborhood, with the Governor of Buenos Ayres?"

Candide assured him on oath that nothing was more true, and their tears began afresh.

The Baron could not refrain from embracing Candide; he called him his brother, his savior.

"Ah! perhaps," said he, "we shall together, my dear Candide, enter the town as conquerors, and recover my sister Cunegonde."

"That is all I want," said Candide, "for I intended to marry her, and I still hope to do so."

"You insolent!" replied the Baron, "would you have the impudence to marry my sister who has seventy-two quarterings! I find thou hast the most consummate effrontery to dare to mention so presumptuous a design!"

Candide, petrified at this speech, made answer: "Reverend Father, all the quarterings in the world signify nothing; I rescued your sister from²⁰ the arms of a Jew and of an Inquisitor; she has great obligations to me, she wishes to marry me; Master Pangloss always told me that all men are equal, and certainly I will marry her."

"We shall see that, thou scoundrel!" said the Jesuit Baron de Thunder-ten-Tronckh, and that instant struck him across the face with the flat of his sword. Candide in an instant drew his rapier, and plunged it up to the hilt in the Jesuit's belly; but in pulling it out reeking hot, he burst into³⁰ tears.

"Good God!" said he, "I have killed my old master, my friend, my brother-in-law! I am the best-natured creature in the world, and yet I have already killed three men, and of these three two were priests."

Cacambo, who stood sentry by the door of the arbor, ran to him.

"We have nothing more for it than to sell our lives as dearly as we can," said his master to him, "without doubt someone will soon enter the arbor, and we must die sword in hand."

Cacambo, who had been in a great many scrapes in his lifetime, did not lose his head; he took the Baron's Jesuit habit, put it on Candide, gave him the square cap, and made him mount on horseback. All this was done in the twinkling of an eye.

"Let us gallop fast, master, everybody will take you for a Jesuit, going to give directions to your men, and we shall have passed the frontiers before they will be able to overtake us."

He flew as he spoke these words, crying out aloud in Spanish:

"Make way, make way, for the reverend Father Colonel."

XVII

ARRIVAL OF CANDIDE AND HIS VALET AT EL DORADO, AND WHAT THEY SAW THERE

"You see," said Cacambo to Candide, as soon as they had reached the frontiers of the Oreillons, "that this hemisphere is not better than the others—take my word for it; let us go back to Europe by ¹⁰ the shortest way."

"How go back?" said Candide, "and where shall we go—to my own country? The Bulgarians and the Abares are slaying all; to Portugal? there I shall be burnt; and if we abide here we are every moment in danger of being spitted. But how can I resolve to quit a part of the world where my dear Cunegonde resides?"

"Let us turn toward Cayenne," said Cacambo, "there we shall find Frenchmen, who wander all ²⁰ over the world; they may assist us; God will perhaps have pity on us."

It was not easy to get to Cayenne; they knew vaguely in which direction to go, but rivers, precipices, robbers, savages, obstructed them all the way. Their horses died of fatigue. Their provisions were consumed; they fed a whole month upon wild fruits, and found themselves at last near a little river bordered with cocoa trees, which sustained their lives and their hopes.

Cacambo, who was as good a counselor as the old woman, said to Candide:

"We are able to hold out no longer; we have walked enough. I see an empty canoe near the river-side; let us fill it with cocoanuts, throw ourselves into it, and go with the current; a river always leads to some inhabited spot. If we do not find pleasant things we shall at least find new things."

"With all my heart," said Candide, "let us ⁴⁰ recommend ourselves to Providence."

They rowed a few leagues, between banks, in some places flowery, in others barren; in some parts smooth, in others rugged. The stream ever widened, and at length lost itself under an arch of frightful rocks which reached to the sky. The two travelers had the courage to commit themselves to the current. The river, suddenly contracting at this place, whirled them along with a dreadful noise and rapidity. At the end of four-and-twenty hours ⁵⁰ they saw daylight again, but their canoe was dashed to pieces against the rocks. For a league they had to creep from rock to rock, until at length they discovered an extensive plain, bounded by inaccessible mountains. The country was cultivated as much for pleasure as for necessity. On all sides the useful was also the beautiful. The roads were covered, or rather adorned, with carriages of a glittering form and substance, in which were men and women of surprising beauty, drawn by large red sheep which surpassed in fleetness the finest coursers of Andalusia, Tetuan, and Mequinez.

"Here, however, is a country," said Candide, "which is better than Westphalia."

He stepped out with Cacambo toward the first village which he saw. Some children dressed in tattered brocades played at quoits on the outskirts. Our travelers from the outer world amused themselves by looking on. The quoits were large round pieces, yellow, red, and green, which cast a singular luster! The travelers picked a few of them off the ground; this was of gold, that of emeralds, the ^{other of rubies—the least of them would have been the greatest ornament on the Mogul's throne.}

"Without doubt," said Cacambo, "these children must be the king's sons that are playing at quoits!"

The village schoolmaster appeared at this moment and called them to school.

"There," said Candide, "is the preceptor of the royal family."

The little truants immediately quitted their ³⁰ game, leaving the quoits on the ground with all their other playthings. Candide gathered them up, ran to the master, and presented them to him in a most humble manner, giving him to understand by signs that their royal highnesses had forgotten their gold and jewels. The schoolmaster, smiling, flung them upon the ground; then, looking at Candide with a good deal of surprise, went about his business.

The travelers, however, took care to gather up the gold, the rubies, and the emeralds.

"Where are we?" cried Candide. "The king's children in this country must be well brought up, since they are taught to despise gold and precious stones."

Cacambo was as much surprised as Candide. At length they drew near the first house in the village. It was built like an European palace. A crowd of people pressed about the door, and there were still more in the house. They heard most agreeable music, and were aware of a delicious odor of cooking. Cacambo went up to the door and heard they were talking Peruvian; it was his mother tongue, for it is well known that Cacambo was born in Tucuman, in a village where no other language was spoken.

"I will be your interpreter here," said he to Candide; "let us go in, it is a public-house."

Immediately two waiters and two girls, dressed in cloth of gold, and their hair tied up with ribbons, invited them to sit down to table with the landlord. They served four dishes of soup, each garnished with two young parrots; a boiled condor which weighed two hundred pounds; two roasted monkeys, of excellent flavor; three hundred humming-birds in one dish, and six hundred fly-birds in another; exquisite ragouts; delicious pastries; the whole served up in dishes of a kind of rock-crystal. The waiters and girls poured out several liqueurs drawn from the sugar-cane.

Most of the company were chapmen and wagoners, all extremely polite; they asked Cacambo a few questions with the greatest circumspection, and answered his in the most obliging manner.

As soon as dinner was over, Cacambo believed as well as Candide that they might well pay their reckoning by laying down two of those large gold pieces which they had picked up. The landlord and landlady shouted with laughter and held their sides. When the fit was over:

"Gentlemen," said the landlord, "it is plain you are strangers, and such guests we are not accustomed to see; pardon us therefore for laughing when you offered us the pebbles from our high-roads in payment of your reckoning. You doubtless have not the money of the country; but it is not necessary to have any money at all to dine in this house. All hostelrys established for the convenience of commerce are paid by the government. You have fared but very indifferently because this is a poor village; but everywhere else, you will be received as you deserve."

Cacambo explained this whole discourse with great astonishment to Candide, who was as greatly astonished to hear it.

"What sort of a country then is this," said they to one another; "a country unknown to all the rest of the world, and where nature is of a kind so different from ours? It is probably the country where all is well; for there absolutely must be one such place. And, whatever Master Pangloss might say, I often found that things went very ill in Westphalia."

XVIII

WHAT THEY SAW IN THE COUNTRY OF EL DORADO

Cacambo expressed his curiosity to the landlord, who made answer:

"I am very ignorant, but not the worse on that account. However, we have in this neighborhood an old man retired from the Court who is the most learned and most communicative person in the kingdom."

At once he took Cacambo to the old man. Candide acted now only a second character, and accompanied his valet. They entered a very plain house, for the door was only of silver, and the ceilings were only of gold, but wrought in so elegant a taste as to vie with the richest. The antechamber, indeed, was only encrusted with rubies and emeralds, but the order in which everything was arranged made amends for this great simplicity.

The old man received the strangers on his sofa, which was stuffed with humming-birds' feathers, and ordered his servants to present them with liqueurs in diamond goblets; after which he satisfied their curiosity in the following terms:

"I am now one hundred and seventy-two years old, and I learnt of my late father, Master of the Horse to the King, the amazing revolutions of Peru, of which he had been an eye-witness. The kingdom we now inhabit is the ancient country of the Incas, who quitted it very imprudently to conquer another part of the world, and were at length destroyed by the Spaniards.

"More wise by far were the princes of their family, who remained in their native country; and they ordained, with the consent of the whole nation, that none of the inhabitants should ever be permitted to quit this little kingdom; and this has preserved our innocence and happiness. The Spaniards have had a confused notion of this country, and have called it El Dorado; and an Englishman, whose name was Sir Walter Raleigh, came very near it about a hundred years ago; but being surrounded by inaccessible rocks and precipices, we have hitherto been sheltered from the rapaciousness of European nations, who have an inconceivable passion for the pebbles and dirt of our land, for the sake of which they would murder us to the last man."

The conversation was long: it turned chiefly on their form of government, their manners, their women, their public entertainments, and the arts. At length Candide, having always had a taste for metaphysics, made Cacambo ask whether there was any religion in that country.

The old man reddened a little.

"How then," said he, "can you doubt it? Do you take us for ungrateful wretches?"

Cacambo humbly asked, "What was the religion in El Dorado?"

The old man reddened again.

"Can there be two religions?" said he. "We have, I believe, the religion of all the world: we worship God night and morning."

"Do you worship but one God?" said Cacambo, who still acted as interpreter in representing Candide's doubts.

"Surely," said the old man, "there are not two, nor three, nor four. I must confess the people from your side of the world ask very extraordinary ques-¹⁰ tions."

Candide was not yet tired of interrogating the good old man; he wanted to know in what manner they prayed to God in El Dorado.

"We do not pray to Him," said the worthy sage; "we have nothing to ask of Him; He has given us all we need, and we return Him thanks without ceasing."

Candide having a curiosity to see the priests asked where they were. The good old man smiled.²⁰

"My friend," said he, "we are all priests. The King and all the heads of families sing solemn canticles of thanksgiving every morning, accompanied by five or six thousand musicians."

"What! have you no monks who teach, who dispute, who govern, who cabal, and who burn people that are not of their opinion?"

"We must be mad, indeed, if that were the case," said the old man; "here we are all of one opinion, and we know not what you mean by³⁰ monks."

During this whole discourse Candide was in raptures, and he said to himself:

"This is vastly different from Westphalia and the Baron's castle. Had our friend Pangloss seen El Dorado he would no longer have said that the castle of Thunder-ten-Tronckh was the finest upon earth. It is evident that one must travel."

After this long conversation the old man ordered a coach and six sheep to be got ready, and twelve⁴⁰ of his domestics to conduct the travelers to Court.

"Excuse me," said he, "if my age deprives me of the honor of accompanying you. The King will receive you in a manner that cannot displease you; and no doubt you will make an allowance for the customs of the country, if some things should not be to your liking."

Candide and Cacambo got into the coach, the six sheep flew, and in less than four hours they⁵⁰ reached the King's palace situated at the extremity of the capital. The portal was two hundred and twenty feet high, and one hundred wide; but words are wanting to express the materials of which it was built. It is plain such materials must have prodigious superiority over those pebbles and sand which we call gold and precious stones.

Twenty beautiful damsels of the King's guard received Candide and Cacambo as they alighted from the coach, conducted them to the bath, and dressed them in robes woven of the down of humming-birds; after which the great crown officers, of both sexes, led them to the King's apartment, between two files of musicians, a thousand on each side. When they drew near to the audience chamber Cacambo asked one of the great officers in what way he should pay his obeisance to his Majesty; whether they should throw themselves upon their knees or on their stomachs; whether they should put their hands upon their heads or behind their backs; whether they should lick the dust off the floor; in a word, what was the ceremony?

"The custom," said the great officer, "is to embrace the King, and to kiss him on each cheek."

Candide and Cacambo threw themselves round his Majesty's neck. He received them with all the goodness imaginable, and politely invited them to supper.

While waiting they were shown the city, and saw the public edifices raised as high as the clouds, the market places ornamented with a thousand columns, the fountains of spring water, those of rose water, those of liqueurs drawn from sugarcane, incessantly flowing into the great squares, which were paved with a kind of precious stone, which gave off a delicious fragrance like that of cloves and cinnamon. Candide asked to see the court of justice, the parliament. They told him they had none, and that they were strangers to lawsuits. He asked if they had any prisons, and they answered no. But what surprised him most and gave him the greatest pleasure was the palace of sciences, where he saw a gallery two thousand feet long, and filled with instruments employed in mathematics and physics.

After rambling about the city the whole afternoon, and seeing but a thousandth part of it, they were reconducted to the royal palace, where Candide sat down to table with his Majesty, his valet Cacambo, and several ladies. Never was there a better entertainment, and never was more wit shown at a table than that which fell from his Majesty. Cacambo explained the King's bon-mots to Candide, and notwithstanding they were translated they still appeared to be bon-mots. Of all the things that surprised Candide this was not the least.

er there be evil or good? When his highness sends a ship to Egypt, does he trouble his head whether the mice on board are at their ease or not?"

"What, then, must we do?" said Pangloss.

"Hold your tongue," answered the Dervish.

"I was in hopes," said Pangloss, "that I should reason with you a little about causes and effects, about the best of possible worlds, the origin of evil, the nature of the soul, and the pre-established harmony."

At these words, the Dervish shut the door in their faces.

During this conversation, the news was spread that two Viziers and the Mufti had been strangled at Constantinople, and that several of their friends had been impaled. This catastrophe made a great noise for some hours. Pangloss, Candide, and Martin, returning to the little farm, saw a good old man taking the fresh air at his door under an orange bower. Pangloss, who was as inquisitive as he was argumentative, asked the old man what was the name of the strangled Mufti.

"I do not know," answered the worthy man, "and I have not known the name of any Mufti, nor of any Vizier. I am entirely ignorant of the event you mention; I presume in general that they who meddle with the administration of public affairs die sometimes miserably, and that they deserve it; but I never trouble my head about what is transacting at Constantinople; I content myself with sending there for sale the fruits of the garden which I cultivate."

Having said these words, he invited the strangers into his house; his two sons and two daughters presented them with several sorts of sherbet, which they made themselves, with Kaimak enriched with the candied-peel of citrons, with oranges, lemons, pineapples, pistachio-nuts, and Mocha coffee unadulterated with the bad coffee of Batavia or the American islands. After which the two daughters of the honest Mussulman perfumed the strangers' beards.

"You must have a vast and magnificent estate," said Candide to the Turk.

"I have only twenty acres," replied the old man; "I and my children cultivate them; our labor preserves us from three great evils—weariness, vice, and want."

Candide, on his way home, made profound reflections on the old man's conversation.

"This honest Turk," said he to Pangloss and Martin, "seems to be in a situation far preferable to that of the six kings with whom we had the honor of supping."

"Grandeur," said Pangloss, "is extremely dangerous according to the testimony of philosophers. For, in short, Eglon, King of Moab, was assassinated by Ehud; Absalom was hung by his hair, and pierced with three darts; King Nadab, the son of Jeroboam, was killed by Baasa; King Ela by Zimri; Ahaziah by Jehu; Athaliah by Jehoiada; the Kings Jehoiakim, Jeconiah, and Zedekiah, were led into captivity. You know how perished Cræsus, Astyages, Darius, Dionysius of Syracuse, Pyrrhus, Perseus, Hannibal, Jugurtha, Ariovistus, Cæsar, Pompey, Nero, Otho, Vitellius, Domitian, Richard II of England, Edward II, Henry VI, Richard III, Mary Stuart, Charles I, the three Henrys of France, the Emperor Henry IV! You know—"

"I know also," said Candide, "that we must cultivate our garden."

"You are right," said Pangloss, "for when man was first placed in the Garden of Eden, he was put there ut operaretur eum, that he might cultivate it; which shows that man was not born to be idle."

"Let us work," said Martin, "without disputing; it is the only way to render life tolerable."

The whole little society entered into this laudable design, according to their different abilities. Their little plot of land produced plentiful crops. Cunegonde was, indeed, very ugly, but she became an excellent pastry cook; Paquette worked at embroidery; the old woman looked after the linen. They were all, not excepting Friar Giroflée, of some service or other; for he made a good joiner, and became a very honest man.

Pangloss sometimes said to Candide:

"There is a concatenation of events in this best of all possible worlds: for, if you had not been kicked out of a magnificent castle for love of Miss Cunegonde: if you had not walked over America: if you had not stabbed the Baron: if you had not lost all your sheep from the fine country of El Dorado: you would not be here eating preserved citrons and pistachio-nuts."

"All that is very well," answered Candide, "but let us cultivate our garden."

JEAN-JACQUES ROUSSEAU

A Discourse on Inequality

The first man, who, after enclosing a piece of ground, took it into his head to say, "This is mine," and found people simple enough to believe him, was the true founder of civil society. How many crimes, how many wars, how many murders, how many misfortunes and horrors, would that man have saved the human species, who pulling up the stakes or filling up the ditches should have cried to his fellows: Be sure not to listen to this impostor; you are lost, if you forget that the fruits of the earth belong equally to us all, and the earth itself to nobody! But it is highly probable that things were now come to such a pass, that they could not continue much longer in the same way; for as this idea of property depends on several prior ideas which could only spring up gradually one after another, it was not formed all at once in the human mind: men must have made great progress; they must have acquired a great stock of industry and knowledge, and transmitted and increased it from age to age before they could arrive at this last term of the state of nature. Let us therefore take up things a little higher, and collect into one point of view, and in their most natural order, this slow succession of events and mental improvements.

The first sentiment of man was that of his existence, his first care that of preserving it. The production of the earth yielded him all the assistance he required; instinct prompted him to make use of them. Among the various appetites, which made him at different times experience different modes of existence, there was one that excited him to perpetuate his species; and this blind propensity, quite void of anything like pure love or affection, produced nothing but an act that was merely animal. The present heat once allayed, the sexes took no further notice of each other, and even the child ceased to have any tie in his mother, the moment he ceased to want her assistance.

Such was the condition of infant man; such was the life of an animal confined at first to pure sensations, and so far from harboring any thought of forcing her gifts from nature, that he scarcely availed himself of those which she offered to him of her own accord. But difficulties soon arose, and there was a necessity for learning how to surmount them: the height of some trees, which prevented his reaching their fruits; the competition of other animals equally fond of the same fruits; the fierceness of many that even aimed at his life; these were so many circumstances, which obliged him to apply to bodily exercise. There was a necessity for becoming active, swift-footed, and sturdy in battle. The natural arms, which are stones and the branches of trees, soon offered themselves to his assistance. He learned to surmount the obstacles of nature, to contend in case of necessity with other animals, to dispute his subsistence even with other men, or indemnify himself for the loss of whatever he found himself obliged to part with to the strongest.

In proportion as the human species grew more numerous, and extended itself, its pain likewise multiplied and increased. The difference of soils, climates and seasons, might have forced men to observe some differences in their way of living. Bad harvests, long and severe winters, and scorching summers, which parched up all the fruits of the earth, required extraordinary exertions of industry. On the sea shore, and the banks of rivers they invented the line and the hook, and became fishermen and ichthyophagous. In the forests they made themselves bows and arrows, and became huntsmen and warriors. In the cold countries they covered themselves with the skins of the beasts they had killed; thunder, a volcano, or some happy accident made them acquainted with fire, a new resource against the rigors of winter: they discovered the method of preserving this element, then that of reproducing it, and lastly the way of preparing with it the flesh of animals, which heretofore they devoured raw from the carcass.

This reiterated application of various beings to himself, and to one another, must have naturally engendered in the mind of man the idea of certain relations. These relations, which we express by the words, great, little, strong, weak, swift, slow, fearful, bold, and the like, compared occasionally, and almost without thinking of it, produced in him some kind of reflection, or rather a mechanical prudence, which pointed out to him the precautions most essential to his preservation and safety.

The new lights resulting from this development increased his superiority over other animals, by making him sensible of it. He laid himself out to ensnare them; he played them a thousand tricks; and though several surpassed him in strength or in swiftness, he in time became the master of those that could be of any service to him, and a sore enemy to those that could do him any mischief. 'Tis thus, that the first look he gave into himself produced the first emotion of pride in him; 'tis thus that, at a time he scarce knew how to distinguish between the different ranks of existence, by attributing to his species the first rank among animals in general, he prepared himself at a distance to pretend to it as an individual among those of his own species in particular.

Though other men were not to him what they are to us, and he had scarce more intercourse with them than with other animals, they were not overlooked in his observations. The conformities, which in time he might discover between them, and between himself and his female, made him judge of those he did not perceive; and seeing that they all behaved as himself would have done in similar circumstances, he concluded that their manner of thinking and willing was quite conformable to his own; and this important truth, when once engraved deeply on his mind, made him follow, by a presentiment as sure as any logic, and withal much quicker, the best rules of conduct, which for the sake of his own safety and advantage it was proper he should observe towards them.

Instructed by experience that the love of happiness is the sole principle of all human actions, he found himself in a condition to distinguish the few cases, in which common interest might authorize him to build upon the assistance of his fellow, and those still fewer, in which a competition of interests might justly render it suspected. In the first case he united with them in the same flock, or at most by some kind of free association which obliged none of its members, and lasted no longer than the transitory necessity that had given birth to it. In the second case everyone aimed at his own private advantage, either by open force if he found himself strong enough, or by cunning and address if he thought himself too weak to use violence.

Such was the manner in which men might have insensibly acquired some gross idea of their mutual engagements and the advantage of fulfilling them, but this only as far as their present and sensible interest required; for as to foresight they were utter strangers to it, and far from troubling their heads about a distant futurity, they scarce thought of the day following. Was a deer to be taken? Everyone saw that to succeed he must faithfully stand to his post; but suppose a hare to have slipped by within reach of any one of them, it is not to be doubted but he pursued it without scruple, and when he had seized his prey never reproached himself with having made his companions miss theirs.

We may easily conceive that such an intercourse scarce required a more refined language than that of crows and monkeys, which flock together almost in the same manner. Inarticulate exclamations, a great many gestures, and some imitative sounds, must have been for a long time the universal language of mankind, and by joining to these in every country some articulate and conventional sounds, of which, as I have already hinted, it is not very easy to explain the institution, there arose particular languages, but rude, imperfect, and such nearly as are to be found at this day among several savage nations. My pen straightened by the rapidity of time, the abundance of things I have to say, and the almost insensible progress of the first improvements, flies like an arrow over numberless ages, for the slower the succession of events, the quicker I may allow myself to be in relating them.

At length, these first improvements enabled man to improve at a greater rate. Industry grew perfect in proportion as the mind became more enlightened. Men soon ceasing to fall asleep under the first tree, or take shelter in the first cavern, lit upon some hard and sharp kinds of stone resembling spades or hatchets, and employed them to dig the ground, cut down trees, and with the branches build huts, which they afterwards bethought themselves of plastering over with clay or dirt. This was the epoch of a first revolution, which produced the establishment and distinction of families, and which introduced a species of property, and along with it perhaps a thousand quarrels and battles. As the strongest, however, were probably the first to make themselves cabins, which they knew they were able to defend, we may conclude that the weak found it much shorter and safer to imitate than to attempt to dislodge them: and as to those who were already provided with cabins, no one could have any great temptation to seize upon that of his neighbor, not so much because it did not belong to him, as because it could be of no service to him; and as besides to make himself master of it, he must expose himself to a very sharp conflict with the present occupiers.

The first developments of the heart were the effects of a new situation, which united husbands and wives, parents and children, under one roof; the habit of living together gave birth to the sweetest sentiments the human species is acquainted with, conjugal and paternal love. Every family became a little society, so much the more firmly united, as a mutual attachment and liberty were the only bonds of it; and it was now that the sexes, whose way of life had been hitherto the same, began to adopt different manners and customs. The women became more sedentary, and accustomed themselves to stay at home and look after the children, while the men rambled abroad in quest of subsistence for the whole family. The two sexes likewise by living a little more at their ease began to lose somewhat of their usual ferocity and sturdiness; but if on the one hand individuals became less able to engage separately with wild beasts, they on the other were more easily got together to make a common resistance against them.

In this new state of things, the simplicity and solitariness of man's life, the limitedness of his wants, and the instruments which he had invented to satisfy them, leaving him a great deal of leisure, he employed it to supply himself with several conveniences unknown to his ancestors; and this was the first yoke he inadvertently imposed upon himself, and the first source of mischief which he prepared for his children; for besides continuing in this manner to soften both body and mind, these conveniences having through use lost almost all their aptness to please, and even degenerated into real wants, the privation of them became far more intolerable than the possession of them had been agreeable; to lose them was a misfortune, to possess them no happiness.

Here we may a little better discover how the use of speech insensibly commences or improves in the bosom of every family, and may likewise from conjectures concerning the manner in which divers particular causes might have propagated language, and accelerated its progress by rendering it every day more and more necessary. Great inundations or earthquakes surrounded inhabited districts with water or precipices, portions of the continent were by revolutions of the globe torn off and split into islands. It is obvious that among men thus collected, and forced to live together, a common idiom must have started up much sooner, than among those who freely wandered through the forests of the main land. Thus it is very possible that the inhabitants of the islands formed in this manner, after their first essays in navigation, brought among us the use of speech; and it is very probable at least that society and languages commenced in islands and even acquired perfection there, before the inhabitants of the continent knew anything of either.

Everything now begins to wear a new aspect. Those who heretofore wandered through the woods, by taking to a more settled way of life, gradually flock together, coalesce into several separate bodies, and at length form in every country distinct nations, united in character and manners, not by any laws or regulations, but by a uniform manner of life, a sameness of provisions, and the common influence of the climate. A permanent neighborhood must at last infallibly create some connection between different families. The transitory commerce required by nature soon produced, among the youth of both sexes living in contiguous cabins, another kind of commerce, which besides being equally agreeable is rendered more durable by mutual intercourse. Men begin to consider different objects, and to make comparisons; they insensibly acquire ideas of merit and beauty, and these soon produce sentiments of preference. By seeing each other often they contract a habit, which makes it painful not to see each other always. Tender and agreeable sentiments steal into the soul, and are by the smallest opposition wound up into the most impetuous fury: Jealousy kindles with love; discord triumphs; and the gentlest of passions requires sacrifices of human blood to appease it.

In proportion as ideas and sentiments succeed each other, and the head and the heart exercise themselves, men continue to shake off their original wildness, and their connections become more intimate and extensive. They now begin to assemble round a great tree: singing and dancing, the genuine offspring of love and leisure, become the amusement or rather the occupation of the men and women, free from care, thus gathered together. Everyone begins to survey the rest, and wishes to be surveyed himself; and public esteem acquires a value. He who sings or dances best; the hand-somest, the strongest, the most dexterous, the most eloquent, comes to be the most respected: this was the first step towards inequality, and at the same time towards vice. From these first preferences there proceeded on one side vanity and contempt, on the other envy and shame; and the fermentation raised by these new leavens at length produced combinations fatal to happiness and innocence.

Men no sooner began to set a value upon each other, and know what esteem was, than each laid claim to it, and it was no longer safe for any man to refuse it to another. Hence the first duties of civility and politeness, even among savages; and hence every voluntary injury became an affront, as besides the mischief, which resulted from it as an injury, the party offended was sure to find in it a contempt for his person more intolerable than the mischief itself. It was thus that every man, punishing the contempt expressed for him by others in proportion to the value he set upon himself, the effects of revenge became terrible, and men learned to be sanguinary and cruel. Such precisely was the degree attained by most of the savage nations with whom we are acquainted. And it is for want of sufficiently distinguishing ideas, and observing at how great a distance these people were from the first state of nature, that so many authors have hastily concluded that man is naturally cruel, and requires a regular system of police to be reclaimed; whereas nothing can be more gentle than he in his primitive state, when placed by nature at an equal distance from the stupidity of brutes, and the pernicious good sense of civilized man; and equally confined by instinct and reason to the care of providing against the mischief which threatens him, he is withheld by natural compassion from doing any injury to others, so far from being ever so little prone even to return that which he has received. For according to the axiom of the wise Locke, Where there is no property, there can be no injury.

But we must take notice, that the society now formed and the relations now established among men required in them qualities different from those, which they derived from their primitive constitution; that as a sense of morality began to insinuate itself into human actions, and every man, before the enacting of laws, was the only judge and avenger of the injuries he had received, that goodness of heart suitable to the pure state of nature by no means suited infant society; that it was necessary punishments should become severer in the same proportion that the opportunities of offending became more frequent, and the dread of vengeance add strength to the too weak curb of the law. Thus, though men were become less patient, and natural compassion had already suffered some alteration, this period of the development of the human faculties, holding a just mean between the indolence of the primitive state, and the petulant activity of self-love, must have been the happiest and most durable epoch. The more we reflect on this state, the more convinced we shall be, that it was the least subject of any to revolutions, the best for man, and that nothing could have drawn him out of it but some fatal accident, which, for the public good, should never have happened. The example of the savages, most of whom have been found in this condition, seems to confirm that mankind was formed ever to remain in it, that this condition is the real youth of the world, and that all ulterior improvements have been so many steps, in appearance towards the perfection of individuals, but in fact towards the decrepitness of the species.

As long as men remained satisfied with their rustic cabins; as long as they confined themselves to the use of clothes made of the skins of other animals, and the use of thorns and fish-bones, in putting these skins together; as long as they continued to consider feathers and shells as sufficient ornaments, and to paint their bodies of different colors, to improve or ornament their bows and arrows, to form and scoop out with sharp-edged stones some little fishing boats, or clumsy instruments of music; in a word, as long as they undertook such works only as a single person could finish, and stuck to such arts as did not require the joint endeavors of several hands, they lived free, healthy, honest and happy, as much as their nature would admit, and continued to enjoy with each other all the pleasures of an independent intercourse; but from the moment one man began to stand in need of another's assistance; from the moment it appeared an advantage for one man to possess the quantity of provisions requisite for two, all equality vanished; property started up; labor became necessary; and boundless forests became smiling fields, which it was found necessary to water with human sweat, and in which slavery and misery were soon seen to sprout out and grow with the fruits of the earth.

HONORÉ DE BALZAC

Gold

At this time I was living in a little street which no doubt you do not know, la rue de Lesdiguières; it begins in la rue Saint Antoine, opposite a fountain near la place de la Bastille, and ends in la rue de la Cerisaie. The love of science had thrown me into a garret where I worked all through the night; the day I spent at a neighboring library, la Bibliothèque de Monsieur. I lived frugally, accepting all the conditions of monastic life—conditions so necessary to men at work. When the weather was fine, the farthest I went was for a walk on le boulevard Bourdon. One passion alone drew me out of my studious habits; but even that was a study in itself. I used to go and watch the manners of the quarter, its inhabitants and their characters. As I was as ill-clad as the workmen and indifferent to appearances, I did not in any way put them on their guard against me; I was able to mix with them when they stood in groups, and watch them driving their bargains and disputing as they were leaving their work. With me observation had even then become intuitive; it did not neglect the body, but it penetrated further, into the soul, or rather, it grasped the exterior details so perfectly, that it at once passed beyond. It gave me the faculty of living the life of the individual upon whom it exercised itself, by allowing me to substitute myself for him, like the dervish in the Thousand-and-One Nights, who took possession of the body and soul of people over whom he pronounced certain words.

Between eleven and twelve o'clock at night I might fall in with a workman and his wife returning together from the Ambigu Comique; then I would amuse myself by following them from le boulevard du Pontaux-Choux to le boulevard Beaumarchais. First of all, the good people would talk about the piece they had seen; then, from the thread to the needle, they passed on to their own affairs. The mother would drag along her child by the hand without listening to his cries or his questions. Then the pair would count up the money to be paid them next day, and spend it in twenty different ways. Then there were details of housekeeping, grumblings about the enormous price of potatoes, or the length of the winter and the dearness of fuel; and then forcible representations as to what was owing to the baker; at last the discussion grew acrimonious, and each of them would betray his character in forcible expressions. As I listened to these people I was able to enter into their life; I felt their rags upon my back, and walked with my feet in their worn-out shoes; their desires, their wants—everything passed into my soul, or else it was my soul that passed into theirs. It was the dream of a man awake. I grew warm with them against some tyrannical foreman, or the bad customers who made them return many times without paying them. To be quit of one's own habits, to become another than oneself by an inebriation of the moral faculties, and to play this game at will—this formed my distraction.

To what do I owe this gift? Is it a kind of second sight? Is it one of those qualities which, if abused, induce madness? I have never sought to find the cause of this power; I possess it and I use it, that is all. It is enough to know that, at that time, I had decomposed the elements of the heterogeneous mass called the People—that I had analyzed it in such a way that I could set their proper value on its qualities, good and bad. I knew already the possible usefulness of the quarter, that seminary of Revolution which contains heroes, inventors, men of practical science, rogues, villains, virtues and vices, all oppressed by misery, stifled by poverty, drowned in wine, worn out by strong drink. You could not imagine how many unknown adventures, how many forgotten dramas, how many horrible and beautiful things lie hidden in this town of sorrow. Imagination will never reach the truth that lurks there, for no man can go to seek it out, the descent is too deep to discover its marvelous scenes of tragedy and comedy, its masterpieces which are born of chance.

I know not why I have kept the story I am about to relate so long without telling it; it is part of those strange tales stored in the bag whence memory draws them capriciously, like the numbers of a lottery. I have many more of them, as strange as this and as deeply buried; they will have their turn, I assure you.

One day my housekeeper, the wife of a workman, came to ask me to honor with my presence the marriage of one of her sisters. To make you understand what this marriage must have been like, I must tell you that I gave the poor creature forty sous a month; for this she came every morning to make my bed, clean my shoes, brush my clothes, sweep the room, and get ready my breakfast; the rest of her time she went to turn the handle of a machine, earning at this hard work ten sous a day. Her husband, a cabinet-maker, earned four francs. But as they had a family of three children, it was almost impossible for them to get an honest living. I never met with more thorough honesty than this man's and woman's. For five years after my leaving the district, la mère Vaillant used to come to congratulate me on my name day, and bring me a bouquet and some oranges,—and she was a woman who could never manage to save ten sous. Misery had drawn us together. I have never been able to give her more than ten francs, often borrowed on purpose. This may explain my promise to go to the wedding; I relied upon effacing myself in the poor creature's merriment.

The marriage feast, the ball, the whole entertainment took place on the first floor of a wine shop in la rue de Charenton. The room was large, papered up to the height of the tables with a filthy paper, and lit by lamps with tin reflectors; along the walls were wooden benches; in this room were twenty-four people, all dressed in their best, decked with large bouquets and ribands, their faces flushed, full of excitement, dancing as if the world were coming to an end. The bride and bridegroom were embracing to the general satisfaction, and certain hee-hees! and haw-haws! were heard, facetious, but really less indecent than the timid glances of girls who have been well brought up. The whole company expressed an animal contentment, which was somehow or other contagious. However, neither the physiognomies of the company, nor the wedding, nor in fact any of these people, have any connection with my story. Only bear in mind the strangeness of the frame. Picture to yourself the squalid, red shop, sniff the odor of the wine, listen to the howls of merriment, linger a while in this quarter, among those workmen and poor women and old men who had given themselves up to pleasure for a single night!

The orchestra was composed of three blind men from Les Quinze-Vingts; the first was violin, the second clarionet, and the third flageolet. They were paid seven francs for the night among the three. You may imagine they did not give Rossini or Beethoven at that price; they played what they chose or could; with charming delicacy, no one reproached them. Their music did such brutal violence to the drum of my ear, that, after glancing round at the company, I looked at the blind trio,—I was inclined to indulgence at once, when I recognized their uniform. The performers were in the embrasure of a window, so that you were obliged to be close to them to be able to distinguish their features; I did not go up immediately, but when I did get near them, I do not know how it was, but it was all over, the wedding party and the music disappeared; my curiosity was excited to the highest degree, for my soul passed into the body of the man who played the clarionet. The violin and the flageolet had both quite ordinary faces, the usual face of the blind, intense, attentive, and grave; but the clarionet's was a phenomenon such as arrests and absorbs the attention of a philosopher or an artist.

Imagine a plaster mask of Dante, lit up by the red glow of the lamp and crowned with a forest of silver-white hair. The bitter, sorrowful expression of this magnificent head was intensified by blindness, for thought gave a new life to the dead eyes; it was as if a scorching light came forth from them, the product of one single, incessant desire, itself inscribed in vigorous lines upon a prominent brow, scored with wrinkles, like the courses of stone in an old wall. The old man breathed into his instrument at random, without paying the least attention to the measure or the air; his fingers rose and fell as they moved the worn-out keys with mechanical unconsciousness; he did not trouble himself about making mistakes, but the dancers did not notice it any more than did my Italian's two acolytes; for I was determined he must be an Italian, and he was an Italian. There was something great and despotic in this old Homer keeping within himself an Odyssey doomed to oblivion. It was such real greatness that it still triumphed over its abject condition, a despotism so full of life that it dominated his poverty.

None of the violent passions which lead a man to good as well as to evil, and make of him a convict or a hero, were wanting in that grandly hewn, lividly Italian face. The whole was overshadowed by grizzled eyebrows which cast into shade the deep hollows beneath; one trembled lest one should see the light of thought reappear in them, as one fears to see brigands armed with torches and daggers come to the mouth of a cave. A lion dwelt within that cage of flesh, a lion whose rage was exhausted in vain against the iron of its bars. The flame of despair had sunk quenched into its ashes, the lava had grown cold; but its channels, its destructions, a little smoke, bore evidence to the violence of the eruption and the ravages of the fire. These ideas revealed in the man's appearance were as burning in his soul as they were cold upon his face.

Between dances the violin and the flageolet, gravely occupied with their bottle and glass, hung their instruments on to the button of their reddish-colored coats, stretched out their hands toward a little table placed in the embrasure of the window and on which was their canteen, and offered a full glass to the Italian;—he could not take it himself, as the table was always behind his chair;—he thanked them by a friendly gesture of the head. Their movements were accomplished with that precision which is always so astonishing in the blind of Les Quinze-Vingts, it almost makes you believe that they can see.

Presently I went up nearer to the three blind men, so as to be better able to listen to them; but when I was close to them they began to study me, and not, I suppose, recognizing a workman, they remained shy.

"What country do you come from, you who are playing the clarionet?"

"From Venice," replied the blind man, with a slight Italian accent.

"Were you born blind, or did you become blind from—"

"From an accident," he replied sharply; "it was a cursed cataract."

"Venice is a fine town; I have always had a longing to go there."

The old man's face lit up, his wrinkles worked, he was deeply moved.

"If I went there with you," he said, "you would not be losing your time."

"Don't talk to him about Venice," said the violin, "or you'll start our Doge off; especially as he has already put two bottles into his mouthpiece—that prince of ours!"

"Come, let's go on, old Quack," said the flageolet.

They all three began to play; but all the time they took to execute four country dances, the Venetian kept sniffing after me, he divined the excessive curiosity which I felt about him. His expression lost the cold, sad look; some hope—I know not what—enlivened all his features and ran like a blue flame through his wrinkles; he smiled and wiped his bold, terrible brow; in fact he grew cheerful, like a man getting on to his hobby.

"How old are you?" I asked.

"Eighty-two!"

"How long have you been blind?"

"Nearly fifty years," he replied, with an accent which showed that his regrets did not arise only from his loss of sight, but from some great power of which he must have been despoiled.

"Why is it they call you the Doge?" I asked.

"Oh, it's their joke," he said. "I am a patrician of Venice, and might have been Doge like the rest."

"What is your name then?"

"Here, le père Canet," he said. "My name could never be written on the registers different from that; but in Italian it is Marco Facino Cane, principe di Varese."

"Why! you are descended from the famous adventurer Facino Cane, whose conquests passed to the Duke of Milan?"

"True," said he. "In those days the son of Cane took refuge in Venice to avoid being killed by the Visconti, and got himself inscribed in the Golden Book. But now there is no Cane, any more than there is a book." And he made a terrible gesture of extinct patriotism and disgust for human affairs.

"But if you were a Senator of Venice, you must have been rich; how did you come to lose your fortune?"

At this question he raised his head toward me with a truly tragic movement as if to examine me, and answered, "By misfortune!"

He no longer thought of drinking, and refused by a sign the glass of wine which the old flageolet was just at that moment holding out to him, then his head sank. These details were not of a kind to extinguish my curiosity. While these three machines were playing a country dance, I watched the old Venetian noble with the feelings which devour a man of twenty. I saw Venice and the Adriatic; I saw her in ruins in the ruins of his face. I walked in that city that is so dear to its inhabitants. I went from the Rialto to the Grand Canal, from the Quay of the Slaves to the Lido; I came back to the unique, sublime Cathedral; I examined the case-ments of the Casa d'Oro, each with its different ornament; I gazed at the ancient palaces with all their wealth of marble; in a word, I saw all those marvels with which the savant sympathizes the more because he can color them to his liking, and does not rob his dreams of their poetry by the sight of the reality. I followed back the course of the life of this scion of the greatest of the condottieri, and sought to discover in him the traces of his misfortunes, and the causes of the physical and moral degradation which rendered yet more beautiful the sparks of greatness and nobleness that had just revived.

No doubt we shared the same thoughts, for I believe that blindness renders intellectual communications much more rapid, by preventing the attention from flitting away to exterior objects. The proof of our sympathy was not long in showing itself. Facino Cane stopped playing, rose from his seat, came to me, and said:

"Let us go outside!"

The effect it produced on me was like an electric douche. I gave him my arm and we went out.

When we were in the street, he said to me: "Will you take me to Venice, will you be my guide, will you have faith in me? You shall be richer than the ten richest houses in Amsterdam or London, richer than the Rothschilds, as rich as the Thousand-and-One Nights."

I thought the man was mad; but there was a power in his voice which I obeyed. I let him guide me; he led me toward the trenches of the Bastille, as if he had eyes. He sat down on a very lonely place, where the bridge connecting the Canal Saint Martin and the Seine has since been built. I placed myself on another stone in front of the old man; his white hair glistened like threads of silver in the moonlight. The silence, scarcely broken by the stormy sounds which reached us from the boulevards, the purity of the night—everything—combined to render the scene really fantastic.

"You speak of millions to a young man, and do you think he would hesitate to endure a thousand evils in order to obtain them! But you are not making fun of me?"

"May I die without confession," he said passionately, "if what I am going to tell you is not true. I was twenty—just as you are now—I was rich, handsome, and a noble. I began with the greatest of all madness—Love. I loved as men love no longer; I even hid in a chest at the risk of being stabbed to death in it, without having received anything more than the promise of a kiss. To die for her seemed to me life itself. In 1760 I became enamored of one of the Vendramini, a woman of eighteen, who was married to a Sagredo, one of the richest senators, a man of thirty, and mad about his wife. My mistress and I were as innocent as two cherubim when the husband surprised us as we were talking of love. I was unarmed; he missed me; I leaped upon him and strangled him with my two hands, wringing his neck like a chicken. I wanted to fly with Bianca, but she would not follow me. It was so like a woman! I went alone. I was condemned, and my goods were confiscated to the benefit of my heirs; but I had rolled up and carried away with me five pictures by Titian, my diamonds, and all my gold. I went to Milan, where I was left in peace, as my affair did not concern the State."

"Just one remark before I go on," he said, after a pause. "Whether the fancies of a woman when she conceives, or while she is pregnant, influence her child or not, it is certain that my mother during her pregnancy had a passion for gold. I have a monomania for gold, the satisfaction of which is so necessary to my life that, in all situations I have found myself, I have never been without gold upon me. I have a constant mania for gold. When I was young I always wore jewelry, and always carried two or three hundred ducats about with me."

As he said these words he drew two ducats out of his pocket and showed them to me.

"I feel gold. Although I am blind, I stop before jewellers' shops. This passion ruined me. I became a gambler for the sake of gambling with gold. I was not a cheat, I was cheated; I ruined myself. When I had no fortune left I was seized by a mad longing to see Bianca; I returned to Venice in secret, found her again, and was happy for six months, hidden in her house and supported by her. I used to have delicious dreams of ending my life like this. She was courted by the Provedittore; he divined he had a rival. In Italy we have an instinct for them. The dastard played the spy upon us and caught us in bed. You may guess how fierce the fight was. I did not kill him, but I wounded him very severely. This event shattered our happiness; since then I have never found another Bianca. I have enjoyed great favors; I have lived at the Court of Louis XV among the most celebrated women; I have not found anywhere the noble qualities, the charms, the love, of my dear Venetian. The Provedittore had his servants with him; he called them; they surrounded the palace, and entered. I defended myself that I might die before Bianca's eyes—she helped me to kill the Provedittore. Before, this woman had refused to fly with me; but after six months of happiness she was ready to die on my body, and received several wounds. I was taken in a large mantle which they threw over me; they rolled me up in it, carried me away in a gondola, and put me into a cell in the dungeon. I was twenty-two. I held the stump of my sword so tight that they would have been obliged to cut off my wrist in order to take it away. By a strange chance, or rather inspired by some instinct of precaution, I hid this fragment of metal in a corner as a thing of possible use to me. My wounds were dressed, none of them was mortal; at twenty-two a man recovers from anything. I was to die by beheading. I feigned sickness to gain time. I believed I was in a cell bordering on the canal; my project was to escape by undermining the wall, and risk being drowned by swimming across the canal. My hopes were founded on the following calculations. Every time the jailer brought me food I read the notices fastened on the walls, such as—The Palace; The Canal; The Subterranean Prisons. Thus I succeeded in making out a plan which caused me some little apprehension, but was to be explained by the actual state of the ducal palace, which has never been finished. With that genius which the longing to recover one's liberty gives a man, I succeeded, by feeling the surface of a stone with the tips of my fingers, in deciphering an Arabic inscription, by which the author of the work warned his successors that he had dislodged two stones of the last course of masonry and dug eleven feet underground. To continue his work, it would be necessary to spread the fragments of stone and mortar caused by the work of excavation over the floor of the cell itself. Even if the jailers and the inquisitors had not felt satisfied, that, from the construction of the building, it only needed an external guard, the arrangement of the cells, in which was a descent of several steps, allowed the floor to be gradually raised without attracting the jailer's notice. This immense labor had been superfluous at least for the unknown person who had undertaken it; its incompleteness was an evidence of his death. That his exertions might not be lost forever, it was necessary that a prisoner should know Arabic. Now I had studied the oriental languages at the Armenian monastery. A sentence written behind the stone told the unhappy man's fate; he had died a victim to his immense wealth, which was coveted and seized by Venice. It would require a month to arrive at any result. While I worked, and during those moments when I was prostrate with fatigue, I heard the sound of gold; I saw gold before me; I was dazzled by diamonds! Now, listen! One night my blunt sword touched wood. I sharpened the stump, and began to make a hole in the wood. In order to work, I used to crawl on my belly like a snake. I stripped myself and worked like a mole, with my hands in front, and using the rock itself as a fulcrum. Two nights before the day I was to appear before my judges, I determined to make one last effort during the night. I bored through the wood, and my sword touched nothing. You can imagine my amazement when I put my eye to the hole! I was in the panelled roof of a cellar, in which a dim light enabled me to see a heap of gold. In the cellar were the Doge and one of the Ten. I could hear their voices. I learned from their conversation that here was the secret treasure of the Republic, the gifts of the Doges and the reserves of booty called The last hope of Venice, a certain proportion of the spoils of all expeditions. I was saved! When the jailer came, I proposed to him to help me to escape and to fly with me, taking with us everything we could get. He had no cause to hesitate; he agreed. A ship was about to set sail for the Levant; every precaution was taken. I dictated a plan to my accomplice, and Bianca assisted in carrying it out. To avoid giving the alarm, Bianca was to join us at Smyrna. In one night we enlarged the hole and descended into the secret treasury of Venice. What a night it was! I saw four tons of pure gold. In the first chamber the silver was piled up in two even heaps, leaving a path between them by which to pass through the room; the coins formed banks, which covered the walls to the height of five feet. I thought the jailer would have gone mad; he sang, he leaped, he laughed, he gambolled about in the gold. I threatened to throttle him if he wasted the time or made a noise. In his delight he did not at first see a table where the diamonds were. I swooped down upon it so skillfully that I was able to fill my sailor's vest and the pockets of my pantaloons. My God! I did not take a third part. Under this table were ingots of gold. I persuaded my companion to fill as many sacks as we could carry with gold, pointing out to him that it was the only way to avoid being discovered in a foreign country. The pearls, jewelry, and diamonds, I told him, would lead to our being found out. In spite of our greed, we could not take more than two thousand pounds of gold, and this necessitated six journeys across the prison to the gondola. The sentinel at the water-gate had been bought with a bag containing ten pounds of gold; as for the two gondoliers, they believed they were serving the Republic. At daybreak we departed. When we were out at sea and I thought of that night, when I recalled the sensations which I had experienced, and seemed to see again that immense treasure, of which I calculated I must have left thirty millions in silver and twenty millions in gold, besides several millions in diamonds, pearls, and rubies; a feeling of madness rose within me; I had gold fever. We were landed at Smyrna; and immediately re-embarked for France. As we were going on board the French vessel, God did me the favor of relieving me of my accomplice. At the moment I did not think of all the bearings of this mishap; I was greatly rejoiced at it. We were so completely enervated that we remained in a state of torpor, without speaking, waiting until we were in a place of safety to play our parts at our ease. It is not to be wondered at that the fellow's head had been turned. You will see how God punished me. I did not consider myself safe until I had disposed of two-thirds of my diamonds in London and Amsterdam, and realized my gold dust in negotiable species. For five years I hid myself in Madrid; then in 1770 I came to Paris under a Spanish name, and lived in the most brilliant style.

"Bianca was dead.

"In the midst of my pleasures, when I was enjoying a fortune of six millions, I was struck with blindness. I concluded that this infirmity was the result of my sojourn in the prison and my labors in the dark, if indeed my faculty for seeing gold did not imply an abuse of the powers of vision and predestine me to lose my eyes. At this time I loved a woman to whom I had resolved to link my fate. I had told her the secret of my name; she belonged to a powerful family, and I had every hope from the favor shown me by Louis XV; she was a friend of Madame du Barry. I had put my trust in this woman; she advised me to consult a famous oculist in London; then, after staying in the town for some months, she deserted me in Hyde Park, robbing me of the whole of my fortune and leaving me without resources. I was obliged to conceal my name, for it would have exposed me to the vengeance of Venice. I could not invoke any one's help; I was afraid of Venice. The spies whom this woman had attached to my person had made capital out of my blindness. I spare you the history of adventures worthy of Gil Blas. Your Revolution came; I was obliged to enter at Les Quinze-Vingts; this creature got me admitted after having kept me for two years at Bicêtre as insane. I have never been able to kill her, I could not see to, and I was too poor to pay another hand. If, before I lost Benedetto Carpi, my jailer, I had consulted him on the situation of my cell, I should have been able to find the treasury again and return to Venice when the Republic was abolished by Napoleon. However, in spite of my blindness, let us go to Venice! I will find the door of the prison, I shall see the gold through the walls, I shall feel it where it lies buried beneath the waters; for the events which overturned the power of Venice are such that the secret of the treasury must have died with Vendramino, the brother of Bianca, a Doge who, I hoped, would have made my peace with the Ten. I addressed notes to the First Consul, I proposed an agreement with the Emperor of Austria; every one treated me as a madman! Come, let us start for Venice, let us start beggars; we shall come back millionaires; we will buy back my property, and you shall be my heir, you shall be Prince of Varese."

I was thunderstruck at this confidence, at the sight of that white head; before the black waters of the trenches of the Bastille sleeping as still as the canals of Venice, it assumed in my imagination the proportions of a poem. I gave no answer. Facino Cane no doubt believed that I judged him, like all the rest, with disdainful pity; he made a gesture expressive of all the philosophy of despair. Perhaps his story had carried him back to those happy days at Venice; he seized his clarionet and played with the deepest pathos a Venetian song, a barcarolle in which he recovered all his first talent—the talent which was his when he was a patrician and in love. My eyes filled with tears.

If some belated passers-by chanced to be walking along le boulevard Bourdon, I dare say they stopped to listen to this last prayer of the exile, this last regret of a lost name, mingled with memories of Bianca. But gold soon got the mastery again, and its fatal passion quenched the glimmering of youth.

"That treasure!" he said; "I see it always, waking and in my dreams; I take my walks there, the diamonds sparkle, I am not so blind as you think; gold and diamonds lighten my night, the night of the last Facino Cane, for my title passes to the Memmi. Good God! the murderer's punishment has begun betimes! Ave Maria!" . . .

He recited some prayers which I could not hear.

"We will go to Venice," I exclaimed, as he was getting up.

"Then I have found my man," he cried, with a glow upon his face. I gave him my arm and led him back; at the door of Les Quinze-Vingts he pressed my hand; just then some of the people from the wedding were going home, shouting enough to blow one's head off.

"We will start to-morrow?" said the old man.

"As soon as we have got some money."

"But we can go on foot; I will ask alms—I am strong, and when a man sees gold before him he is young."

Facino Cane died during the winter after lingering for two months. The poor man had caught a chill.

GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

A Simple Heart

Madame Aubain's servant Félicité was the envy of the ladies of Pont-l'Évêque for half a century.

She received four pounds a year. For that she was cook and general servant, and did the sewing, washing, and ironing; she could bridle a horse, fatten poultry, and churn butter—and she remained faithful to her mistress, unamiable as the latter was.

Mme. Aubain had married a gay bachelor without money who died at the beginning of 1809, leaving her with two small children and a quantity of debts. She then sold all her property except the farms of Toucques and Geffosses, which brought in two hundred pounds a year at most, and left her house in Saint-Melaine for a less expensive one that had belonged to her family and was situated behind the market.

This house had a slate roof and stood between an alley and a lane that went down to the river. There was an unevenness in the levels of the rooms which made you stumble. A narrow hall divided the kitchen from the "parlour" where Mme. Aubain spent her day, sitting in a wicker easy chair by the window. Against the panels, which were painted white, was a row of eight mahogany chairs. On an old piano under the barometer a heap of wooden and cardboard boxes rose like a pyramid. A stuffed armchair stood on either side of the Louis-Quinze chimney-piece, which was in yellow marble with a clock in the middle of it modelled like a temple of Vesta. The whole room was a little musty, as the floor was lower than the garden.

The first floor began with "Madame's" room: very large, with a pale-flowered wall-paper and a portrait of "Monsieur" as a dandy of the period. It led to a smaller room, where there were two children's cots without mattresses. Next came the drawing-room, which was always shut up and full of furniture covered with sheets. Then there was a corridor leading to a study. The shelves of a large bookcase were respectably lined with books and papers, and its three wings surrounded a broad writing-table in darkwood. The two panels at the end of the room were covered with pendrawings, water-colour landscapes, and engravings by Audran, all relics of better days and vanished splendour. Félicité's room on the top floor got its light from a dormer-window, which looked over the meadows.

She rose at daybreak to be in time for Mass, and worked till evening without stopping. Then, when dinner was over, the plates and dishes in order, and the door shut fast, she thrust the log under the ashes and went to sleep in front of the hearth with her rosary in her hand. Félicité was the stubbornest of all bargainers; and as for cleanness, the polish on her saucepans was the despair of other servants. Thrifty in all things, she ate slowly, gathering off the table in her fingers the crumbs of her loaf—a twelve-pound loaf expressly baked for her, which lasted for three weeks.

At all times of year she wore a print handkerchief fastened with a pin behind, a bonnet that covered her hair, grey stockings, a red skirt, and a bibbed apron—such as hospital nurses wear—over her jacket.

Her face was thin and her voice sharp. At twenty-five she looked like forty. From fifty onwards she seemed of no particular age; and with her silence, straight figure, and precise movements she was like a woman made of wood, and going by clockwork.

II

She had had her love-story like any other.

Her father, a mason, had been killed by falling off some scaffolding. Then her mother died, her sisters scattered, and a farmer took her in and employed her, while she was still quite little, to herd the cows at pasture. She shivered in rags and would lie flat on the ground to drink water from the ponds; she was beaten for nothing, and finally turned out for the theft of a shilling which she did not steal. She went to another farm, where she became dairy-maid; and as she was liked by her employers her companions were jealous of her.

One evening in August (she was then eighteen) they took her to the assembly at Colleville. She was dazed and stupefied in an instant by the noise of the fiddlers, the lights in the trees, the gay medley of dresses, the lace, the gold crosses, and the throng of people jiggling all together. While she kept shyly apart a young man with a well-to-do air, who was leaning on the shaft of a cart and smoking his pipe, came up to ask her to dance. He treated her to cider, coffee, and cake, and bought her a silk handkerchief; and then, imagining she had guessed his meaning, offered to see her home. At the edge of a field of oats he pushed her roughly down. She was frightened and began to cry out; and he went off.

One evening later she was on the Beaumont road. A big hay-wagon was moving slowly along; she wanted to get in front of it, and as she brushed past the wheels she recognized Theodore. He greeted her quite calmly, saying she must excuse it all because it was "the fault of the drink." She could not think of any answer and wanted to run away.

He began at once to talk about the harvest and the worthies of the commune, for his father had left Colleville for the farm at Les Écots, so that now he and she were neighbours. "Ah!" she said. He added that they thought of settling him in life. Well, he was in no hurry; he was waiting for a wife to his fancy. She dropped her head; and then he asked her if she thought of marrying. She answered with a smile that it was mean to make fun of her.

"But I am not, I swear!"—and he passed his left hand round her waist. She walked in the support of his embrace; their steps grew slower. The wind was soft, the stars glittered, the huge wagon-load of hay swayed in front of them, and dust rose from the dragging steps of the four horses. Then, without a word of command, they turned to the right. He clasped her once more in his arms, and she disappeared into the shadow.

The week after Theodore secured some assignations with her.

They met at the end of farmyards, behind a wall, or under a solitary tree. She was not innocent as young ladies are—she had learned knowledge from the animals—but her reason and the instinct of her honour would not let her fall. Her resistance exasperated Theodore's passion; so much so that to satisfy it—or perhaps quite artlessly—he made her an offer of marriage. She was in doubt whether to trust him, but he swore great oaths of fidelity.

Soon he confessed to something troublesome; the year before his parents had bought him a substitute for the army, but any day he might be taken again, and the idea of serving was a terror to him. Félicité took this cowardice of his as a sign of affection, and it redoubled hers. She stole away at night to see him, and when she reached their meeting-place Theodore racked her with his anxieties and urgings.

At last he declared that he would go himself to the prefecture for information, and would tell her the result on the following Sunday, between eleven and midnight.

When the moment came she sped towards her lover. Instead of him she found one of his friends.

He told her that she would not see Theodore any more. To ensure himself against conscription he had married an old woman, Madame Lehousais, of Toucques, who was very rich.

There was an uncontrollable burst of grief. She threw herself on the ground, screamed, called to the God of mercy, and moaned by herself in the fields till daylight came. Then she came back to the farm and announced that she was going to leave; and at the end of the month she received her wages, tied all her small belongings with a handkerchief, and went to Pont-l'Évêque.

In front of the inn there she made inquiries of a woman in a widow's cap, who, as it happened, was just looking for a cook. The girl did not know much, but her willingness seemed so great and her demands so small that Mme. Aubain ended by saying:

"Very well, then, I will take you."

A quarter of an hour afterwards Félicité was installed in her house.

She lived there at first in a tremble, as it were, at "the style of the house" and the memory of "Monsieur" floating over it all. Paul and Virginie, the first aged seven and the other hardly four, seemed to her beings of a precious substance; she carried them on her back like a horse; it was a sorrow to her that Mme. Aubain would not let her kiss them every minute. And yet she was happy there. Her grief had melted in the pleasantness of things all round.

Every Thursday regular visitors came in for a game of boston, and Félicité got the cards and footwarmers ready beforehand. They arrived punctually at eight and left before the stroke of eleven.

On Monday mornings the dealer who lodged in the covered passage spread out all his old iron on the ground. Then a hum of voices began to fill the town, mingled with the neighing of horses, bleating of lambs, grunting of pigs, and the sharp rattle of carts along the street. About noon, when the market was at its height, you might see a tall, hook-nosed old countryman with his cap pushed back making his appearance at the door. It was Robelin, the farmer of Geffosses. A little later came Liébard, the farmer from Toucques—short, red, 20 and corpulent—in a grey jacket and gaiters shod with spurs.

Both had poultry or cheese to offer their landlord. Félicité was invariably a match for their cunning, and they went away filled with respect for her.

At vague intervals Mme. Aubain had a visit from the Marquis de Gremenville, one of her uncles, who had ruined himself by debauchery and now lived at Falaise on his last remaining morsel 20 of land. He invariably came at the luncheon hour, with a dreadful poodle whose paws left all the furniture in a mess. In spite of efforts to show his breeding, which he carried to the point of raising his hat every time he mentioned "my late father," habit was too strong for him; he poured himself out glass after glass and fired off improper remarks. Félicité edged him politely out of the house—"You have had enough, Monsieur de Gremenville! Another time!"—and she shut the door on 30 him.

She opened it with pleasure to M. Bourais, who had been a lawyer. His baldness, his white stock, frilled shirt, and roomy brown coat, his way of rounding the arm as he took snuff—his whole person, in fact, created that disturbance of mind which overtakes us at the sight of extraordinary men.

As he looked after the property of "Madame" he remained shut up with her for hours in "Monsieur's" study, though all the time he was afraid 40 of compromising himself. He respected the magistracy immensely, and had some pretensions to Latin.

To combine instruction and amusement he gave the children a geography book made up of a series of prints. They represented scenes in different parts of the world: cannibals with feathers on their heads, a monkey carrying off a young lady, Bedouins in the desert, the harpooning of a whale, and so on. Paul explained these engravings to Félicité; and 50 that, in fact, was the whole of her literary education. The children's education was undertaken by Guyot, a poor creature employed at the town hall, who was famous for his beautiful hand and sharpened his penknife on his boots.

When the weather was bright the household set off early for a day at Geffosses Farm.

Its courtyard is on a slope, with the farmhouse in the middle, and the sea looks like a grey streak in the distance.

Félicité brought slices of cold meat out of her basket, and they breakfasted in a room adjoining the dairy. It was the only surviving fragment of a country house which was now no more. The wallpaper hung in tatters, and quivered in the draughts. Mme. Aubain sat with bowed head, overcome by her memories; the children became afraid to speak. "Why don't you play, then?" she would say, and off they went.

Paul climbed into the barn, caught birds, played at ducks and drakes over the pond, or hammered with his stick on the big casks which boomed 20 like drums. Virginie fed the rabbits or dashed off to pick cornflowers, her quick legs showing their embroidered little drawers.

One autumn evening they went home by the fields. The moon was in its first quarter, lighting part of the sky; and mist floated like a scarf over the windings of the Toucques. Cattle, lying out in the middle of the grass, looked quietly at the four people as they passed. In the third meadow some of them got up and made a half-circle in front of the walkers. "There's nothing to be afraid of," said Félicité, as she stroked the nearest on the back with a kind of crooning song; he wheeled round and the others did the same. But when they crossed the next pasture there was a formidable bellow. It was a bull, hidden by the mist. Mme. Aubain was about to run. "No! no! don't go so fast!" They mended their pace, however, and heard a loud breathing behind them which came nearer. His hoofs thudded on the meadow grass like hammers; why, he was galloping now! Félicité turned round, and tore up clods of earth with both hands and threw them in his eyes. He lowered his muzzle, waved his horns, and quivered with fury, bellowing terribly. Mme. Aubain, now at the end of the pasture with her two little ones, was looking wildly for a place to get over the high bank. Félicité was retreating, still with her face to the bull, keeping up a shower of clods which blinded him, and crying all the time, "Be quick! be quick!"

Mme. Aubain went down into the ditch, pushed Virginie first and then Paul, fell several times as she tried to climb the bank, and managed it at last by dint of courage.

The bull had driven Félicité to bay against a rail-fence; his slaver was streaming into her face; another second, and he would have gored her. She had just time to slip between two of the rails, and the big animal stopped short in amazement.

This adventure was talked of at Pont-l'Évêque for many a year. Félicité did not pride herself on it in the least, not having the barest suspicion that she had done anything heroic.

Virginie was the sole object of her thoughts, for the child developed a nervous complaint as a result of her fright, and M. Poupart, the doctor, advised sea-bathing at Trouville. It was not a frequented place then. Mme. Aubain collected information, consulted Bourais, and made preparations as though for a long journey.

Her luggage started a day in advance, in Liébard's cart. The next day he brought round two horses, one of which had a lady's saddle with a velvet back to it, while a cloak was rolled up to make a kind of seat on the crupper of the other. Mme. Aubain rode on that, behind the farmer. Félicité took charge of Virginie, and Paul mounted M. Lechaptois' donkey, lent on condition that great care was taken of it.

The road was so bad that its five miles took two hours. The horses sank in the mud up to their pasterns, and their haunches jerked abruptly in the effort to get out; or else they stumbled in the ruts, and at other moments had to jump. In some places Liébard's mare came suddenly to a halt. He waited patiently until she went on again, talking about the people who had properties along the road, and adding moral reflections to their history. So it was that as they were in the middle of Toucques, and passed under some windows bowered with nasturtiums, he shrugged his shoulders and said: "There's a Mme. Lehoussais lives there; instead of taking a young man she . . ." Félicité did not hear the rest; the horses were trotting and the donkey galloping. They all turned down a bypath; a gate swung open and two boys appeared; and the party dismounted in front of a manure-heap at the very threshold of the farmhouse door.

When Mme. Liébard saw her mistress she gave lavish signs of joy. She served her a luncheon with a sirloin of beef, tripe, black-pudding, a fricassee of chicken, sparkling cider, a fruit tart, and brandied plums; seasoning it all with compliments to Madame, who seemed in better health; Mademoiselle, who was "splendid" now; and Monsieur Paul, who had "filled out" wonderfully. Nor did she forget their deceased grandparents, whom the Liébards had known, as they had been in the service of the family for several generations. The farm, like them, had the stamp of antiquity. The beams on the ceiling were worm-eaten, the walls blackened with smoke, and the window-panes grey with dust. There was an oak dresser laden with every sort of useful article—jugs, plates, pewter bowls, wolf-traps, and sheep-shears; and a huge syringe made the children laugh. There was not a tree in the three courtyards without mushrooms growing at the bottom of it or a tuft of mistletoe on its boughs. Several of them had been thrown down by the wind. They had taken root again at the middle; and all were bending under their wealth of apples. The thatched roofs, like brown velvet and of varying thickness, withstood the heaviest squalls. The cart-shed, however, was falling into ruin. Mme. Aubain said she would see about it, and ordered the animals to be saddled again.

It was another half-hour before they reached Trouville. The little caravan dismounted to pass Écores—it was an overhanging cliff with boats below it—and three minutes later they were at the end of the quay and entered the courtyard of the Golden Lamb, kept by good Mme. David.

From the first days of their stay Virginie began to feel less weak, thanks to the change of air and the effect of the sea-baths. These, for want of a bathing-dress, she took in her chemise; and her nurse dressed her afterwards in a coastguard's cabin which was used by the bathers.

In the afternoons they took the donkey and went off beyond the Black Rocks, in the direction of Hennequeville. The path climbed at first through ground with dells in it like the green sward of a park, and then reached a plateau where grass fields and arable lay side by side. Hollies rose stiffly out of the briary tangle at the edge of the road; and here and there a great withered tree made zigzags in the blue air with its branches.

They nearly always rested in a meadow, with Deauville on their left, Havre on their right, and the open sea in front. It glittered in the sunshine, smooth as a mirror and so quiet that its murmur was scarcely to be heard; sparrows chirped in hiding and the immense sky arched over it all. Mme. Aubain sat doing her needlework; Virginie plaited rushes by her side; Félicité pulled up lavender, and Paul was bored and anxious to start home.

Other days they crossed the Toucques in a boat and looked for shells. When the tide went out sea-urchins, starfish, and jelly-fish were left exposed; and the children ran in pursuit of the foam-flakes which scudded in the wind. The sleepy waves broke on the sand and unrolled all along the beach; it stretched away out of sight, bounded on the land-side by the dunes which parted it from the Marsh, a wide meadow shaped like an arena. As they came home that way, Trouville, on the hill-slope in the background, grew bigger at every step, and its miscellaneous throng of houses seemed to break into a gay disorder.

On days when it was too hot they did not leave their room. From the dazzling brilliance outside light fell in streaks between the laths of the blinds. There were no sounds in the village; and on the pavement below not a soul. This silence round them deepened the quietness of things. In the distance, where men were caulking, there was a tap of hammers as they plugged the hulls, and a sluggish breeze wafted up the smell of tar.

The chief amusement was the return of the fishing-boats. They began to tack as soon as they had passed the buoys. The sails came down on two of the three masts; and they drew on with the foresail swelling like a balloon, glided through the splash of the waves, and when they had reached the middle of the harbour suddenly dropped anchor. Then the boats drew up against the quay. The sailors threw quivering fish over the side; a row of carts was waiting, and women in cotton bonnets darted out to take the baskets and give their men a kiss.

One of them came up to Félicité one day, and she entered the lodgings a little later in a state of delight. She had found a sister again—and then Nastasie Barette, "wife of Leroux," appeared, holding an infant at her breast and another child with her right hand, while on her left was a little cabin boy with his hands on his hips and a cap over his ear.

After a quarter of an hour Mme. Aubain sent them off; but they were always to be found hanging about the kitchen, or encountered in the course of a walk. The husband never appeared.

Félicité was seized with affection for them. She bought them a blanket, some shirts, and a stove; it was clear that they were making a good thing out of her. Mme. Aubain was annoyed by this weakness of hers, and she did not like the liberties taken by the nephew, who said "thee" and "thou" to Paul. So as Virginie was coughing and the fine weather gone, she returned to Pont-l'Évêque.

There M. Bourais enlightened her on the choice of a boys' school. The one at Caen was reputed to be the best, and Paul was sent to it. He said his good-byes bravely, content enough at going to live in a house where he would have companions.

Mme. Aubain resigned herself to her son's absence as a thing that had to be. Virginie thought about it less and less. Félicité missed the noise he made. But she found an occupation to distract her; from Christmas onward she took the little girl to catechism every day.

III

After making a genuflexion at the door she walked up between the double row of chairs under the lofty nave, opened Mme. Aubain's pew, sat down, and began to look about her. The choir stalls were filled with the boys on the right and the girls on the left, and the curé stood by the lectern. On a painted window in the apse the Holy Ghost looked down upon the Virgin. Another window showed her on her knees before the child Jesus, and a group carved in wood behind the altar-shrine represented St. Michael overthrowing the dragon.

The priest began with a sketch of sacred history. The Garden, the Flood, the Tower of Babel, cities in flames, dying nations, and overturned idols passed like a dream before her eyes; and the dizzying vision left her with reverence for the Most High and fear of his wrath. Then she wept at the story of the Passion. Why had they crucified Him, when He loved the children, fed the multitudes, healed the blind, and had willed, in His meekness, to be born among the poor, on the dung-heap of a stable? The sowings, harvests, wine-presses, all the familiar things the Gospel speaks of, were a part of her life. They had been made holy by God's passing; and she loved the lambs more tenderly for her love of the Lamb, and the doves because of the Holy Ghost.

She found it hard to imagine Him in person, for He was not merely a bird, but a flame as well, and a breath at other times. It may be His light, she thought, which flits at night about the edge of the marshes, His breathing which drives on the clouds, His voice which gives harmony to the bells; and she would sit rapt in adoration, enjoying the cool walls and the quiet of the church.

Of doctrines she understood nothing—did not even try to understand. The curé discoursed, the children repeated their lesson, and finally she went to sleep, waking up with a start when their wooden shoes clattered on the flagstones as they went away.

It was thus that Félicité, whose religious education had been neglected in her youth, learned the catechism by dint of hearing it; and from that time she copied all Virginie's observances, fasting as she did and confessing with her. On Corpus Christi Day they made a festal altar together.

The first communion loomed distractingly ahead. She fussed over the shoes, the rosary, the book ¹⁰ and gloves; and how she trembled as she helped Virginie's mother to dress her!

All through the mass she was racked with anxiety. She could not see one side of the choir because of M. Bourais; but straight in front of her was the flock of maidens, with white crowns above their hanging veils, making the impression of a field of snow; and she knew her dear child at a distance by her dainty neck and thoughtful air. The bell tinkled. The heads bowed, and there was silence. ²⁰ As the organ pealed, singers and congregation took up the "Agnus Dei"; then the procession of the boys began, and after them the girls rose. Step by step, with their hands joined in prayer, they went towards the lighted altar, knelt on the first step, received the sacrament in turn, and came back in the same order to their places. When Virginie's turn came Félicité leaned forward to see her; and with the imaginativeness of deep and tender feeling it seemed to her that she actually was the child; ³⁰ Virginie's face became hers, she was dressed in her clothes, it was her heart beating in her breast. As the moment came to open her mouth she closed her eyes and nearly fainted.

She appeared early in the sacristy next morning for Monsieur the curé to give her the communion. She took it with devotion, but it did not give her the same exquisite delight.

Mme. Aubain wanted to make her daughter into an accomplished person; and as Guyot could not teach her music or English she decided to place her in the Ursuline Convent at Honfleur as a boarder. The child made no objection. Félicité sighed and thought that Madame lacked feeling. Then she reflected that her mistress might be right; matters of this kind were beyond her.

So one day an old spring-van drew up at the door, and out of it stepped a nun to fetch the young lady. Félicité hoisted the luggage on to the top, admonished the driver, and put six pots of ⁵⁰ preserves, a dozen pears, and a bunch of violets under the seat.

At the last moment Virginie broke into a fit of sobbing; she threw her arms round her mother, who kissed her on the forehead, saying over and over "Come, be brave! be brave!" The step was raised, and the carriage drove off.

Then Mme. Aubain's strength gave way; and in the evening all her friends—the Lormeau family, Mme. Lechaptois, the Rochefeuille ladies, M. de Houpeville, and Bourais—came in to console her.

To be without her daughter was very painful for her at first. But she heard from Virginie three times a week, wrote to her on the other days, walked in the garden, and so filled up the empty hours.

From sheer habit Félicité went into Virginie's room in the mornings and gazed at the walls. It was boredom to her not to have to comb the child's hair now, lace up her boots, tuck her into bed—and not to see her charming face perpetually and hold her hand when they went out together. In this idle condition she tried making lace. But her fingers were too heavy and broke the threads; she could not attend to anything, she had lost her sleep, and was, in her own words, "destroyed."

To "divert herself" she asked leave to have visits from her nephew Victor.

He arrived on Sundays after Mass, rosy-checked, bare-chested, with the scent of the country he had walked through still about him. She laid her table promptly and they had lunch, sitting opposite each other. She ate as little as possible herself to save expense, but stuffed him with food so generously that at last he went to sleep. At the first stroke of vespers she woke him up, brushed his trousers, fastened his tie, and went to church, leaning on his arm with maternal pride.

Victor was always instructed by his parents to get something out of her—a packet of moist sugar, it might be, a cake of soap, spirits, or even money at times. He brought his things for her to mend and she took over the task, only too glad to have a reason for making him come back.

In August his father took him off on a coasting voyage. It was holiday time, and she was consoled by the arrival of the children. Paul, however, was getting selfish, and Virginie was too old to be called "thou" any longer; this put a constraint and barrier between them.

Victor went to Morlaix, Dunkirk, and Brighton in succession and made Félicité a present on his return from each voyage. It was a box made of shells the first time, a coffee cup the next, and on the third occasion a large gingerbread man. Victor was growing handsome. He was well made, had a hint of a moustache, good honest eyes, and a small leather hat pushed backwards like a pilot's. He entertained her by telling stories embroidered with nautical terms.

On a Monday, July 14, 1819 (she never forgot the date), he told her that he had signed on for the big voyage and next night but one he would take the Honfleur boat and join his schooner, which was to weigh anchor from Havre before long. Perhaps he would be gone two years.

The prospect of this long absence threw Félicité into deep distress; one more good-bye she must have, and on the Wednesday evening, when Madame's dinner was finished, she put on her clogs and made short work of the twelve miles between Pont-l'Évêque and Honfleur.

When she arrived in front of the Calvary she took the turn to the right instead of the left, got lost in the timber-yards, and retraced her steps; some people to whom she spoke advised her to be quick. She went all round the harbour basin, full of ships, and knocked against hawsers; then the ground fell away, lights flashed across each other, and she thought her wits had left her, for she saw horses up in the sky.

Others were neighing by the quay-side, frightened at the sea. They were lifted by a tackle and deposited in a boat, where passengers jostled each other among cider casks, cheese baskets, and sacks of grain; fowls could be heard clucking, the captain swore; and a cabin-boy stood leaning over the bows, indifferent to it all. Félicité, who had not recognized him, called "Victor!" and he raised his head; all at once, as she was darting forwards, the gangway was drawn back.

The Honfleur packet, women singing as they hauled it, passed out of harbour. Its framework creaked and the heavy waves whipped its bows. The canvas had swung round, no one could be seen on board now; and on the moon-silvered sea the boat made a black speck which paled gradually, dipped, and vanished.

As Félicité passed by the Calvary she had a wish to commend to God what she cherished most, and she stood there praying a long time with her face bathed in tears and her eyes towards the clouds. The town was asleep, coastguards were walking to and fro; and water poured without cessation through the holes in the sluice, with the noise of a torrent. The clocks struck two.

The convent parlour would not be open before day. If Félicité were late Madame would most certainly be annoyed; and in spite of her desire to kiss the other child she turned home. The maids at the inn were waking up as she came in to Pont-l'Évêque.

So the poor slip of a boy was going to toss for months and months at sea! She had not been frightened by his previous voyages. From England or Brittany you came back safe enough; but America, the colonies, the islands—these were lost in a dim region at the other end of the world.

Félicité's thoughts from that moment ran entirely on her nephew. On sunny days she was harassed by the idea of thirst; when there was a storm she was afraid of the lightning on his account. As she listened to the wind growling in the chimney or carrying off the slates she pictured him lashed by that same tempest, at the top of a shattered mast, with his body thrown backwards under a sheet of foam; or else (with a reminiscence of the illustrated geography) he was being eaten by savages, captured in a wood by monkeys, or dying on a desert shore. And never did she mention her anxieties.

Mme. Aubain had anxieties of her own, about her daughter. The good sisters found her an affectionate but delicate child. The slightest emotion unnerved her. She had to give up the piano.

Her mother stipulated for regular letters from the convent. She lost patience one morning when the postman did not come, and walked to and fro in the parlour from her armchair to the window. It was really amazing; not a word for four days!

To console Mme. Aubain by her own example Félicité remarked:

"As for me, Madame, it's six months since I heard . . ."

"From whom, pray?"

"Why . . . from my nephew," the servant answered gently.

"Oh! your nephew!" And Mme. Aubain resumed her walk with a shrug of the shoulders, as much as to say: "I was not thinking of him! And what is more, it's absurd! A scamp of a cabin-boy—what does he matter? . . . whereas my daughter . . . why, just think!"

Félicité, though she had been brought up on harshness, felt indignant with Madame—and then forgot. It seemed the simplest thing in the world to her to lose one's head over the little girl. For her the two children were equally important; a bond in her heart made them one, and their destinies must be the same.

She heard from the chemist that Victor's ship had arrived at Havana. He had read this piece of news in a gazette.

Cigars—they made her imagine Havana as a place where no one does anything but smoke, and there was Victor moving among the negroes in a cloud of tobacco. Could you, she wondered, “in case you needed,” return by land? What was the distance from Pont-l’Évêque? She questioned M. Bourais to find out.

He reached for his atlas and began explaining the longitudes; Félicité’s consternation provoked a fine pedantic smile. Finally he marked with his pencil a black, imperceptible point in the indentations of an oval spot, and said as he did so, “Here it is.” She bent over the map; the maze of coloured lines wearied her eyes without conveying anything; and on an invitation from Bourais to tell him her difficulty she begged him to show her the house where Victor was living. Bourais threw up his arms, sneezed, and laughed immensely: a simplicity like hers was a positive joy. And Félicité did not understand the reason; how could she when she expected, very likely, to see the actual image of her nephew—so stunted was her mind!

A fortnight afterwards Liébard came into the kitchen at market-time as usual and handed her a letter from her brother-in-law. As neither of them could read she took it to her mistress.

Mme. Aubain, who was counting the stitches in her knitting, put the work down by her side, broke the seal of the letter, started, and said in a low voice, with a look of meaning:

“It is bad news . . . that they have to tell you. Your nephew . . .”

He was dead. The letter said no more.

Félicité fell on to a chair, leaning her head against the wainscot; and she closed her eyelids, which suddenly flushed pink. Then with bent forehead, hands hanging, and fixed eyes, she said at intervals: “Poor little lad! poor little lad!”

Liébard watched her and heaved sighs. Mme. Aubain trembled a little.

She suggested that Félicité should go to see her sister at Trouville. Félicité answered by a gesture that she had no need.

There was a silence. The worthy Liébard thought it was time for them to withdraw.

Then Félicité said:

“They don’t care, not they!”

Her head dropped again; and she took up mechanically, from time to time, the long needles on her work-table.

Women passed in the yard with a barrow of dripping linen.

As she saw them through the window-panes she remembered her washing; she had put it to soak the day before, to-day she must wring it out; and she left the room.

Her plank and tub were at the edge of the Toucques. She threw a pile of linen on the bank, rolled up her sleeves, and taking her wooden beater dealt lusty blows whose sound carried to the neighbouring gardens. The meadows were empty, the river stirred in the wind; and down below long grasses wavered, like the hair of corpses floating in the water. She kept her grief down and was very brave until the evening; but once in her room she surrendered to it utterly, lying stretched on the mattress with her face in the pillow and her hands clenched against her temples.

Much later she heard, from the captain himself, the circumstances of Victor’s end. They had bled him too much at the hospital for yellow fever. Four doctors held him at once. He had died instantly, and the chief had said:

“Bah! there goes another!”

His parents had always been brutal to him. She preferred not to see them again; and they made no advances, either because they forgot her or from the callousness of the wretchedly poor.

Virginie began to grow weaker.

Tightness in her chest, coughing, continual fever, and veinings on her cheek-bones betrayed some deep-seated complaint. M. Poupart had advised a stay in Provence. Mme. Aubain determined on it, and would have brought her daughter home at once but for the climate of Pont-l’Évêque.

She made an arrangement with a job-master, and he drove her to the convent every Tuesday. There is a terrace in the garden, with a view over the Seine. Virginie took walks there over the fallen vine-leaves, on her mother’s arm. A shaft of sunlight through the clouds made her blink sometimes, as she gazed at the sails in the distance and the whole horizon from the castle of Tancarville to the lighthouses at Havre. Afterwards they rested in the harbour. Her mother had secured a little cask of excellent Malaga; and Virginie, laughing at the idea of getting tipsy, drank a thimble-full of it, no more.

Her strength came back visibly. The autumn glided gently away. Félicité reassured Mme. Aubain. But one evening, when she had been out on a commission in the neighbourhood, she found

M. Poupart's gig at the door. He was in the hall, and Mme. Aubain was tying her bonnet.

"Give me my foot-warmer, purse, gloves! Quicker, come!"

Virginie had inflammation of the lungs; perhaps it was hopeless.

"Not yet!" said the doctor, and they both got into the carriage under whirling flakes of snow. Night was coming on and it was very cold.

Félicité rushed into the church to light a taper. Then she ran after the gig, came up with it in an hour, and jumped lightly in behind. As she hung on by the fringes a thought came into her mind: "The courtyard has not been shut up; supposing burglars got in!" And she jumped down.

At dawn next day she presented herself at the doctor's. He had come in and started for the country again. Then she waited in the inn, thinking that a letter would come by some hand or other. Finally, when it was twilight, she took the Lisieux coach.

The convent was at the end of a steep lane. When she was about half-way up it she heard strange sounds—a death-bell tolling. "It is for someone else," thought Félicité, and she pulled the knocker violently.

After some minutes there was a sound of trailing slippers, the door opened ajar, and a nun appeared.

The good sister, with an air of compunction, said that "she had just passed away." On the instant the bell of St. Leonard's tolled twice as fast.

Félicité went up to the second floor.

From the doorway she saw Virginie stretched on her back, with her hands joined, her mouth open, and head thrown back under a black crucifix that leaned towards her, between curtains that hung stiffly, less pale than was her face. Mme. Aubain, at the foot of the bed which she clasped with her arms, was choking with sobs of agony. The mother superior stood on the right. Three candlesticks on the chest of drawers made spots of red, and the mist came whitely through the windows. Nuns came and took Mme. Aubain away.

For two nights Félicité never left the dead child. She repeated the same prayers, sprinkled holy water over the sheets, came and sat down again, and watched her. At the end of the first vigil she noticed that the face had grown yellow, the lips turned blue, the nose was sharper, and the eyes sunk in. She kissed them several times, and would not have been immensely surprised if Virginie had opened them again; to minds like hers the supernatural is quite simple. She made the girl's toilette, wrapped her in her shroud, lifted her down into her bier, put a garland on her head, and spread out her hair. It was fair, and extraordinarily long for her age. Félicité cut off a big lock and slipped half of it into her bosom, determined that she should never part with it.

The body was brought back to Pont-l'Évêque, as Mme. Aubain intended; she followed the hearse in a closed carriage.

It took another three-quarters of an hour after the mass to reach the cemetery. Paul walked in front, sobbing. M. Bourais was behind, and then came the chief residents, the women shrouded in black mantles, and Félicité. She thought of her nephew; and because she had not been able to pay these honours to him her grief was doubled, as though the one were being buried with the other.

Mme. Aubain's despair was boundless. It was against God that she first rebelled, thinking it unjust of Him to have taken her daughter from her—she had never done evil and her conscience was so clear! Ah, no!—she ought to have taken Virginie off to the south. Other doctors would have saved her. She accused herself now, wanted to join her child, and broke into cries of distress in the middle of her dreams. One dream haunted her above all. Her husband, dressed as a sailor, was returning from a long voyage, and shedding tears he told her that he had been ordered to take Virginie away. Then they consulted how to hide her somewhere.

She came in once from the garden quite upset. A moment ago—and she pointed out the place—the father and daughter had appeared to her, standing side by side, and they did nothing, but they looked at her.

For several months after this she stayed inertly in her room. Félicité lectured her gently; she must live for her son's sake, and for the other, in remembrance of "her."

"Her?" answered Mme. Aubain, as though she were just waking up. "Ah, yes! . . . yes! . . . You do not forget her!" This was an allusion to the cemetery, where she was strictly forbidden to go.

Félicité went there every day.

Precisely at four she skirted the houses, climbed the hill, opened the gate, and came to Virginie's grave. It was a little column of pink marble with a stone underneath and a garden plot enclosed by chains. The beds were hidden under a coverlet of flowers. She watered their leaves, freshened the gravel, and knelt down to break up the earth better. When Mme. Aubain was able to come there she felt a relief and a sort of consolation.

Then years slipped away, one like another, and their only episodes were the great festivals as they recurred—Easter, the Assumption, All Saints' Day. Household occurrences marked dates that were referred to afterwards. In 1825, for instance, two glaziers whitewashed the hall; in 1827 a piece of the roof fell into the courtyard and nearly killed a man. In the summer of 1828 it was Madame's turn to offer the consecrated bread; Bourais, about this time, mysteriously absented himself; and one by one the old acquaintances passed away: Guyot, Liébard, Mme. Lechaptois, Robelin, and Uncle Gremenville, who had been paralysed for a long time.

One night the driver of the mail-coach announced the Revolution of July in Pont-l'Évêque. A new sub-prefect was appointed a few days later—Baron de Larsonnière, who had been consul in America, and brought with him, besides his wife, a sister-in-law and three young ladies, already growing up. They were to be seen about on their lawn, in loose blouses, and they had a negro and a parrot. They paid a call on Mme. Aubain which she did not fail to return. The moment they were seen in the distance Félicité ran to let her mistress know. But only one thing could really move her feelings—the letters from her son.

He was swallowed up in a tavern life and could follow no career. She paid his debts, he made new ones; and the sighs that Mme. Aubain uttered as she sat knitting by the window reached Félicité at her spinning-wheel in the kitchen.

They took walks together along the espaliered wall, always talking of Virginie and wondering if such and such a thing would have pleased her and what, on some occasion, she would have been likely to say.

All her small belongings filled a cupboard in the two-bedded room. Mme. Aubain inspected them as seldom as she could. One summer day she made up her mind to it—and some moths flew out of the wardrobe.

Virginie's dresses were in a row underneath a shelf, on which there were three dolls, some hoops, a set of toy pots and pans, and the basin that she used. They took out her petticoats as well, and the stockings and handkerchiefs, and laid them out on the two beds before folding them up again. The sunshine lit up these poor things, bringing out their stains and the creases made by the body's movements. The air was warm and blue, a black-bird warbled, life seemed bathed in a deep sweetness. They found a little plush hat with thick, chestnut-coloured pile; but it was eaten all over by moth. Félicité begged it for her own. Their eyes met fixedly and filled with tears; at last the mistress opened her arms, the servant threw herself into them, and they embraced each other, satisfying their grief in a kiss that made them equal.

It was the first time in their lives, Mme. Aubain's nature not being expansive. Félicité was as grateful as though she had received a favour, and cherished her mistress from that moment with the devotion of an animal and a religious worship.

The kindness of her heart unfolded.

When she heard the drums of a marching regiment in the street she posted herself at the door with a pitcher of cider and asked the soldiers to drink. She nursed cholera patients and protected the Polish refugees; one of these even declared that he wished to marry her. They quarrelled, however; for when she came back from the Angelus one morning she found that he had got into her kitchen and made himself a vinegar salad which he was quietly eating.

After the Poles came Father Colmiche, an old man who was supposed to have committed atrocities in '93. He lived by the side of the river in the ruins of a pigsty. The little boys watched him through the cracks in the wall, and threw pebbles at him which fell on the pallet where he lay constantly shaken by a catarrh; his hair was very long, his eyes inflamed, and there was a tumour on his arm bigger than his head. She got him some linen and tried to clean up his miserable hole; her dream was to establish him in the bakehouse, without letting him annoy Madame. When the tumour burst she dressed it every day; sometimes she brought him cake, and would put him in the sunshine on a truss of straw. The poor old man, slobbering and trembling, thanked her in his worn-out voice, was terrified that he might lose her, and stretched out his hands when he saw her go away. He died; and she had a mass said for the repose of his soul.

That very day a great happiness befell her; just at dinner-time appeared Mme. de Larsonnière's negro, carrying the parrot in its cage, with perch, chain, and padlock. A note from the baroness informed Mme. Aubain that her husband had been raised to a prefecture and they were starting that evening; she begged her to accept the bird as a memento and mark of her regard.

For a long time he had absorbed Félicité's imagination, because he came from America; and that name reminded her of Victor, so much so that she made inquiries of the negro. She had once gone so far as to say "How Madame would enjoy having him!"

The negro repeated the remark to his mistress; and as she could not take the bird away with her she chose this way of getting rid of him.

IV

His name was Loulou. His body was green and the tips of his wings rose-pink; his forehead was blue and his throat golden.

But he had the tiresome habits of biting his perch, tearing out his feathers, sprinkling his dirt about, and spattering the water of his tub. He annoyed Mme. Aubain, and she gave him to Félicité for good.

She endeavoured to train him; soon he could repeat "Nice boy! Your servant, sir! Good morning, Marie!" He was placed by the side of the door, and astonished several people by not answering to the name Jacquot, for all parrots are called Jacquot. People compared him to a turkey and a log of wood, and stabbed Félicité to the heart each time. Strange obstinacy on Loulou's part!—directly you looked at him he refused to speak.

None the less he was eager for society; for on Sundays, while the Rochefeuille ladies, M. de Houpeville, and new familiars—Onfroy the apothecary, Monsieur Varin, and Captain Mathieu—were playing their game of cards, he beat the windows with his wings and threw himself about so frantically that they could not hear each other speak.

Bourais' face, undoubtedly, struck him as extremely droll. Directly he saw it he began to laugh—and laugh with all his might. His peals rang through the courtyard and were repeated by the echo; the neighbours came to their windows and laughed too; while M. Bourais, gliding along under the wall to escape the parrot's eye, and hiding his profile with his hat, got to the river and then entered by the garden gate. There was a lack of tenderness in the looks which he darted at the bird.

Loulou had been slapped by the butcher-boy for making so free as to plunge his head into his basket; and since then he was always trying to nip him through his shirt. Fabu threatened to wring his neck, although he was not cruel, for all his tat-toed arms and large whiskers. Far from it; he really rather liked the parrot, and in a jovial humour even wanted to teach him to swear. Félicité, who was alarmed by such proceedings, put the bird in the kitchen. His little chain was taken off and he roamed about the house.

His way of going downstairs was to lean on each step with the curve of his beak, raise the right foot, and then the left; and Félicité was afraid that these gymnastics brought on fits of giddiness. He fell ill and could not talk or eat any longer. There was a growth under his tongue, such as fowls have sometimes. She cured him by tearing the pellicle off with her finger-nails. Mr. Paul was thoughtless enough one day to blow some cigar smoke into his nostrils, and another time when Mme. Lormeau was teasing him with the end of her umbrella he snapped at the ferrule. Finally he got lost.

Félicité had put him on the grass to refresh him, and gone away for a minute, and when she came back—no sign of the parrot! She began by looking for him in the shrubs, by the waterside, and over the roofs, without listening to her mistress's cries of "Take care, do! You are out of your wits!" Then she investigated all the gardens in Pont-l'Évêque, and stopped the passers-by. "You don't ever happen to have seen my parrot, by any chance, do you?" And she gave a description of the parrot to those who did not know him. Suddenly, behind the mills at the foot of the hill she thought she could make out something green that fluttered. But on the top of the hill there was nothing. A hawker assured her that he had come across the parrot just before, at Saint-Melaine, in Mère Simon's shop. She rushed there; they had no idea of what she meant. At last she came home exhausted, with her slippers in shreds and despair in her soul; and as she was sitting in the middle of the garden-seat at Madame's side, telling the whole story of her efforts, a light weight dropped on to her shoulder—it was Loulou! What on earth had he been doing? Taking a walk in the neighbourhood, perhaps!

She had some trouble in recovering from this, or rather never did recover. As the result of a chill she had an attack of quinsy, and soon afterwards an earache. Three years later she was deaf; and she spoke very loud, even in church. Though Félicité's sins might have been published in every corner of the diocese without dishonour to her or scandal to anybody, his Reverence the priest thought it right now to hear her confession in the sacristy only.

Imaginary noises in the head completed her upset.

Her mistress often said to her, "Heavens! how stupid you are!" "Yes, Madame," she replied, and looked about for something.

Her little circle of ideas grew still narrower; the peal of church-bells and the lowing of cattle ceased to exist for her. All living beings moved as silently as ghosts. One sound only reached her ears now—the parrot's voice.

Loulou, as though to amuse her, reproduced the click-clack of the turn-spit, the shrill call of a man selling fish, and the noise of the saw in the joiner's house opposite; when the bell rang he imitated Mme. Aubain's "Félicité! the door! the door!"

They carried on conversations, he endlessly reciting the three phrases in his repertory, to which she replied with words that were just as disconnected but uttered what was in her heart. Loulou was almost a son and a lover to her in her isolated state. He climbed up her fingers, nibbled at her lips, and clung to her kerchief; and when she bent her forehead and shook her head gently to and fro, as nurses do, the great wings of her bonnet and the bird's wings quivered together.

When the clouds massed and the thunder rumbled Loulou broke into cries, perhaps remembering the downpours in his native forests. The streaming rain made him absolutely mad; he fluttered wildly about, dashed up to the ceiling, upset everything, and went out through the window to dabble in the garden; but he was back quickly to perch on one of the fire-dogs and hopped about to dry himself, exhibiting his tail and his beak in turn.

One morning in the terrible winter of 1837 she had put him in front of the fireplace because of the cold. She found him dead, in the middle of his cage: head downwards, with his claws in the wires. He had died from congestion, no doubt. But Félicité thought he had been poisoned with parsley, and though there was no proof of any kind her suspicions inclined to Fabu.

She wept so piteously that her mistress said to her, "Well, then, have him stuffed!"

She asked advice from the chemist, who had always been kind to the parrot. He wrote to Havre, and a person called Fellacher undertook the business. But as parcels sometimes got lost in the coach she decided to take the parrot as far as Honfleur herself.

Along the sides of the road were leafless apple-trees, one after the other. Ice covered the ditches. Dogs barked about the farms; and Félicité, with her hands under her cloak, her little black sabots and her basket, walked briskly in the middle of the road.

She crossed the forest, passed High Oak, and reached St. Gatién.

A cloud of dust rose behind her, and in it a mail-coach, carried away by the steep hill, rushed down at full gallop like a hurricane. Seeing this woman who would not get out of the way, the driver stood up in front and the postilion shouted too. He could not hold in his four horses, which increased their pace, and the two leaders were grazing her when he threw them to one side with a jerk of the reins. But he was wild with rage, and lifting his arm as he passed at full speed, gave her such a lash from waist to neck with his big whip that she fell on her back.

Her first act, when she recovered consciousness, was to open her basket. Loulou was happily none the worse. She felt a burn in her right cheek, and when she put her hands against it they were red; the blood was flowing.

She sat down on a heap of stones and bound up her face with her handkerchief. Then she ate a crust of bread which she had put in the basket as a precaution, and found a consolation for her wound in gazing at the bird.

When she reached the crest of Ecquemaerville she saw the Honfleur lights sparkling in the night sky like a company of stars; beyond, the sea stretched dimly. Then a faintness overtook her and she stopped; her wretched childhood, the disillusion of her first love, her nephew's going away, and Virginie's death all came back to her at once like the waves of an oncoming tide, rose to her throat, and choked her.

Afterwards, at the boat, she made a point of speaking to the captain, begging him to take care of the parcel, though she did not tell him what was in it.

Fellacher kept the parrot a long time. He was always promising it for the following week. After six months he announced that a packing-case had started, and then nothing more was heard of it. It really seemed as though Loulou was never coming back. "Ah, they have stolen him!" she thought.

He arrived at last, and looked superb. There he was, erect upon a branch which screwed into a mahogany socket, with a foot in the air and his head on one side, biting a nut which the bird-stuffer—with a taste for impressiveness—had gilded.

Félicité shut him up in her room. It was a place to which few people were admitted, and held so many religious objects and miscellaneous things that it looked like a chapel and bazaar in one.

A big cupboard impeded you as you opened the door. Opposite the window commanding the garden a little round one looked into the court; there was a table by the folding-bed with a water-jug, two combs, and a cube of blue soap in a chipped plate. On the walls hung rosaries, medals, several benign Virgins, and a holy water vessel made out of cocoa-nut; on the chest of drawers, which was covered with a cloth like an altar, was the shell box that Victor had given her, and after that a watering-can, a toy-balloon, exercise-books, the illustrated geography, and a pair of young lady's boots; and, fastened by its ribbons to the nail of the looking-glass, hung the little plush hat! Félicité carried observances of this kind so far as to keep one of Monsieur's frock-coats. All the old rubbish which Mme. Aubain did not want any longer she laid hands on for her room. That was why there were artificial flowers along the edge of the chest of drawers and a portrait of the Comte d'Artois in the little window recess.

With the aid of a bracket Loulou was established over the chimney, which jutted into the room. Every morning when she woke up she saw him there in the dawning light, and recalled old days and the smallest details of insignificant acts in a deep quietness which knew no pain.

Holding, as she did, no communication with anyone, Félicité lived as insensibly as if she were walking in her sleep. The Corpus Christi processions roused her to life again. Then she went round begging mats and candlesticks from the neighbours to decorate the altar they put up in the street.

In church she was always gazing at the Holy Ghost in the window, and observed that there was something of the parrot in him. The likeness was still clearer, she thought, on a crude colour-print representing the baptism of Our Lord. With his purple wings and emerald body he was the very image of Loulou.

She bought him, and hung him up instead of the Comte d'Artois, so that she could see them both together in one glance. They were linked in her thoughts; and the parrot was consecrated by his association with the Holy Ghost, which became more vivid to her eye and more intelligible. The Father could not have chosen to express Himself through a dove, for such creatures cannot speak; it must have been one of Loulou's ancestors, surely. And though Félicité looked at the picture while she said her prayers she swerved a little from time to time towards the parrot.

She wanted to join the Ladies of the Virgin, but Mme. Aubain dissuaded her.

And then a great event loomed up before them—Paul's marriage.

He had been a solicitor's clerk to begin with, and then tried business, the Customs, the Inland Revenue, and made efforts, even, to get into the Rivers and Forests. By an inspiration from heaven he had suddenly, at thirty-six, discovered his real line—the Registrar's Office. And there he showed such marked capacity that an inspector had offered him his daughter's hand and promised him his influence.

So Paul, grown serious, brought the lady to see his mother.

She sniffed at the ways of Pont-l'Évêque, gave herself great airs, and wounded Félicité's feelings. Mme. Aubain was relieved at her departure.

The week after came news of M. Bourais' death in an inn in Lower Brittany. The rumour of suicide was confirmed, and doubts arose as to his honesty. Mme. Aubain studied his accounts, and soon found out the whole tale of his misdoings—embezzled arrears, secret sales of wood, forged receipts, etc. Besides that he had an illegitimate child, and "relations with a person at Dozulé."

These shameful facts distressed her greatly. In March 1853 she was seized with a pain in the chest; her tongue seemed to be covered with film, and leeches did not ease the difficult breathing. On the ninth evening of her illness she died, just at seventy-two.

She passed as being younger, owing to the bands of brown hair which framed her pale, pock-marked face. There were few friends to regret her, for she had a stiffness of manner which kept people at a distance.

But Félicité mourned for her as one seldom mourns for a master. It upset her ideas and seemed contrary to the order of things, impossible and monstrous, that Madame should die before her.

Ten days afterwards, which was the time it took to hurry there from Besançon, the heirs arrived. The daughter-in-law ransacked the drawers, chose some furniture, and sold the rest; and then they went back to their registering.

Madame's armchair, her small round table, her foot-warmer, and the eight chairs were gone! Yellow patches in the middle of the panels showed where the engravings had hung. They had carried off the two little beds and the mattresses, and all Virginie's belongings had disappeared from the cupboard. Félicité went from floor to floor dazed with sorrow.

The next day there was a notice on the door, and the apothecary shouted in her ear that the house was for sale.

She tottered, and was obliged to sit down. What distressed her most of all was to give up her room, so suitable as it was for poor Loulou. She enveloped him with a look of anguish when she was imploring the Holy Ghost, and formed the idolatrous habit of kneeling in front of the parrot to say her prayers. Sometimes the sun shone in at the attic window and caught his glass eye, and a great luminous ray shot out of it and put her in an ecstasy.

She had a pension of fifteen pounds a year which her mistress had left her. The garden gave her a supply of vegetables. As for clothes, she had enough to last her to the end of her days, and she economized in candles by going to bed at dusk.

She hardly ever went out, as she did not like passing the dealer's shop, where some of the old furniture was exposed for sale. Since her fit of giddiness she dragged one leg; and as her strength was failing Mère Simon, whose grocery business had collapsed, came every morning to split the wood and pump water for her.

Her eyes grew feeble. The shutters ceased to be thrown open. Years and years passed, and the house was neither let nor sold.

Félicité never asked for repairs because she was afraid of being sent away. The boards on the roof rotted; her bolster was wet for a whole winter. After Easter she spat blood.

Then Mère Simon called in a doctor. Félicité wanted to know what was the matter with her. But she was too deaf to hear, and the only word which reached her was "pneumonia." It was a word she knew, and she answered softly "Ah! like Madame," thinking it natural that she should follow her mistress.

The time for the festal shrines was coming near. The first one was always at the bottom of the hill, the second in front of the post-office, and the third towards the middle of the street. There was some rivalry in the matter of this one, and the women of the parish ended by choosing Mme. Aubain's courtyard.

The hard breathing and fever increased. Félicité was vexed at doing nothing for the altar. If only she could at least have put something there! Then she thought of the parrot. The neighbours objected that it would not be decent. But the priest gave her permission, which so intensely delighted her that she begged him to accept Loulou, her sole possession, when she died.

From Tuesday to Saturday, the eve of the festival, she coughed more often. By the evening her face had shrivelled, her lips stuck to her gums, and she had vomitings; and at twilight next morning, feeling herself very low, she sent for a priest.

Three kindly women were round her during the extreme unction. Then she announced that she must speak to Fabu. He arrived in his Sunday clothes, by no means at his ease in the funereal atmosphere.

"Forgive me," she said, with an effort to stretch out her arm; "I thought it was you who had killed him."

What did she mean by such stories? She suspected him of murder—a man like him! He waxed indignant, and was on the point of making a row.

"There," said the women, "she is no longer in her senses, you can see it well enough!"

Félicité spoke to shadows of her own from time to time. The women went away, and Mère Simon had breakfast. A little later she took Loulou and brought him close to Félicité with the words:

"Come, now, say good-bye to him!"

Loulou was not a corpse, but the worms devoured him; one of his wings was broken, and the tow was coming out of his stomach. But she was blind now; she kissed him on the forehead and kept him close against her cheek. Mère Simon took him back from her to put him on the altar.

V

Summer scents came up from the meadows; flies buzzed; the sun made the river glitter and heated the slates. Mère Simon came back into the room and fell softly asleep.

She woke at the noise of bells; the people were coming out from vespers. Félicité's delirium subsided. She thought of the procession and saw it as if she had been there.

All the school children, the church-singers, and the firemen walked on the pavement, while in the middle of the road the verger armed with his halberd and the beadle with a large cross advanced in front. Then came the schoolmaster, with an eye on the boys, and the sister, anxious about her little girls; three of the daintiest, with angelic curls, scattered rose-petals in the air; the deacon controlled the band with outstretched arms; and two censer-bearers turned back at every step towards the Holy Sacrament, which was borne by Monsieur the curé, wearing his beautiful chasuble, under a canopy of dark-red velvet held up by four churchwardens. A crowd of people pressed behind, between the white cloths covering the house walls, and they reached the bottom of the hill.

A cold sweat moistened Félicité's temples. Mère Simon sponged her with a piece of linen, saying to herself that one day she would have to go that way.

The hum of the crowd increased, was very loud for an instant, and then went further away.

A fusillade shook the window-panes. It was the postilions saluting the monstrance. Félicité rolled her eyes and said as audibly as she could: "Does he look well?" The parrot was weighing on her mind.

Her agony began. A death-rattle that grew more and more convulsed made her sides heave. Bubbles of froth came at the corners of her mouth and her whole body trembled.

Soon the booming of the ophicleides,¹ the high voices of the children, and the deep voices of the men were distinguishable. At intervals all was silent, and the tread of feet, deadened by the flowers they walked on, sounded like a flock pattering on grass.

The clergy appeared in the courtyard. Mère

Simon clambered on to a chair to reach the attic window, and so looked down straight upon the shrine. Green garlands hung over the altar, which was decked with a flounce of English lace. In the middle was a small frame with relics in it; there were two orange-trees at the corners, and all along stood silver candlesticks and china vases, with sun-flowers, lilies, peonies, foxgloves, and tufts of hortensia. This heap of blazing colour slanted from the level of the altar to the carpet which went on over the pavement; and some rare objects caught the eye. There was a silver-gilt sugar-basin with a crown of violets; pendants of Alençon stone glittered on the moss, and two Chinese screens displayed their landscapes. Loulou was hidden under roses, and showed nothing but his blue forehead, like a plaque of lapis lazuli.

The churchwardens, singers, and children took their places round the three sides of the court. The priest went slowly up the steps, and placed his great, radiant golden sun upon the lace. Everyone knelt down. There was a deep silence; and the censers glided to and fro on the full swing of their chains.

An azure vapour rose up into Félicité's room. Her nostrils met it; she inhaled it sensuously, mystically; and then closed her eyes. Her lips smiled. The beats of her heart lessened one by one, vaguer each time and softer, as a fountain sinks, an echo disappears; and when she sighed her last breath she thought she saw an opening in the heavens, and a gigantic parrot hovering above her head.

GUY DE MAUPASSANT

Christening

"Come doctor, a little more cognac." "With pleasure." The old navy doctor watched the golden liquid flow into his glass, held it up to the light, took a sip and kept it in his mouth a long while before swallowing it and said:

"What a delicious poison! I should say, what a captivating destroyer of humanity! You do not know it as I know it. You may have read that remarkable book called L'Assommoir, but you have not seen a whole tribe of savages exterminated by this same poison. I have seen with my own eyes a strange and terrible drama which was the result of too much alcohol. It happened not very far from here, in a little village near Pont-l'Abbé in Brittany. I was on a vacation and was living in the little country house which my father Guy de Maupassant (1850-1893).

had left me. You all know that wild country surrounded by the sea—that wicked sea, always lying in wait for some new victim! The poor fishermen go out day and night in their little boats, and the wicked sea upsets their boats and swallows them! Fearlessly they go out, yet feeling uneasy as to their safety, but half of the time they are intoxicated. ‘When the bottle is full we feel safe, but when it is empty we feel lost,’ they say. If you got into their huts you will never find the father and if you ask the woman what has become of her man, she will answer, pointing to the raging sea: ‘He stayed there one night when he had too much drink, and my eldest son too.’ She has still four strong boys; it will be their turn soon!

“Well, as I have said, I was living at my little country house with one servant, an old sailor and the Breton family who took care of the place during my absence, which consisted of two sisters and the husband of one of them, who was also my gardener.

“Toward Christmas of that year the gardener’s wife gave birth to a boy, and he asked me to be godfather. I could not very well refuse, and on the strength of it he borrowed ten francs from me, for the ‘church expenses,’ he said.

“The christening was to take place on the second of January. For the past week the ground had been covered with snow and it was bitter cold. At nine o’clock of the morning designated, Kerandec and his sister-in-law arrived in front of my door with a nurse carrying the baby wrapped up in a blanket, and we started for the church. The cold was terrific, and I wondered how the poor little child could stand such cold. These Bretons must be made of iron, I thought, if they can stand going out in such weather at their birth!

“When we arrived at the church the door was closed. The priest had not come yet. The nurse sat on the steps and began to undress the child. I thought at first that she only wanted to arrange his clothes, but to my horror I saw that she was taking every stitch of clothing off his back! I was horrified at such imprudence and I went toward her, saying:

“‘What in the world are you doing? Are you crazy? Do you want to kill him?’

“‘Oh no, master,’ she answered placidly, ‘but he must present himself before God naked.’ His father and aunt looked on calmly. It was the custom in Brittany, and if they had not done this, they said, something would happen to the child.

• “I got furiously angry. I called the father all kinds of names; I threatened to leave them and tried to cover the child by force, but in vain. The nurse ran away from me with the poor little naked body, which was fast becoming blue with the biting cold. I had made up my mind to leave these brutes to their ignorance, when I saw the priest coming along, followed by the sexton and an altar boy. I ran toward him and told him in a few words what these brutes had done, but he was not a bit surprised; nor did he hurry.

“‘What can I do, my dear sir? It is the custom; they all do it.’

“‘But for goodness sake, hurry up,’ I cried impatiently.

“‘I cannot go any faster,’ he answered, and at last he entered the vestry. We waited outside the church door, and I suffered terribly at hearing that poor little wretch crying with pain. At last the door opened and we went in, but the child had to remain naked during the whole ceremony. It seemed to me as if it would never come to an end. The priest crawled along like a turtle, muttered his Latin words slowly, as if he took pleasure in torturing the poor little baby. At last the torture came to an end, and the nurse wrapped the child in his blanket again. By that time the poor little thing was chilled through and was crying piteously.

“‘Will you come in and sign your name to the register?’ asked the priest.

“I turned to the gardener and urged him to go home immediately and warm the child up, so as to avoid pneumonia if there was still time. He promised to follow my advice and left with his sister-in-law and the nurse. I followed the priest into the vestry, and when I had signed the register he demanded five francs. As I had given ten francs to the father, I refused. The priest threatened to tear up the certificate and to annul the ceremony, and I, in my turn, threatened to prosecute him. We quarreled for a long time, but at last I paid the five francs.

“As soon as I got home I ran to Kerandec’s house, but neither he nor his sister-in-law nor the nurse had come home. The mother was in bed shivering with cold, and she was hungry, not having eaten anything since the day before.

“‘Where on earth did they go?’ I asked. She did not seem the least bit surprised and answered calmly:

“‘They went to have a drink in honor of the christening.’ That also was the custom, and I thought of my ten francs which I had given the father and which would pay for the drinks, no doubt. I sent some beef tea to the mother and had a good fire made in her room. I was so angry at those brutes that I made up my mind to discharge them when they came back, but what worried me most was the poor little baby. What would become of him?

"At six o'clock they had not come back. I ordered my servant to wait for them and I went to bed.

"I slept soundly, as a sailor will sleep, until day-break and did not wake until my servant brought me some hot water. As soon as I opened my eyes I asked him about Kerandec. The old sailor hesitated then finally answered:

"He came home past midnight as drunk as a fool; the Kermagan woman and the nurse too. I think they slept in a ditch, and the poor little baby died without their even noticing it."

"Dead!" I cried, jumping to my feet.

"Yes sir, they brought it to the mother, and when she saw it she cried terribly, but they made her drink to forget her sorrow."

"What do you mean by 'they made her drink'?"

"This, sir. I only found out this morning. Kerandec had no more liquor and no more money to buy any, so he took the wood alcohol that you gave him for the lamp, and they drank that until they had finished the bottle, and now the Kerandec woman is very sick."

"I dressed in haste, seized a cane with the firm intention of chastising those human brutes and ran to the gardener's house. The mother lay helpless, dying from the effects of the alcohol, with the discolored corpse of her baby lying near her, while Kerandec and the Kermagan woman lay snoring on the floor.

"I did everything in my power to save the woman, but she died at noon."

The old doctor, having concluded his narrative, took the bottle of cognac, poured out a glass for himself and, having held it up to the light, swallowed the golden liquid and smacked his lips.

ÉMILE ZOLA

Germinal

The day before, at a meeting held at Rasseneur's house, Etienne and a few of his comrades had chosen the delegates to go to the superintendent's house the following day. In the evening, when Maheude found out that her man was one of them, she grew desperate, and she asked him if he wanted them to be thrown out into the street. Maheu had agreed to go with no little reluctance. Despite the injustice of their wretchedness, when the time came to act they both fell back into the resignation of their race, trembling before the morrow, and choosing rather to bend their backs in submission. Maheu usually deferred to his wife in the management of their daily affairs, for her judgment was sound. This time, however, he ended by getting angry, all the more so because secretly he shared her fears.

"Aw, cut it out, will you!" he said, going to bed and turning his back. "It would be a fine thing to go back on the comrades now! I'm doing my duty!"

She too went to bed. Neither of them spoke. Then, after a long silence, she replied:

"You're right. Go ahead. Just the same, old fellow, we're done for."

The meeting was set for one o'clock at the Avantage, from where they would proceed to M. Hennebeau's. Twelve o'clock struck while they were at lunch. There were potatoes on the table; but since there was only a small piece of butter left, no one touched it. That evening they would have bread and butter.

"We're counting on you to do the talking, you know," Etienne suddenly said to Maheu.

Maheu was so overcome with emotion that he could say nothing. But Maheude exclaimed:

"No, no! That's carrying things too far! I'm willing to have him go, but I won't have him be the leader. Why do you choose him rather than someone else?"

Etienne turned his fiery eloquence on Maheude. Maheu was the best worker in the pit, the most Zola, Germinal. Translated by Joseph C. Palamountain. Émile Zola was born in Paris in 1840 and died in 1902. Chief of the school of Naturalism, Zola produced a series of novels on contemporary French themes, of which Germinal (1885) is an outstanding example. The present selections are from Parts IV, VI, and VII. Zola's pamphlet, J'accuse, written in behalf of Captain Dreyfus, played a significant part in the final outcome of the Dreyfus Affaire.

popular, the most respected, the one whose good sense was a byword. Coming from his mouth the miners' demands would carry more weight. At first, Etienne was to have done the talking; but he had not worked at Montsou long enough. A man who had lived in the place a long time would get a better hearing. In short, the comrades were entrusting their interests to the most deserving one. And he could not refuse—that would be cowardly.

Maheude made a gesture of despair.

"Go ahead, my man! Go get yourself killed for the others. What can I do about it, anyhow?"

"But I won't know how to talk," stammered Maheu. "I'll say something foolish."

Etienne, happy to have won him over, patted him on the shoulder.

"Say the things that you feel, and everything will be all right."

His mouth full, old Bonnemort, listened and shook his head. While the group at the table ate the potatoes in silence, and the children were on good behavior. After swallowing a mouthful, the old man muttered slowly:

"No matter what you say, it will be just as if you hadn't said anything. . . . I've seen this kind of thing, I've seen it before! Forty years ago they kicked us out of the superintendent's house, and they used sabers too! Maybe they'll let you in this time, but you might as well be talking to a wall. Good God! They've got money; a lot they care about us!"

There was another silence. Maheu and Etienne got up and left the gloomy family sitting before their empty plates. They took Pierron and Levaque with them, then all four went to Rasseleur's. The delegates from the four neighboring coal patches kept arriving in small groups. Once the twenty members of the delegation were together, they agreed on the demands which they would put up against the Company's; and they set out for Montsou. A sharp wind from the northeast swept the street. Just as they arrived the clock struck two.

First the servant told them to wait, and shut the door in their faces; then, returning, he led them into the drawing-room and drew aside the curtains. A soft light sifted through the lace. Left alone, the miners in their embarrassment did not dare to sit down. They fairly glistened, with their yellow hair and mustaches, dressed in their best clothes, and freshly shaven. They twisted their caps between their fingers; they cast sidewise glances at the furniture, which was a confusion of all the styles that the taste for antiques had brought into fashion: Henri II armchairs, Louis XV chairs, a seventeenth-century Italian cabinet, a fifteenth-century Spanish contador, an altar-front serving as a chimney-piece, and ancient chasuble trimmings appliquéd to the curtains. This old gold, these old silks in tawny tones, all this luxurious chapel furniture, had filled them with an uneasy respect. The long wool of the Oriental rugs seemed to bind their feet. The heat stifled them, the even heat of a furnace. Its enveloping power surprised them as they felt it glow on their wind-chilled cheeks. Five minutes passed by. Their embarrassment increased in the comfort of this rich room which was so pleasantly warm.

At last M. Hennebeau entered, buttoned up in a military fashion, wearing on his frock coat the correct little knot of his decoration. He was the first to speak.

"Ah! Here you are! You are rebelling, it seems . . ."

He interrupted himself only to add with stiff politeness:

"Sit down. I would like nothing better than to talk things over."

The miners looked around for places to sit. A few ventured to sit down on the chairs while the others, made uneasy by the embroidered silks, chose to remain standing.

There was a silence. M. Hennebeau, who had drawn his easy chair up to the fireplace, quickly looked them over and tried to recall their faces. He had just recognized Pierron, hidden in the last row, when his eyes rested on Etienne, seated in front of him.

"Come now," he began. "What have you to say to me?"

He expected to hear the young man do the talking, and he was so surprised to see Maheu come forward that he could not keep from adding:

"What! You, a good workman who has always shown himself to be so sensible, one of the old Montsou people whose family has been working in the mines ever since the first pickaxe was driven into the ground! Ah! This is bad! I am sorry that you are at the head of the malcontents!"

Maheu listened with his eyes cast down. Then he began, his voice at first hesitant and low.

"Sir, it's just because I am a quiet man, a man no one can say anything against, that my comrades have chosen me. That ought to prove to you that this is not just a revolt of loud mouths, of malicious men trying to create disorder. We only want justice. We are tired of starving, and it seems to us that it is about time to fix things so that at least we'll have bread to eat every day."

His voice grew stronger. He raised his eyes and went on, fixing them on the superintendent.

"You know very well that we can't accept your new system. They accuse us of bad timbering. It's true we don't give the necessary time to that part of the work. But if we did, our day's pay would be even more reduced; and since it doesn't give us enough to eat now, why, that would be the end of everything—yes, the swish of the broom that would sweep away all your men. Pay us more and we'll timber better; we'll spend the necessary time in timbering, instead of putting all our strength into digging coal—the only job that pays anything. There's no other arrangement possible. If work is done, it must be paid for. And what have you invented as a substitute? A thing we can't get into our heads, don't you see? You lower the price of each carload, then you claim to make up for this reduction by paying separately for the timbering. If that was true, we'd still be getting robbed just as much, because the timbering would still take us more time. But what makes us mad is that it isn't even true. The Company is offering no compensation at all. It simply puts two centimes for every carload in its pocket, that's all!"

"Yes, yes, that's the truth," muttered the other delegates when they saw M. Hennebeau make a violent gesture as if to interrupt.

But Maheu cut short the superintendent before he had a chance to speak. Now that he was started, Maheu's words came all by themselves. At times he listened to himself with surprise as though it were a stranger within him speaking. There were things stored up inside himself, things he never knew were there, things which came out in this overflowing of his heart. He spoke of the wretchedness that was their common lot, the grinding toil, the brutal life, the wives and little ones at home crying from hunger. He cited the recent disastrous wages, the absurdly meager fortnightly wages, eaten up by fines and idle days and brought home to families in tears. Had it been decided that the workers must be destroyed?

"Then, sir," he concluded, "we have come to tell you that if we've got to starve we'd rather die doing nothing. It would be that much less trouble. We have left the coal mines and we shall not go down again unless the Company accepts our conditions. The Company wants to lower the price on carloads and pay for the timbering separately. As for us, we want things to stay as they were, and in addition we want to be given five centimes more for each carload. Now it's up to you to see whether you are on the side of justice and work!"

Voices rose among the miners.

"That's it. . . . He said what we all think. . . . We only ask what is right."

Others silently nodded their approval. The luxurious room disappeared with its gold and embroideries, its mysterious jumble of antiques, and the men no longer even felt the rug crushed beneath their heavy boots.

"Well, let me give my answer," finally exclaimed M. Hennebeau, who was getting angry. "First of all, it is not true that the Company is gaining two centimes per carload. Let us look at the figures."

A confused discussion followed. In order to try to divide them, the superintendent called upon Pierron, who, stammering, evaded giving an answer. Levaque on the other hand was at the head of the more aggressive group, muddling things up, stating facts of which he was ignorant. The loud hum of their voices was stifled beneath the hangings in the hothouse atmosphere.

"If you all talk at the same time," M. Hennebeau went on, "we shall never come to an agreement."

Displaying no ill humor, he had regained the calmness, the blunt politeness, of a superintendent who has received instructions and who means to see that they are respected. From the very first words he never took his eyes off Etienne. He maneuvered to draw the young man out of his obstinate silence. Therefore, abandoning the discussion about the two centimes, he abruptly broadened the question.

"No, confess the truth! You are responding to vicious agitation. It is a plague which is infecting all workers and corrupting the best of them. Oh, no one need confess. I can see perfectly well that something has changed you—you who used to be so orderly. Isn't that true? You've been promised more butter than bread. You've been told that your turn has come to be the masters. . . . Finally, you are being regimented into that famous International, that army of brigands whose dream is the destruction of society. . . ."

Then Etienne interrupted him.

"You are mistaken, sir. Not one single Montsou coal-digger has joined yet. But if they are driven to it, all the coal pits will join. That depends on the Company."

From that moment the struggle went on between M. Hennebeau and Etienne, as if the other miners were no longer there.

"The Company is a Providence for its men: you are wrong to threaten it. This year it has spent 300,000 francs building mining patches, which don't even bring in two per cent, and I'm not saying anything about the pensions it pays or the coal or medicines it gives away. You who seem intelligent, you who have become in a few months one of our most skillful workmen, wouldn't you be doing better to spread these truths than to ruin yourself by associating with people of bad reputation? Yes, I mean Rasseneur, whom we had to get rid of in order to save our coal pits from socialistic corruption. You are constantly seen at his house, and he is certainly the one who has induced you to create that Provident Fund, which we should be perfectly willing to tolerate if it were merely a means of saving, but which we regard as a weapon turned against us, a reserve fund to pay the expenses of a war. And, in that connection, I must add that the Company means to exert control over that fund."

Etienne allowed him to go on, his eyes fixed on the superintendent, his lips quivering nervously. He smiled at the last sentence. He answered simply:

"Then that is a new demand, for until now, sir, you have neglected to demand that control. . . . Our wish, unfortunately, is that the Company pay less attention to us, and that instead of playing the part of Providence it show itself merely fair to us by giving us what is coming to us: our profits which it is appropriating. Is it honest whenever a depression occurs to let the workers die of hunger in order to preserve the stockholders' dividends? . . . Say what you will, sir, the new system is a disguised lowering of wages, and that's what makes us indignant, for if the Company has to economize, it's acting in bad faith when it economizes on the men alone."

"Ah! So that's it!" cried M. Hennebeau. "I was waiting for that, that accusation of starving the people and of living by the sweat of their brows. How can you talk such nonsense, you who ought to know the enormous risks that capital runs in industry—in mines for example? A completely equipped coal-pit today costs from 1,500,000 to 2,000,000 francs; and then think of the trouble you have before you can get a moderate return on the sum you've sunk into it! Almost half of the mining companies in France go bankrupt. . . . Besides it is stupid to accuse the successful companies of cruelty. . . . When their workers suffer, they suffer too. Do you think the Company hasn't as much to lose as you in the present depression? The Company isn't the master of the wages it pays. It obeys the laws of competition, under penalty of ruin. Blame the facts, not the Company! . . . But you don't want to listen, you don't want to understand!"

"Yes," said the young man, "we understand very well that there is no improvement possible for us so long as things go on as they do, and it's just because of that that one of these days the workers will finally see to it that things go differently."

This sentence, so mild in form, was uttered in a low voice tremulous with its threat and with such conviction that a long silence followed. A constraint, a breath of fear, passed through the quietness of the drawing-room. The other delegates, who did not completely understand, felt, however, that the comrade had just demanded their share in those comforts which surrounded them; and they began to cast sidewise glances at the warm hangings, the comfortable chairs, all this luxury, the least knick-knack of which could pay for their food for a month.

At last M. Hennebeau, who had been reflecting a moment, rose as a signal for them to leave. They stood up too. Etienne had nudged Maheu; and the latter, his speech once more thick and clumsy, resumed:

"Then, sir, is that your final answer? We'll tell the rest that you reject our demands."

"I, my good fellow?" exclaimed the superintendent, "why, I'm rejecting nothing! . . . I am a wage earner just like yourselves. I have no more power here than the smallest of your trappers. I am given orders and my only job is to see that they are properly carried out. I have told you what I thought I ought to tell you, but far be it from me to make any decisions. . . . You bring me your demands; I shall make them known to the Directors; then I shall transmit the answer to you."

He spoke with the formal air of a high official who avoids getting stirred up about matters, with the polite curtness of a simple instrument of authority. And the miners now looked at him with distrust, wondering what interest he might have in lying, what he was to get out of putting himself between them and the real bosses. A tricky fellow perhaps, a man who was paid like a worker, and who lived so well!

Etienne ventured to intervene again.

"You see, sir, how regrettable it is that we cannot plead our cause in person. We would explain many things, we would find reasons which necessarily escape you. . . . If we only knew where we must go to see the right person."

M. Hennebeau did not get angry. He even smiled.

"Ah! Since you have no confidence in me, the matter gets complicated. . . . You will have to go over there."

The delegates had followed his vague gesture, his hand stretched out toward one of the windows. Where was "over there"? Paris, probably. But they didn't know for sure. "Over there" seemed to fall back into a terrifying distance, into an inaccessible and holy country where the unknown god crouched on his throne in the far recesses of his tabernacle. Never would they see him. They merely felt him as a force which from afar weighed heavily on the ten thousand coal miners of Montsou. And when the superintendent spoke it was this force that was hidden behind him, delivering oracles.

Discouragement overwhelmed them. Etienne himself shrugged his shoulders as if to tell them that the best thing to do was to go away. At the same time M. Hennebeau gave Maheu a friendly pat on the arm and asked him for news from Jeanlin.

"It certainly is a hard lesson for you, and you are the ones who are defending bad timbering! . . . You will think things over, my friends, you will come to see that a strike would be a disaster for everyone. Within a week you will die of hunger. What will you do? . . . Anyhow, I count on your good behavior, and I am convinced that you will go down into the mines on Monday at the latest."

The miners trooped out of the drawing-room like a herd, their backs bowed, without making any reply to the superintendent's hope that they would submit. The superintendent, accompanying them, felt it necessary to sum up their conversation: the Company on the one hand with its new tariff, the workers on the other with their demand for an increase of five centimes per carload. In order to leave them no illusion he felt it proper to warn them that their conditions would certainly be rejected by the Directors.

"Think it over before you do anything rash," he repeated, disturbed at their silence.

In the entry way Pierron bowed very low while Levaque pretended to put on his cap. Maheu was groping for some parting word when Etienne again nudged him. And they all left enveloped in this threatening silence. The door closed with a loud bang.

When M. Hennebeau returned to the dining room he found his guests motionless and mute before their liqueurs. In a few words he told his story to Deneulin, whose face grew even gloomier. Then, while M. Hennebeau drank his cold coffee, the guests tried to talk of other things. But the Grégoires themselves returned to the subject of the strike. They were amazed that there were no laws to forbid workers to leave their work. Paul quieted Cécile's fears, and said that they were expecting the police.

Finally Madame Hennebeau called the servant.

"Hippolyte, before we go into the drawing room, open the windows and let in some fresh air."

All the entrances to the Voreux had just been closed. The sixty soldiers, with grounded arms, barred the door leading to the receiving room, the foremen's room, and the shed. The captain had lined up the soldiers in two rows against the brick wall, so that they could not be attacked from the rear.

At first the band of miners who had come down from the patch kept at a distance. There were some thirty of them at most, and they talked to one another in confused and violent words.

Maheude, the first to arrive, her hair disheveled beneath a handkerchief hastily tied over it and holding Estelle asleep in her arms, kept repeating in feverish tones:

"Don't let anyone in or out! We've got to shut them all in there!"

Maheu nodded approval, and just then old Mouque arrived from Réquillart. The miners tried to stop him from going through. But he argued; he said that after all his horses had to have their oats to eat and they didn't give a hang about the revolution. Besides, there was a dead horse down there, and they were waiting for him to get it out. Etienne let Mouque through and the soldiers allowed him to go to the shaft. A quarter of an hour later, the band of strikers, gradually swelling in numbers, began to look threatening. A wide door opened on the surface of the ground, and men came out of it, carting the dead beast fastened in a rope net. They left the pitiful mass of flesh in the puddles of melting snow. The shock was so great that no one kept the men from returning and barricading the door anew. They had all recognized the horse, with his head bent back and stiff against his flank. Whispers ran about:

"It's Trompette, isn't it? It's Trompette."

It was indeed Trompette. Never since he had first gone down into the mine had he become acclimatized. He remained melancholy, without taste for his work, as though tortured with longing for the light. Vainly Bateille, the veteran horse of the mine, would rub his ribs against him in his friendly way, and softly bite his neck to give him a little of the resignation learned in his ten years in the mines. These caresses increased Trompette's melancholy, his skin quivered under the confidences of the comrade who had grown old in the darkness. And both of them, every time they met and snorted together, seemed to be grieving; the old one that he could no longer remember, the young one that he could never forget. At the stable they were neighbors at the manger, and they lived with lowered heads, breathing in each other's nostrils, exchanging their continual dreams of daylight, visions of green grass, white roads, endless yellow light. Then when Trompette, soaked in sweat, lay in death agony on his litter, Bateille sniffed at him despairingly—sniffs that were almost like sobs. He felt that Trompette was growing cold; the mine was taking from him his last joy, this friend fallen from above, fresh with pleasant odors which reminded him of his youth in the open air. And he broke his tether, neighing with fright, when he sensed that his friend no longer stirred.

Mouque had indeed warned the head foreman a week before. But a lot they cared about a sick horse at a time like this! The gentlemen were not very fond of removing the horses. Now, however, they had to make up their minds to take him out. The evening before, the groom with two other men had spent an hour tying up Trompette. They harnessed Bateille to bring Trompette to the shaft. Slowly the old horse pulled, dragging his dead comrade through a gallery so narrow that he had to jog along at the risk of scraping his skin off; and weary, his head shook as he listened to the long rustling of that shapeless mass which the men were waiting to slaughter. At the foot of the shaft when he had been unharnessed, he followed with a gloomy eye the preparations for the ascent; the body pushed onto crossbars above the sump, the net being fastened beneath a cage. At last the loaders called for the carcass. He lifted his head to watch the body go up, at first slowly, then suddenly lost in the darkness, flown up forever to the top of that black hole. And he remained with his neck outstretched, his vague animal memory perhaps recalling the things of the earth. But it was all over. The comrade would never see anything any more. He himself would also be tied up in a pitiful bundle the day that he would go up there. His legs began to tremble. The fresh gusts of wind from the distant countryside choked him; and he felt as if intoxicated when he plodded back to the stable.

At the surface the coal miners stood gloomily before Trompette's carcass. A woman said in a low voice:

"It's different with a man; a man goes down into the mines if he wants to!"

A new crowd was arriving from the coal patch, and Levaque at the head, followed by his wife and Bouteloup, shouted:

"Kill them, those Borains! We don't want any scabs around here! Kill them! Kill them!"

They all rushed forward—Etienne simply had to stop them. He was already talking to the captain, a tall slender young man hardly twenty-eight years old, whose face looked desperate and resolute. Etienne began to explain matters to him. He tried to win him over and watched the effect of his words. What was the good of risking a useless massacre? Wasn't justice on the side of the miners? We're all brothers, we ought to come to an understanding! At the word "republic," the captain had made a nervous gesture. He preserved his military stiffness and said abruptly:

"Get away from here! Don't force me to do my duty."

Three times Etienne tried. Behind him his comrades were growling. It was bruited about that M. Hennebeau was at the pit, and they talked of letting him down by the neck to see if he would dig his coal himself. But it was a false rumor for only Négrel and Dansaert were there. Both showed themselves for a moment at a window in the receiving room: the head foreman stood in the background while the engineer bravely looked around at the crowd with his bright little eyes, smiling with the sneering contempt he had for men and things. The miners hooted and the heads at the window disappeared. In their place nothing could be seen but Souvarine's pale face. As luck would have it he was on duty. He hadn't left his engine for a single day since the beginning of the strike. He no longer talked to anyone. He was being gradually penetrated by a fixed idea which glittered like a steel nail in the depths of his pale eyes.

"Get out of here!" shouted the captain. "I wish to hear nothing. I have orders to guard the shaft. I shall guard it. . . . And don't rush us, or I shall know how to make you get back."

Despite his firm voice, a mounting anxiety made him blanch at the sight of the ever-swelling flood of miners. He was to be relieved at noon; but, ¹⁰ fearing he would be unable to hold out until then, he had just sent a trapper from the pit to Montsou to ask for reinforcements.

He had been answered by shouts.

"Kill the scabs! Kill the Borains! . . . We mean to be the masters in our own place!"

Etienne drew back in despair. The end had come; there was nothing left to do but fight and die. And he stopped holding back his comrades. The mob moved up to the little troop. There were ²⁰ nearly four hundred miners, and the nearby patches were emptying as more people arrived on the run. They all shouted one cry. Maheu and Levaque raged at the soldiers:

"Get out of here! We've got nothing against you! But get out of here!"

"This is none of your business," said Maheude. "Let us attend to our own affairs."

And, behind her, Levaque's wife added, more violently:

"Do we have to eat you to get through? Get the hell out of here!"

Even Lydie's shrill voice was heard. Having jammed herself into the thick of it with Bébert, she said in a sharp voice:

"There's a pack of scurvy soldier-dogs for you!"

Catherine, a few paces away, was gazing and listening, stupefied by these new scenes of violence, into the midst of which bad luck was always pushing her. Wasn't she suffering more than enough ⁴⁰ already? What fault could she have committed that misfortune would never let her rest? Only yesterday she could not understand the strikers' wrath. She thought when one has one's share of blows, there's no use looking for more. And now her heart was swelling with a gnawing hatred. She remembered what Etienne used to tell her in the evening, and she tried to hear what he was saying to the soldiers now. He called them comrades; he reminded them that they belonged to the people ⁵⁰ too; that they ought to be on the side of the people against those who exploited the people's misery.

A long shudder ran through the crowd and an old woman scurried forward. It was Mother Brûlé, terrifyingly scrawny, her neck and arms outstretched, rushing up so wildly that wisps of gray hair got in her eyes and blinded her.

"Ah! by God, here I am!" she stammered, breathless. "That traitor of a Pierron shut me up in the cellar!"

And without waiting, she fell onto the armed ¹⁰ troops, her mouth livid, belching abuse.

"You pack of scoundrels! You dirty scum! These guys that lick their masters' boots and are only brave against poor people!"

Then the others joined her, and there were volleys of insults. Some of them shouted: "Hurrah for the soldiers! Throw the officer down the shaft!" Soon there was but the single roar: "Down with the red breeches!" The soldiers, having listened with mute and motionless faces to all these calls ²⁰ for brotherhood, and to the friendly attempts to win them over, preserved their passive stiffness beneath this hail of abusive words. Behind them the captain had drawn his sword; and, as the crowd pressed toward them ever closer, threatening to crush them against the wall, he ordered the soldiers to cross bayonets. They obeyed. A double row of steel blades pointed at the strikers' chests.

"Ah! The swine!" howled Mother Brûlé, draw- ³⁰ ing back.

The miners moved forward again in an exalted contempt for death. Women dashed forward. Maheude and Levaque's wife shouted:

"Kill us! Go ahead and kill us! We want our rights!"

Levaque, at risk of cutting himself, seized a bunch of bayonets with both hands. He shook them and he dragged them toward him in an effort to snatch them away; and he twisted them ⁴⁰ in the tenfold strength of his wrath. Bouteloup, sorry he had followed Levaque, stood aside and quietly watched him.

"Go ahead, get into it," Maheu kept shouting, "get into it, if you're real men!"

Levaque opened his jacket. Pulling his shirt apart, he showed his naked chest with its hairy skin tattooed with coal. He moved on toward the bayonet points; he forced them to draw back, terrible in his insolent bravado. One of the points ⁵⁰ pricked him in the chest, and he became like a madman, trying to make it enter so deep that he might hear his ribs crack.

"Cowards! You don't dare! . . . There are ten thousand behind us. Yes, you can kill us—but there will be ten thousand more to kill."

The position of the soldiers was becoming critical, for they had received strict orders not to use their arms, except as a last resort. And how were they to keep these furious people from impaling themselves? Moreover, the space was growing smaller; they were being driven against the wall, and they could not retreat any farther. The troop, a handful of men, face to face with the rising sea of miners still held its own, however; and calmly executed the brief orders given by the captain. The latter, with eyes clear and lips nervously compressed, feared only one thing: that his men would lose their tempers under the taunts. Already a young sergeant, a tall thin fellow, his scant mustache beginning to bristle, moved his eyelids in a disquieting way. Near him an old soldier, his skin tanned by twenty campaigns, grew pale when he saw his bayonet twisted like a piece of straw.

Another, probably a recruit still smelling of the plow, flushed every time he heard himself called "scum" and "riffraff." And the violent outbursts did not cease—the raised fists, the hateful words, the shovelfuls of accusations and threats which buffeted their faces. It required all the force of the orders they had received to keep them thus, with silent faces, in the morose and haughty silence of military discipline.

A collision seemed inevitable when from behind the soldiers Richomme appeared, the white-haired foreman, overcome with emotion. He shouted:

"Good God! This is all too stupid! Such damn fool nonsense can't go on!"

And he threw himself between the bayonets and the miners.

"Comrades, listen to me! . . . You know that I am an old worker and that I have never stopped being one of you. Well, good God, I promise you that if they are not fair to you I'll tell the bosses myself how things stand. But this is too much! It doesn't get you anywhere to yell ugly names at these good fellows and to want to have a hole drilled through your bellies!"

They listened, they hesitated. Up above, unfortunately, little Négrel's sharp profile reappeared. He feared, no doubt, that they would accuse him of sending a foreman instead of risking his own life; and he tried to speak. But his voice was lost in a tumult so frightful that he was obliged to leave the window again with merely a shrug of the shoulders. From that moment on Richomme vainly pleaded with them in his own name. He repeated that the miners must settle their own affairs and leave the soldiers alone. Now they repelled him; they suspected him. But he was obstinate and remained among them.

"Good God! Let them break my head as well as yours, but I won't desert you as long as you are so foolish!"

Etienne, whom he implored to help him make them listen to reason, made a helpless gesture. It was too late. Their number had now risen to more than five hundred. And in addition to the enraged men who had come to drive the Borains away, idle onlookers and banterers were enjoying the battle. In the midst of one group a little distance away, Zacharie and Philomène looked on as if this were a show. They were so unperturbed that they had brought along their two children, Achille and Désirée. A new stream of people poured in from Réquillart, among them Mouquet and his wife. The former with a grin on his face, walked up to his friend Zacharie and slapped him on the shoulder; while his wife excitedly dashed into the first row of hotheads.

Every minute, however, the captain kept turning his eyes toward the Montsou road. The reinforcements he had asked for had not arrived; his sixty men could not hold back any longer. Suddenly he was struck with the idea of kindling the crowd's imagination, and he ordered his men to load their rifles. The soldiers executed the order, but the excitement mounted—and the swaggering and the jeering.

"Look! Those good-for-nothings are going off to target practice!" jeered the women, the Brûlé woman, Levaque's wife, and the rest.

Maheude, holding against her breast the little body of Estelle, who had awakened and was crying, came so near that the sergeant asked her what she was doing there with that poor kid.

"What's that to you?" she replied. "Fire at us if you dare!"

Contemptuously the miners shook their heads. None of them thought that anyone could fire on them.

"They've got blank cartridges," said Levaque.

"Are we Cossacks?" cried Maheu. "You don't fire on Frenchmen, by God!"

Others exclaimed that in the Crimean campaign people were not afraid of lead. And they all continued to press against the rifles. If the soldiers had fired at that moment the crowd would have been mowed down.

In the front row Mouquet's wife was choking with fury at the thought that soldiers wanted to drill holes in women's flesh. She spat out all her ugly words at them. She found no vulgarity base enough, when, suddenly, having nothing left but that mortal offense to flaunt in the soldiers' faces, she exhibited her backside. With both hands she lifted her skirts, bent her back, and displayed the enormous rotundity.

"Take that, it's for you! And even at that it's too clean for you, you bunch of filthy rats!"

She plunged, bent, and turned so that everyone might get his share of the insult, repeating at each thrust she made:

"And this for the officer! And this for the sergeant! And this for the soldiers!"

A storm of laughter arose. Bébert and Lydie were in convulsions. Etienne himself, even though he was expecting dismal things to happen, applauded this insulting nakedness. All of them, the banterers as well as the infuriated, hooted the soldiers, as if they had seen them splashed by filth. Catherine, with blood in her throat, stood alone on an old plank. She remained speechless, her body boiling with hate.

There was a sudden commotion. In order to calm the excitement of his men, the captain decided to take some prisoners. With one leap, Mouquet's wife escaped between her comrades' legs. Three miners, Levaque and two others, were seized from among the more violent ones, and were closely guarded at the far end of the foremen's room. From above, Négrel and Dansaert shouted to the captain to come in and take refuge with them. He refused, feeling that these buildings, with their doors without locks, could be carried in an assault, and that he would be put to the shame of being disarmed. His little troop was already growling with impatience: it was impossible to flee before these wretches in wooden shoes. The sixty, with their backs to the wall and rifles loaded, once more faced the mob.

At first there was a recoil and a deep silence. The strikers were astonished at this energetic stroke. Then someone shouted a demand for the prisoners, calling for their immediate release. Some cried out that their throats were being cut in there. Without any attempt at concerted action and carried away by the same impulse, by the same need for revenge, all ran to the nearby piles of bricks—those bricks made from this very soil and baked on the spot. The children carried them one by one; women filled their skirts with them. Soon, everyone had ammunition at his feet, and the battle of brick-throwing began.

It was Mother Brûlé who set to work first. She broke the bricks on the sharp edge of her knee, and first with her right hand and then her left hand, she hurled the two pieces. Levaque's wife almost threw her shoulder out; she was so fat, so soft that she had to move very close to get her aim, in spite of the pleading of Bouteloup, who pulled her back, in the hope of dragging her away, now that her husband had been taken away. All the women were frantic, and Mouquet's wife, tired of making herself bleed by breaking the bricks on her too fat thighs, preferred to throw them whole. Even the youngsters entered the combat. Bébert showed Lydie how the bricks should be thrown underhand. It was a storm of huge hailstones; one could hear the dull thuds. Suddenly in the midst of this fury Catherine seized some bricks and hurled them with all the strength of her little arms. She could not have said why; she was choking, she was longing to kill everyone. Would it not be over soon, this cursed life? She had had enough of it, beaten and driven out by her man, wandering about like a lost dog in the mud of the roads, being unable to get anything to eat even from her father—himself starving. Things never seemed to get better; they had always got worse ever since she could remember. And she broke bricks and threw them forward, with the one idea of sweeping everything away. Her eyes were so blinded that she did not even see whose jaws she might be smashing.

Etienne, still standing in front of the soldiers, almost had his skull broken. His ear swelled; he turned around; he started when he saw that the brick had come from Catherine's feverish hands. At the risk of being killed, he remained where he was, gazing at her. Many others also forgot themselves, excited by the battle, and remained with their arms dangling. Mouquet appraised the throws as if this were a game of bouchon: oh! that was a good shot! And that other one, no luck! He was having a good time. He nudged Zacharie, who was quarreling with Philomène because he had boxed Achilles' and Désirée's ears, refusing to put them up on his shoulders so that they could see. There were spectators, massed all along the road. And at the top of the slope, at the entrance to the coal patch, old Bonnemort appeared, dragging himself along on his stick, motionless now, standing against the rust-colored sky.

From the moment the first brick had been thrown Richomme, the foreman, had placed himself between the soldiers and the miners. He pleaded with the soldiers; he exhorted the miners, ignoring the danger, and so desperate that big tears streamed from his eyes. No one could hear his words in the midst of the uproar; but one could see his big gray mustaches trembling.

The hail of bricks grew thicker; the men followed the women's example.

Then Maheude noticed that Maheu was standing in the rear. His hands were empty, and he looked gloomy.

"Say, what's the matter with you?" she shouted. "Are you a coward? Are you going to let them take your comrades to prison? Ah! If I didn't have this child, I'd show you!"

Estelle, clinging to her neck and screaming, kept her from joining the Brûlé woman and the others. And, as her man did not seem to hear, she kicked some bricks against his legs.

"Good God! There, take that! Must I spit in your face before everyone to give you courage?"

Turning very red, he broke bricks and threw them. She lashed him on, she stunned him, she yelped cries of death behind him. At the same time she crushed her daughter against her breast, holding her convulsively. Maheu kept moving forward until he was face to face with the rifles.

The little troop recoiled beneath the shower of bricks. Fortunately the women, aiming too high, were riddling the wall. What should the soldiers do? The idea of going inside, of turning their backs, made the captain's pale face flush for an instant; but that was no longer even possible: they would be cut to pieces at the slightest movement. A brick had just broken the visor of his military cap. Drops of blood trickled from his forehead. Several of his men were hurt; and he felt that they were losing self-control in that unbridled instinct of self-defense when obedience to leaders ceases. The sergeant had let out a "By God!" for his left shoulder was half out of its socket, his flesh bruised in a dull impact like the blow of a washer-woman's paddle on her linens. Grazed twice, the recruit was incensed by a smashed thumb, and a bruise on his right knee: were they going to let themselves be provoked much longer? A rebounding stone hit the old veteran in the belly and his cheeks turned green. His rifle trembled as he held it before him. Three times the captain was on the point of ordering his men to fire. He was choked by anguish; an interminable struggle of a few seconds jumbled within him ideas, duties, all his beliefs as a man and a soldier. The rain of bricks redoubled, and he opened his mouth. He was just about to shout: "Fire!" when the rifles went off by themselves, three shots at first, then five, then the roll of a volley. In the great silence that followed there came a lone shot.

Stupor reigned. They had fired. The gaping crowd stood motionless, not yet believing their eyes. But heart-rending cries pierced the air at the same time that the bugler sounded the signal to cease firing. There was a mad panic,—the rush of cattle filled with grapeshot, a wild flight through the mud.

At the first three shots Bébert and Lydie had fallen one on top of the other, the girl struck in the face, the boy wounded beneath the left shoulder. Knocked to the ground, she lay motionless. But he moved and seized her with both his arms, in the convulsions of a death agony. And Jeanlin, who had run all the way from Réquillart, still half asleep, groping his way through the smoke, arrived to see Bébert die, holding his little wife tightly in his arms.

The other five shots had brought down Mother Brûlé and Richomme, the foreman. Hit in the back just as he was pleading with his comrades, he had fallen to his knees; and, slipping onto one hip, there he lay on the ground in the throes of the death rattle, his face still wet with the tears he had wept. The old woman, her throat slit open, fell stiff and crackling like a bundle of dry faggots. She stammered one last oath in the gurgling of blood.

But then the volley of bullets swept the field and mowed down the groups of bystanders laughing at the battle from their vantage point a hundred paces away. A bullet entered Mouquet's mouth and knocked him down, shattered his head at the feet of Zacharie and Philomène, whose two youngsters were splashed with red drops. At the same moment Mouquet's wife received two bullets in the stomach. She had seen the soldiers shoulder arms, and, being game, she had instinctively thrown herself in front of Catherine, shouting to her to look out for herself. She uttered a great shriek and fell on her back, overturned by the shock. Etienne ran up, tried to lift her, and carry her away; but she motioned to him that it was all over. Then the death rattle rolled in her throat, but she kept smiling at both Catherine and Etienne, as if she were happy to see them together, now that she was going away.

Everything seemed to be over. The hurricane of bullets had been lost in the distance as far even as the house fronts in the mining patch when the last shot, isolated and delayed, was fired.

Maheu, struck in the heart, pivoted and fell face forward into a puddle of water, black with coal dust.

Stupefied, Maheude leaned over him.

"Come, old man, get up. It isn't anything, is it?"

Since both her arms were taken up with Estelle, she had to put the child under one arm, so that with the other she could turn her man's head over.

"Say something! Where does it hurt you?"

His eyes were empty, his mouth drooled with a bloody froth. She realized he was dead. Then she remained sitting in the mud, her daughter like a bundle under her arm, looking at her man with a besotted expression on her face.

The pit was free. With a nervous gesture the captain had taken off his cap which had been cut by a piece of brick, then had put it right on again. In the face of the disaster of his life he preserved his pallid stiffness, while his men, with mute faces, reloaded their rifles. The terrified faces of Négrel and Dansaert could be seen at the window of the receiving room. Souvarine was behind them, his forehead lined with a deep wrinkle, as if his fixed idea were imprinted there, menacing. On the other side of the horizon, on the edge of the plain, Bonnemort had not stirred. Bracing himself with one hand on his stick, with the other he cupped his eyes to get a better view of the murder of his own people down there. The wounded howled. The dead were growing cold in their twisted postures, muddy with the liquid mud of the thaw. Here and there inky patches of coal shone through the soiled tatters of snow. And, in the midst of those human corpses, so small, so pitiful in their scrawny misery, lay the carcass of Trompette, a monstrous, harrowing mass of dead flesh.

Etienne had not been killed. He was still waiting near Catherine who had fallen from weariness and anguish, when a vibrant voice made him start. It was Abbé Ranvier, on his way back from saying Mass. His two arms upraised in the fury of a prophet, he called down the wrath of God upon the assassins! He heralded the era of justice, the approaching extermination by fire from heaven of the middle class which now was putting the crowning touch on its crimes by massacring the toilers and the disinherited of the world.

It was four o'clock in the morning. The cool April night was growing warmer as day approached. Stars shimmered in the limpid sky while the light of dawn threw a reddish haze over the east. And the drowsy black countryside had scarcely shuddered with that vague rumble that precedes waking.

Etienne was striding down the road to Vandame. He had just spent six weeks at Montsou in a hospital bed. Still sallow and very thin, he nevertheless had felt strong enough to leave, and he left. The Company, still trembling for its pits and constantly firing men, had notified him that it could not keep him on. The Company offered him a compensation of one hundred francs with the paternal advice to give up work in the mines since it would be too hard for him from now on. But he had refused the hundred francs. . . . He got up early in the morning. There was only one thing more that he wanted to do before going to take the eight o'clock train at Marchiennes—say good-bye to his comrades.

Etienne stopped for a moment on the road which was bathed in rosy light. It was good to breathe this pure air of early spring. The morning promised to be beautiful. The sun was slowly rising and the life of the earth was rising with it. He continued walking, striking the ground vigorously with his briar stick, gazing off in the distance at the plain rising out of the mists of night. He had seen no one since leaving the mine save Maheude who had come only once to the hospital, then had doubtless been unable to return. But he knew that the whole patch was now going down to work in the Jean-Bart mine and that Maheude had gone back to work there too.

Little by little people appeared on the deserted roads, silent charcoal-burners kept passing Etienne, their faces wan. It was said that the Company was taking unfair advantage of its triumph. After the strike had been on for two-and-a-half months the miners, beaten by hunger, had returned to the pits. They had been obliged to accept the tariff on timbering—that disguised lowering of wages, now all the more hateful because it was stained with the blood of their comrades. The Company was stealing an hour of work from them. They were forced to go back on their oath never to submit, and that imposed perjury was like bitter gall in their throats. Work was being resumed everywhere, at Mirou, at Madeleine, at Crèvecœur, at La Victoire. Everywhere in the morning haze, along the roads still drowned in shadow, the herd tramped on, rows of men walking with heads bowed down, like cattle led to the slaughterhouse. They shivered under their thin clothing. And when one saw these men, mute black shadows, returning to work in a body, without a laugh, without a sidewise glance, one felt that their teeth were gritting with anger, that their hearts were swelling with hatred, and that all this was simply a resignation to the needs of the belly.

Etienne took the road to the left, to Joiselle. In the distance, in the clear sunlight, he could see the tipples of several mines—Mirou on the right, Madeleine and Crève-cœur side by side. Work was roaring on every hand. He thought he heard the blows of the pickax at the bottom of the earth resounding now from one end of the plain to the other. One blow, and another blow, and yet more blows, under the fields, the roads, and the villages which were smiling at the daylight. The sound of the dark toil in the subterranean dungeon was so crushed by the enormous mass of rock that one had to know it was buried there to feel its great sorrowful sigh. And now he mused that violence perhaps did not hasten things. Severed cables, torn-up rails, broken lamps—what useless tasks! . . . Vaguely he divined that lawful methods might one day be more terrible. . . . Yes, Maheude with her good sense had said the right thing: that this would be the final blow: to organize quietly, to learn to know one another, to join unions when the law would permit; and then, one day when they would feel their united strength, when they would number millions of workers against a few thousand idlers, let them then take the power, let them then be the masters! Ah! What an awakening of truth and justice! The sated and crouching god would instantly be destroyed, that monstrous idol hidden in the deep recesses of his tabernacle, in that faraway unknown place where the poor toiling wretches who had never even seen him, fed him on their flesh.

Etienne, leaving the road to Vandame, now came onto the paved street. To the right he saw Montsou fading in the distance. Opposite were the ruins of Voreux, the cursed hole where three pumps worked relentlessly. Then, there were the other pits against the horizon, La Victoire, Saint-Thomas, Feutry-Cantel; while, toward the north, the tall chimneys of the blast furnaces and the batteries of coke kilns stood smoking in the transparent air of the morning. If he did not want to miss the eight o'clock train, he would have to hurry, for he still had six kilometers to go.

Beneath his feet the deep blows, the stubborn blows, of the pickaxes continued. The comrades were all there; at every stride he could hear them following him. Wasn't that Maheude far down under that bed of beets, dragging her twisted spine? Wasn't that her raucous breathing mingled with the rumble of the ventilator? He thought he recognized others, to the left, to the right, farther on, under the wheatfields, the hedges, and the young trees. Overhead the April sun shone in all its glory, warming the pregnant earth. Life was gushing forth from its fertile soil; buds burst into green leaves; the fields were quivering with the growing of the grass. Everywhere seeds swelled, reached upward, and broke through the plain, throbbing with a great need for warmth and light. Sap overflowed in whispering voices; the sound of seeds burst forth into a great kiss. Again, again, and ever more distinctly, as if they had drawn nearer the surface, the comrades were wielding their pickaxes. And the country was pregnant with the rumbling beneath the flaming rays of the sun in the young morning. Men were pushing through the ground, a black avenging army, springing up slowly in the furrows, growing for the harvests of the future century—and this germination would soon make the whole earth burst.

ANATOLE FRANCE

The Procurator of Judæa

Ælius Lamia, born in Italy of illustrious parents, had not yet discarded the toga prætexta when he set out for the schools of Athens to study philosophy. Subsequently he took up his residence at Rome, and in his house on the Esquiline, amid a circle of youthful wastrels, abandoned himself to licentious courses. But, being accused of engaging in criminal relations with Lepida, the wife of Sulpicius Quirinus, a man of consular rank, and being found guilty, he was exiled by Tiberius Cæsar. At that time he was just entering his twenty-fourth year. During the eighteen years that his exile lasted he traversed Syria, Palestine, Cappadocia, and Armenia, and made prolonged visits to Antioch, Cæsarea, and Jerusalem. When, after the death of Tiberius, Caius was raised to the purple, Lamia obtained permission to return to Rome. He even regained a portion of his possessions. Adversity had taught him wisdom.

He avoided all intercourse with the wives and daughters of Roman citizens, made no efforts toward obtaining office, held aloof from public honours, and lived a secluded life in his house on the Esquiline. Occupying himself with the task of recording all the remarkable things he had seen during his distant travels, he turned, as he said, the vicissitudes of his years of expiation into a diversion for his hours of rest. In the midst of these calm enjoyments, alternating with assiduous study of the works of Epicurus, he recognized with a mixture of surprise and vexation that age was stealing upon him. In his sixty-second year, being afflicted with an illness which proved in no slight degree troublesome, he decided to have recourse to the waters at Baia. The coast at that point, once frequented by the halcyon, was at this date the resort of the wealthy Roman, greedy of pleasure. For a week Lamia lived alone, without a friend in the brilliant crowd. Then one day, after dinner, an inclination to which he yielded urged him to ascend the inclines which, covered with vines that resembled bacchantes, looked out upon the waves.

Having reached the summit, he seated himself by the side of a path beneath a terebinth and let his glances wander over the lovely landscape. To his left, livid and bare, the Phlegræan plain stretched out towards the ruins of Cumæ. On his right, Cape Misenum plunged its abrupt spur beneath the Tyrrhenian sea. Beneath his feet luxurious Baia, following the graceful outline of the coast, displayed its gardens, its villas thronged with statues, its porticos, its marble terraces along the shores of the blue ocean where the dolphins sported. Before him, on the other side of the bay, on the Campanian coast, gilded by the already sinking sun, gleamed the temples which far away rose above the laurels of Posilippo, whilst on the extreme horizon Vesuvius looked forth smiling.

Lamia drew from a fold of his toga a scroll containing the Treatise upon Nature, extended himself upon the ground, and began to read. But the warning cries of a slave necessitated his rising to allow of the passage of a litter which was being carried along the narrow pathway through the vineyards. The litter, being uncurtained, permitted Lamia to see stretched upon the cushions as it was borne nearer to him the figure of an elderly man of immense bulk who, supporting his head on his hand, gazed out with a gloomy and disdainful expression. His nose, which was aquiline, and his chin, which was prominent, seemed desirous of meeting across his lips, and his jaws were powerful.

From the first moment Lamia was convinced that the face was familiar to him. He hesitated a moment before the name came to him. Then suddenly hastening towards the litter with a display of surprise and delight—

"Pontius Pilate!" he cried. "The gods be praised who have permitted me to see you once again!"

The old man gave a signal to the slaves to stop, and cast a keen glance upon the stranger who had addressed him.

"Pontius, my dear host," resumed the latter, "have twenty years so far whitened my hair and hollowed my cheeks that you no longer recognise your friend Ælius Lamia?"

At this name Pontius Pilate dismounted from the litter as actively as the weight of his years and the heaviness of his gait permitted him, and embraced Ælius Lamia again and again.

"Gods! what a treat it is to me to see you once more! But, alas, you call up memories of those long-vanished days when I was Procurator of Judæa, in the province of Syria. Why, it must be thirty years ago that I first met you. It was at Cæsarea, whither you came to drag out your weary term of exile. I was fortunate enough to alleviate it a little, and out of friendship, Lamia, you followed me to that depressing place Jerusalem, where the Jews filled me with bitterness and disgust. You remained for more than ten years my guest and my companion, and in converse about Rome and things Roman we both of us managed to find consolation—you for your misfortunes, and I for my burdens of State."

Lamia embraced him afresh.

"You forget two things, Pontius; you are overlooking the facts that you used your influence on my behalf with Herod Antipas, and that your purse was freely open to me."

"Let us not talk of that," replied Pontius, "since after your return to Rome you sent me by one of your freedmen a sum of money which repaid me with usury."

"Pontius, I could never consider myself out of your debt by the mere payment of money. But tell me, have the gods fulfilled your desires? Are you in the enjoyment of all the happiness you deserve?"

Tell me about your family, your fortunes, your health."

"I have withdrawn to Sicily, where I possess estates, and where I cultivate wheat for the market. My eldest daughter, my best-beloved Pontia, who has been left a widow, lives with me and directs my household. The gods be praised, I have preserved my mental vigour; my memory is not in the least degree enfeebled. But old age always brings in its train a long procession of griefs and infirmities. I am cruelly tormented with gout. And at this very moment you find me on my way to the Phlegræan plain in search of a remedy for my sufferings. From that burning soil, whence at night flames burst forth, proceed acrid exhalations of sulphur which, so they say, ease the pains and restore suppleness to the stiffened joints. At least, the physicians assure me that it is so."

"May you find it so in your case, Pontius! But, despite the gout and its burning torments, you scarcely look as old as myself, although in reality you must be my senior by ten years. Unmistakably you have retained a greater degree of vigour than I ever possessed, and I am overjoyed to find you looking so hale. Why, dear friend, did you retire from the public service before the customary age? Why, on resigning your governorship in Judæa, did you withdraw to a voluntary exile on your Sicilian estates? Give me an account of your doings from the moment that I ceased to be a witness of them. You were preparing to suppress a Samaritan rising when I set out for Cappadocia, where I hoped to draw some profit from the breeding of horses and mules. I have not seen you since then. How did that expedition succeed? Pray tell me. Everything interests me that concerns you in any way."

Pontius Pilate sadly shook his head.

"My natural disposition," he said, "as well as a sense of duty, impelled me to fulfil my public responsibilities, not merely with diligence, but even with ardour. But I was pursued by unrelenting hatred. Intrigues and calumnies cut short my career in its prime, and the fruit it should have looked to bear has withered away. You ask me about the Samaritan insurrection. Let us sit down on this hillock. I shall be able to give you an answer in few words. These occurrences are as vividly present to me as if they had happened yesterday."

"A man of the people, of persuasive speech—there are many such to be met with in Syria—induced the Samaritans to gather together in arms on Mount Gerizim (which in that country is looked upon as a holy place) under the promise that he would disclose to their sight the sacred vessels which in the ancient days of Evander and our father, Æneas, had been hidden away by an eponymous hero, or rather a tribal deity, named Moses. Upon this assurance the Samaritans rose in rebellion; but, having been warned in time to forestall them, I dispatched detachments of infantry to occupy the mountain and stationed cavalry to keep the approaches to it under observation.

"These measures of prudence were urgent. The rebels were already laying siege to the town of Tythaba, situated at the foot of Mount Gerizim. I easily dispersed them and stifled the as yet scarcely organized revolt. Then, in order to give a forcible example with as few victims as possible, I handed over to execution the leaders of the rebellion. But you are aware, Lamia, in what strait dependence I was kept by the proconsul Vitellius, who governed Syria not in, but against, the interests of Rome, and looked upon the provinces of the empire as territories which could be farmed out to tetrarchs. The head men among the Samaritans, in their resentment against me, came and fell at his feet lamenting. To listen to them, nothing had been further from their thoughts than to disobey Cæsar. It was I who had provoked the rising, and it was purely in order to withstand my violence that they had gathered together around Tythaba. Vitellius listened to their complaints and, handing over the affairs of Judæa to his friend Marcellus, commanded me to go and justify my proceedings before the Emperor himself. With a heart overflowing with grief and resentment I took ship. Just as I approached the shores of Italy, Tiberius, worn out with age and the cares of empire, died suddenly on the self-same Cape Misenum whose peak we see from this very spot magnified in the mists of evening. I demanded justice of Caius, his successor, whose perception was naturally acute, and who was acquainted with Syrian affairs. But marvel with me, Lamia, at the maliciousness of fortune, resolved on my discomfiture. Caius then had in his suite at Rome the Jew Agrippa, his companion, the friend of his childhood, whom he cherished as his own eyes. Now Agrippa favoured Vitellius, inasmuch as Vitellius was the enemy of Antipas, whom Agrippa pursued with his hatred. The Emperor adopted the prejudices of his beloved Asiatic, and refused even to listen to me. There was nothing for me to do but bow beneath the stroke of unmerited misfortune. With tears for my meat and gall for my portion, I withdrew to my estates in Sicily, where I should have died of grief if my sweet Pontia had not come to console her father. I have cultivated wheat, and succeeded in producing the fullest ears in the whole province. But now my life is ended; the future will judge between Vitellius and me."

"Pontius," replied Lamia, "I am persuaded that you acted towards the Samaritans according to the rectitude of your character, and solely in the interests of Rome. But were you not perchance on that occasion a trifle too much influenced by that impetuous courage which has always swayed you? You will remember that in Judæa it often happened that I who, younger than you, should naturally have been more impetuous than you, was obliged to urge you to clemency and suavity."

"Suavity towards the Jews!" cried Pontius Pilate. "Although you have lived amongst them, it seems clear that you ill understand those enemies of the human race. Haughty and at the same time base, combining an invincible obstinacy with a despicably mean spirit, they weary alike your love and your hatred. My character, Lamia, was formed upon the maxims of the divine Augustus. When I was appointed Procurator of Judæa, the world was already penetrated with the majestic ideal of the pax romana. No longer, as in the days of our internecine strife, were we witnesses to the sack of a province for the aggrandisement of a proconsul. I knew where my duty lay. I was careful that my actions should be governed by prudence and moderation. The gods are my witnesses that I was resolved upon mildness, and upon mildness only. Yet what did my benevolent intentions avail me? You were at my side, Lamia, when, at the outset of my career as ruler, the first rebellion came to a head. Is there any need for me to recall the details to you? The garrison had been transferred from Cæsarea to take up its winter quarters at Jerusalem. Upon the ensigns of the legionaries appeared the presentment of Cæsar. The inhabitants of Jerusalem, who did not recognize the indwelling divinity of the Emperor, were scandalized at this, as though, when obedience is compulsory, it were not less abject to obey a god than a man. The priests of their nation appeared before my tribunal imploring me with supercilious humility to have the ensigns removed from within the holy city. Out of reverence for the divine nature of Cæsar and the majesty of the empire, I refused to comply. Then the rabble made common cause with the priests, and all around the pretorium portentous cries of supplication arose. I ordered the soldiers to stack their spears in front of the tower of Antonia, and to proceed, armed only with sticks like lictors, to disperse the insolent crowd. But, heedless of blows, the Jews continued their entreaties, and the more obstinate amongst them threw themselves on the ground and, exposing their throats to the rods, deliberately courted death. You were a witness of my humiliation on that occasion, Lamia. By the order of Vitellius I was forced to send the insignia back to Cæsarea. That disgrace I had certainly not merited. Before the immortal gods I swear that never once during my term of office did I flout justice and the laws. But I am grown old. My enemies and detractors are dead. I shall die unavenged. Who will now retrieve my character?"

He moaned and lapsed into silence. Lamia replied:

"That man is prudent who neither hopes nor fears anything from the uncertain events of the future. Does it matter in the least what estimate men may form of us hereafter? We ourselves are after all our own witnesses, and our own judges. You must rely, Pontius Pilate, on the testimony you yourself bear to your own rectitude. Be content with your own personal respect and that of your friends. For the rest, we know that mildness by itself will not suffice for the work of government. There is but little room in the actions of public men for that indulgence of human frailty which the philosophers recommend."

"We'll say no more at present," said Pontius. "The sulphurous fumes which rise from the Phlegræan plain are more powerful when the ground which exhales them is still warm beneath the sun's rays. I must hasten on. Adieu! But now that I have rediscovered a friend, I should wish to take advantage of my good fortune. Do me the favour, Ælius Lamia, to give me your company at supper at my house to-morrow. My house stands on the seashore, at the extreme end of the town in the direction of Misenum. You will easily recognize it by the porch, which bears a painting representing Orpheus surrounded by tigers and lions, whom he is charming with the strains from his lyre."

"Till to-morrow, Lamia," he repeated, as he climbed once more into his litter. "To-morrow we will talk about Judæa."

The following day at the supper hour Lamia presented himself at the house of Pontius Pilate. Two couches only were in readiness for occupants. Creditable but simply equipped, the table held a silver service in which were set out beccaficos in honey, thrushes, oysters from the Lucrine lake, and lampreys from Sicily. As they proceeded with their repast, Pontius and Lamia interchanged inquiries with one another about their ailments, the symptoms of which they described at considerable length, mutually emulous of communicating the various remedies which had been recommended to them. Then, congratulating themselves on being thrown together once more at Baïæ, they vied with one another in praise of the beauty of that enchanting coast and the mildness of the climate they enjoyed. Lamia was enthusiastic about the charms of the courtesans who frequented the sea-shore laden with golden ornaments and trailing draperies of barbaric broidery. But the aged Procurator deplored the ostentation with which by means of trumpery jewels and filmy garments foreigners and even enemies of the empire beguiled the Romans of their gold. After a time they turned to the subject of the great engineering feats that had been accomplished in the country; the prodigious bridge constructed by Caius between Puteoli and Baïæ, and the canals which Augustus excavated to convey the waters of the ocean to Lake Avernus and the Lucrine lake.

"I also," said Pontius, with a sigh, "I also wished to set afoot public works of great utility. When, for my sins, I was appointed Governor of Judæa, I conceived the idea of furnishing Jerusalem with an abundant supply of pure water by means of an aqueduct. The elevation of the levels, the proportionate capacity of the various parts, the gradient for the brazen reservoirs to which the distribution pipes were to be fixed—I had gone into every detail and decided everything for myself with the assistance of mechanical experts. I had drawn up regulations for the superintendents so as to prevent individuals from making unauthorized depredations. The architects and the workmen had their instructions. I gave orders for the commencement of operations. But, far from viewing with satisfaction the construction of that conduit which was intended to carry to their town upon its massive arches not only water but health, the inhabitants of Jerusalem gave vent to lamentable outcries. They gathered tumultuously together, exclaiming against the sacrilege and impiety, and, hurling themselves upon the workmen, scattered the very foundation stones. Can you picture to yourself, Lamia, a filthier set of barbarians? Nevertheless, Vitellius decided in their favour, and I received orders to put a stop to the work."

"It is a knotty point," said Lamia, "how far one is justified in devising things for the commonweal against the will of the populace."

Pontius Pilate continued as though he had not heard this interruption.

"Refuse an aqueduct! What madness! But whatever is of Roman origin is distasteful to the Jews. In their eyes we are an unclean race, and our very presence appears a profanation to them. You will remember that they would never venture to enter the pretorium for fear of defiling themselves, and that I was consequently obliged to discharge my magisterial functions in an open-air tribunal on that marble pavement your feet so often trod.

"They fear us and they despise us. Yet is not Rome the mother and warden of all these peoples who nestle smiling upon her venerable bosom? With her eagles in the van, peace and liberty have been carried to the very confines of the universe. Those whom we have subdued we look on as our friends, and we leave those conquered races, nay, we secure to them the permanence of their customs and their laws. Did Syria, aforesaid, rent asunder by its rabble of petty kings, ever even begin to taste of peace and prosperity until it submitted to the armies of Pompey? And when Rome might have reaped a golden harvest as the price of her goodwill, did she lay hands on the hoards that swell the treasuries of barbaric temples? Did she despoil the shrine of Cybele at Pessinus, or the Morimene and Cilician sanctuaries of Jupiter, or the temple of the Jewish god at Jerusalem? Antioch, Palmyra, and Apamea, secure despite their wealth, and no longer in dread of the wandering Arab of the desert, have erected temples to the genius of Rome and the divine Cæsar. The Jews alone hate and withstand us. They withhold their tribute till it is wrested from them, and obstinately rebel against military service."

"The Jews," replied Lamia, "are profoundly attached to their ancient customs. They suspected you, unreasonably I admit, of a desire to abolish their laws and change their usages. Do not resent it, Pontius, if I say that you did not always act in such a way as to disperse their unfortunate illusion. It gratified you, despite your habitual self-restraint, to play upon their fears, and more than once have I seen you betray in their presence the contempt with which their beliefs and religious ceremonies inspired you. You irritated them particularly by giving instructions for the sacerdotal garments and ornaments of their high priest to be kept in ward by your legionaries in the Antonine tower. One must admit that though they have never risen like us to an appreciation of things divine, the Jews celebrate rites which their very antiquity renders venerable."

Pontius Pilate shrugged his shoulders.

"They have very little exact knowledge of the nature of the gods," he said. "They worship Jupiter, yet they abstain from naming him or erecting a statue of him. They do not even adore him under the semblance of a rude stone, as certain of the Asiatic peoples are wont to do. They know nothing of Apollo, of Neptune, of Mars, nor of Pluto, nor of any goddess. At the same time, I am convinced that in days gone by they worshipped Venus. For even to this day their women bring doves to the altar as victims; and you know as well as I that the dealers who trade beneath the arcades of their temple supply those birds in couples for sacrifice. I have even been told that on one occasion some madman proceeded to overturn the stalls bearing these offerings, and their owners with them. The priests raised an outcry about it, and looked on it as a case of sacrilege. I am of opinion that their custom of sacrificing turtle-doves was instituted in honour of Venus. Why are you laughing, Lamia?"

"I was laughing," said Lamia, "at an amusing idea which, I hardly know how, just occurred to me. I was thinking that perchance some day the Jupiter of the Jews might come to Rome and vent his fury upon you. Why should he not? Asia and Africa have already enriched us with a considerable number of gods. We have seen temples in honour of Isis and the dog-faced Anubis erected in Rome. In the public squares, and even on the race-courses, you may run across the Bona Dea of the Syrians mounted on an ass. And did you never hear how, in the reign of Tiberius, a young patrician passed himself off as the horned Jupiter of the Egyptians, Jupiter Ammon, and in this disguise procured the favours of an illustrious lady who was too virtuous to deny anything to a god? Beware, Pontius, lest the invisible Jupiter of the Jews disembark some day on the quay at Ostia!"

At the idea of a god coming out of Judæa, a fleeting smile played over the severe countenance of the Procurator. Then he replied gravely:

"How would the Jews manage to impose their sacred law on outside peoples when they are in a perpetual state of tumult amongst themselves as to the interpretation of that law? You have seen them yourself, Lamia, in the public squares, split up into twenty rival parties, with staves in their hands, abusing each other and clutching one another by the beard. You have seen them on the steps of the temple, tearing their filthy garments as a symbol of lamentation, with some wretched creature in a frenzy of prophetic exaltation in their midst. They have never realized that it is possible to discuss peacefully and with an even mind those matters concerning the divine which yet are hidden from the profane and wrapped in uncertainty. For the nature of the immortal gods remains hidden from us, and we cannot arrive at a knowledge of it. Though I am of opinion, none the less, that it is a prudent thing to believe in the providence of the gods. But the Jews are devoid of philosophy, and cannot tolerate any diversity of opinions. On the contrary, they judge worthy of the extreme penalty all those who on divine subjects profess opinions opposed to their law. And as, since the genius of Rome has towered over them, capital sentences pronounced by their own tribunals can only be carried out with the sanction of the procurator or the procurator, they harry the Roman magistrate at any hour to procure his signature to their baleful decrees, they besiege the pretorium with their cries of Death! A hundred times, at least, have I known them, mustered, rich and poor together, all united under their priests, make a furious onslaught on my ivory chair, seizing me by the skirts of my robe, by the thongs of my sandals, and all to demand of me—nay, to exact from me—the death sentence on some unfortunate whose guilt I failed to perceive, and as to whom I could only pronounce that he was as mad as his accusers. A hundred times, do I say! Not a hundred, but every day and all day. Yet it was my duty to execute their law as if it were ours, since I was appointed by Rome not for the destruction but for the upholding of their customs, and over them I had the power of the rod and the axe. At the outset of my term of office I endeavoured to persuade them to hear reason. I attempted to snatch their miserable victims from death. But this show of mildness only irritated them the more; they demanded their prey, fighting around me like a horde of vultures with wing and beak. Their priests reported to Cæsar that I was violating their law, and their appeals, supported by Vitellius, drew down upon me a severe reprimand. How many times did I long, as the Greeks used to say, to dispatch accusers and accused in one convoy to the crows!

"Do not imagine, Lamia, that I nourish the rancour of the discomfited, the wrath of the superannuated, against a people which in my person has prevailed against both Rome and tranquillity. But I foresee the extremity to which sooner or later they will reduce us. Since we cannot govern them, we shall be driven to destroy them. Never doubt it. Always in a state of insubordination, brewing rebellion in their inflammatory minds, they will one day burst forth upon us with a fury beside which the wrath of the Numidians and the mutterings of the Parthians are mere child's play. They are secretly nourishing preposterous hopes, and madly premeditating our ruin. How can it be otherwise, when, on the strength of an oracle, they are living in expectation of the coming of a prince of their own blood whose kingdom shall extend over the whole earth? There are no half measures with such a people. They must be exterminated. Jerusalem must be laid waste to the very foundation. Perchance, old as I am, it may be granted me to behold the day when her walls shall fall and the flames shall envelop her houses, when her inhabitants shall pass under the edge of the sword, when salt shall be strewn on the place where once the temple stood. And in that day I shall at length be justified."

Lamia exerted himself to lead the conversation back to a less acrimonious note.

"Pontius," he said, "it is not difficult for me to understand both your long-standing resentment and your sinister forebodings. Truly, what you have experienced of the character of the Jews is nothing to their advantage. But I lived in Jerusalem as an interested onlooker, and mingled freely with the people, and I succeeded in detecting certain obscure virtues in these rude folk which were altogether hidden from you. I have met Jews who were all mildness, whose simple manners and faithfulness of heart recalled to me what our poets have related concerning the Spartan lawgiver. And you yourself, Pontius, have seen perish beneath the cudgels of your legionaries simple-minded men who have died for a cause they believed to be just without revealing their names. Such men do not deserve our contempt. I am saying this because it is desirable in all things to preserve moderation and an even mind. But I own that I never experienced any lively sympathy for the Jews. The Jewesses, on the contrary, I found extremely pleasing. I was young, then, and the Syrian women stirred all my senses to response. Their ruddy lips, their liquid eyes that shone in the shade, their sleepy gaze pierced me to the very marrow. Painted and stained, smelling of nard and myrrh, steeped in odours, their physical attractions are both rare and delightful."

Pontius listened impatiently to these praises.

"I was not the kind of man to fall into the snares of the Jewish women," he said; "and since you have opened the subject yourself, Lamia, I was never able to approve of your laxity. If I did not express with sufficient emphasis formerly how culpable I held you for having intrigued at Rome with the wife of a man of consular rank, it was because you were then enduring heavy penance for your misdoings. Marriage from the patrician point of view is a sacred tie; it is one of the institutions which are the support of Rome. As to foreign women and slaves, such relations as one may enter into with them would be of little account were it not that they habituate the body to a humiliating effeminacy. Let me tell you that you have been too liberal in your offerings to the Venus of the Marketplace; and what, above all, I blame in you is that you have not married in compliance with the law and given children to the Republic, as every good citizen is bound to do."

But the man who had suffered exile under Tiberius was no longer listening to the venerable magistrate. Having tossed off his cup of Falernian, he was smiling at some image visible to his eye alone.

After a moment's silence he resumed in a very deep voice, which rose in pitch by little and little:

"With what languorous grace they dance, those Syrian women! I knew a Jewess at Jerusalem who used to dance in a pokey little room, on a threadbare carpet, by the light of one smoky little lamp, waving her arms as she clanged her cymbals. Her loins arched, her head thrown back, and, as it were, dragged down by the weight of her heavy red hair, her eyes swimming with voluptuousness, eager, languishing, compliant, she would have made Cleopatra herself grow pale with envy. I was in love with her barbaric dances, her voice—a little raucous and yet so sweet—her atmosphere of incense, the semi-somnolescent state in which she seemed to live. I followed her everywhere. I mixed with the vile rabble of soldiers, conjurers, and extortioners with which she was surrounded. One day, however, she disappeared, and I saw her no more. Long did I seek her in disreputable alleys and taverns. It was more difficult to learn to do without her than to lose the taste for Greek wine. Some months after I lost sight of her, I learned by chance that she had attached herself to a small company of men and women who were followers of a young Galilean thaumaturgist.

"His name was Jesus; he came from Nazareth, and he was crucified for some crime, I don't quite know what. Pontius, do you remember anything about the man?"

Pontius Pilate contracted his brows, and his hand rose to his forehead in the attitude of one who probes the deeps of memory. Then after a silence of some seconds:

"Jesus?" he murmured, "Jesus—of Nazareth? I cannot call him to mind."

THE GERMANIC LANDS

The modern Germanic literatures have been rich and distinguished, but their most remarkable feature has been a tendency toward excess and explosiveness. Long placid stretches of Germanic culture and literature (especially in Germany) have now and then been followed by violent upheavals. On the one hand, this has led to extravagance and appalling sins against good taste and common sense; on the other, to works of remarkable power and, occasionally, world-shaking importance.

Germany responded avidly at first to the ferment of the Renaissance in the fifteenth century. Indeed in neighboring Holland arose one of the chief figures of modernism, Desiderius Erasmus (1466-1536), whose criticism of the medieval Church in his delightful Praise of Folly and Colloquies paved the way for Protestantism, and who promoted the study of Greek and Hebrew. But in Germany proper the Renaissance was quickly transformed into the Protestant Reformation under the leadership of Martin Luther (1483-1546). A long period of stagnation set in as a result of heated religious controversies and the devastating Thirty Years War (1618-1648). Not until the middle of the eighteenth century did German literature begin to recover, under the leadership of a great critic and champion of enlightenment, Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (1729-1781).

Lessing, the son of a Saxon pastor, entered the University of Leipzig as a theological student but turned to philosophy and letters. These twin interests made him one of those versatile men who led the "Enlightenment" throughout Europe. He became one of the greatest critics of all time, one of the foremost proponents of liberal thought, and Germany's first important playwright. As critic, he wrote the brilliant analysis of the comparative functions of poetry and painting, Laocoön, and the Hamburg Dramaturgy, a collection of dramatic criticism that challenged French neoclassicism, denounced its stultifying influence on the German theater, and recognized Shakespeare as the king of dramatists. In this work he paved the way for the romantic and realistic drama by proclaiming that a playwright does not have to abide by any regulations, classic or otherwise.

As a philosopher, Lessing ranged himself on the side of the rationalists, subjecting dogma to severe criticism, calling for a "natural religion" of the heart, and preaching and practicing religious tolerance. His important plays were all related to his championing of liberalism. Thus his Miss Sarah Sampson and Emilia Galotti were "bourgeois tragedies," for along with Diderot in France and Lillo in England he regarded the common people as a suitable subject for tragedy. His comedy Minna von Barnhelm was intended to reconcile the German states after Frederick the Great's Seven Years War, with a romance between a humane Prussian officer and a sprightly girl from a conquered German state.

An even more explicit statement of liberalism appeared in his noble Nathan the Wise. He came to it after having concluded a bitter theological battle in favor of "natural religion." The plot, which concerns the noble Jew, Nathan, who reared a Christian girl-child after losing his own children in a religious massacre, is slowed up by many discussions, and is snarled when a Crusader falls in love with her only to discover that she is his sister. But no European play gave such eloquent expression to the ideal of religious tolerance. Nathan's profound parable of the Three Rings can be read separately as a lesson in tolerance and ethics that the eighteenth-century idealists strove to impress on the world.

After Lessing and a fellow-critic, Herder, had cleared the way for the free development of German literature, there arose a so-called "Storm and Stress" movement of frantic romanticism and of frothing against all restrictions. Most of the "Storm and Stress" writers are insignificant, but the poet, dramatist, and historian Frederick von Schiller is remembered for high-spirited philosophic poems and noble, if no longer highly valued plays, like William Tell and Wallenstein. And Goethe, who fired the first rounds of the German romantic revolt in his play Götz von Berlichingen (1771), became one of the supreme poets and intellects of Europe.

Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (1749-1832) was one of the universal and Olympian men of European culture. He is the Leonardo da Vinci of the literary world. The son of a well-to-do Frankfurt lawyer, he received every opportunity, mastered many languages, learned how to paint, familiarized himself with architecture and science, and studied law and philosophy. He came under the influence of Rousseau, and became entranced with Shakespeare and with folk-poetry. Depressions and stormy love affairs at first made him an intense romanticist whose highly subjective lyrics would have alone gained him a reputation. His tragedy, Götz von Berlichingen, glorified a medieval baron who defied the growing materialism of the world. A later play, Egmont, treated the revolt of the Netherlands against Spanish tyranny with much feeling. His youthful Sorrows of Werther (1774), the story of an unhappy love affair, was rich in sentimental self-torments ending in the suicide. It gave him an international reputation at the age of twenty-four.

A year later, in 1775, the young Duke of Saxe-Weimar, who had become his admirer, invited him to his court at Weimar. Goethe became the intellectual monarch of the little state. In Weimar, Goethe also experienced a great change. His early romanticism left him, and he steeped himself in practical activities as a minister of state, regulating Weimar's transportation and finance and directing the state theater. At the same time he also applied himself to scientific research, studying the evolution of plants and discovering evidence for the theory of evolution.

Acquiring moderation and practical wisdom, summed up in his thought that everybody must learn renunciation, he began to examine his life and the development of the human personality in his long novels Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship and Wilhelm Meister's Travels, and in his autobiography Poetry and Truth. Indeed all his writing, as he once declared, was autobiographical. Out of his realization of the wisdom of moderation he arrived at the conclusion that "classicism is health, romanticism is disease." He therefore wrote two noble classic plays, Iphigenia in Tauris and Torquato Tasso, the latter a tragedy about the Italian poet whose madness is exhibited in the play as a lesson in restraint; Tasso's great mistake, according to Goethe, was his failure to realize that poetry was not the only important accomplishment in society.

Throughout his entire adult life, Goethe was occupied with one major work, his Faust, based on the medieval legend of the scholar who sold his soul to the devil. Goethe, who had seen a puppet-play on Faust in childhood, found in this story a symbol of humanity's consuming passion for knowledge and self-realization. He conceived the idea for a Faust drama as early as 1769. Part One was published in 1802, thirty-nine years later. Part Two, which he fashioned for the next thirty years, was finished on his last birthday, shortly before his death in 1832. Faust thus grew slowly and became one man's record of his life-long development. In Part II, a fascinating but somewhat chaotic work, Faust's long journey, which led him into many mistakes and by-paths and destroyed a sweet girl's happiness, comes to an end with the realization that although his vague strivings for the infinite have not been crowned with success, he has found the highest self-realization in actively serving mankind. Moreover, man's endless striving is the secret of his true strength and humanity.

The critic, John Macy, has well stated the meaning of Faust: "The road itself is the goal, life is its own end and must justify itself from within; perfection is beyond our reach; we do not know what it is and, indeed, to the human mind, it seems akin to stagnation and to death. Thus our highest achievement is a noble striving, a tireless creative living. That it is which saves Faust and defeats Mephistopheles [the devil to whom he sells his soul]; it is with an affirmation of this truth that the eternal armies welcome Faust."

This glorification of striving Goethe found in his own life. But he also found it in the whole history of modern Europe—in the progressive ideals of the Enlightenment, in the romantic movement, and in the ceaseless experimentation that characterized the nineteenth century. Faust is something bigger than a play. It is a dramatic poem of epic proportions setting forth Renaissance-inspired modern man's gospel of creative evolution.

Goethe also belonged to an age in which lyric poetry attained new heights, and he was himself one of the world's great lyricists. This may be seen in the songs he inserted into Faust. The modern German lyric, however, entered our heritage primarily through the work of one superb poet, Heinrich Heine (1797-1856).

Heine was born at Düsseldorf, in Rhenish Prussia, of Jewish parentage, but he was educated by Jesuits, and his mother even entertained the possibility of his becoming a priest. Although he was later primed by his family for a business career, his unstable, romantic nature was wholly unsuited for a sedate, practical life. Like other young romanticists he was attracted to medieval legends and to weird experiences, and his imagination was heightened by secret visits to a woman who was reputed to be a witch and to her niece, who was the daughter of a hangman. His earliest poems were steeped in this eerie atmosphere. Having an extremely susceptible heart, he also fell in love frequently, and his unrequited passion for his rich cousin Amalie exerted a powerful influence on his poetry. His rich uncle Solomon set him up in the dry-goods business in Hamburg. But this son of an impractical father and of an intellectual mother quickly became bankrupt, and his patient uncle, whom Heine was not above satirizing as a bourgeois, made it possible for him to enter the University of Bonn in 1819. Instead of pursuing the study of law, he became immersed in the activities of the democratic student organization known as the Burschenschaft and fell under the influence of the romantic critic and philosopher August Wilhelm Schlegel. From Bonn he went to the University of Göttingen, where he found the pedantic and conservative atmosphere repellent and got into a quarrel that resulted in his being advised to leave. In the spring of 1821 he enrolled at the University in Berlin, where he found congenial literary companionship and became known as a promising young writer. His first volume Gedichte (Poems) was published there in 1821.

Uncle Solomon, although pleased at his erratic nephew's growing reputation, insisted that Heine complete his law studies. Dutifully the young poet returned to Göttingen, taking his degree of Doctor of Laws in 1825 and becoming baptized in the Lutheran Church in order to obtain the right to practice his profession. Both his conversion and his preparation for a legal career, however, were mere formalities. He went to Norderney for a vacation where his love for the North Sea, celebrated in superb poems, became deepened. He visited the Hartz Mountains and responded to the region with an enthusiasm that he shared with many romanticists. He traveled to England, whose materialism depressed him, and then to Italy. The result of these travels was his fascinating and witty book of prose descriptions and verses, Pictures of Travel, published in four parts between 1826 and 1831. In 1827 Heine also collected most of his poems under the title Buch der Lieder (Book of Songs).

Political reaction in his native land and the Parisian Revolution of 1830 led Heine to go to Paris toward the end of May, 1831, and Paris remained his home until his death a quarter of a century later. Here he became attached to a charming but ignorant woman Mathilde, to whom he was deeply devoted, and earned a slender livelihood with his pen by contributing to various French and German publications. In 1837 he also began to receive a pension of 4,800 francs from the French government, which continued until 1848. Here he also wrote his last books of poems, New Songs, Germany, Atta Troll, and Romanzero (1851), in which he included biting satires aimed at the extravagances of romanticism and at anti-democratic German forces. Germany regarded him as a renegade, but this did not deter him from writing brilliant studies of German literature and political satires intended to promote a democratic change in that country. Indeed he came to regard himself as a soldier in the war for the liberation of Germany and the entire world. His last ten years were a painful conclusion to his fiery and zestful life. He was stricken with a disease of the spine, and was bedridden during his last five years.

The best known of Heine's lyric poems communicate their magic readily, though some of it necessarily disappears in translation. They express, in the words of Professor Charles Harvey Genung, "the tenderness, the gaiety, and the pained humor of the human heart." Other poems, no less distinguished but less popular, reveal him as a satirist who does not hesitate to resort to Rabelaisian grossness but possesses the spirit of French wit. Heine, in addition, was one of the most brilliant essayists of the nineteenth century. He had, as Professor Genung noted, a "Byronic power to blend satire, criticism, and unbridled imagination with poetic elements and impassioned expression." And well he might, for he was in spirit related both to the revolutionary enlightenment of France and the romantic movement. He was both a poet and a revolutionary journalist, and in temperament both gay and morbid, both a passionate lover and a humorist and cynic. "To be born with diverse souls," wrote the critic Edward Dowden, "is embarrassing, but it was Heine's distinction. It signifies that life is to be no steady progress, directed by some guiding light, but a wavering advance through a countless series of attractions and repulsions, and of repulsions transformed into attractions." Moreover, he had a sensibility so quivering that it needed the protective armor of laughter.

The restlessness of Heine marked the later course of German literature. Some of the romanticists represented morbid psychology, and one of them, Friedrich Hebbel, took a step in the direction of realism in his powerful middle-class tragedy, Maria Magdalena (1844), which anticipated Ibsen's realistic dramas. In the field of economic and social thought Karl Marx (1818-1883) and his followers gave birth to the revolutionary movement of socialism that has profoundly influenced the course of the world. Marx and his collaborator Engels possessed literary talent, and their Communist Manifesto (1847) is a challenging essay. In the field of philosophy, Arthur Schopenhauer (1788-1860) set forth his philosophy of pessimism in essays of great literary distinction.

Schopenhauer's disciple, Friedrich Wilhelm Nietzsche (1844-1900), was a tortured and extremist genius who never developed a systematic philosophy but delivered himself of forceful philosophic ideas. These echoed many tendencies of the time—Darwinism, atheism, and rising Prussianism, which he consciously detested. He also represented a reaction to other trends: to materialism, middle-class complacency, utilitarianism (the principle of the greatest good for the greatest number, as propounded by John Stuart Mill and other English social thinkers), and socialism. Central in Nietzsche's thought was the glorification of man's "will to power," of unhampered self-realization and self-assertion by the individual. He condemned both Christianity and socialism as "slave philosophies" which opposed the superior individual's full development and mastery over the mediocre and weak. Schopenhauer believed that the Will brought misery. Nietzsche, on the contrary, regarded the Will as the source of all noble achievement leading, through the assertion of life and tireless striving, to the evolutionary development of superior people or "supermen." Above all, Nietzsche fulminated against human pettiness, against a dull life of pampering and complacency. The real goal of man is, not ease, but greatness. And for this, courage is needed—the courage to struggle incessantly and to pass beyond social and religious conventions—"beyond good and evil."

In all things Nietzsche expressed himself with unbridled extremism, for he was an impassioned and suffering man. He was born in Prussia, though of Polish descent, and was the son of a clergyman, which may explain his constant struggle against Christianity. A precocious student, he became a professor of philology at the University of Basel, Switzerland, when he was only twenty-five. In the same year, 1870, he joined the Prussian army, and the privations he endured during the Franco-Prussian War undermined his already delicate health. Returning to his professorship after the war, he held his post until 1889, with occasional interruptions of illness, until he was struck down with paralysis of the brain. He spent the last five years of his life in an insane asylum, suffering from delusions.

He started writing in 1871. Among his books were The Birth of Tragedy, a brilliant speculation on Greek drama; Ecce Homo, a unique apology for his life; The Genealogy of Morals, an attack on Christianity for its "slave morality" and sense of sin; Beyond Good and Evil, a plea for freedom from moral conventions; and the uncompleted The Will to Power.

His greatest book is Thus Spake Zarathustra, a collection of rhapsodies on the glory of life, freedom from sentimentality and convention, and the will to power, which Nietzsche put into the mouth of the Persian sage Zarathustra or Zoroaster. In this work we see Nietzsche for what he really was—a poet rather than a systematic philosopher. It has always been a mistake to interpret Nietzsche practically; he would have shuddered at some of Germany's political policies associated with his name. It is as a literary artist, a rhapsodist of life and individuality, and an erratically but also brilliantly intuitive critic and idealist that Nietzsche can be expected to survive.

It was, nevertheless, in Scandinavia—in the work of the dramatist Ibsen (1828-1906)—that the nineteenth century expressed the most telling criticism of middle-class society and the most influential promulgation of modern ideas of liberation from convention in the name of individual self-realization. Through the powerful social instrument of the theater, Ibsen's challenge was trumpeted throughout the Western world. Moreover, Ibsen radically transformed the style and purpose of the theater. The drama that deals with social ideas and that represents the conditions and issues of the real world virtually began with him.

Born in 1828 in a small Norwegian town, of a conservative merchant family that became insolvent and experienced poverty, Henrik Ibsen had sufficient provocation to chafe under the restraints and prejudices he subsequently fought in his plays. He spent seven years of drudgery as an apothecary's assistant and then engaged in a long struggle for recognition as a playwright. Failing to receive a poet's pension from the government, and embittered by the failure of such early plays as The Vikings and The Pretenders, Ibsen left Norway in 1863. His self-imposed exile for more than a quarter of a century was mostly spent in Rome and in Germany, and it was there that he composed many of his masterpieces. The first of these, Brand, an attack on the spirit of compromise, was published with enviable success in 1865, the coveted poet's pension followed a year later, and in time sturdy champions like William Archer and Bernard Shaw arose to argue his cause with the world. But his plays, which became increasingly incisive, continued to be received with hostility. Recognition came to him at last on his seventieth birthday, which was publicly celebrated in Norway. Before he died, in 1906, his work was already the most potent force in the modern theater.

Ibsen began his literary career as a romanticist, whose earnestness and probing into character could only strike the theater of his time and place as strange and incongruous. His later plays faced the world squarely on a platform of realism that shook the stage to its foundations. The transition to realism was a natural development in his work: There were modern characters in his medieval saga dramas The Vikings and The Pretenders; as early as 1862 his rhymed play, Love's Comedy, discussed conventionality in the relation of the sexes; his powerful poetic dramas, Brand and Peer Gynt, crossed swords with philistinism; and his satirical League of Youth, was a political comedy. Eight years later, in 1877, Ibsen definitely inaugurated his realistic period with the composition of The Pillars of Society, an exposé of hypocritical small-town respectability.

A Doll's House, in 1879, challenged the conventions of marriage which deprived woman of access to experience and limited her individuality. The conclusion, in which Nora leaves her husband, became a subject of heated debate throughout Europe. In 1881 Ibsen went even further in Ghosts, a tragedy that denounced its heroine Mrs. Alving's conformity to the social traditions that sanctioned a loveless marriage to a debauched husband who gave her a son doomed to hereditary venereal disease. As late as 1913 Ibsen was still being accused by the American critic William Winter of "mental astigmatism," "purblind censoriousness, gross falsehood, and ignominious censure." Both the thesis of Ghosts and the presentation of the tabooed subject of venereal disease were revolutionary in their day and resulted in pitched battles between conservatives and radicals. The author answered his critics with a stinging indictment of corrupt society a year later in An Enemy of the People.

After this explosion Ibsen seems to have been shaken in his reformer's faith, and he grew less aggressive. After voicing his doubts concerning the "call of the ideal" in The Wild Duck (1884), he became more an observer and recorder of realities than a champion of causes. In realistic plays, such as Rosmersholm (1886), Hedda Gabler (1890), and John Gabriel Borkman (1896), as well as in symbolical dramas, such as The Lady from the Sea (1888) and The Master Builder (1892), he continued his analysis of modern characters and problems, but without strenuous preachment, on the whole.

A Doll's House is not his best realistic play, but no student can afford to be unfamiliar with it. It is with this work that Ibsen inaugurated dramatic realism and his championing of women's right to equality with men. It made him known as the iconoclast and rebel of modern literature, and it set an example in social criticism for the many important continental and English playwrights who arose after 1880.

It was Germany that first responded to Ibsen's call after giving him the best hearing. Realistic social dramas appeared on the German stage after 1890 in great profusion, and realism was intensified there in the manner of Zola. Naturalistic drama, as this extreme form of realism was called, went beyond Ibsen in using the most colloquial speech, including dialect; in recording facts and observing people with scientific objectivity; in touching many tabooed subjects, representing the sexual instinct in its most bestial forms, treating alcoholism and disease, and dramatizing explosions of protest and violence on the part of the most submerged groups in society—namely, the working class. The most potent of the naturalist dramatists, Gerhart Hauptmann (1862-), summed up all these tendencies.

Hauptmann, the son of a Silesian innkeeper, was a poet who was early exposed to the scientific, practical world, to socialist agitation, and to the literary program of the naturalists. In 1889 he fired the first shot for naturalism in his first play Before Sunrise, a somber picture of degeneration, incest, and alcoholism among the Silesian peasantry, as well as a warning against hereditary disease and a plea for eugenics. Another unrelieved representation of drab and hopeless life appeared in his Lonely Lives two years later, and in 1893 he delivered himself of his masterpiece, The Weavers, a powerful account of the sufferings and rebellion of the Silesian weavers in 1844. This epoch-making work gave voice to the protests and aspirations of the working class, and was indeed the first modern "proletarian" play. Permission to perform it was won only after years of litigation, and it cost the leading Deutsches Theater the Emperor's patronage. It set an example in militantly social-minded playwriting that has been followed by numerous twentieth-century dramatists.

Hauptmann continued to consolidate his position as a commanding realist with many other plays, such as his naturalistic fantasy The Assumption of Hannele, his study of a girl caught in the net of men's bestial sexuality, Rose Bernd, and his two naturalistic comedies The Beaver Coat and The Conflagration, for which the nearest equivalent in America is Tobacco Road. Responding to a romantic reaction against the excessive unpleasantness of much naturalistic drama—a reaction that produced Rostand's beautiful romantic play Cyrano de Bergerac in France—Hauptmann wrote a number of romantic plays distinguished for their poetry. Among these The Sunken Bell enjoyed a vogue. But Hauptmann will be remembered longest for his realistic work, and our survey of German literature before the twentieth century may be properly concluded with The Weavers, which brings us to the threshold of the contemporary world. As a representation of the conflict between capital and labor it foreshadowed the most far-reaching and still unresolved problem of our century.

GOTTHOLD EPHRAIM LESSING

Nathan the Wise

NATHAN. A man, many years ago, received from a beloved hand a ring of priceless worth. The stone, an opal, radiant with a hundred hues and shades, possessed a certain secret power—a secret power to make whoever wore it pleasing alike to God and men. Is there a wonder that the man would never take it off?

SALADIN. No wonder. Where is this ring?

NATHAN. In his will the man declared that it should stay forever in his family.

Translated and adapted by Ferdinand Bruckner. Upon being requested by Sultan Saladin to tell which of the three faiths—the Christian, Jewish, and Mohammedan—is the best, Nathan answers with this parable.

SALADIN. He died?

NATHAN. And left it to the dearest of his sons, ordaining that he in turn should leave it to the son he loved the most and that in every age the dearest, not the first-born son—by virtue of the magic ring alone—should be the family head.

SALADIN. They all had sons?

NATHAN. They had.

SALADIN. And the magic ring?

NATHAN. —came down from son to son.

SALADIN. Where is it now?

NATHAN. You'll see. It reached a father of three sons. All three were equally obedient to his word, all three an equal pleasure to his eyes, and thus he loved all three as one. Whenever one or another was alone with him, he thought that one the dearest of the three and promised him the ring. Thus, by and by, the tender weakness of his overflowing heart led him to swear the ring in turn to each of them. But when he was about to die, his heart faced painfully the thought that two of his beloved sons, who'd trusted him so well, should be deceived.

SALADIN. What could he do?

NATHAN. What could he do? A man when faced with death—as if some thought has reached him from the eternal world he's nearing—often surprises us with a solution which we'd seek in vain. But be that as it may: at once this man sent for an artisan and ordered him in strictest secrecy to make at any cost and pain two other rings precisely like the first. The artisan had wrought so well that when at last he brought the rings even the father could not tell the genuine one. With joy he summoned his three sons, on separate calls, of course, bestowed on each his blessing and his ring and died.

SALADIN. And died. And then?

NATHAN. I'm at the end. The genuine ring could never be discovered. After the father's death each son at once produced his ring and claimed to be the dearest son. They investigated, began proceedings one against the other, quarreled and fought—in vain. Which was the one and genuine ring remained still unrevealed almost as much as now the one and true belief.

SALADIN. You didn't mean a tale of rings should be the answer to my question?

NATHAN. Almost, sir.

SALADIN. That's preposterous.

NATHAN. How could I dare distinguish the three rings when the father himself with purpose had them made the same?

SALADIN. You cannot put me off with tales of rings. I asked you about religions, unlike in all respects, even to their ways of dressing, eating, drinking.

NATHAN. But not to ways of feeling, which are the same for all mankind. Our feeling is the soil from which all trees arise, divide themselves in branches, twigs, and leaves. Millions of leaves we are, but nurtured by one soil.

SALADIN. Why then do we so hate our fellows?

NATHAN. For better air, for better place to catch the sun, another ray or two. Besides a leaf sticks to its branch, the branch to the tree. Could I then love my father less than you do yours?

SALADIN. My father was the most heroic man on earth. He killed four thousand Christians. At Heaven's table his place is close to Mahomet himself.

NATHAN. Let's turn again to the rings. Each of the sons swore he received his ring straight from his father's hand and therefore charged the others with fraudulence and greed, determined to protect his own, the genuine ring.

SALADIN. And the judge? Now all depends on him.

NATHAN. How would you judge, O Sultan, in such a case?

SALADIN. I never could.

NATHAN. I bow before this word of yours.

SALADIN. Go on. What did the judge pronounce?

NATHAN. The judge pronounced the case dismissed.

SALADIN. Dismissed?

NATHAN. The genuine ring, he said, contains the secret power to make its bearer the most beloved in sight of God and men. You three put on your rings and let me see which one of you is most beloved by his brothers.

SALADIN. And did the secret power work?

NATHAN. It didn't. The brothers went on looking at one another, their hate unchanged. I see, said then the judge, each ring works only for his owner and makes him fall in love with him alone.

SALADIN. That's good. Oh, what a judge!

NATHAN. Well, then, he said, all three of you—you're nothing but deceived deceivers, and all your rings are false. Your father might have had them made to replace the genuine one which doubtless he had lost.

SALADIN. The genuine one is lost?

NATHAN. That's what the judge assumed.

SALADIN. Oh, what a shame!

NATHAN. But let me tell you how the case was ended. The fact, he said, that each of you received his ring straight from his father's hand entitles each of you to think his own the genuine ring. He loved you all, and loved you all alike. If only each of you believes in him and his bequest, then all three rings are genuine alike. Vie now each with the other to prove the secret powers of the rings you wear, and after they have worked, these secret powers—humility, forbearance, tolerance and love—

SALADIN. I see!

NATHAN. —have worked for a thousand years within your children's children; then let them be called once more before this seat whereon a wiser judge than I shall sit and give his verdict.

SALADIN. Listening to you, I feel that they're not only words.

NATHAN. Perhaps that thousand years have passed. Could you but be the wiser judge!

SALADIN. Stupid warrior that I am? Oh, no!

NATHAN. You must. At every dawn, as Sultan and victorious warrior, you have to be the wiser judge. Right now you must decide on armistice or not.

SALADIN. I have already. Why should I punish with the death of thousands a childish charge by some fanatic templars? Who knows if in their place I had not done the same?

NATHAN. He is the wisest judge who sets himself on the defendant bench. If God held the final truth enclosed in his right hand and in his left only our longing for it, and he should say to me: "Come, choose!" I would bow humbly to his left and say: "This hand, my Father, for the final truth belongs to Thee alone."

And stiff-silk mantle richly dress'd, 10

A cock's gay feather for a plume,

A long and pointed rapier, too;

And briefly I would counsel you

To don at once the same costume,

And, free from trammels, speed away, 15

That what life is you may essay.

FAUST. In every garb I needs must feel oppress'd,

My heart to earth's low cares a prey.

Too old the trifer's part to play,

Too young to live by no desire possess'd. 20

What can the world to me afford?

Renounce! renounce! is still the word;

This is the everlasting song

In every ear that ceaseless rings,

And which, alas, our whole life long, 25

Hoarsely each passing moment sings.

But to new horror I awake each morn,

And I could weep hot tears, to see the sun

Dawn on another day, whose round forlorn

Accomplishes no wish of mine—not one. 30

Which still, with froward captiousness, impains

E'en the presentiment of every joy,

While low realities and paltry cares

The spirit's fond imaginings destroy.

Then must I too, when falls the veil of night, 35

Stretch'd on my pallet languish in despair:

Appalling dreams my soul affright;

No rest vouchsafed me even there.

The god, who throned within my breast resides,

Goethe, Faust. Translated by Miss Swanwick. Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (1749-1832), Germany's greatest poet and critic, was born at Frankfort, but after he had achieved his fame spent much of his romantic life at Weimar.

Deep in my soul can stir the springs; 40
 With sovereign sway my energies he guides,
 He cannot move external things;
 And so existence is to me a weight,
 Death fondly I desire, and life I hate.
 MEPH. And yet, methinks, by most 'twill be confess'd 45
 That Death is never quite a welcome guest.
 FAUST. Happy the man around whose brow he binds
 The bloodstain'd wreath in conquest's dazzling hour;
 Or whom, excited by the dance, he finds
 Dissolv'd in bliss, in love's delicious bower! 50
 O that before the lofty spirit's might,
 Enraptured, I had rendered up my soul!
 MEPH. Yet did a certain man refrain one night,
 Of its brown juice to drain the crystal bowl.
 FAUST. To play the spy diverts you then?
 MEPH. I own, 55
 Though not omniscient, much to me is known.
 FAUST. If o'er my soul the tone familiar, stealing, Drew me from harrowing thought's bewild'ring maze,
 Touching the ling'ring chords of childlike feeling,
 With the sweet harmonies of happier days: 60
 So curse I all, around the soul that windeth
 Its magic and alluring spell,
 And with delusive flattery bindeth
 Its victim to this dreary cell!
 Curs'd before all things be the high opinion, 65
 Wherewith the spirit girds itself around!
 Of shows delusive curs'd be the dominion,
 Within whose mocking sphere our sense is bound!
 Accurs'd of dreams the treacherous wiles.
 The cheat of glory, deathless fame! 70
 Accurs'd what each as property beguiles,
 Wife, child, slave, plow, whate'er its name!
 Accurs'd be mammon, when with treasure
 He doth to daring deeds incite:
 Or when to steep the soul in pleasure, 75
 He spreads the couch of soft delight!
 Curs'd be the grape's balsamic juice!
 Accurs'd love's dream, of joys the first!
 Accurs'd be hope! accurs'd be faith!
 And more than all, be patience curs'd! 80
 CHOR. OF SPIRITS [invisible]. Woel woel!
 Thou hast destroy'd
 The beautiful world
 With violent blow;
 'Tis shiver'd! 'tis shatter'd! 85
 The fragments abroad by a demigod scatter'd!
 Now we sweep
 The wrecks into nothingness!
 Fondly we weep
 The beauty that's gone! 90
 Thou, 'mongst the sons of earth,
 Lofty and mighty one,
 Build it once more!
 In thine own bosom the lost world restore!
 Now with unclouded sense 95
 Enter a new career;
 Songs shall salute thine ear,
 Ne'er heard before!
 MEPH. My little ones these spirits be.
 Hark! with shrewd intelligence, 100
 How they recommend to thee
 Action, and the joys of sense!
 In the busy world to dwell,
 Fain they would allure thee hence:
 For within this lonely cell, 105
 Stagnate sap of life and sense.
 Forbear to trifle longer with thy grief,
 Which, vulture-like, consumes thee in this den.
 The worst society is some relief,
 Making thee feel thyself a man with men. 110
 Nathless, it is not meant, I trow,
 To thrust thee 'mid the vulgar throng.
 I to the upper ranks do not belong;
 Yet if, by me companion'd, thou
 Thy steps through life forthwith wilt take, 115
 Upon the spot myself I'll make Thy comrade:—
 Should it suit thy need,
 I am thy servant, am thy slave indeed!
 FAUST. And how must I thy services repay? 120
 MEPH. Thereto thou lengthen'd respite hast!
 FAUST. No! no!
 The devil is an egoist I know:
 And, for Heaven's sake, 'tis not his way
 Kindness to anyone to show. 125
 Let the condition plainly be exprest!
 Such a domestic is a dangerous guest.
 MEPH. I'll pledge myself to be thy servant here,
 Still at thy back alert and prompt to be;
 But when together yonder we appear, 130
 Then shalt thou do the same for me.
 FAUST. But small concern I feel for yonder world;
 Hast thou this system into ruin hurl'd,
 Another may arise the void to fill.
 This earth the fountain whence my pleasures flow, 135
 This sun doth daily shine upon my woe,
 And if this world I must forego,
 Let happen then,—what can and will.

I to this theme will close mine ears,
If men hereafter hate and love, 140
And if there be in yonder spheres
A depth below or height above.

MEPH. In this mood thou mayst venture it. But make

The compact! I at once will undertake
To charm thee with mine arts. I'll give thee more
Than mortal eye hath e'er beheld before. 146

FAUST. What, sorry Devil, hast thou to bestow?
Was ever mortal spirit, in its high endeavor,
Fathom'd by Being such as thou?

Yet food thou hast which satisfieth never, 150
Hast ruddy gold, that still doth flow
Like restless quicksilver away,

A game thou hast, at which none win who play,
A girl who would, with amorous eyen,
E'en from my breast, a neighbor snare, 155

Lofty ambition's joy divine,
That, meteor-like, dissolves in air.

Show me the fruit that, ere 'tis pluck'd, doth rot,
And trees, whose verdure daily buds anew!

MEPH. Such a commission scares me not, 160
I can provide such treasures, it is true;

But, my good friend, a season will come round,
When on what's good we may regale in peace.

FAUST. If e'er upon my couch, stretched at my ease, I'm found,

Then may my life that instant cease! 165
Me canst thou cheat with glozing wile
Till self-reproach away I cast,—

Me with joy's lure canst thou beguile;—
Let that day be for me the last!

Be this our wager!
MEPH. Settled!

FAUST. Sure and fast! 170
When to the moment I shall say,
"Linger awhile! so fair thou art!"

Then mayst thou fetter me straightway,
Then to the abyss will I depart!

Then may the solemn death-bell sound, 175
Then from thy service thou art free,
The index then may cease its round,

And time be never more for me!

MEPH. I shall remember: pause, ere 'tis too late.

FAUST. Thereto a perfect right hast thou. 180
My strength I do not rashly overrate.

Slave am I here, at any rate,
If thine, or whose, it matters not, I trow.

MEPH. At thine inaugural feast I will this day
Attend, my duties to commence.— 185

But one thing!—Accidents may happen, hence
A line or two in writing grant, I pray.

FAUST. A writing, Pedant! dost demand from me?

Man, and man's plighted word, are these unknown to thee?

Is't not enough, that by the word I gave, 190
My doom for evermore is cast?

Doth not the world in all its currents rave,
And must a promise hold me fast?

Yet fixed is this delusion in our heart; 194
Who, of his own free will, therefrom would part?

How blest within whose breast truth reigneth
pure!

No sacrifice will he repent when made!
A formal deed, with seal and signature,

A specter this from which all shrink afraid.
The word its life resigneth in the pen, 200

Leather and wax usurp the mastery then.
Spirits of evil! what dost thou require?

Brass, marble, parchment, paper, dost desire?
Shall I with chisel, pen, or graver write?

Thy choice is free; to me 'tis all the same. 205

MEPH. Wherefore thy passion so excite,
And thus thine eloquence inflame?

A scrap is for our compact good.
Thou under-signest merely with a drop of blood.

FAUST. If this will satisfy thy mind, 210
Thy whim I'll gratify, howe'er absurd.

MEPH. Blood is a juice of very special kind.
FAUST. Be not afraid that I shall break my word!

The scope of all my energy
Is in exact accordance with my vow. 215

Vainly I have aspired too high;
I'm on a level but with such as thou;

Me the great spirit scorn'd, defied;
Nature from me herself doth hide;

Rent is the web of thought; my mind 220
Doth knowledge loathe of every kind.

In depths of sensual pleasure drown'd,
Let us our fiery passions still!

Enwrapp'd in magic's veil profound,
Let wondrous charms our senses thrill! 225

Plunge we in time's tempestuous flow,
Stem we the rolling surge of chance!

There may alternate weal and woe,
Success and failure, as they can,

Mingle and shift in changeful dance! 230
Excitement is the sphere for man.

MEPH. Nor goal, nor measure is prescrib'd to
you,

If you desire to taste of every thing,
To snatch at joy while on the wing,

May your career amuse and profit too! 235
Only fall to and don't be over coy!

FAUST. Harken! The end I aim at is not joy;
 I crave excitement, agonizing bliss,
 Enamor'd hatred, quickening vexation. 239
 Purg'd from the love of knowledge, my vocation,
 The scope of all my powers henceforth be this,
 To bare my breast to every pang,—to know
 In my heart's core all human weal and woe,
 To grasp in thought the lofty and the deep,
 Men's various fortunes on my breast to heap, 245
 And thus to theirs dilate my individual mind,
 And share at length with them the shipwreck of mankind.

MEPH. Oh, credit me, who still as ages roll,
 Have chew'd this bitter fare from year to year,
 No mortal, from the cradle to the bier, 250
 Digests the ancient leaven! Know, this Whole
 Doth for the Deity alone subsist!
 He in eternal brightness doth exist,
 Us unto darkness he hath brought, and here
 Where day and night alternate, is your sphere.

FAUST. But 'tis my will! 256

MEPH. Well spoken, I admit!
 But one thing puzzles me, my friend;
 Time's short, art long; methinks 'twere fit
 That you to friendly counsel should attend.
 A poet choose as your ally! 260
 Let him thought's wide dominion sweep,
 Each good and noble quality,
 Upon your honored brow to heap;
 The lion's magnanimity,
 The flectness of the hind, 265
 The fiery blood of Italy,
 The Northern's stedfast mind.
 Let him to you the mystery show
 To blend high aims and cunning low;
 And while youth's passions are aflame
 To fall in love by rule and plan!
 I fain would meet with such a man;
 Would him Sir Microcosmus name.

FAUST. What then am I, if I aspire in vain
 The crown of our humanity to gain, 275
 Towards which my every sense doth strain?

MEPH. Thou'rt after all—just what thou art.
 Put on thy head a wig with countless locks,
 And to a cubit's height upraise thy socks,
 Still thou remainest ever, what thou art. 280

FAUST. I feel it, I have heap'd upon my brain
 The gather'd treasure of man's thought in vain;
 And when at length from studious toil I rest,
 No power, new-born, springs up within my breast;
 A hair's breadth is not added to my height, 285
 I am no nearer to the infinite.

MEPH. Good sir, these things you view indeed,

Just as by other men they're view'd;
 We must more cleverly proceed,
 Before life's joys our grasp elude. 290
 The devil! thou hast hands and feet,
 And head and heart are also thine;
 What I enjoy with relish sweet,
 Is it on that account less mine?
 If for six stallions I can pay, 295
 Do I not own their strength and speed?
 A proper man I dash away,
 As their two dozen legs were mine indeed.
 Up then, from idle pondering free,
 And forth into the world with me! 300
 I tell you what;—your speculative churl
 Is like a beast which some ill spirit leads,
 On barren wilderness, in ceaseless whirl,
 While all around lie fair and verdant meads.

FAUST. But how shall we begin?

MEPH. We will go hence with speed, 305
 A place of torment this indeed!
 A precious life, thyself to bore,
 And some few youngsters evermore!
 Leave that to neighbor Paunch!—withdraw,
 Why wilt thou plague thyself with thrashing straw? 310

The very best that thou dost know
 Thou dar'st not to the striplings show.
 One in the passage now doth wait!

FAUST. I'm in no mood to see him now.

MEPH. Poor lad! He must be tired, I trow; 315
 He must not go disconsolate.
 Hand me thy cap and gown; the mask
 Is for my purpose quite first rate.

He changes his dress.

Now leave it to my wit! I ask
 But quarter of an hour; meanwhile equip, 320
 And make all ready for our pleasant trip!

[Exit FAUST.]

MEPH. [in Faust's long gown]. Mortal! the loftiest attributes of men,
 Reason and Knowledge, only thus contemn,
 Still let the Prince of lies, without control,
 With shows, and mocking charms delude thy soul,
 I have thee unconditionally then!— 326
 Fate hath endow'd him with an ardent mind,
 Which unrestrain'd still presses on for ever,
 And whose precipitate endeavor
 Earth's joys o'erleaping, leaveth them behind. 330
 Him will I drag through life's wild waste,
 Through scenes of vapid dullness, where at last
 Bewilder'd, he shall falter, and stick fast;
 And, still to mock his greedy haste,

Viands and drink shall float his craving lips beyond—
Vainly he'll seek refreshment, anguish-tost,
And were he not the devil's by his bond,
Yet must his soul infallibly be lost!

A Student enters.

STUD. But recently I've quitted home,
Full of devotion am I come
A man to know and hear, whose name
With reverence is known to fame.

MEPH. Your courtesy much flatters me!

A man like other men you see;

Pray have you yet applied elsewhere?

STUD. I would entreat your friendly care!

I've youthful blood and courage high;

Of gold I bring a fair supply;

To let me go my mother was not fain;

But here I longed true knowledge to attain.

MEPH. You've hit upon the very place.

STUD. And yet my steps I would retrace.

These walls, this melancholy room,

O'erpower me with a sense of gloom;

The space is narrow, nothing green,

No friendly tree is to be seen:

And in these halls, with benches filled, distraught,
Sight, hearing, fail me, and the power of thought.

MEPH. It all depends on habit. Thus at first

The infant takes not kindly to the breast,

But before long, its eager thirst

Is fain to slake with hearty zest:

Thus at the breasts of wisdom day by day

With keener relish you'll your thirst allay.

STUD. Upon her neck I fain would hang with joy;

To reach it, say, what means must I employ?

MEPH. Explain, ere further time we lose,

What special faculty you choose?

STUD. Profoundly learned I would grow,

What heaven contains would comprehend,

O'er earth's wide realm my gaze extend,

Nature and science I desire to know.

MEPH. You are upon the proper track, I find;

Take heed, let nothing dissipate your mind.

STUD. My heart and soul are in the chase!

Though to be sure I fain would seize,

On pleasant summer holidays,

A little liberty and careless ease.

MEPH. Use well your time, so rapidly it flies;

Method will teach you time to win;

Hence, my young friend, I would advise,

With college logic to begin!

Then will your mind be so well braced,

In Spanish boots so tightly laced,
That on 'twill circumspectly creep,

Thought's beaten track securely keep,

Nor will it, ignis-fatuus like,

Into the path of error strike.

Then many a day they'll teach you how

The mind's spontaneous acts, till now

As eating and as drinking free,

Require a process;—one! two! three!

In truth the subtle web of thought

Is like the weaver's fabric wrought:

One treadle moves a thousand lines,

Swift dart the shuttles to and fro,

Unseen the threads together flow,

A thousand knots one stroke combines.

Then forward steps your sage to show,

And prove to you, it must be so;

The first being so, and so the second,

The third and fourth deduc'd we see;

And if there were no first and second,

Nor third nor fourth would ever be.

This, scholars of all countries prize,—

Yet 'mong themselves no weavers rise.

He who would know and treat of aught alive,

Seeks first the living spirit thence to drive:

Then are the lifeless fragments in his hand,

There only fails, alas! the spirit-band.

This process, chemists name, in learned thesis,

Mocking themselves, Natura encheiresis.

STUD. Your words I cannot fully comprehend.

MEPH. In a short time you will improve, my friend,

When of scholastic forms you learn the use;

And how by method all things to reduce.

STUD. So doth all this my brain confound,

As if a mill-wheel there were turning round.

MEPH. And next, before aught else you learn,

You must with zeal to metaphysics turn!

There see that you profoundly comprehend,

What doth the limit of man's brains transcend;

For that which is or is not in the head

A sounding phrase will serve you in good stead.

But before all strive this half year

From one fix'd order ne'er to swerve!

Five lectures daily you must hear;

The hour still punctually observe!

Yourself with studious zeal prepare,

And closely in your manual look,

Hereby may you be quite aware

That all he utters standeth in the book;

Yet write away without cessation,

As at the Holy Ghost's dictation!

STUD. This, Sir, a second time you need not say! 435

Your counsel I appreciate quite;
What we possess in black and white,
We can in peace and comfort bear away.

MEPH. A faculty I pray you name.

STUD. For jurisprudence some distaste I own. 440

MEPH. To me this branch of science is well known,
And hence I cannot your repugnance blame.
Customs and laws in every place,
Like a disease, an heir-loom dread,
Still trail their curse from race to race, 445
And furtively abroad they spread.
To nonsense, reason's self they turn;
Beneficence becomes a pest;
Woe unto thee, that thou'rt a grandson born!
As for the law born with us, unexpressed;— 450
That law, alas, none careth to discern.

STUD. You deepen my dislike. The youth
Whom you instruct, is blest in sooth!
To try theology I feel inclined.

MEPH. I would not lead you willingly astray,
But as regards this science, you will find 456
So hard it is to shun the erring way,
And so much hidden poison lies therein,
Which scarce can you discern from medicine.
Here too it is the best, to listen but to one, 460
And by the master's words to swear alone.
To sum up all—To words hold fast!
Then the safe gate securely pass'd,
You'll reach the fane of certainty at last.

STUD. But then some meaning must the words convey. 465

MEPH. Right! But o'er-anxious thought, you'll find of no avail,
For there precisely where ideas fail,
A word comes opportunely into play
Most admirable weapons words are found,
On words a system we securely ground, 470
In words we can conveniently believe,
Nor of a single jot can we a word bereave.

STUD. Your pardon for my importunity;
Yet once more must I trouble you:
On medicine, I'll thank you to supply 475
A pregnant utterance or two!
Three years! how brief the appointed tide!
The field, heaven knows, is all too wide!
If but a friendly hint be thrown,
'Tis easier then to feel one's way. 480

MEPH. [aside]. I'm weary of the dry pedantic tone,

And must again the genuine devil play. [Aloud.]
Of medicine the spirit's caught with ease,
The great and little world you study through,
That things may then their course pursue, 485
As heaven may please.
In vain abroad you range through science' ample space,
Each man learns only that which learn he can;
Who knows the moment to embrace,
He is your proper man. 490
In person you are tolerably made,
Nor in assurance will you be deficient:
Self-confidence acquire, be not afraid,
Others will then esteem you a proficient.
Learn chiefly with the sex to deal! 495
Their thousand ahs and ohs,
These the sage doctor knows,
He only from one point can heal.
Assume a decent tone of courteous ease,
You have them then to humor as you please. 500
First a diploma must belief infuse,
That you in your profession take the lead:
You then at once those easy freedoms use
For which another many a year must plead;
Learn how to feel with nice address 505
The dainty wrist;—and how to press,
With ardent furtive glance, the slender waist,
To feel how tightly it is laced.

STUD. There is some sense in that! one sees the how and why.

MEPH. Gray is, young friend, all theory: 510
And green of life the golden tree.

STUD. I swear it seemeth like a dream to me.
May I some future time repeat my visit,
To hear on what your wisdom grounds your views?

MEPH. Command my humble service when you choose. 515

STUD. Ere I retire, one boon I must solicit:
Here is my album, do not, Sir, deny
This token of your favor!

MEPH. Willingly!

He writes and returns the book.

STUD. [reads]. ERITIS SICUT DEUS, SCIENTES BONUM
ET MALUM.¹

He reverently closes the book and retires.

MEPH. Let but this ancient proverb be your rule, 520
My cousin follow still, the wily snake,
And with your likeness to the gods, poor fool,

¹ Ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil (Genesis 3:5).

Ere long be sure your poor sick heart will quake!

FAUST [enters]. Whither away?

MEPH. 'Tis thine our course to steer. 525

The little world, and then the great we'll view.

With what delight, what profit too,

Thou'lt revel through thy gay career!

FAUST. Despite my length of beard I need

The easy manners that insure success; 530

Th' attempt I fear can ne'er succeed;

To mingle in the world I want address;

I still have an embarrass'd air, and then

I feel myself so small with other men.

MEPH. Time, my good friend, will all that's needful give; 535

Be only self-possessed, and thou hast learn'd to live.

FAUST. But how are we to start, I pray?

Steeds, servants, carriage, where are they?

MEPH. We've but to spread this mantle wide,

'Twill serve whereon through air to ride, 540

No heavy baggage need you take,

When we our bold excursion make,

A little gas, which I will soon prepare,

Lifts us from earth; aloft through air,

Light laden, we shall swiftly steer;— 545

I wish you joy of your new life-career.

A STREET

FAUST MARGARET passing by

FAUST. Fair lady, may I thus make free
To offer you my arm and company?

MARG. I am no lady, am not fair,
Can without escort home repair. 550

[She disengages herself and exits.]

FAUST. By heaven! This girl is fair indeed!

No form like hers can I recall.

Virtue she hath, and modest heed,

Is piquant too, and sharp withal.

Her cheek's soft light, her rosy lips, 555

No length of time will e'er eclipse!

Her downward glance in passing by,

Deep in my heart is stamp'd for aye;

How curt and sharp her answer too,

To ecstasy the feeling grew! 560

MEPHISTOPHELES enters.

FAUST. This girl must win for me! Dost hear?

MEPH. Which?

FAUST. She who but now passed.

MEPH. What! She?

She from confession cometh here,

From every sin absolved and free; 565

I crept near the confessor's chair.

All innocence her virgin soul,

For next to nothing went she there;

O'er such as she I've no controll!

FAUST. She's past fourteen.

MEPH. You really talk 570

Like any gay Lothario,

Who every floweret from its stalk

Would pluck, and deems nor grace, nor truth,

Secure against his arts, forsooth!

This ne'er the less won't always do. 575

FAUST. Sir Moralizer, prithee, pause;

Nor plague me with your tiresome laws!

To cut the matter short, my friend,

She must this very night be mine,—

And if to help me you decline, 580

Midnight shall see our compact end.

MEPH. What may occur just bear in mind!

A fortnight's space, at least, I need,

A fit occasion but to find.

FAUST. With but seven hours I could succeed;

Nor should I want the devil's wile, 586

So young a creature to beguile.

MEPH. Like any Frenchman now you speak,

But do not fret, I pray; why seek

To hurry to enjoyment straight? 590

The pleasure is not half so great,

As when at first, around, above,

With all the fooleries of love,

The puppet you can knead and mold

As in Italian story oft is told. 595

FAUST. No such incentives do I need.

MEPH. But now, without offense or jest!

You cannot quickly, I protest,

In winning this sweet child succeed.

By storm we cannot take the fort, 600

To stratagem we must resort.

FAUST. Conduct me to her place of rest!

Some token of the angel bring!

A kerchief from her snowy breast,

A garter bring me,—any thing! 605

MEPH. That I my anxious zeal may prove,

Your pangs to soothe and aid your love,

A single moment will we not delay,

Will lead you to her room this very day.

FAUST. And shall I see her?—Have her?

MEPH. No! 610

She to a neighbor's house will go;

But in her atmosphere alone,

The tedious hours meanwhile you may employ,

In blissful dreams of future joy.

FAUST. Can we go now?

MEPH. 'Tis yet too soon. 615

FAUST. Some present for my love procure! [Exit.]

MEPH. Presents so soon! 'tis well! success is sure!
Full many a goodly place I know,
And treasures buried long ago; 619
I must a bit o'erlook them now. [Exit.]

EVENING

A small and neat room.

MARG. [braiding and binding up her hair]. I would give something now to know,
Who yonder gentleman could be!
He had a gallant air, I trow,
And doubtless was of high degree:
That written on his brow was seen— 625
Nor else would he so bold have been. [Exit.]

MEPH. Come in! tread softly! be discreet!

FAUST [after a pause]. Begone and leave me, I entreat!

MEPH. [looking round]. Not every maiden is so neat. [Exit.]

FAUST [gazing round]. Welcome sweet twilight, calm and blest, 630

That in this hallow'd precinct reigns!
Fond yearning love, inspire my breast,
Feeding on hope's sweet dew thy blissful pains!
What stillness here environs me!
Content and order brood around. 635
What fullness in this poverty!
In this small cell what bliss profound!

He throws himself on the leather arm-chair beside the bed.

Receive me thou, who hast in thine embrace,
Welcom'd in joy and grief the ages flown!
How oft the children of a by-gone race 640
Have cluster'd round this patriarchal throne!
Haply she, also, whom I hold so dear,
For Christmas gift, with grateful joy possess'd,
Hath with the full round cheek of childhood, here,
Her grandsire's wither'd hand devoutly press'd.
Maiden! I feel thy spirit haunt the place, 646
Breathing of order and abounding grace.
As with a mother's voice it prompteth thee,
The pure white cover o'er the board to spread,
To strew the crisping sand beneath thy tread. 650
Dear hand! so godlike in its ministry!
The hut becomes a paradise through thee!
And here— [He raises the bed-curtain.]
How thrills my pulse with strange delight!
Here could I linger hours untold; 655

Thou, Nature, didst in vision bright,
The embryo angel here unfold.

Here lay the child, her bosom warm
With life; while steeped in slumber's dew, 660
To perfect grace, her godlike form,
With pure and hallow'd weavings grew!
And thou! ah here what seekest thou?
How quails mine inmost being now!
What wouldst thou here? what makes thy heart so sore?

Unhappy Faust! I know thee now no more. 665
Do I a magic atmosphere inhale?
Erewhile, my passion would not brook delay!
Now in a pure love-dream I melt away.
Are we the sport of every passing gale?
Should she return and enter now, 670
How wouldst thou rue thy guilty flame!
Proud vaunter—thou wouldst hide thy brow,—
And at her feet sink down with shame.

MEPH. Quick! quick! below I see her there.

FAUST. Away! I will return no more! 675

MEPH. Here is a casket, with a store
Of jewels, which I got elsewhere.
Just lay it in the press; make haste!
I swear to you, 'twill turn her brain;
Therein some trifles I have placed, 680
Wherewith another to obtain.
But child is child, and play is play.

FAUST. I know not—shall I?

MEPH. Do you ask?

Perchance you would retain the treasure?
If such your wish, why then, I say, 685
Henceforth absolve me from my task,
Nor longer waste your hours of leisure.
I trust you're not by avarice led!
I rub my hands, I scratch my head,—

He places the casket in the press and closes the lock.

Now quick! Away! 690
That soon the sweet young creature may
The wish and purpose of your heart obey;
Yet stand you there
As would you to the lecture-room repair,
As if before you stood, 695
Arrayed in flesh and blood,
Physics and metaphysics weird and gray!—
Away! [Exeunt.]

MARGARET enters with a lamp.

MARG. Here 'tis so close, so sultry now,

She opens the window.

Yet out of doors 'tis not so warm.
I feel so strange, I know not how—
I wish my mother would come home.
Through me there runs a shuddering—
I'm but a foolish timid thing!

While undressing herself she begins to sing.

There was a king in Thule,
True even to the grave;
To whom his dying mistress
A golden beaker gave.

At every feast he drained it,
Naught was to him so dear,
And often as he drained it,
Gush'd from his eyes the tear.

When death came, unrepining
His cities o'er he told;
All to his heir resigning,
Except his cup of gold.

With many a knightly vassal
At a royal feast sat he,
In yon proud hall ancestral,
In his castle o'er the sea.

Up stood the jovial monarch,
And quaff'd his last life's glow,
Then hurled the hallow'd goblet
Into the flood below.

He saw it splashing, drinking,
And plunging in the sea;
His eyes meanwhile were sinking,
And never again drank he.

She opens the press to put away her clothes, and perceives the casket.

How comes this lovely casket here? The press
I locked, of that I'm confident. 730
'Tis very wonderful! What's in it I can't guess;
Perhaps 'twas brought by someone in distress,
And left in pledge for loan my mother lent.
Here by a ribbon hangs a little key!
I have a mind to open it and see! 735
Heavens! only look! what have we here!
In all my days ne'er saw I such a sight!
Jewels! which any noble dame might wear,
For some high pageant richly dight!
This chain—how would it look on me! 740
These splendid gems, whose may they be?

She puts them on and steps before the glass.

700 Were but the ear-rings only mine!
Thus one has quite another air.
What boots it to be young and fair?
It doubtless may be very fine; 745
But then, alas, none cares for you,
And praise sounds half like pity too.

705 Gold all doth lure,
Gold doth secure
All things. Alas, we poor! 750

PROMENADE

710 *FAUST walking thoughtfully up and down. To him
MEPHISTOPHELES:*

MEPH. By all rejected love! By hellish fire I curse,
Would I knew aught to make my imprecation
worse! 715
FAUST. What aileth thee? what chafes thee now so sore?

A face like that I never saw before!
MEPH. I'd yield me to the devil instantly, 755
Did it not happen that myself am he!
FAUST. There must be some disorder in thy wit!
To rave thus like a madman, is it fit? 720

MEPH. Think! only think! The gems for Gretchen brought,
Them hath a priest now made his own!— 760
A glimpse of them the mother caught,
And 'gan with secret fear to groan.
The woman's scent is keen enough;
Doth ever in the prayer-book snuff;
Smells every article to ascertain 765

Whether the thing is holy or profane,
And scented in the jewels rare,
That there was not much blessing there.
"My child," she cries, "ill-gotten good
Ensnares the soul, consumes the blood; 770
With them we'll deck our Lady's shrine,
She'll cheer our souls with bread divine!"

At this poor Gretchen 'gan to pout;
'Tis a gift-horse, at least, she thought,
And sure, he godless cannot be, 775

Who brought them here so cleverly.
Straight for a priest the mother sent,
Who, when he understood the jest,
With what he saw was well content.
"This shows a pious mind!" Quoth he: 780

"Self-conquest is true victory.
The Church hath a good stomach, she, with zest,
Whole countries hath swallow'd down,
And never yet a surfeit known.

The Church alone, be it confessed, 785
Daughters, can ill-got wealth digest."

FAUST. It is a general custom, too,
Practiced alike by king and Jew.

MEPH. With that, clasp, chain, and ring, he swept

As they were mushrooms; and the casket, 790
Without one word of thanks, he kept,
As if of nuts it were a basket.
Promised reward in heaven, then forth he hied—
And greatly they were edified.

FAUST. And Gretchen!

MEPH. In unquiet mood 795
Knows neither what she would or should;
The trinkets night and day thinks o'er,
On him who brought them, dwells still more.

FAUST. The darling's sorrow grieves me, bring
Another set without delay! 800
The first, methinks, was no great thing.

MEPH. All's to my gentleman child's play!

FAUST. Plan all things to achieve my end!
Engage the attention of her friend!
No milk-and-water devil be, 805
And bring fresh jewels instantly!

MEPH. Aye, sir! Most gladly I'll obey.

[FAUST exit.

MEPH. Your doting love-sick fool, with ease,
Merely his lady-love to please, 809
Sun, moon, and stars in sport would puff away.
[Exit.

THE NEIGHBOR'S HOUSE

MARTH. [alone]. God pardon my dear husband, he

Doth not in truth act well by me!
Forth in the world abroad to roam,
And leave me on the straw at home.
And yet his will I ne'er did thwart, 815
God knows, I lov'd him from my heart. [She weeps.]

Perchance he's dead!—oh wretched state!—
Had I but a certificate!

MARGARET enters.

MARG. Dame Martha!

MARTH. Gretchen?

MARG. Only think!

My knees beneath me well-nigh sink! 820
Within my press I've found today,
Another case, of ebony.
And things—magnificent they are,
More costly than the first, by far.

MARTH. You must not name it to your mother!
It would to shrift, just like the other. 826

MARG. Nay look at them! now only see!

MARTH. [dresses her up]. Thou happy creature!
MARG. Woe is me!

Them in the street I cannot wear,
Or in the church, or any where. 830

MARTH. Come often over here to me,
The gems put on quite privately;
And then before the mirror walk an hour or so,
Thus we shall have our pleasure too.

Then suitable occasions we must seize, 835
As at a feast, to show them by degrees:
A chain at first, pearl ear-drops then,—your mother

Won't see them, or we'll coin some tale or other.

MARG. But, who, I wonder, could the caskets
bring? 839

I fear there's something wrong about the thing!
[A knock.]

Good heavens! can that my mother be?

MARTH. [peering through the blind]. 'Tis a strange gentleman, I see.
Come in!

MEPHISTOPHELES enters.

MEPH. I've ventur'd to intrude today.
Ladies, excuse the liberty, I pray. 845

He steps back respectfully before MARGARET.

After dame Martha Schwerdtlein I inquire!

MARTH. 'Tis I. Pray what have you to say to me?

MEPH. [aside to her]. I know you now,—and therefore will retire;

At present you've distinguished company.
Pardon the freedom, Madam, with your leave, 850
I will make free to call again at eve.

MARTH. [aloud]. Why, child, of all strange notions, he

For some grand lady taketh thee!

MARG. I am, in truth, of humble blood—
The gentleman is far too good— 855
Nor gems nor trinkets are my own.

MEPH. Oh 'tis not the mere ornaments alone;
Her glance and mien far more betray.
Rejoiced I am that I may stay. 859

MARTH. Your business, Sir? I long to know—

MEPH. Would I could happier tidings show!

I trust mine errand you'll not let me rue;

Your husband's dead, and greeteth you.

MARTH. Is dead? True heart! Oh misery!
My husband dead! Oh, I shall die! 865

MARG. Alas! good Martha! don't despair!

MEPH. Now listen to the sad affair!
 MARG. I for this cause should fear to love.
 The loss my certain death would prove. 869
 MEPH. Joy still must sorrow, sorrow joy attend.
 MARTH. Proceed, and tell the story of his end!
 MEPH. At Padua, in St. Anthony's,
 In holy ground his body lies;
 Quiet and cool his place of rest,
 With pious ceremonials blest. 875
 MARTH. And had you naught besides to bring?
 MEPH. Oh yes! one grave and solemn prayer;
 Let them for him three hundred masses sing!
 But in my pockets, I have nothing there.
 MARTH. No trinket! no love-token did he send!
 What every journeyman safe in his pouch will hoard 881
 There for remembrance fondly stored,
 And rather hungers, rather begs than spend!
 MEPH. Madam, in truth, it grieves me sore,
 But he his gold not lavishly hath spent. 885
 His failings too he deeply did repent,
 Aye! and his evil plight bewail'd still more.
 MARG. Alas! That men should thus be doomed to woe!
 I for his soul will many a requiem pray.
 MEPH. A husband you deserve this very day; 890
 A child so worthy to be loved.
 MARG. Ah no,
 That time hath not yet come for me.
 MEPH. If not a spouse, a gallant let it be.
 Among heaven's choicest gifts, I place,
 So sweet a darling to embrace. 895
 MARG. Our land doth no such usage know.
 MEPH. Usage or not, it happens so.
 MARTH. Go on, I pray!
 MEPH. I stood by his bedside.
 Something less foul it was than dung;
 'Twas straw half rotten; yet, he as a Christian died. 900
 And sorely hath remorse his conscience wrung.
 "Wretch that I was," quoth he, with parting breath,
 "So to forsake my business and my wife!
 Ah! the remembrance is my death.
 Could I but have her pardon in this life!"— 905
 MARTH. [weeping]. Dear soul! I've long forgiven him, indeed!
 MEPH. "Though she, God knows, was more to blame than I."
 MARTH. He lied! What, on the brink of death to lie!
 MEPH. If I am skill'd the countenance to read,
 He doubtless fabled as he parted hence.— 910

"No time had I to gape, or take my ease," he said,
 "First to get children, and then get them bread;
 And bread, too, in the very widest sense;
 Nor could I eat in peace even my proper share."
 MARTH. What, all my truth, my love forgotten quite? 915
 My weary drudgery by day and night!
 MEPH. Not so! He thought of you with tender care.
 Quoth he: "Heaven knows how fervently I prayed,
 For wife and children when from Malta bound;—
 The prayer hath heaven with favor crowned; 920
 We took a Turkish vessel which conveyed
 Rich store of treasure for the Sultan's court;
 Its own reward our gallant action brought;
 The captur'd prize was shared among the crew,
 And of the treasure I received my due." 925 MARTH. How? Where? The treasure hath he buried, pray?
 MEPH. Where the four winds have blown it,
 who can say?
 In Naples as he stroll'd, a stranger there,—
 A comely maid took pity on my friend;
 And gave such tokens of her love and care, 930
 That he retained them to his blessed end.
 MARTH. Scoundrel! to rob his children of their bread!
 And all this misery, this bitter need,
 Could not his course of recklessness impede!
 MEPH. Well, he hath paid the forfeit, and is dead. 935
 Now were I in your place, my counsel hear;
 My weeds I'd wear for one chaste year,
 And for another love meanwhile would look out.
 MARTH. Alas, I might search far and near,
 Not quickly should I find another like my first!
 There could not be a fonder fool than mine, 941
 Only he loved too well abroad to roam;
 Loved foreign women too, and foreign wine,
 And loved besides the dice accurs'd.
 MEPH. All had gone swimmingly, no doubt, 945
 Had he but given you at home,
 On his side, just as wide a range.
 Upon such terms, to you I swear,
 Myself with you would gladly rings exchange! 949
 MARTH. The gentleman is surely pleas'd to jest!
 MEPH. [aside]. Now to be off in time, were best!
 She'd make the very devil marry her.
 [To MARGARET.] How fares it with your heart?
 MARG. How mean you, sir?
 MEPH. [aside]. The sweet young innocent!
 [Aloud.] Ladies, farewell!
 MARG. Farewell! 956

MARTH. But ere you leave us, quickly tell!
I from a witness fain had heard,
Where, how, and when my husband died and was interr'd.

To forms I've always been attached indeed, 960
His death I fain would in the journals read.

MEPH. Aye, madam, what two witnesses declare
Is held as valid everywhere;
A gallant friend I have, not far from here,
Who will for you before the judge appear. 965
I'll bring him straight.

MARTH. I pray you do!

MEPH. And this young lady, we shall find her too?

A noble youth, far traveled, he Shows to the sex all courtesy.

MARG. I in his presence needs must blush for shame. 970

MEPH. Not in the presence of a crowned king!

MARTH. The garden, then, behind my house,
we'll name,
There we'll await you both this evening.

A STREET

FAUST MEPHISTOPHELES

FAUST. How is it now? How speeds it? Is't in train?

MEPH. Bravo! I find you all aflame! 975
Gretchen full soon your own you'll name.
This eve, at neighbor Martha's, her you'll meet
again;

The woman seems expressly made
To drive the pimp and gypsy's trade.

FAUST. Good. 980

MEPH. But from us she something would request.

FAUST. A favor claims return as this world goes.

MEPH. We have on oath but duly to attest,
That her dead husband's limbs, outstretch'd, repose
In holy ground at Padua.

FAUST. Sage indeed! 985
So I suppose we straight must journey there!

MEPH. Sancta simplicitas! For that no need!
Without much knowledge we have but to swear.

FAUST. If you have nothing better to suggest,
Against your plan I must at once protest. 990

MEPH. Oh, holy man! methinks I have you there!
In all your life say, have you ne'er
False witness borne, until this hour?
Have you of God, the world, and all it doth contain,

Of man, and that which worketh in his heart and brain, 995
Not definitions given, in words of weight and power,

With front unblushing, and a dauntless breast?
Yet, if into the depth of things you go,
Touching these matters, it must be confess'd,
As much as of Herr Schwerdtlein's death you
know! 1000

FAUST. Thou art and dost remain liar and sophist
too.

MEPH. Aye, if one did not take a somewhat deeper view!

Tomorrow, in all honor, thou
Poor Gretchen wilt befool, and vow
Thy soul's deep love, in lover's fashion. 1005

FAUST. And from my heart.

MEPH. All good and fair!
Then deathless constancy thou'lt swear;
Speak of one all o'ermastering passion,—
Will that too issue from the heart?

FAUST. Forbear!

When passion sways me, and I seek to frame 1010
Fit utterance for feeling, deep, intense,
And for my frenzy finding no fit name,
Sweep round the ample world with every sense,
Grasp at the loftiest words to speak my flame,
And call the glow, wherewith I burn, 1015
Quenchless, eternal, yea, eterne—
Is that of sophistry a devilish play?

MEPH. Yet am I right!

FAUST. Mark this, my friend,
And spare my lungs; who would the right maintain, 1020

And hath a tongue wherewith his point to gain,
Will gain it in the end.

But come, of gossip I am weary quite;
Because I've no resource, thou'rt in the right.

A GARDEN

MARGARET on FAUST's arm. MARTHA with MEPHIS-
TOPHELES walking up and down.

MARG. I feel it, you but spare my ignorance, 1025
The gentleman to shame me stoops thus low.

A traveler from complaisance,
Still makes the best of things; I know
Too well, my humble prattle never can
Have power to entertain so wise a man. 1030

FAUST. One glance, one word from thee doth charm me more,
Than the world's wisdom or the sage's lore.

He kisses her hand.

MARG. Nay; trouble not yourself! A hand so coarse,
So rude as mine, how can you kiss!
What constant work at home must I not do perforce! 1035

My mother too exacting is. [They pass on.]

MARTH. Thus, sir, unceasing travel is your lot?

MEPH. Traffic and duty urge us! With what pain

Are we compelled to leave full many a spot,
Where yet we dare not once remain! 1040

MARTH. In youth's wild years, with vigor crown'd,

'Tis not amiss thus through the world to sweep;
But ah, the evil days come round!
And to a lonely grave as bachelor to creep,
A pleasant thing has no one found. 1045

MEPH. The prospect fills me with dismay.

MARTH. Therefore in time, dear sir, reflect, I pray. [They pass on.]

MARG. Aye, out of sight, is out of mind!
Politeness easy is to you;
Friends everywhere, and not a few, 1050
Wiser than I am, you will find.

FAUST. O dearest, trust me, what doth pass for sense

Full oft is self-conceit and blindness!

MARG. How?

FAUST. Simplicity and holy innocence,—
When will ye learn your hallow'd worth to know!
Ah, when will meekness and humility, 1056
Kind and all-bounteous nature's loftiest dower—

MARG. Only one little moment think of me!
To think of you I shall have many an hour.

FAUST. You are perhaps much alone? 1060

MARG. Yes, small our household is, I own,
Yet must I see to it. No maid we keep,
And I must cook, sew, knit, and sweep,
Still early on my feet and late;
My mother is in all things, great and small, 1065
So accurate!

Not that for thrift there is such pressing need;
Than others we might make more show indeed;
My father left behind a small estate,
A house and garden near the city-wall. 1070

But fairly quiet now my days, I own;
As soldier is my brother gone;
My little sister's dead; the babe to rear
Occasion'd me some care and fond annoy;
But I would go through all again with joy, 1075
The darling was to me so dear.

FAUST. An angel, sweet, if it resembled thee!

MARG. I reared it up, and it grew fond of me.

After my father's death it saw the day;
We gave my mother up for lost, she lay 1080
In such a wretched plight, and then at length
So very slowly she regain'd her strength.

Weak as she was, 'twas vain for her to try
Herself to suckle the poor babe, so I
Reared it on milk and water all alone; 1085
And thus the child became as 'twere my own;
Within my arms it stretched itself and grew,
And smiling, nestled in my bosom too.

FAUST. Doubtless the purest happiness was thine.

MARG. But many weary hours, in sooth, were also mine. 1090

At night its little cradle stood
Close to my bed; so was I wide awake
If it but stirred;
One while I was obliged to give it food,
Or to my arms the darling take; 1095
From bed full oft must rise, whene'er its cry I heard,
And, dancing it, must pace the chamber to and fro;

Stand at the wash-tub early; forthwith go
To market, and then mind the cooking too—
Tomorrow like today, the whole year through.
Ah, sir, thus living, it must be confess'd 1101
One's spirits are not always of the best;
Yet it a relish gives to food and rest.

[They pass on.]

MARTH. Poor women! we are badly off, I own;
A bachelor's conversion's hard, indeed! 1105

MEPH. Madam, with one like you it rests alone,
To tutor me a better course to lead.

MARTH. Speak frankly, sir, none is there you have met?

Has your heart ne'er attach'd itself as yet?

MEPH. One's own fireside and a good wife are gold 1110

And pearls of price, so says the proverb old.

MARTH. I mean, has passion never stirred your breast?

MEPH. I've everywhere been well received, I own.

MARTH. Yet hath your heart no earnest preference known?

MEPH. With ladies one should ne'er presume to jest. 1115

MARTH. Ah! you mistake!

MEPH. I'm sorry I'm so blind!

But this I know—that you are very kind.

[They pass on.]

FAUST. Me, little angel, didst thou recognize,
When in the garden first I came? 1120

MARG. Did you not see it? I cast down my eyes.

FAUST. Thou dost forgive my boldness, dost not blame

The liberty I took that day,
When thou from church didst lately wend thy way?

MARG. I was confused. So had it never been;
No one of me could any evil say. 1126

Alas, thought I, he doubtless in thy mien,
Something unmaidenly or bold hath seen?

It seemed as if it struck him suddenly,

Here's just a girl with whom one may make free!

Yet I must own that then I scarcely knew 1131

What in your favor here began at once to plead;

Yet I was angry with myself indeed,

That I more angry could not feel with you.

FAUST. Sweet love. 1135

MARG. Just wait awhile!

She gathers a star-flower and plucks off the leaves one after another.

FAUST. A nosegay may that be?

MARG. No! It is but a game.

FAUST. How?

MARG. Go, you'll laugh at me! 1140

She plucks off the leaves and murmurs to herself.

FAUST. What murmurest thou?

MARG. [half aloud]. He loves me,—loves me not.

FAUST. Sweet angel, with thy face of heavenly bliss!

MARG. [continues]. He loves me—not—he loves me—not— [Plucking off the last leaf with fond joy.] He loves me!

FAUST. Yes!

And this flower-language, darling, let it be, 1145

A heavenly oracle! He loveth thee!

Know'st thou the meaning of, He loveth thee?

He seizes both her hands.

MARG. I tremble so!

FAUST. Nay! do not tremble, love!

Let this hand-pressure, let this glance reveal 1150

Feelings, all power of speech above;

To give oneself up wholly and to feel

A joy that must eternal prove!

Eternal!—Yes, its end would be despair.

No end!—It cannot end! 1155

MARGARET presses his hand, extricates herself, and runs away. He stands a moment in thought, and then follows her.

MARTH. [approaching]. Night's closing.

MEPH. Yes, we'll presently away.

MARTH. I would entreat you longer yet to stay;

But 'tis a wicked place, just here about;

It is as if the folk had nothing else to do, 1160

Nothing to think of too,

But gaping watch their neighbors, who goes in and out;

And scandal's busy still, do whatso'er one may.

And our young couple?

MEPH. They have flown up there.

The wanton butterflies!

MARTH. He seems to take to her.

MEPH. And she to him. 'Tis of the world the way! 1166

A SUMMER-HOUSE

MARGARET runs in, hides behind the door, holds the tip of her finger to her lip, and peeps through the crevice.

MARG. He comes!

FAUST. Ah, little rogue, so thou

Think'st to provoke me! I have caught thee now!

He kisses her.

MARG. [embracing him, and returning the kiss].

Dearest of men! I love thee from my heart!

MEPHISTOPHELES knocks.

FAUST [stamping]. Who's there?

MEPH. A friend!

FAUST. A brute!

MEPH. 'Tis time to part.

MARTH. [comes]. Aye, it is late, good sir. 1171

FAUST. Mayn't I attend you, then?

MARG. Oh no—my mother would—adieu, adieu!

FAUST. And must I really then take leave of you? Farewell! 1175

MARTH. Good-by!

MARG. Ere long to meet again!

[Exeunt FAUST and MEPHISTOPHELES.]

MARG. Good heavens! How all things far and near Must fill his mind,—a man like this!

Abash'd before him I appear, 1180

And say to all things only, yes.

Poor simple child, I cannot see,

What 'tis that he can find in me. [Exit.]

FOREST AND CAVERN

FAUST [alone]. Spirit sublime! Thou gav'st me, gav'st me all

For which I pray'd! Not vainly hast thou turn'd

To me thy countenance in flaming fire: 1186

Gavest me glorious nature for my realm,
 And also power to feel her and enjoy;
 Not merely with a cold and wondering glance,
 Thou dost permit me in her depths profound, 1190
 As in the bosom of a friend to gaze.
 Before me thou dost lead her living tribes,
 And dost in silent grove, in air and stream
 Teach me to know my kindred. And when roars
 The howling storm-blast through the groaning wood, 1195
 Wrenching the giant pine, which in its fall
 Crashing sweeps down its neighbor trunks and boughs,
 While hollow thunder from the hill resounds;
 Then thou dost lead me to some shelter'd cave,
 Dost there reveal me to myself, and show 1200
 Of my own bosom the mysterious depths.
 And when with soothing beam, the moon's pale orb
 Full in my view climbs up the pathless sky,
 From crag and dewy grove, the silvery forms
 Of by-gone ages hover, and assuage 1205
 The joy austere of contemplative thought.
 Oh, that naught perfect is assign'd to man,
 I feel, alas! With this exalted joy,
 Which lifts me near and nearer to the gods,
 Thou gav'st me this companion, unto whom 1210
 I needs must cling, though cold and insolent,
 He still degrades me to myself, and turns
 Thy glorious gifts to nothing, with a breath.
 He in my bosom with malicious zeal
 For that fair image fans a raging fire; 1215
 From craving to enjoyment thus I reel,
 And in enjoyment languish for desire.

MEPHISTOPHELES enters.

MEPH. Of this lone life have you not had your fill?
 How for so long can it have charms for you?
 'Tis well enough to try it if you will; 1220
 But then away again to something new!
 FAUST. Would you could better occupy your leisure,
 Than in disturbing thus my hours of joy.
 MEPH. Well! Well! I'll leave you to yourself with pleasure,
 A serious tone you hardly dare employ. 1225
 To part from one so crazy, harsh, and cross,
 Were not in truth a grievous loss.
 The live-long day, for you I toil and fret;
 Ne'er from his worship's face a hint I get,
 What pleases him, or what to let alone. 1230

FAUST. Aye truly! that is just the proper tone!
 He wearies me, and would with thanks be paid!

MEPH. Poor Son of Earth, without my aid,
 How would thy weary days have flown?
 Thee of thy foolish whims I've cured, 1235
 Thy vain imaginations banished.
 And but for me, be well assured,
 Thou from this sphere must soon have vanished.
 In rocky hollows and in caverns drear,
 Why like an owl sit moping here? 1240
 Wherefore from dripping stones and moss with ooze embued,
 Dost suck, like any toad, thy food?
 A rare, sweet pastime. Verily!
 The doctor cleaveth still to thee.
 FAUST. Dost comprehend what bliss without alloy 1245
 From this wild wand'ring in the desert springs?—
 Couldst thou but guess the new life-power it brings,
 Thou wouldst be fiend enough to envy me my joy.
 MEPH. What super-earthly ecstasy! at night,
 To lie in darkness on the dewy height, 1250
 Embracing heaven and earth in rapture high,
 The soul dilating to a deity;
 With prescient yearnings pierce the core of earth,
 Feel in your laboring breast the six-days' birth,
 Enjoy, in proud delight what no one knows, 1255
 While your love-rapture o'er creation flows,—
 The earthly lost in beatific vision,
 And then the lofty intuition— [With a gesture.]
 I need not tell you how—to close!
 FAUST. Fie on you! 1260
 MEPH. This displeases you? "For shame!"
 You are forsooth entitled to exclaim;
 We to chaste ears it seems must not pronounce
 What, nathless, the chaste heart cannot renounce.
 Well, to be brief, the joy as fit occasions rise, 1265
 I grudge you not, of specious lies.
 But long this mood thou'lt not retain.
 Already thou'rt again outworn,
 And should this last, thou wilt be torn
 By frenzy or remorse and pain. 1270
 Enough of this! Thy true love dwells apart,
 And all to her seems flat and tame;
 Alone thine image fills her heart,
 She loves thee with an all-devouring flame. 1274
 First came thy passion with o'erpowering rush,
 Like mountain torrent, swollen by the melted
 snow;
 Full in her heart didst pour the sudden gush,
 Now has thy brooklet ceased to flow.
 Instead of sitting throned midst forests wild,

It would become so great a lord 1280
 To comfort the enamor'd child,
 And the young monkey for her love reward.
 To her the hours seem miserably long;
 She from the window sees the clouds float by
 As o'er the lofty city-walls they fly. 1285
 "If I a birdie were!" so runs her song,
 Half through the night and all day long.
 Cheerful sometimes, more oft at heart full sore;
 Fairly outwept seem now her tears,
 Anon she tranquil is, or so appears, 1290
 And love-sick evermore.

FAUST. Snake! Serpent vile!

MEPH. [aside]. Good! If I catch thee with my guile!

FAUST. Vile reprobate! go get thee hence;
 Forbear the lovely girl to name! 1295
 Nor in my half-distracted sense,
 Kindle anew the smoldering flame!

MEPH. What wouldest thou! She thinks you've taken flight;

It seems, she's partly in the right.

FAUST. I'm near her still—and should I distant rove, 1300

Her I can ne'er forget, ne'er lose her love;
 And all things touch'd by those sweet lips of hers,
 Even the very Host, my envy stirs.

MEPH. 'Tis well! I oft have envied you indeed,
 The twin-pair that among the roses feed. 1305

FAUST. Pander, avaunt!

MEPH. Go to! I laugh, the while you rail.
 The power which fashion'd youth and maid,
 Well understood the noble trade;
 So neither shall occasion fail. 1310

But hence!—A mighty grief I trow!
 Unto thy lov'd one's chamber thou
 And not to death shouldst go.

FAUST. What is to me heaven's joy within her arms?

What though my life her bosom warms!— 1315
 Do I not ever feel her woe?

The outcast am I not, unhoused, unblest,
 Inhuman monster, without aim or rest,
 Who, like the greedy surge, from rock to rock,
 Sweeps down the dread abyss with desperate shock? 1320

While she, within her lowly cot, which graced
 The Alpine slope, beside the waters wild,
 Her homely cares in that small world embraced,
 Secluded lived, a simple artless child.
 Was't not enough, in thy delirious whirl 1325

To blast the steadfast rocks;
 Her, and her peace as well,

Must I, God-hated one, to ruin hurl!
 Dost claim this holocaust, remorseless Hell!
 Fiend, help me to cut short the hours of dread!
 Let what must happen, happen speedily! 1331
 Her direful doom fall crushing on my head,
 And into ruin let her plunge with me!

MEPH. Why how again it seethes and glows!
 Away, thou fool! Her torment ease! 1335

When such a head no issue sees,
 It pictures straight the final close.

Long life to him who boldly dares!
 A devil's pluck thou'rt wont to show;

As for a devil who despairs, 1340
 Nothing I find so mawkish here below.

MARGARET'S ROOM

MARG. [alone at her spinning wheel].

My peace is gone,
 My heart is sore,
 I find it never,
 And nevermore! 1345

Where him I have not,
 Is the grave; and all
 The world to me
 Is turned to gall.

My wilder'd brain 1350
 Is overwrought;
 My feeble senses
 Are distraught.

My peace is gone,
 My heart is sore, 1355
 I find it never,
 And nevermore!

For him from the window
 I gaze, at home;
 For him and him only 1360
 Abroad I roam.

His lofty step,
 His bearing high,
 The smile of his lip,
 The power of his eye, 1365

His witching words,
 Their tones of bliss,
 His hand's fond pressure,
 And ah—his kiss!

My peace is gone, 1370
 My heart is sore,

I find it never,
And nevermore.

My bosom aches
To feel him near; 1375
Ah, could I clasp
And fold him here!

Kiss him and kiss him
Again would I,
And on his kisses 1380
I fain would die!

MARTHA'S GARDEN

MARGARET and FAUST

MARG. Promise me, Henry!

FAUST. What I can!

MARG. How thy religion fares, I fain would hear.
Thou art a good kind-hearted man,
Only that way not well-disposed, I fear. 1385

FAUST. Forbear, my child! Thou feelest thee I
love;

My heart, my blood, I'd give, my love to prove,
And none would of their faith or church bereave.

MARG. That's not enough, we must ourselves believe!

FAUST. Must we? 1390

MARG. Ah, could I but thy soul inspire!
Thou honorest not the sacraments, alas!

FAUST. I honor them.

MARG. But yet without desire;
'Tis long since thou hast been either to shrift or mass. 1395

Dost thou believe in God?

FAUST. My darling, who dares say,
Yes, I in God believe?

Question or priest or sage, and they Seem, in the answer you receive, 1400
To mock the questioner.

MARG. Then thou dost not believe?

FAUST. Sweet one! my meaning do not misconceive!

Him who dare name?

And who proclaim, 1405

Him I believe?

Who that can feel,
His heart can steel,
To say: I believe him not?

The All-embracer, 1410
All-sustainer,
Holds and sustains he not
Thee, me, himself?

Lifts not the Heaven its dome above?
Doth not the firm-set earth beneath us lie? 1415

And beaming tenderly with looks of love,
Climb not the everlasting stars on high?
Do we not gaze into each other's eyes?

Nature's impenetrable agencies,
Are they not thronging on thy heart and brain,
Viewless, or visible to mortal ken, 1421

Around thee weaving their mysterious chain?
Fill thence thy heart, how large so'er it be;
And in the feeling when thou utterly art blest,
Then call it, what thou wilt,— 1425

Call it Bliss! Heart! Love! God!

I have no name for it!

'Tis feeling all;

Name is but sound and smoke
Shrouding the glow of heaven. 1430

MARG. All this is doubtless good and fair;
Almost the same the parson says,
Only in slightly different phrase.

FAUST. Beneath Heaven's sunshine, everywhere,
This is the utterance of the human heart; 1435
Each in his language doth the like impart;
Then why not I in mine?

MARG. What thus I hear
Sounds plausible, yet I'm not reconciled;
There's something wrong about it; much I fear
That thou art not a Christian.

FAUST. My sweet child! 1440

MARG. Alas! it long hath sorely troubled me,
To see thee in such odious company.

FAUST. How so?

MARG. The man who comes with thee, I hate,
Yea, in my spirit's inmost depths abhor; 1445
As his loath'd visage, in my life before,
Naught to my heart e'er gave a pang so great.

FAUST. Him fear not, my sweet love!

MARG. His presence chills my blood.
Towards all beside I have a kindly mood; 1450
Yet, though I yearn to gaze on thee, I feel
At sight of him strange horror o'er me steal;
That he's a villain my conviction's strong.
May Heaven forgive me, if I do him wrong!

FAUST. Yet such strange fellows in the world must be! 1455

MARG. I would not live with such an one as he.
If for a moment he but enter here,
He looks around him with a mocking sneer,
And malice ill-conceal'd;
That he with naught on earth can sympathize is clear; 1460

Upon his brow 'tis legibly revealed,
That to his heart no living soul is dear.

So blest I feel, within thine arms,
So warm and happy,—free from all alarms;
And still my heart doth close when he comes near.

FAUST. Foreboding angel! check thy fear! 1466

MARG. It so o'ermasters me, that when,
Or wheresoe'er, his step I hear,
I almost think, no more I love thee then.
Besides, when he is near, I ne'er could pray. 1470
This eats into my heart; with thee
The same, my Henry, it must be.

FAUST. This is antipathy!

MARG. I must away.

FAUST. For one brief hour then may I never rest,
And heart to heart, and soul to soul be pressed?

MARG. Ah, if I slept alone! Tonight 1476
The bolt I fain would leave undrawn for thee;
But then my mother's sleep is light,
Were we surprised by her, ah me!
Upon the spot I should be dead. 1480

FAUST. Dear angel! there's no cause for dread.
Here is a little phial,—if she take
Mixed in her drink three drops, 'twill steep
Her nature in a deep and soothing sleep.

MARG. What do I not for thy dear sake! 1485
To her it will not harmful prove?

FAUST. Should I advise it else, sweet love?

MARG. I know not, dearest, when thy face I see,
What doth my spirit to thy will constrain;
Already I have done so much for thee, 1490
That scarcely more to do doth now remain. [Exit.]

MEPHISTOPHELES enters.

MEPH. The monkey! Is she gone?

FAUST. Again hast played the spy?

MEPH. Of all that pass'd I'm well apprized,
I heard the doctor catechized, 1495
And trust he'll profit much thereby!
Fain would the girls inquire indeed
Touching their lover's faith and creed,
And whether pious in the good old way; 1499
They think, if pliant there, us too he will obey.

FAUST. Thou monster, dost not see that this Pure soul, possessed by ardent love,
Full of the living faith,
To her of bliss
The only pledge, must holy anguish prove, 1505
Holding the man she loves, fore-doomed to endless death!

MEPH. Most sensual, supersensualist? The while
A damsel leads thee by the nose!

FAUST. Of filth and fire abortion vile!

MEPH. In physiognomy strange skill she shows;
She in my presence feels she knows not how; 1511

My mask it seems a hidden sense reveals;
That I'm a genius she must needs allow,
That I'm the very devil perhaps she feels.
So then tonight—

FAUST. What's that to you? 1515

MEPH. I've my amusement in it too!

AT THE WELL

MARGARET and BESSY, with pitchers

BESSY. Of Barbara hast nothing heard?

MARG. I rarely go from home,—no, not a word.

BESSY. 'Tis true: Sybilla told me so today!
That comes of being proud, methinks; 1520
She played the fool at last.

MARG. How so?

BESSY. They say
That two she feedeth when she eats and drinks.

MARG. Alas!

BESSY. She's rightly served, in sooth.
How long she hung upon the youth! 1525
What promenades, what jaunts there were,
To dancing booth and village fair!
The first she everywhere must shine,
He always treating her to pastry and to wine.
Of her good looks she was so vain, 1530
So shameless too, that to retain
His presents, she did not disdain;
Sweet words and kisses came anon—
And then the virgin flower was gone.

MARG. Poor thing! 1535

BESSY. Forsooth dost pity her?

At night, when at our wheels we sat,
Abroad our mothers ne'er would let us stir.
Then with her lover she must chat,
Or on the bench, or in the dusky walk, 1540
Thinking the hours too brief for their sweet talk;
Her proud head she will have to bow,
And in white sheet do penance now!

MARG. But he will surely marry her?

BESSY. Not he!
He won't be such a fool! a gallant lad 1545
Like him, can roam o'er land and sea,
Besides, he's off.

MARG. That is not fair!

BESSY. If she should get him, 'twere almost as bad!

Her myrtle wreath the boys would tear;
And then we girls would plague her too, 1550
For we chopp'd straw before her door would strew! [Exit.]

MARG. [walking towards home]. How stoutly once I could inveigh,

If a poor maiden went astray;
 Not words enough my tongue could find,
 'Gainst others' sin to speak my mind! 1555
 Black as it seemed, I blacken'd it still more,
 And strove to make it blacker than before.
 And did myself securely bless—
 Now my own trespass doth appear!
 Yet ah!—what urg'd me to transgress, 1560
 God knows, it was so sweet, so dear!

ZWINGER

Enclosure between the city-wall and the gate. In the niche of the wall a devotional image of the Mater dolorosa, with flower-pots before it.

MARG. [putting fresh flowers in the pots].
 Ah, rich in sorrow, thou,
 Stoop thy maternal brow,
 And mark with pitying eye my misery!
 The sword in thy pierced heart, 1565
 Thou dost with bitter smart,
 Gaze upwards on thy Son's death agony.
 To the dear God on high,
 Ascends thy piteous sigh,
 Pleading for his and thy sore misery. 1570

Ah, who can know
 The torturing woe,
 The pangs that rack me to the bone?
 How my poor heart, without relief,
 Trembles and throbs, its yearning grief 1575
 Thou knowest, thou alone!

Ah, wheresoe'er I go,
 With woe, with woe, with woe,
 My anguish'd breast is aching!
 When all alone I creep, 1580
 I weep, I weep, I weep,
 Alas! my heart is breaking!
 The flower-pots at my window
 Were wet with tears of mine,
 The while I pluck'd these blossoms, 1585
 At dawn to deck thy shrine!

When early in my chamber
 Shone bright the rising morn,
 I sat there on my pallet,
 My heart with anguish torn. 1590
 Help! from disgrace and death deliver me!
 Ah! rich in sorrow, thou,
 Stoop thy maternal brow,
 And mark with pitying eye my misery!

NIGHT

A street before Margaret's door

VALENTINE [a soldier, Margaret's brother].
 When seated 'mong the jovial crowd, 1595
 Where merry comrades boasting loud
 Each named with pride his favorite lass,
 And in her honor drain'd his glass;
 Upon my elbows I would lean,
 With easy quiet view the scene; 1600
 Nor give my tongue the rein, until
 Each swaggering blade had talked his fill.
 Then smiling I my beard would stroke,
 The while, with brimming glass, I spoke;
 "Each to his taste!—but to my mind, 1605
 Where in the country will you find,
 A maid, as my dear Gretchen fair,
 Who with my sister can compare?"
 Cling! Clang! so rang the jovial sound!
 Shouts of assent went circling round; 1610
 Pride of her sex is she!—cried some;
 Then were the noisy boasters dumb.

And now!—I could tear out my hair,
 Or dash my brains out in despair!—
 Me every scurvy knave may twit, 1615
 With stinging jest and taunting sneer!
 Like skulking debtor I must sit,
 And sweat each casual word to hear!
 And though I smash'd them one and all,—
 Yet them I could not liars call. 1620
 Who comes this way? who's sneaking here?
 If I mistake not, two draw near.
 If he be one, have at him;—well I wot
 Alive he shall not leave this spot!

FAUST and MEPHISTOPHELES enter.

FAUST. How from yon sacristy, athwart the night, 1625
 Its beams the ever-burning taper throws,
 While ever waning, fades the glimmering light,
 As gathering darkness doth around it close!
 So night-like gloom doth in my bosom reign.
 MEPH. I'm like a tom-cat in a thievish vein, 1631
 That up fire-ladders tall and steep,
 And round the walls doth slyly creep;
 Virtuous withal, I feel, with, I confess,
 A touch of thievish joy and wantonness.
 Thus through my limbs already burns 1635
 The glorious Walpurgis night!
 After tomorrow it returns,
 Then why one wakes, one knows aright!

FAUST. Meanwhile, the treasure I see glimmering there,

Will it ascend into the open air? 1640

MEPH. Ere long thou wilt proceed with pleasure,
To raise the casket with its treasure;
I took a peep, therein are stored,
Of lion-dollars a rich hoard.

FAUST. And not a trinket? not a ring? 1645
Wherewith my lovely girl to deck?

MEPH. I saw among them some such thing,
A string of pearls to grace her neck.

FAUST. 'Tis well! I'm always loath to go,
Without some gift my love to show. 1650

MEPH. Some pleasures gratis to enjoy,
Should surely cause you no annoy.
While bright with stars the heavens appear,
I'll sing a masterpiece of art:
A moral song shall charm her ear, 1655
More surely to beguile her heart.
[Sings to the guitar.]

Kathrina say,
Why lingering stay
At dawn of day
Before your lover's door? 1660
Maiden, beware,
Nor enter there,
Lest forth you fare,
A maiden never more.

Maiden take heed! 1665
Reck well my rede!
Is't done, the deed?
Good night, you poor, poor thing!
The spoiler's lies,
His arts despise, 1670
Nor yield your prize,
Without the marriage ring!

VAL. [steps forward]. Whom are you luring here? I'll give it you!

Accursed rat-catchers, your strains I'll end!
First, to the devil the guitar I'll send! 1675
Then to the devil with the singer too!

MEPH. The poor guitar! 'tis done for now.

VAL. Your skull shall follow next, I trow!

MEPH. [to FAUST]. Doctor, stand fast! your strength collect! 1680

Be prompt, and do as I direct.
Out with your whisk! keep close, I pray,
I'll parry! do you thrust away!

VAL. Then parry that!

MEPH. Why not?

VAL. That too!

MEPH. With ease!

VAL. The devil fights for you! 1685

Why how is this? my hand's already lamed!

MEPH. [to FAUST]. Thrust home!

VAL. [falls]. Alas!

MEPH. There! Now the lubber's tamed!
But quick, away! We must at once take wing;
A cry of murder strikes upon the ear; 1691
With the police I know my course to steer,
But with the blood-ban 'tis another thing.

MARTH. [at the window]. Without! without!

MARG. [at the window]. Quick, bring a light!

MARTH. [as above]. They rail and scuffle, scream and fight! 1696

PEOPLE. One lieth here already dead!

MARTH. [coming out]. Where are the murderers? are they fled?

MARG. [coming out]. Who lieth here?

PEOPLE. Thy mother's son.

MARG. Almighty God! I am undone! 1700

VAL. I'm dying—'tis a soon-told tale,
And sooner done the deed.

Why, women, do ye howl and wail?

To my last words give heed! [All gather round
him.]

My Gretchen, see! still young art thou, 1705

Art not discreet enough, I trow,

Thou dost thy matters ill;

Let this in confidence be said:

Since thou the path of shame dost tread,

Tread it with right good will! 1710

MARG. My brother! God! what can this mean?

VAL. Abstain,

Nor dare God's holy name profane!

What's done, alas, is done and past!

Matters will take their course at last; 1715

By stealth thou dost begin with one,

Others will follow him anon;

And when a dozen thee have known,

Thou'lt common be to all the town.

When infamy is newly born, 1720

In secret she is brought to light,

And the mysterious veil of night

O'er head and ears is drawn;

The loathsome birth men fain would slay;

But soon, full grown, she waxes bold, 1725

And though not fairer to behold,

With brazen front insults the day:

The more abhorrent to the sight,

The more she courts the day's pure light,

The time already I discern, 1730

When thee all honest folk will spurn,

And shun thy hated form to meet,
 As when a corpse infects the street.
 Thy heart will sink in blank despair,
 When they shall look thee in the face! 1735
 A golden chain no more thou'lt wear!
 Nor near the altar take in church thy place!
 In fair lace collar simply dight
 Thou'lt dance no more with spirits light!
 In darksome corners thou wilt hide, 1740
 Where beggars vile and cripples hide,
 And e'en though God thy crime forgive,
 On earth, a thing accursed, thou'lt live!
 MARTH. Your parting soul to God commend!
 Your dying breath in slander will you spend? 1745
 VAL. Could I but reach thy wither'd frame,
 Thou wretched beldame, void of shame!
 Full measure I might hope to win
 Of pardon then for every sin.
 MARG. Brother! what agonizing pain! 1750
 VAL. I tell thee, from vain tears abstain!
 'Twas thy dishonor pierced my heart,
 Thy fall the fatal death-stab gave.
 Through the death-sleep I now depart 1754
 To God, a soldier true and brave. [Dies.]

CATHEDRAL

Service, organ, and anthem

MARGARET amongst a number of people. EVIL-
 SPIRIT behind MARGARET.

EVIL-SPIRIT. How different, Gretchen, was it once with thee,
 When thou, still full of innocence,
 Here to the altar camest,
 And from the small and well-conn'd book
 Didst lisp thy prayer, 1760
 Half childish sport,
 Half God in thy young heart!
 Gretchen!
 What thoughts are thine?
 What deed of shame 1765
 Lurks in thy sinful heart?
 Is thy prayer utter'd for thy mother's soul,
 Who into long, long torment slept through thee?
 Whose blood is on thy threshold?
 —And stirs there not already 'neath thy heart 1770
 Another quick'ning pulse, that even now
 Tortures itself and thee
 With its foreboding presence?
 MARG. Woe! Woe!
 Oh could I free me from the thoughts 1775

That hither, thither, crowd upon my brain,
 Against my will!

CHOR. *Dies iræ, dies illa,
 Solvet sæclum in favilla.*²

The organ sounds.

EVIL-SPIRIT. Grim horror seizes thee! 1780
 The trumpet sounds!
 The graves are shaken!

And thy heart
 From ashy rest
 For torturing flames 1785
 Anew created,
 Trembles into life!

MARG. Would I were hence!
 It is as if the organ
 Choked my breath, 1790
 As if the choir
 Melted my inmost heart!

CHOR. *Judex ergo cum sedebit,
 Quidquid latet adparebit,
 Nil inultum remanebit.* 1795

MARG. I feel oppressed!
 The pillars of the wall
 Imprison me!
 The vaulted roof
 Weighs down upon me!—air! 1800

EVIL-SPIRIT. Wouldst hide thee? sin and shame Remain not hidden!
 Air! light!
 Woe's thee!

CHOR. *Quid sum miser tunc dicturus?
 Quem patronum rogaturus!
 Cum vix justus sit securus.* 1805

EVIL-SPIRIT. The glorified their faces turn Away from thee!
 Shudder the pure to reach 1810
 Their hands to thee!
 Woe!

CHOR. Quid sum miser tunc dicturus—
 MARG. Neighbor! your smelling bottle!
 [She swoons away.]

A GLOOMY DAY

A plain

FAUST and MEPHISTOPHELES enter.

FAUST. In misery! despairing! long wandering pitifully on the face of the earth and now imprisoned! This gentle hapless creature, immured in the dungeon as a malefactor and reserved for

² The ominous church hymn of the Day of Doom, by Thomas of Celano, "Day of wrath, that dreadful day."

horrid tortures! That it should come to this! To this!—Perfidious, worthless spirit, and this thou hast concealed from me!—Stand, aye, stand! roll in malicious rage thy fiendish eyes! Stand and brave me with thine insupportable presence! Imprisoned! In hopeless misery! Delivered over to the power of evil spirits and the judgment of unpitying humanity!—And me, the while, thou wert lulling with tasteless dissipations, concealing from me her growing anguish, and leaving her to perish without help! 1829

MEPH. She is not the first.

FAUST. Hound! Execrable monster!—Back with him, oh thou infinite spirit! back with the reptile into his dog's shape, in which it was his wont to scamper before me at eventide, to roll before the feet of the harmless wanderer, and to fasten on his shoulders when he fell! Change him again into his favorite shape, that he may crouch on his belly before me in the dust, whilst I spurn him with my foot, the reprobate!—Not the first!—Woe! Woe! By no human soul is it conceivable, that more than one human creature has ever sunk into a depth of wretchedness like this, or that the first in her writhing death-agony should not have atoned in the sight of all-pardoning Heaven for the guilt of all the rest! The misery of this one pierces me to the very marrow, and harrows up my soul; thou art grinning calmly over the doom of thousands! 1848

MEPH. Now we are once again at our wit's end, just where the reason of you mortals snaps! Why dost thou seek our fellowship, if thou canst not go through with it? Wilt fly, and art not proof against dizziness? Did we force ourselves on thee, or thou on us?

FAUST. Cease thus to gnash thy ravenous fangs at me! I loathe thee!—Great and glorious spirit, thou who didst vouchsafe to reveal thyself unto me, thou who dost know my very heart and soul, why hast thou linked me with this base associate, who feeds on mischief and revels in destruction?

MEPH. Hast done? 1861

FAUST. Save her!—or woe to thee! The direst of curses on thee for thousands of years!

MEPH. I cannot loose the bands of the avenger, nor withdraw his bolts.—Save her!—Who was it plunged her into perdition? I or thou? [FAUST looks wildly around.]

MEPH. Would'st grasp the thunder? Well for you, poor mortals, that 'tis not yours to wield! To smite to atoms the being however innocent, who obstructs his path, such is the tyrant's fashion of relieving himself in difficulties! 1872

FAUST. Convey me thither! She shall be free!

MEPH. And the danger to which thou dost expose thyself? Know, the guilt of blood, shed by thy hand, lies yet upon the town. Over the place where fell the murdered one, avenging spirits hover and watch for the returning murderer.

FAUST. This too from thee? The death and downfall of a world be on thee, monster! Conduct me thither, I say, and set her free! 1881

MEPH. I will conduct thee. And what I can do,—hear! Have I all power in heaven and upon earth? I'll cloud the senses of the warder,—do thou possess thyself of the keys and lead her forth with human hand! I will keep watch! The magic steeds are waiting, I bear thee off. Thus much is in my power.

FAUST. Up and away!

NIGHT

Open country

FAUST and MEPHISTOPHELES rushing along on black horses.

FAUST. What weave they yonder round the Ravenstone? 1891

MEPH. I know not what they shape and brew.

FAUST. They're soaring, swooping, bending, stooping.

MEPH. A witches' pack.

FAUST. They charm, they strew.

MEPH. On! On!

DUNGEON

FAUST [with a bunch of keys and a lamp before a small iron door]. A fear unwonted o'er my spirit falls;

Man's concentrated woe o'erwhelms me here! She dwells immur'd within these dripping walls; Her only trespass a delusion dear!

Thou lingerest at the fatal door? 1900

Thou dread'st to see her face once more?

On! While thou dalliest, draws her death-hour near.

He seizes the lock.

MARG. [singing within].

My mother, the harlot,

She took me and slew!

My father, the scoundrel,

Hath eaten me too!

My sweet little sister

1905

Hath all my bones laid,
Where soft breezes whisper
All in the cool shade! 1910
Then became I a wood-bird, and sang on the spray,
Fly away! little bird, fly away! fly away! ³
FAUST [opening the lock]. Ah! she forebodes not that her lover's near,
The clanking chains, the rustling straw, to hear.

He enters.

MARG. [hiding her face in the bed of straw].
Woe! woe! they come! oh bitter 'tis to die! 1915
FAUST [softly]. Hush! hush! be still! I come to set thee free?
MARG. [throwing herself at his feet]. If thou art human, feel my misery!
FAUST. Thou wilt awake the jailor with thy cry!

He grasps the chains to unlock them.

MARG. [on her knees]. Who, headsman, unto thee this power
O'er me could give? 1920
Thou com'st for me at midnight-hour.
Be merciful, and let me live!
Is morrow's dawn not time enough? [*She stands
up.*]
I'm still so young, so young—
And must so early die! 1925
Fair was I too, and that was my undoing.
My love is now afar, he then was nigh;
Torn lies the garland, the fair blossoms strew'd.
Nay, seize me not with hand so rude!
Spare me! What harm have I e'er done to thee?
Oh let me not in vain implore! 1931
I ne'er have seen thee in my life before!
FAUST. Can I endure this bitter agony?
MARG. I now am at thy mercy quite.
Let me my babe but suckle once again! 1935
I fondled it the live-long night;
They took it from me but to give me pain,
And now, they say that I my child have slain.
Gladness I ne'er again shall know.
Then they sing songs about me,—'tis wicked of the throng— 1940
An ancient ballad endeth so;
Who bade them thus apply the song?
FAUST [throwing himself on the ground]. A lover at thy feet bends low,
To loose the bonds of wretchedness and woe.

MARG. [throws herself beside him]. Oh, let us kneel and move the saints by prayer! 1945
Look! look! yon stairs below,
Under the threshold there,
Hell's flames are all aglow!
Beneath the floor,
The devils roar! 1950
FAUST [aloud]. Gretchen! Gretchen!
MARG. [listening]. That was my lov'd one's voice! [She springs up, the chains fall off.]
Where is he? I heard him calling me.
Free am I! There's none shall hinder me.
To his neck will I fly, 1955
On his bosom will lie!
Gretchen, he called!—On yon threshold he stood;
Amidst all the howling of hell's fiery flood,
The scoff and the scorn of its devilish crew,
The tones of his voice, sweet and loving, I knew.
FAUST. 'Tis I! 1961
MARG. 'Tis thou! O say so once more again!
[Embracing him.]
'Tis he! 'Tis he! where's now the torturing pain?
Where are the fetters? where the dungeon's gloom?
'Tis thou! To save me thou art comest! 1965
And I am sav'd!—
Already now the street I see
Where the first time I caught a glimpse of thee.
There too the pleasant garden shade,
Where I and Martha for thy coming stay'd. 1970
FAUST [endeavoring to lead her away]. Come!
come away!
MARG. Oh do not haste!
I love to linger where thou stayest. [*Caressing
him.*]
FAUST. Ah haste! For if thou still delayest,
Our lingering we shall both deplore.
MARG. How, dearest? canst thou kiss no more!
So short a time away from me, and yet, 1976
To kiss thou couldst so soon forget!
Why on thy neck so anxious do I feel—
When formerly a perfect heaven of bliss
From thy dear looks and words would o'er me steal? 1980
As thou wouldst stifle me thou then didst kiss!—
Kiss me!
Or I'll kiss thee! [She embraces him.]
Woe! woe! Thy lips are cold,—
Are dumb! 1985
Thy love where hast thou left?

³ A song from the well-known German folktale of "The Juniper Tree" (No. 49 of the Grimm Collection).

Who hath me of thy love bereft? [She turns away from him.]

FAUST. Come! Follow me, my dearest love, be bold!

I'll cherish thee with ardor thousand-fold;

I but entreat thee now to follow me! 1990

MARG. [turning towards him]. And art thou he? and art thou really he?

FAUST. 'Tis I! Oh come!

MARG. Thou wilt strike off my chain,
And thou wilt take me to thine arms again.
How comes it that thou dost not shrink from me?— 1995

And dost thou know, love, whom thou wouldst set free?

FAUST. Come! come! already night begins to wane.

MARG. I sent my mother to her grave,
I drown'd my child beneath the wave.
Was it not given to thee and me—thee too? 2000
'Tis thou thyself! I scarce believe it yet.
Give me thy hand! It is no dream! 'Tis true!
Thine own dear hand!—But how is this? 'Tis wet!

Quick, wipe it off! Meseems that yet
There's blood thereon. 2005

Ah God! what hast thou done?

Put up thy sword,

I beg of thee!

FAUST. Oh, dearest, let the past forgotten be!
Death is in every word. 2010

MARG. No, thou must linger here in sorrow!
The graves I will describe to thee,
And thou to them must see
Tomorrow:

The best place give to my mother, 2015
Close at her side my brother,
Me at some distance lay—
But not too far away!

And the little one place on my right breast.
Nobody else will near me lie! 2020

To nestle beside thee so lovingly,
That was a rapture, gracious and sweet!
A rapture I never again shall prove;
Methinks I would force myself on thee, love,
And thou dost spurn me, and back retreat— 2025
Yet 'tis thyself, thy fond kind looks I see.

FAUST. If thou dost feel 'tis I, then come with me!

MARG. What, there? without?

FAUST. Yes, forth in the free air.

MARG. Aye, if the grave's without,—if death lurk there! 2030

Hence to the everlasting resting-place,
And not one step beyond!—Thou'rt leaving me?
Oh Henry! would that I could go with thee!

FAUST. Thou canst! But will it! Open stands the door.

MARG. I dare not go! I've naught to hope for more! 2035

What boots it to escape? They lurk for me!

'Tis wretched to beg, as I must do,

And with an evil conscience thereto!

'Tis wretched, in foreign lands to stray;

And me they will catch, do what I may! 2040

FAUST. With thee will I abide.

MARG. Quick! Quick!

Save thy poor child!

Keep to the path

The brook along, 2045

Over the bridge

To the wood beyond,

To the left, where the plank is,

In the pond.

Seize it at once! 2050

It fain would rise,

It struggles still!

Save it. Oh save!

FAUST. Dear Gretchen, more collected be!
One little step, and thou art free! 2055

MARG. Were we but only past the hill!

There sits my mother upon a stone—

My brain, alas, is cold with dread!—

There sits my mother upon a stone,

And to and fro she shakes her head; 2060

She winks not, she nods not, her head it droops
sore;

She slept so long, she waked no more;

She slept, that we might taste of bliss:

Ah! those were happy times, I wis!

FAUST. Since here avails nor argument nor prayer, 2065

Thee hence by force I needs must bear.

MARG. Loose me! I will not suffer violence!

With murderous hand hold not so fast!

I have done all to please thee in the past! 2069

FAUST. Day dawns! My love! My love!

MARG. Yes! day draws near,

The day of judgment too will soon appear!

It should have been my bridal! No one tell,

That thy poor Gretchen thou hast known too well.

Woe to my garland!

Its bloom is o'er! 2075

Though not at the dance—

We shall meet once more.

The crowd doth gather, in silence it rolls;
 The squares, the streets,
 Scarce hold the throng. 2080
 The staff is broken,—the death-bell tolls,—
 They bind and seize me! I'm hurried along,
 To the seat of blood already I'm bound!
 Quivers each neck as the naked steel
 Quivers on mine the blow to deal— 2085
 The silence of the grave now broods around!
 FAUST. Would I had ne'er been born!
 MEPH. [appears without]. Up! or you're lost.
 Vain hesitation! Babbling, quaking!
 My steeds are shivering, 2090
 Morn is breaking.
 MARG. What from the floor ascendeth like a ghost?
 'Tis he! 'Tis he! Him from my presence chase!

What would he in this holy place?
 It is for me he cometh!
 FAUST. Thou shalt live! 2095
 MARG. Judgment of God! To thee my soul I give!
 MEPH. [to FAUST]. Come, come! With her I'll else abandon thee!
 MARG. Father, I'm thine! Do thou deliver me!
 Ye angels! Ye angelic hosts! descend,
 Encamp around to guard me and defend!— 2100
 Henry! I shudder now to look on thee!
 MEPH. She now is judged!
 VOICES [from above]. Is saved!
 MEPH. [to FAUST]. Come thou with me!
 [Vanishes with FAUST.
 VOICE [from within, dying away]. Henry! 2105
 Henry!

HEINRICH HEINE

Ein Fichtenbaum Steht Einsam

A pine tree standeth lonely
 In the North on an upland bare;
 It standeth whitely shrouded
 With snow, and sleepeth there.

It dreameth of a Palm Tree
 Which far in the East alone,
 In mournful silence standeth
 On its ridge of burning stone.

Der Mond Ist Aufgegangen

The moon is fully risen,
 And shineth o'er the sea;
 And I embrace my darling,
 Our hearts are swelling free.

In the arms of the lovely maiden
 I lie alone on the strand;—
 "What sounds in the breezes sighing?
 Why trembles your white hand?"

"That is no breeze's sighing,
 That is the mermaid's song,
 The singing of my sisters
 Whom the sea hath drowned so long."

Sag', Wo Ist Dein Schönes Liebchen

"Say, where is the maiden sweet,
 Whom you once so sweetly sung,
 When the flames of mighty heat
 Filled your heart and fired your tongue?"

Ah, those flames no longer burn,
 Cold and drear the heart that fed;
 And this book is but the urn
 Of the ashes of love dead.

The Grenadiers

For France two grenadiers held their way,
 Had prisoners been in Russia;
 And sorrowful men they were, when they
 The frontier reached of Prussia.

5 For there they heard of a dire event,— 5
 How the world 'gainst France had risen, her
Grande armée had shattered and shent,
 And taken her Emperor prisoner.

They mingled their tears, these two grenadiers, 10
 To the sad tale ever returning; 10
 "Oh would," said one, "that my days were done!
 My old wounds, how they're burning!"

Heinrich Heine (1796-1856). The first three translations are by James Thomson; the fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and ninth, by Theodore Martin; the eighth by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow; the tenth by Lord Houghton.

"All's up!" said the other; "and sooner than not
I would die like you, never doubt me;
But a wife and child at home I've got, 15
And they must be starved without me!"

"Hang wife and child! It is something more,
And better far, that I pant for;
My Emperor prisoner! My Emperor!
Let them go beg what they want for! 20

"If I die just now, as 'tis like I may,
Then, comrade, this boon grant me,
Take my body with you to France away,
And in France's dear earth plant me.

"The Croix d'Honneur, with its crimson band,
On my heart see that you place it; 26
Then give me my rifle in my hand,
And my sword, around me brace it.

"So will I lie, and listen all ear,
Like a sentinel, low in my bed there, 30
Till the roar of the cannon some day I hear,
And the chargers' neigh and their tread there.

"Then I'll know 'tis my Emperor riding by;
The sabers flash high that attend him,
And out from my grave full-armed spring I, 35
The Emperor! to shield and defend him!"

Wenn Ich in Deine Augen Seh'

Whene'er I look into thine eyes,
Then every fear that haunts me flies;
But when I kiss thy mouth, oh then
I feel a giant's strength again.

Whene'er I couch me on thy breast,
I know what heaven is to the blest;
But when thou sayest, "I love thee!"
Then must I weep, and bitterly.

Loreley

I cannot tell what's coming o'er me,
That makes me so eerie and low:
An old-world legend before me,
Keeps rising, and will not go.

The air chills, day is declining, 5
And smoothly Rhine's waters run,
And the peaks of the mountains are shining
Aloft in the setting sun.

A maiden of wondrous seeming,
Most beautiful, sits up there, 10
Her jewels in gold are gleaming,
She combs out her golden hair.

With a comb of red gold she parts it,
And still as she combs it, she sings;
Her song pierces home to our hearts, it 15
Has tones of a sweetness that stings.

The boatman, he thrills as he hears it
Out there in his little skiff:
He sees not the reef as he nears it,
He only looks up to the cliff. 20

The waters will sweep, I am thinking,
O'er skiff, and o'er boatman ere long;
And this is, when daylight is sinking,
What Loreley did with her song.

Du Schönes Fischer-Mädchen

My bonnie blithe fisher-maiden,
Row in your boat to the strand;
Come here and sit down beside me,
And chat with me hand in hand.

Rest your dear little head on my bosom, 5
And be not so frightened, child;
Every day you trust without thinking
Yourself to the ocean wild.

My heart is quite like the ocean,
It has tempests, and ebb, and flow; 10
And fine pearls lie there a-many,
Down, down in its depths below.

The Sea Hath Its Pearls

The sea hath its pearls,
The heaven hath its stars;
But my heart, my heart,
My heart hath its love.

Great are the sea and the heaven; 5
Yet greater is my heart,
And fairer than pearls and stars
Flashes and beams my love.

Thou little, youthful maiden, 10
Come unto my great heart;
My heart, and the sea, and the heaven
Are melting away with love!

Du Bist Wie Eine Blume

Thou art even as a flower is,
 So gentle, and pure, and fair;
 I gaze on thee, and sadness
 Comes over my heart unaware.

I feel as though I should lay, sweet,
 My hands on thy head, with a prayer
 That God may keep thee alway, sweet,
 As gentle, and pure, and fair!

Lost Child—Enfant Perdu

In Freedom's War, of "Thirty Years" and more,
 A lonely outpost have I held—in vain!
 With no triumphant hope or prize in store,
 Without a thought to see my home again.

I watched both day and night: I could not sleep
 Like my well-tented comrades far behind,
 Though near enough to let their snoring keep
 A friend awake, if e'er to doze inclined.

And thus, when solitude my spirits shook,
 Or fear—for all but fools know fear sometimes,—
 To rouse myself and them, I piped and took
 A gay revenge in all my wanton rhymes.

Yes! there I stood, my musket always ready,
 And when some sneaking rascal showed his head,
 My eye was vigilant, my aim was steady,
 And gave his brains an extra dose of lead.

But war and justice have far different laws,
 And worthless acts are often done right well;
 The rascals' shots were better than their cause,
 And I was hit—and hit again, and fell!

That outpost was abandoned: while the one
 Lies in the dust, the rest in troops depart;
 Unconquered—I have done what could be done,
 With sword unbroken, and with broken heart.

Last Words

It was a depressed, an arrested time in Germany when I wrote the second volume of the Reisebilder,¹ and had it printed as I wrote. But before it appeared something was whispered about it; it was said that my book would awaken and encourage the cowed spirit of freedom, and that measures were being taken to suppress it. When such rumors were afloat, it was advisable to advance the book as quickly as possible, and to hurry it through the press. As it was necessary, too, that it should contain a certain number of leaves, to escape the requisitions of the estimable censorship, I followed the example of Benvenuto Cellini, who, in founding his Perseus, was short of bronze, and to fill up the mould threw into the molten metal all the tin plates he could lay his hands on. It was certainly easy to distinguish between the tin—especially the tin termination of the book—and the better bronze; anyone, however, who understands the craft will not betray the workman.

But as everything in this world is likely to turn up again, so it came to pass that, in this very volume, I found myself again in the same scrape, and I have been obliged to again throw some tin into the mould—let me hope that this renewed melting of baser metal will simply be attributed to the pressure of the times.

Alas! the whole book sprang from the pressure of the times, as well as the earlier writings of similar tendency. The more intimate friends of the writer, who are acquainted with his private circumstances, know well how little his own vanity forced him to the tribune, and how great were the sacrifices which he was obliged to make for every independent word which he has spoken since then and—if God will!—which he still means to speak. Now-a-days, a word is a deed whose consequences cannot be measured, and no one knows whether he may not in the end appear as witness to his words in blood.

For many years I have waited in vain for the words of those bold orators, who once in the meetings of the German Burschenschaft² so often claimed a hearing, who so often overwhelmed me with their rhetorical talent, and spoke a language spoken so oft before; they were then so forward in noise—they are now so backward in silence. How they then reviled the French and the foreign Babel, and the un-German frivolous betrayers of the Fatherland, who praised French-dom. That praise verified itself in the great week!³

Ah, the great week of Paris! The spirit of freedom, which was wafted thence over Germany, has certainly upset the night-lamps here and there, so that the red curtains of several thrones took fire, and golden crowns grew hot under blazing night-caps; but the old catch-polls, in whom the royal police trusted, are already bringing out the fire-buckets, and now scent around all the more suspiciously, and forge all the more firmly their secret chains, and I mark well that a still thicker prison vault is being invisibly arched over the German people.

Poor imprisoned people! be not cast down in your need. Oh, that I could speak catapults! Oh, that I could shoot falarica from my heart!

The distinguished ice-rind of reserve melts from my heart, a strange sorrow steals over me—is it love, and love for the German people? Or is it sickness?—my soul quivers and my eyes burn, and that is an unfortunate occurrence for a writer, who should command his material, and remain charmingly objective, as the art school requires, and as Goethe has done—he has grown to be eighty years old in so doing, and a minister, and portly—poor German people! that is thy greatest man!

I still have a few octavo pages to fill, and I will therefore tell a story—it has been floating in my head since yesterday—a story from the life of Charles the Fifth.⁴ But it is now a long time since I heard it, and I no longer remember its details exactly. Such things are easily forgotten, if one does not receive a regular salary for reading them every half-year from his lecture books. But what does it matter if places and dates are forgotten, so long as one holds their significance, their moral meaning,³⁰ in his memory. It is this which stirs my soul and moves me even to tears. I fear I am getting ill.

The poor emperor was taken prisoner by his enemies, and lay in strict imprisonment. I believe it was in Tyrol. There he sat in solitary sorrow, forsaken by all his knights and courtiers, and no one came to his help. I know not if he had even in those days that cheese-yellow complexion with which Holbein painted him. But the misanthropic under-lip certainly protruded, even more than than in his portraits. He must have despised the people who fawned around him in the sunshine of prosperity, and who left him alone in his bitter need. Suddenly the prison door opened, and there entered a man wrapped in a cloak, and as he cast it aside, the emperor recognised his trusty Kunz von der Rosen, the court-fool. One brought him consolation and counsel—and it was the court-fool.

My German Fatherland! dear German people! I am thy Kunz von der Rosen. The man whose real⁵⁰ office was pastime, and who should only make thee merry in happy days, forces his way into thy prison, in time of need; here, beneath my mantle, I bring thee thy strong sceptre and the beautiful crown—dost thou not remember me, my emperor? If I cannot free thee, I will at least console thee, and thou shalt have some one by thee who will talk with thee about thy most pressing oppressions, and will speak courage to thee, and who loves thee, and whose best jokes and best blood are ever at thy service. For thou, my people, art the true emperor, the true lord of the land—thy will is sovereign and more legitimate than that purple Tel est notre plaisir,⁵ which grounds itself upon divine right, without any better guarantee than the quackery of shaven jugglers—thy will, my people, is the only righteous source of all power. Even though thou liest down there in fetters, thy good right will arise in the end, the day of freedom draws near, a new time begins—my emperor, the night is over, and the dawn shines outside.

“Kunz von der Rosen, my Fool, thou errest. Thou hast perhaps mistaken a bright axe for the sun, and the dawn is nothing but blood.”

“No, my Emperor, it is the sun, though it rises in the west—for six thousand years men have always seen it rise in the east—it is high time that it for once made a change in its course.”

“Kunz von der Rosen, my Fool, thou hast lost the bells from thy red cap, and it now has such a strange look, that red cap!”

“Ah, my Emperor, I have shaken my head in such mad earnest over your distress that the fool’s bell fell from my cap; but it is none the worse for that!”

“Kunz von der Rosen, my Fool, what is that breaking and cracking outside there?”

“Hush! it is the saw and the carpenter’s axe; the doors of your prison will soon be broken in, and you will be free, my Emperor!”

“Am I then really Emperor? Alas! it is only the Fool who tells me so!”

“Oh, do not sigh, my dear lord, it is the air of the dungeon which so dispirits you; when you have once regained your power, you will feel the bold imperial blood in your veins, and you will be proud as an emperor, and arrogant, and gracious, and unjust, and smiling, and ungrateful as princes are.”

“Kunz von der Rosen, my Fool, when I am free again, what wilt thou be doing?”

“I shall sew new bells on my cap.”

“And how shall I reward thy fidelity?”

“Ah! dear master—do not let me be put to death!”

⁴ Actually the Emperor in this legend was Maximilian.

FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE

Thus Spake ZarathustraBefore Sunrise

O heaven above me, thou pure, thou deep heaven!
Thou abyss of light! Gazing on thee, I tremble with divine desires.

Up to thy height to toss myself—that is my depth!
In thy purity to hide myself—that is mine innocence!

The God veileth his beauty: thus hidest thou thy stars.
Thou speakest not: thus proclaimest thou thy wisdom unto me.

Mute o'er the raging sea hast thou risen for me to-day;
thy love and thy modesty make a revelation unto my raging soul.

In that thou camest unto me beautiful, veiled in thy beauty, in that thou spakest unto me mutely, obvious in thy wisdom:

Oh, how could I fail to divine all the modesty of thy soul!
Before the sun didst thou come unto me—the loneliest one.

We have been friends from the beginning: to us are grief, gruesomeness, and ground common; even the sun is common to us.

We do not speak to each other, because we know too much—: we keep silent to each other, we smile our knowledge to each other.

Art thou not the light of my fire? Hast thou not the sister-soul of mine insight?

Together did we learn everything; together did we learn to ascend beyond ourselves, and to smile uncloudedly:—

Uncloudedly to smile down out of luminous eyes and out of miles of distance, when under us constraint and purpose and guilt steam like rain.

And wandered I alone, for what did my soul hunger by night and in labyrinthine paths? And climbed I mountains, whom did I ever seek, if not thee, upon mountains?

And all my wandering and mountain climbing: a necessity was it merely, and a makeshift of the unhandy one:—to fly only, wanteth mine entire will, to fly into thee!

And what have I hated more than passing clouds, and whatever tainteth thee? And mine own hatred have I even hated, because it tainted thee!

The passing clouds I detest—those stealthy cats of prey: they take from thee and me what is common to us—the vast unbounded Yea- and Amen-saying.

These mediators and mixers we detest—the passing clouds: those half-and-half ones, that have neither learned to bless nor to curse from the heart.

Rather will I sit in a tub under a closed heaven, rather will I sit in the abyss without heaven, than see thee, thou luminous heaven, tainted with passing clouds!

And oft have I longed to pin them fast with the jagged gold-wires of lightning, that I might, like the thunder, beat the drum upon their kettlebellies:—

—An angry drummer, because they rob me of thy Yea and Amen!—thou heaven above me, thou pure, thou luminous heaven! Thou abyss of light!—because they rob thee of my Yea and Amen.

For rather will I have noise and thunders and tempest-blasts, than this discreet, doubting cat-repose; and also amongst men do I hate most of all the soft-treaders, and half-and-half ones, and the doubting, hesitating, passing clouds.

And “he who cannot bless shall learn to curse!”—this clear teaching dropt unto me from the clear heaven; this star standeth in my heaven even in dark nights.

I, however, am a blesser and a Yea-sayer, if thou be but around me, thou pure, thou luminous heaven! Thou abyss of light!—into all abysses do I then carry my beneficent Yea-saying.

A blesser have I become and a Yea-sayer: and therefore strove I long and was a striver, that I might one day get my hands free for blessing.

This, however, is my blessing: to stand above everything as its own heaven, its round roof, its azure bell and eternal security: and blessed is he who thus blesseth!

For all things are baptized at the font of eternity, and beyond good and evil; good and evil themselves, however, are but fugitive shadows and damp afflictions and passing clouds.

Verily, it is a blessing and not a blasphemy when I teach that “above all things there standeth the heaven of chance, the heaven of innocence, the heaven of hazard, the heaven of wantonness.”

“Of Hazard”—that is the oldest nobility in the world; that gave I back to all things; I emancipated them from bondage under purpose.

This freedom and celestial serenity did I put like an azure bell above all things, when I taught that over them and through them, no "eternal Will"—willeth.

This wantonness and folly did I put in place of that Will, when I taught that "In everything there is one thing impossible—rationality!"

A little reason, to be sure, a germ of wisdom scattered from star to star—this heaven is mixed in all things: for the sake of folly, wisdom is mixed in all things!

A little wisdom is indeed possible; but this blessed security have I found in all things, that they prefer—to dance on the feet of chance.

O heaven above me! thou pure, thou lofty heaven! This is now thy purity unto me, that there is no eternal reason-spider and reason-cobweb:—

—That thou art to me a dancing-floor for divine chances, that thou art to me a table of the Gods, for divine dice and dice-players!—

But thou blushest? Have I spoken unspeakable things? Have I abused, when I meant to bless thee?

Or is it the shame of being two of us that maketh thee blush!—Dost thou bid me go and be silent, because now—day cometh?

The world is deep—: and deeper than e'er the day could read. Not everything may be uttered in presence of day. But day cometh: so let us part!

O heaven above me, thou modest one! thou glowing one! O thou, my happiness before sunrise! The day cometh: so let us part!—

Thus spake Zarathustra.

Old and New Tables

When the water hath planks, when gangways and railings o'erspan the stream, verily, he is not believed who then saith: "All is in flux."

But even the simpletons contradict him. "What?" say the simpletons, "all in flux? Planks and railings are still over the stream!"

"Over the stream all is stable, all the values of things, the bridges and bearings, all 'good' and 'evil': these are all stable!" —

Cometh, however, the hard winter, the stream-tamer, then learn even the wittiest distrust, and verily, not only the simpletons then say: "Should not everything—stand still?"

"Fundamentally standeth everything still"—that is an appropriate winter doctrine, good cheer for an unproductive period, a great comfort for winter-sleepers and fireside-loungers.

"Fundamentally standeth everything still"—: but contrary thereto, preacheth the thawing wind!

The thawing wind, a bullock, which is no ploughing bullock—a furious bullock, a destroyer, which with angry horns breaketh the ice! The ice however—breaketh gangways!

O my brethren, is not everything at present in flux? Have not all railings and gangways fallen into the water? Who would still hold on to "good" and "evil"?

"Woe to us! Hail to us! The thawing wind bloweth!"—Thus preach, my brethren, through all the streets!

There is an old illusion—it is called good and evil. Around soothsayers and astrologers hath hitherto revolved the orbit of this illusion.

Once did one believe in soothsayers and astrologers; and therefore did one believe, "Everything is fate: thou shalt, for thou must!"

Then again did one distrust all soothsayers and astrologers; and therefore did one believe, "Everything is freedom: thou canst, for thou willest!"

O my brethren, concerning the stars and the future there hath hitherto been only illusion, and not knowledge; and therefore concerning good and evil there hath hitherto been only illusion and not knowledge!

"Thou shalt not rob! Thou shalt not slay!"—such precepts were once called holy; before them did one bow the knee and the head, and took off one's shoes.

But I ask you: Where have there ever been better robbers and slayers in the world than such holy precepts?

Is there not even in all life—robbing and slaying? And for such precepts to be called holy, was not truth itself thereby—slain?

—Or was it a sermon of death that called holy what contradicted and dissuaded from life?—O my brethren, break up, break up for me the old tables!

It is my sympathy with all the past that I see it is abandoned,— —Abandoned to the favor, the spirit and the madness of every generation that cometh, and re-interpreteth all that hath been as its bridge!

A great potentate might arise, an artful prodigy, who with approval and disapproval could strain and constrain all the past, until it became for him a bridge, a harbinger, a herald, and a cock-crowing.

This however is the other danger, and mine other sympathy:—he who is of the populace, his thoughts go back to his grandfather,—with his grandfather, however, doth time cease.

Thus is all the past abandoned: for it might some day happen for the populace to become master, and drown all time in shallow waters.

Therefore, O my brethren, a new nobility is needed, which shall be the adversary of all populace and potentate rule, and shall inscribe anew the word "noble" on new tables.

For many noble ones are needed, and many kinds of noble ones, for a new nobility! Or, as I once said in parable: "That is just divinity, that there are Gods, but no God!"

SCENE:—Sitting-room in Helmer's House (a flat) in Christiania.

TIME:—The Present Day; Christmastide.

The action takes place on three consecutive days.

ACT I

A room comfortably and tastefully, but not expensively, furnished. In the background, to the right, a door leads to the hall; to the left, another door leads to Helmer's study. Between the two doors a pianoforte. In the middle of the left wall, a door, and nearer the front a window. Near the window a round table with armchairs and a small sofa. In the right wall, somewhat to the back, a door; and against the same wall, farther forward, a porcelain stove; in front of it a couple of armchairs and a rocking-chair. Between the stove and the side door a small table. Engravings on the walls. A whatnot with china and bric-à-brac. A small book-case of showily bound books. Carpet. A fire in the stove. A winter day.
A bell rings in the hall outside. Presently the outer door is heard to open. Then NORA enters, humming contentedly. She is in out-door dress, and carries several parcels, which she lays on the right-hand table. She leaves the door into the hall open behind her, and a Porter is seen outside, carrying a Christmas-tree and a basket, which he gives to the maid-servant who has opened the door.

NORA. Hide the Christmas-tree carefully, Ellen; ¹⁰ the children mustn't see it before this evening, when it's lighted up. [To the Porter, taking out her purse.] How much?

PORTER. Fifty öre.¹

NORA. There's a crown. No, keep the change. [The Porter thanks her and goes. NORA shuts the door. She continues smiling in quiet glee as she takes off her walking things. Then she takes from her pocket a bag of macaroons, and eats one or two. As she does so, she goes on tip-toe to her husband's door and listens.]

NORA. Yes; he is at home. [She begins humming again, going to the table on the right.]

HELM. [in his room.] Is that my lark twittering there?

NORA [busy opening some of her parcels.] Yes, it is.

HELM. Is it the squirrel skipping about?

NORA. Yes!

HELM. When did the squirrel get home?

³⁰ NORA. Just this minute. [Hides the bag of macaroons in her pocket and wipes her mouth.] Come here, Torvald, and see what I've bought.

Henrik Ibsen, A Doll's House. Translated by William Archer. Henrik Ibsen (1828-1906), born in a village of southern Norway, had practical experience in stage production and play revision at Bergen. After achieving success he spent much of his life in Germany and Italy, though in his later years he returned to Norway.

¹ Half a Norwegian crown, or about thirteen cents.

HELM. Don't disturb me. [A little later he opens the door and looks in, pen in hand.] "Bought," did you say? What! all that? Has my little spendthrift been making the money fly again?

NORA. Why, Torvald, surely we can afford to launch out a little now! It's the first Christmas we haven't had to pinch.

HELM. Come, come; we can't afford to squander money.

NORA. Oh, yes, Torvald, do let us squander a little—just the least little bit, won't you? You know you'll soon be earning heaps of money.

HELM. Yes, from New Year's Day. But there's a whole quarter before my first salary is due.

NORA. Never mind; we can borrow in the meantime.

HELM. Nora! [He goes up to her and takes her playfully by the ear.] Thoughtless as ever! Supposing I borrowed a thousand crowns today, and you spent it during Christmas week, and that on New Year's Eve a tile blew off the roof and knocked my brains out—

NORA [laying her hand on his mouth]. Hush! How can you talk so horribly?

HELM. But, supposing it were to happen—what then?

NORA. If anything so dreadful happened, I shouldn't care whether I was in debt or not.

HELM. But what about the creditors?

NORA. They! Who cares for them? They're only 30 strangers.

HELM. Nora, Nora! What a woman you are! But seriously, Nora, you know my ideas on these points. No debts! No credit! Home-life ceases to be free and beautiful as soon as it is founded on borrowing and debt. We two have held out bravely till now, and we won't give in at the last.

NORA [going to the fireplace]. Very well—as you like, Torvald.

HELM. [following her]. Come, come; my little lark mustn't let her wings droop like that. What? Is the squirrel pouting there? [Takes out his purse.] Nora, what do you think I've got here?

NORA [turning round quickly]. Money!

HELM. There! [Gives her some notes.] Of course I know all sorts of things are wanted at Christmas.

NORA [counting]. Ten, twenty, thirty, forty. Oh! thank you, thank you, Torvald. This will go a long way.

HELM. I should hope so.

NORA. Yes, indeed, a long way! But come here, and see all I've been buying. And so cheap! Look, here is a new suit for Ivar, and a little sword. Here are a horse and a trumpet for Bob. And here are a doll and a cradle for Emmy. They're only common; but she'll soon pull them all to pieces. And dresses and neckties for the servants; only I should have got something better for dear old Anna.

HELM. And what's in that other parcel?

NORA [crying out]. No, Torvald, you're not to see that until this evening.

HELM. Oh! ah! But now tell me, you little rogue, what have you got for yourself?

NORA. For myself? Oh, I don't want anything.

HELM. Nonsense. Just tell me something sensible you would like to have.

NORA. No. Really I want nothing. . . . Well, listen, Torvald—

HELM. Well?

NORA [playing with his coat buttons, without looking him in the face]. If you really want to give me something, you might, you know, you might—

HELM. Well, well? Out with it!

NORA [quickly]. You might give me money, Torvald. Only just what you think you can spare; then I can buy myself something with it later.

HELM. But, Nora—

NORA. Oh, please do, dear Torvald, please do! Then I would hang the money in lovely gilt paper on the Christmas-tree. Wouldn't that be fun?

HELM. What do they call the birds that are always making the money fly?

NORA. Yes, I know—spendthrifts, of course. But please do as I say, Torvald. Then I shall have time to think what I want most. Isn't that very sensible, now?

HELM. [smiling]. Certainly; that is to say, if you really kept the money I gave you, and really bought yourself something with it. But it all goes in housekeeping, and for all sorts of useless things, and then I have to find more.

NORA. But, Torvald—

HELM. Can you deny it, Nora dear? [He puts his arm round her.] It's a sweet little lark; but it gets through a lot of money. No one would believe how much it costs a man to keep such a little bird as you.

NORA. For shame! how can you say so? Why, I save as much as ever I can.

HELM. [laughing]. Very true—as much as you can—but you can't.

NORA [hums and smiles in quiet satisfaction]. 50 H'm!—you should just know, Torvald, what expenses we larks and squirrels have.

HELM. You're a strange little being! Just like your father—always eager to get hold of money; but the moment you have it, it seems to slip through your fingers; you never know what becomes of it. Well, one must take you as you are. It's in the blood. Yes, Nora, that sort of thing is inherited.

NORA. I wish I had inherited many of my father's qualities.

HELM. And I don't wish you anything but just what you are—my own, sweet little song-bird. But, I say—it strikes me—you look so, so—what shall I call it?—so suspicious today—

NORA. Do I?

HELM. You do, indeed. Look me full in the face.

NORA [looking at him]. Well?

HELM. [threatening with his finger]. Hasn't the little sweet-tooth been breaking the rules today?

NORA. No; how can you think of such a thing!

HELM. Didn't she just look in at the confectioner's?

NORA. No, Torvald, really—

HELM. Not to sip a little jelly?

NORA. No; certainly not.

HELM. Hasn't she even nibbled a macaroon or two?

NORA. No, Torvald, indeed, indeed!

HELM. Well, well, well; of course I'm only joking.

NORA [goes to the table on the right]. I shouldn't think of doing what you disapprove of.

HELM. No, I'm sure of that; and, besides, you've given me your word. [Going toward her]. Well, keep your little Christmas secrets to yourself, Nora darling. The Christmas-tree will bring them all to light, I daresay.

NORA. Have you remembered to ask Doctor Rank?

HELM. No. But it's not necessary; he'll come as a matter of course. Besides, I shall invite him when he looks in today. I've ordered some capital wine. Nora, you can't think how I look forward to this evening!

NORA. And I too. How the children will enjoy themselves, Torvald!

HELM. Ah! it's glorious to feel that one has an assured position and ample means. Isn't it delightful to think of?

NORA. Oh, it's wonderful!

HELM. Do you remember last Christmas? For three whole weeks beforehand you shut yourself up till long past midnight to make flowers for the Christmas-tree, and all sorts of other marvels that were to have astonished us. I was never so bored in my life.

NORA. I did not bore myself at all.

HELM. [smiling]. And it came to so little after all, Nora.

NORA. Oh! are you going to tease me about that again? How could I help the cat getting in and spoiling it all?

HELM. To be sure you couldn't, my poor little Nora. You did your best to amuse us all, and that's the main thing. But, all the same, it's a good thing the hard times are over.

NORA. Oh, isn't it wonderful!

HELM. Now, I needn't sit here boring myself all alone; and you needn't tire your dear eyes and your delicate little fingers—

NORA [clapping her hands]. No, I needn't, need I, Torvald? Oh! it's wonderful to think of! [Takes his arm]. And now I'll tell you how I think we ought to manage, Torvald. As soon as Christmas is over— [The hall-door bell rings]. Oh, there's a ring! [Arranging the room]. That's somebody to call. How vexing!

HELM. I am "not at home" to callers; remember that.

ELLEN [in the doorway]. A lady to see you, ma'am.

NORA. Show her in.

ELLEN [to HELMER]. And the Doctor is just come, sir.

HELM. Has he gone into my study?

ELLEN. Yes, sir.

HELMER goes into his study. ELLEN ushers in MRS. LINDEN in traveling costume, and shuts the door behind her.

MRS. L. [timidly and hesitatingly]. How do you do, Nora?

NORA [doubtfully]. How do you do?

MRS. L. I daresay you don't recognize me?

NORA. No, I don't think—oh, yes!—I believe— [Effusively]. What! Christina! Is it really you?

MRS. L. Yes, really I!

NORA. Christina! and to think I didn't know you! But how could I— [More softly]. How changed you are, Christina!

MRS. L. Yes, no doubt. In nine or ten years—

NORA. Is it really so long since we met? Yes, so it is. Oh! the last eight years have been a happy time, I can tell you. And now you have come to town? All that long journey in mid-winter! How brave of you.

MRS. L. I arrived by this morning's steamer.

NORA. To keep Christmas, of course. Oh, how delightful! What fun we shall have! Take your things off. Aren't you frozen? [Helping her.] There, now we'll sit down here cozily by the fire. No, you take the arm-chair; I'll sit in this rocking-chair. [Seizes her hand.] Yes, now I can see the dear old face again. It was only at the first glance— But you're a little paler, Christina, and perhaps a little thinner.

MRS. L. And much, much older, Nora.

NORA. Yes, perhaps a little older—not much—ever so little. [She suddenly stops; seriously.] Oh! ²⁰ what a thoughtless wretch I am! Here I sit chattering on, and— Dear, dear Christina, can you forgive me?

MRS. L. What do you mean, Nora?

NORA [softly]. Poor Christina! I forgot, you are a widow?

MRS. L. Yes; my husband died three years ago.

NORA. I know, I know, I saw it in the papers. Oh! believe me, Christina, I did mean to write to you; but I kept putting it off, and something ²⁰ always came in the way.

MRS. L. I can quite understand that, Nora dear.

NORA. No, Christina; it was horrid of me. Oh, you poor darling! how much you must have gone through!—and he left you nothing?

MRS. L. Nothing.

NORA. And no children?

MRS. L. None.

NORA. Nothing, nothing at all?

MRS. L. Not even a sorrow or a longing to dwell ³⁰ upon.

NORA [looking at her incredulously]. My dear Christina, how is that possible?

MRS. L. [smiling sadly and stroking her hair]. Oh, it happens sometimes, Nora.

NORA. So utterly alone. How dreadful that must be! I have three of the loveliest children. I can't show them to you just now; they're out with their nurse. But now you must tell me everything.

MRS. L. No, no, I want you to tell me—

NORA. No, you must begin; I won't be egotistical today. Today, I will think of you only. Oh! I must tell you one thing; but perhaps you've heard of our great stroke of fortune?

MRS. L. No. What is it?

NORA. Only think! my husband has been made Manager of the Joint Stock Bank.

MRS. L. Your husband! Oh, how fortunate!

NORA. Yes, isn't it? A lawyer's position is so uncertain, you see, especially when he won't touch ³⁰ any business that's the least bit . . . shady, as of course Torvald won't; and in that I quite agree with him. Oh! you can imagine how glad we are.

He is to enter on his new position at the New Year, and then he will have a large salary, and percentages. In future we shall be able to live quite differently—just as we please, in fact. Oh, Christina, I feel so light and happy! It's splendid to have lots of money, and no need to worry about things, isn't it?

MRS. L. Yes; it must be delightful to have what you need.

NORA. No, not only what you need, but heaps of money—heaps!

MRS. L. [smiling]. Nora, Nora, haven't you learnt reason yet? In our schooldays you were a shocking little spendthrift!

NORA [quietly smiling]. Yes; Torvald says I am still. [Threatens with her finger.] But "Nora, Nora," is not so silly as you all think. Oh! I haven't had the chance to be much of a spendthrift. We have both had to work.

MRS. L. You too?

NORA. Yes, light fancy work; crochet, and embroidery, and things of that sort, [significantly] and other work too. You know, of course, that Torvald left the Government service when we were married. He had little chance of promotion, and of course he was required to make more money. But in the first year of our marriage he overworked himself terribly. He had to undertake all sorts of odd jobs, you know, and to work early and late. He couldn't stand it, and fell dangerously ill. Then the doctors declared he must go to the South.

MRS. L. Yes; you spent a whole year in Italy, didn't you?

NORA. We did. It wasn't easy to manage, I can tell you. It was just after Ivar's birth. But of course we had to go. Oh, it was a delicious journey! And it saved Torvald's life. But it cost a frightful lot of money, Christina.

MRS. L. So I should think.

⁴⁰ NORA. Twelve hundred dollars! Four thousand eight hundred crowns! Isn't that a lot of money?

MRS. L. How lucky you had the money to spend!

NORA. I must tell you we got it from father.

MRS. L. Ah, I see. He died just about that time, didn't he?

NORA. Yes, Christina, just then. And only think! I couldn't go and nurse him! I was expecting little Ivar's birth daily. And then I had my Torvald to attend to. Dear, kind old father! I never saw him again, Christina. Oh! that's the hardest thing I've had to bear since my marriage.

MRS. L. I know how fond you were of him. And then you went to Italy?

NORA. Yes; we had the money, and the doctors insisted. We started a month later.

MRS. L. And your husband returned completely cured?

NORA. Sound as a bell.

MRS. L. But—the doctor?

NORA. What about him?

MRS. L. I thought as I came in your servant announced the Doctor—

NORA. Oh, yes; Doctor Rank. But he doesn't come as a doctor. He's our best friend, and never lets a day pass without looking in. No, Torvald hasn't had an hour's illness since that time. And the children are so healthy and well, and so am I. [Jumps up and claps her hands.] Oh, Christina, Christina, it's so lovely to live and to be happy!—Oh! but it's really too horrid of me!—Here am I talking about nothing but my own concerns. [Sits down upon a footstool close to her and lays her arms on Christina's lap.] Oh! don't be angry with me!—Now just tell me, is it really true that you didn't love your husband? What made you take him?

MRS. L. My mother was then alive, bedridden and helpless; and I had my two younger brothers to think of. I thought it my duty to accept him.

NORA. Perhaps it was. I suppose he was rich then?

MRS. L. Very well off, I believe. But his business was uncertain. It fell to pieces at his death, and there was nothing left.

NORA. And then—?

MRS. L. Then I had to fight my way by keeping a shop, a little school, anything I could turn my hand to. The last three years have been one long struggle for me. But now it's over, Nora. My poor mother no longer needs me; she is at rest. And the boys are in business, and can look after themselves.

NORA. How free your life must feel!

MRS. L. No, Nora; only inexpressibly empty. No one to live for. [Stands up restlessly.] That is why I couldn't bear to stay any longer in that out-of-the-way corner. Here it must be easier to find something really worth doing—something to occupy one's thoughts. If I could only get some settled employment—some office-work.

NORA. But, Christina, that's so tiring, and you look worn out already. You should rather go to some watering-place and rest.

MRS. L. [going to the window]. I have no father to give me the money, Nora.

NORA [rising]. Oh! don't be vexed with me.

MRS. L. [going toward her]. My dear Nora, don't you be vexed with me. The worst of a position like mine is that it makes one bitter. You have no one to work for, yet you have to be always on the strain. You must live; and so you become selfish. When I heard of the happy change in your circumstances—can you believe it?—I rejoiced more on my own account than on yours.

NORA. How do you mean? Ah! I see. You mean Torvald could perhaps do something for you.

MRS. L. Yes; I thought so.

NORA. And so he shall, Christina. Just you leave it all to me. I shall lead up to it beautifully, and think of something pleasant to put him in a good humor! Oh! I should so love to do something for you.

MRS. L. How good of you, Nora! And doubly good in you, who know so little of the troubles of life.

NORA. I? I know so little of—?

MRS. L. [smiling]. Ah, well! a little fancy-work, and so forth. You're a mere child, Nora.

NORA [tosses her head and paces the room]. Oh, come, you mustn't be so patronizing!

MRS. L. No?

NORA. You're like the rest. You all think I'm fit for nothing really serious—

MRS. L. Well—

NORA. You think I've had no troubles in this weary world.

MRS. L. My dear Nora, you've just told me all your troubles.

NORA. Pooh—these trifles. [Softly.] I haven't told you the great thing.

MRS. L. The great thing? What do you mean?

NORA. I know you look down upon me, Christina; but you've no right to. You're proud of having worked so hard and so long for your mother?

MRS. L. I'm sure I don't look down upon anyone; but it's true I'm both proud and glad when I remember that I was able to make my mother's last days free from care.

NORA. And you're proud to think of what you have done for your brothers?

MRS. L. Have I not the right to be?

NORA. Yes, surely. But now let me tell you, Christina—I, too, have something to be proud and glad of.

MRS. L. I don't doubt it. But what do you mean?

NORA. Hush! Not so loud. Only think, if Torvald were to hear! He mustn't—not for worlds! No one must know about it, Christina—no one but you.

MRS. L. What can it be?

NORA. Come over here. [Draws her beside her on the sofa.] Yes—I, too, have something to be proud and glad of. I saved Torvald's life.

MRS. L. Saved his life? How?

NORA. I told you about our going to Italy. Torvald would have died but for that.

MRS. L. Yes—and your father gave you the money.

NORA [smiling]. Yes, so Torvald and everyone believes; but—

MRS. L. But—?

NORA. Father didn't give us one penny. I found the money.

MRS. L. You? All that money?

NORA. Twelve hundred dollars. Four thousand eight hundred crowns. What do you say to that?

MRS. L. My dear Nora, how did you manage it? Did you win it in the lottery?

NORA [contemptuously]. In the lottery? Pooh! Any fool could have done that!

MRS. L. Then wherever did you get it from?

NORA [hums and smiles mysteriously]. H'm; tra-la-la-la!

MRS. L. Of course you couldn't borrow it.

NORA. No? Why not?

MRS. L. Why, a wife can't borrow without her husband's consent.

NORA [tossing her head]. Oh! when the wife knows a little of business, and how to set about things, then—

MRS. L. But, Nora, I don't understand—

NORA. Well you needn't. I never said I borrowed the money. Perhaps I got it another way. [Throws herself back on the sofa.] I may have got it from some admirer. When one is so—attractive as I am—

MRS. L. You're too silly, Nora.

NORA. Now, I'm sure you're dying of curiosity, Christina—

MRS. L. Listen to me, Nora dear. Haven't you been a little rash?

NORA [sitting upright again]. Is it rash to save one's husband's life?

MRS. L. I think it was rash of you, without his knowledge—

NORA. But it would have been fatal for him to know! Can't you understand that? He was never to suspect how ill he was. The doctors came to me privately and told me that his life was in danger—that nothing could save him but a trip to the South. Do you think I didn't try diplomacy first? I told him how I longed to have a trip abroad, like other young wives; I wept and prayed; I said he ought to think of my condition, and not thwart me; and then I hinted that he could borrow the money. But then, Christina, he got almost angry. He said I was frivolous, and that it was his duty as a husband not to yield to my whims and fancies—so he called them. Very well, thought I, but saved you must be; and then I found the way to do it.

MRS. L. And did your husband never learn from your father that the money was not from him?

NORA. No; never. Father died at that very time. I meant to have told him all about it, and begged him to say nothing. But he was so ill—unhappily, it was not necessary.

MRS. L. And you have never confessed to your husband?

NORA. Good Heavens! What can you be thinking of? Tell him, when he has such a loathing of debt? And besides—how painful and humiliating it would be for Torvald, with his manly self-reliance, to know that he owed anything to me! It would utterly upset the relation between us; our beautiful, happy home would never again be what it is.

MRS. L. Will you never tell him?

NORA [thoughtfully, half-smiling]. Yes, some time perhaps—after many years, when I'm—not so pretty. You mustn't laugh at me. Of course I mean when Torvald is not so much in love with me as he is now; when it doesn't amuse him any longer to see me skipping about, and dressing up and acting. Then it might be well to have something in reserve. [Breaking off.] Nonsense! nonsense! That time will never come. Now, what do you say to my grand secret, Christina? Am I fit for nothing now? You may believe it has cost me a lot of anxiety. It has been no joke to meet my engagements punctually. You must know, Christina, that in business there are things called installments and quarterly interest, that are terribly hard to meet. So I had to pinch a little here and there, wherever I could. I could not save anything out of the house-keeping, for of course Torvald had to live well. And I couldn't let the children go about badly dressed; all I got for them, I spent on them, the darlings.

MRS. L. Poor Nora! So it had to come out of your own pocket-money.

NORA. Yes, of course. After all, the whole thing was my doing. When Torvald gave me money for clothes and so on, I never used more than half of it; I always bought the simplest things. It's a mercy everything suits me so well; Torvald never noticed anything. But it was often very hard, Christina dear. For it's nice to be beautifully dressed. Now, isn't it?

Mrs. L. Indeed it is.

NORA. Well, and besides that, I made money in other ways. Last winter I was so lucky—I got a heap of copying to do. I shut myself up every evening and wrote far on into the night. Oh, sometimes I was so tired, so tired. And yet it was splendid to work in that way and earn money. I almost felt as if I was a man.

Mrs. L. Then how much have you been able to pay off?

NORA. Well, I can't precisely say. It's difficult to keep that sort of business clear. I only know that I paid off everything I could scrape together. Sometimes I really didn't know where to turn. [Smiles.] Then I used to imagine that a rich old gentleman was in love with me—

Mrs. L. What! What gentleman?

NORA. Oh! nobody—that he was now dead, and that when his will was opened, there stood in large letters: Pay over at once everything of which I die possessed to that charming person, Mrs. Nora Helmer.

Mrs. L. But, dear Nora, what gentleman do you mean?

NORA. Dear, dear, can't you understand? There wasn't any old gentleman: it was only what I used to dream, and dream when I was at my wit's end for money. But it's all over now—the tiresome old creature may stay where he is for me; I care nothing for him or his will; for now my troubles are over. [Springing up.] Oh, Christina, how glorious it is to think of! Free from cares! Free, quite free. To be able to play and romp about with the children; to have things tasteful and pretty in the house, exactly as Torvald likes it! And then the spring is coming, with the great blue sky. Perhaps then we shall have a short holiday. Perhaps I shall see the sea again. Oh, what a wonderful thing it is to live and to be happy! [The hall door-bell rings.]

Mrs. L. [rising]. There is a ring. Perhaps I had better go.

NORA. No; do stay. It's sure to be someone for Torvald.

ELLEN [in the doorway]. If you please, ma'am, there's a gentleman to speak to Mr. Helmer.

NORA. Who is the gentleman?

KROG. [in the doorway to the hall]. It is I, Mrs. Helmer. [ELLEN goes. MRS. LINDEN starts and turns away to the window.]

NORA [goes a step toward him, anxiously, half aloud]. You? What is it? What do you want with my husband?

KROG. Bank business—in a way. I hold a small post in the Joint Stock Bank, and your husband is to be our new chief, I hear.

NORA. Then it is—?

KROG. Only tiresome business, Mrs. Helmer; nothing more.

NORA. Then will you please go to his study. [KROGSTAD goes. She bows indifferently while she closes the door into the hall. Then she goes to the fireplace and looks to the fire.]

Mrs. L. Nora—who was that man?

NORA. A Mr. Krogstad. Do you know him?

Mrs. L. I used to know him—many years ago. He was in a lawyer's office in our town.

NORA. Yes, so he was.

Mrs. L. How he has changed!

NORA. I believe his marriage was unhappy.

Mrs. L. And he is now a widower?

NORA. With a lot of children. There! now it'll burn up. [She closes the stove, and pushes the rocking-chair a little aside.]

Mrs. L. His business is not of the most creditable, they say.

NORA. Isn't it? I daresay not. I don't know— But don't let us think of business—it's so tiresome.

DR. RANK comes out of Helmer's room.

RANK [still in the doorway]. No, no; I won't keep you. I'll just go and have a chat with your wife. [Shuts the door and sees MRS. LINDEN.] Oh, I beg your pardon. I am de trop here too.

NORA. No, not in the least. [Introduces them.] Doctor Rank—Mrs. Linden.

RANK. Oh, indeed; I've often heard Mrs. Linden's name. I think I passed you on the stairs as we came up.

Mrs. L. Yes; I go so very slowly. Stairs try me so much.

RANK. You're not very strong?

Mrs. L. Only overworked.

RANK. Ah! Then you have come to town to find rest in a round of dissipation.

Mrs. L. I have come to look for employment.

RANK. Is that an approved remedy for over-work?

Mrs. L. One must live, Doctor Rank.

RANK. Yes, that seems to be the general opinion.

NORA. Come, Doctor Rank, you yourself want to live.

RANK. To be sure I do. However wretched I may be, I want to drag on as long as possible. And my patients have all the same mania. It's just the same with people whose complaint is moral. At this very moment Helmer is talking to such a wreck as I mean.

MRS. L. [softly]. Ah!

NORA. Whom do you mean?

RANK. Oh, a fellow named Krogstad, a man you know nothing about—corrupt to the very core of his character. But even he began by announcing solemnly that he must live.

NORA. Indeed? Then what did he want with Torvald?

RANK. I really don't know; I only gathered that it was some Bank business.

NORA. I didn't know that Krog—that this Mr. Krogstad had anything to do with the Bank?

RANK. He has some sort of place there. [To Mrs. LINDEN.] I don't know whether, in your part of the country, you have people who go wriggling and snuffing around in search of moral rottenness—whose policy it is to fill good places with men of tainted character whom they can keep under their eye and in their power? The honest men they leave out in the cold.

MRS. L. Well, I suppose the—delicate characters require most care.

RANK [shrugs his shoulders]. There we have it! It's that notion that makes society a hospital. [NORA, deep in her own thoughts, breaks into half-stifled laughter and claps her hands.] What are you laughing at? Have you any idea what society is?

NORA. What do I care for your tiresome society. I was laughing at something else—something awfully amusing. Tell me, Doctor Rank, are all the employees at the Bank dependent on Torvald now?

RANK. Is that what strikes you as awfully amusing?

NORA [smiles and hums]. Never mind, never mind! [Walks about the room.] Yes, it is amusing to think that we—that Torvald has such power over so many people. [Takes the box from her pocket.] Doctor Rank, will you have a macaroon?

RANK. Oh, dear, dear—macaroons! I thought they were contraband here.

NORA. Yes; but Christina brought me these.

MRS. L. What! I?

NORA. Oh, well! Don't be frightened. You couldn't possibly know that Torvald had forbidden them. The fact is, he is afraid of me spoiling my teeth. But, oh, bother, just for once. That's for you, Doctor Rank! [Puts a macaroon into his mouth.]

And you, too, Christina. And I will have one at the same time—only a tiny one, or at most two. [Walks about again.] Oh, dear, I am happy! There is only one thing in the world that I really want.

RANK. Well; what's that?

NORA. There's something I should so like to say—in Torvald's hearing.

RANK. Then why don't you say it?

NORA. Because I daren't, it's so ugly.

MRS. L. Ugly?

RANK. In that case you'd better not. But to us you might. What is it you would so like to say in Helmer's hearing?

NORA. I should so love to say—"Damn!"

RANK. Are you out of your mind?

MRS. L. Good gracious, Nora!

RANK. Say it. There he is!

NORA [hides the macaroons]. Hush-sh-sh.

HELMER comes out of his room, hat in hand, with his overcoat on his arm.

[Going toward him.] Well, Torvald, dear, have you got rid of him?

HELM. Yes; he's just gone.

NORA. May I introduce you?—This is Christina, who has come to town—

HELM. Christina? Pardon me, but I don't know—?

NORA. Mrs. Linden, Torvald dear—Christina Linden.

HELM. [to Mrs. LINDEN]. A school-friend of my wife's, no doubt?

MRS. L. Yes; we knew each other as girls.

NORA. And only think! She has taken this long journey on purpose to speak to you.

HELM. To speak to me!

MRS. L. Well, not quite—

NORA. You see Christina is tremendously clever at accounts, and she is so anxious to work under a first-rate man of business in order to learn still more—

HELM. Very sensible indeed.

NORA. And when she heard you were appointed Manager—it was telegraphed, you know—she started off at once, and—Torvald dear, for my sake, you must do something for Christina. Now can't you?

HELM. It's not impossible. I presume you are a widow?

MRS. L. Yes.

HELM. And have already had some experience in office-work?

MRS. L. A good deal.

HELM. Well then, it is very likely. I may find a place for you.

NORA [clapping her hands]. There now! there now!

HELM. You have come at a lucky moment, Mrs. Linden.

MRS. L. Oh! how can I thank you—?

HELM. [smiling]. There's no occasion. [Puts his overcoat on.] But for the present you must excuse me.

RANK. Wait; I'll go with you [fetches his fur coat from the hall and warms it at the fire].

NORA. Don't be long, dear Torvald.

HELM. Only an hour; not more.

NORA. Are you going too, Christina?

MRS. L. [putting on her walking things]. Yes; I must set about looking for lodgings.

HELM. Then perhaps we can go together?

NORA [helping her]. What a pity we haven't a spare room for you; but I'm afraid—

MRS. L. I shouldn't think of troubling you. Good-by, dear Nora, and thank you for all your kindness.

NORA. Good-by for a little while. Of course you come back this evening. And you too, Doctor Rank. What! if you're well enough? Of course you'll be well enough. Only wrap up warmly. [They go out into the hall, talking. Outside on the stairs are heard children's voices.] There they are! there they are! [She runs to the door and opens it. The nurse ANNA enters with the children.] Come in! come in! [Bends down and kisses the children.] Oh! my sweet darlings! Do you see them, Christina? Aren't they lovely?

RANK. Don't let's stand here chattering in the draught.

HELM. Come, Mrs. Linden; only mothers can stand such a temperature. [DR. RANK, HELMER, and MRS. LINDEN go down the stairs; ANNA enters the room with the children; NORA also, shutting the door.]

NORA. How fresh and bright you look! And what red cheeks you have!—like apples and roses. [The children talk low to her during the following.] Have you had great fun? That's splendid. Oh, really! you've been giving Emmy and Bob a ride on your sledge!—Both at once, only think! Why, you're quite a man, Ivar. Oh, give her to me a little, Anna. My sweet little dolly! [Takes the smallest from the nurse and dances with her.] Yes, yes; mother will dance with Bob too. What! did you have a game of snowballs? Oh! I wish I'd been there. No; leave them, Anna; I'll take their things off. Oh, yes, let me do it; it's such fun. Go to the nursery; you look frozen. You'll find some hot coffee on the stove. [The nurse goes into the room on the left. NORA takes off the children's things, and throws them down anywhere, while the children talk to each other and to her.] Really! A big dog ran after you all the way home? But he didn't bite you? No; dogs don't bite dear little dolly children. Don't peep into those parcels, Ivar.

What is it? Wouldn't you like to know? Oh, take care—it'll bite? What! shall we have a game? What shall we play at? Hide-and-seek? Yes, let's play hide-and-seek. Bob shall hide first. Am I to? Yes, let me hide first. [She and the children play, with laughter and shouting, in the room and the adjacent one to the right. At last NORA hides under the table; the children come rushing in, look for her, but cannot find her, hear her half-choked laughter, rush to the table, lift up the cover, and see her. Loud shouts. She creeps out, as though to frighten them. Fresh shouts. Meanwhile there has been a knock at the door leading into the hall. No one has heard it. Now the door is half opened and KROGSTAD is seen. He waits a little; the game is renewed.]

KROG. I beg your pardon, Mrs. Helmer—

NORA [with a suppressed cry, turns round and half jumps up]. Ah! What do you want?

KROG. Excuse me; the outer door was ajar—somebody must have forgotten to shut it—

NORA [standing up]. My husband is not at home, Mr. Krogstad.

KROG. I know it.

NORA. Then—what do you want here?

KROG. To say a few words to you.

NORA. To me? [To the children, softly.] Go in to Anna. What? No, the strange man won't hurt mamma. When he's gone we'll go on playing. [She leads the children into the left-hand room, and shuts the door behind them. Uneasy, with suspense.] It's with me you wish to speak?

KROG. Yes.

NORA. Today? But it's not the first yet—

KROG. No; today is Christmas Eve. It will depend upon yourself whether you have a merry Christmas.

NORA. What do you want? I certainly can't today—

KROG. Never mind that just now. It's about another matter. You have a minute to spare?

NORA. Oh, yes, I suppose so; although—

KROG. Good. I was sitting in the restaurant opposite, and I saw your husband go down the street.

NORA. Well!

KROG. With a lady.

NORA. What then?

KROG. May I ask if the lady was a Mrs. Linden?

NORA. Yes.

KROG. Who has just come to town?

NORA. Yes. Today.

KROG. I believe she's an intimate friend of yours?

NORA. Certainly. But I don't understand—

KROG. I used to know her too.

NORA. I know you did.

KROG. Ah! you know all about it. I thought as much. Now, frankly, is Mrs. Linden to have a place in the bank?

NORA. How dare you catechise me in this way, Mr. Krogstad, you, a subordinate of my husband's? But since you ask you shall know. Yes, Mrs. Linden is to be employed. And it's I who recommended her, Mr. Krogstad. Now you know.

KROG. Then my guess was right.

NORA [walking up and down]. You see one has a little wee bit of influence. It doesn't follow because one's only a woman that— When one is in a subordinate position, Mr. Krogstad, one ought really to take care not to offend anybody who— h'm—

KROG. Who has influence?

NORA. Exactly!

KROG. [taking another tone]. Mrs. Helmer, will you have the kindness to employ your influence on ³⁰ my behalf?

NORA. What? How do you mean?

KROG. Will you be so good as to see that I retain my subordinate position in the bank?

NORA. What do you mean? Who wants to take it from you?

KROG. Oh, you needn't pretend ignorance. I can very well understand that it cannot be pleasant for your friend to meet me; and I can also understand now for whose sake I am to be hounded out.

NORA. But I assure you—

KROG. Come now, once for all: there is time yet, and I advise you to use your influence to prevent it.

NORA. But, Mr. Krogstad, I have absolutely no influence.

KROG. None? I thought you just said—

NORA. Of course not in that sense—I! How should I have such influence over my husband?

KROG. Oh! I know your husband from our college days. I don't think he's firmer than other husbands.

NORA. If you talk disrespectfully of my husband, I must request you to go.

KROG. You are bold, madam.

NORA. I am afraid of you no longer. When New Year's Day is over, I shall be out of the whole business.

KROG. [controlling himself]. Listen to me, Mrs. Helmer. If need be, I shall fight as though for my life to keep my little place in the bank.

NORA. Yes, so it seems.

KROG. It's not only for the money: that matters ¹⁰ least to me. It's something else. Well, I'd better make a clean breast of it. Of course you know, like everyone else, that some years ago I—got into trouble.

NORA. I think I've heard something of the sort.

KROG. The matter never came into court; but from that moment all paths were barred to me. Then I took up the business you know about. I was obliged to grasp at something; and I don't think I've been one of the worst. But now I must ²⁰ clear out of it all. My sons are growing up; for their sake I must try to win back as much respectability as I can. This place in the bank was the first step, and now your husband wants to kick me off the ladder, back into the mire.

NORA. But I assure you, Mr. Krogstad, I haven't the power to help you.

KROG. You have not the will; but I can compel you.

NORA. You won't tell my husband that I owe you money!

KROG. H'm; suppose I were to?

NORA. It would be shameful of you! [With tears in her voice.] This secret which is my joy and my pride—that he should learn it in such an ugly, coarse way—and from you! It would involve me in all sorts of unpleasantness.

KROG. Only unpleasantness?

NORA [hotly]. But just do it. It will be worst for you, for then my husband will see what a bad man ⁴⁰ you are, and then you certainly won't keep your place.

KROG. I asked if it was only domestic unpleasantness you feared?

NORA. If my husband gets to know about it, he will of course pay you off at once, and then we'll have nothing more to do with you.

KROG. [stepping a pace nearer]. Listen, Mrs. Helmer. Either you have a weak memory, or you don't know much about business. I must make your position clearer to you.

NORA. How so?

KROG. When your husband was ill, you came to me to borrow twelve hundred dollars.

NORA. I knew nobody else.

KROG. I promised to find you the money—

NORA. And you did find it.

KROG. I promised to find you the money under certain conditions. You were then so much taken up about your husband's illness, and so eager to have the money for your journey, that you probably did not give much thought to the details. Let me remind you of them. I promised to find you the amount in exchange for a note of hand which I drew up.

NORA. Yes, and I signed it.

KROG. Quite right. But then I added a few lines, making your father a security for the debt. Your father was to sign this.

NORA. Was to? He did sign it!

KROG. I had left the date blank. That is to say, your father was himself to date his signature. Do you recollect that?

NORA. Yes, I believe—

KROG. Then I gave you the paper to send to your father. Is not that so?

NORA. Yes.

KROG. And of course you did so at once? For within five or six days, you brought me back the paper, signed by your father, and I gave you the money.

NORA. Well! Haven't I made my payments punctually?

KROG. Fairly—yes. But to return to the point. You were in great trouble at the time, Mrs. Helmer.

NORA. I was indeed!

KROG. Your father was very ill, I believe?

NORA. He was on his death-bed.

KROG. And died soon after?

NORA. Yes.

KROG. Tell me, Mrs. Helmer: do you happen to recollect the day of his death? The day of the month, I mean?

NORA. Father died on the 29th of September.

KROG. Quite correct. I have made inquiries, and here comes in the remarkable point—[produces a paper] which I cannot explain.

NORA. What remarkable point? I don't know—

KROG. The remarkable point, madam, that your father signed this paper three days after his death!

NORA. What! I don't understand—

KROG. Your father died on the 29th of September. But look here, he has dated his signature October 2d! Is not that remarkable, Mrs. Helmer? [NORA is silent.] Can you explain it? [NORA continues silent.] It is noteworthy too that the words "October 2d" and the year are not in your father's handwriting, but in one which I believe I know. Well, this may be explained; your father may have forgotten to date his signature, and somebody may have added the date at random before the fact of his death was known. There is nothing wrong in that. Everything depends on the signature. Of course it is genuine, Mrs. Helmer? It was really your father who with his own hand wrote his name here?

NORA [after a short silence throws her head back and looks defiantly at him]. No; I wrote father's name there.

KROG. Ah! Are you aware, madam, that that is a dangerous admission?

NORA. Why? You'll soon get your money.

KROG. May I ask you one more question? Why did you not send the paper to your father?

NORA. It was impossible. Father was ill. If I had asked him for his signature I should have had to tell him why I wanted the money; but he was so ill I really could not tell him that my husband's life was in danger. It was impossible.

KROG. Then it would have been better to have given up your tour.

NORA. No, I couldn't do that; my husband's life depended on that journey. I couldn't give it up.

KROG. And did you not consider that you were playing me false?

NORA. That was nothing to me. I didn't care in the least about you. I couldn't endure you for all the cruel difficulties you made, although you knew how ill my husband was.

KROG. Mrs. Helmer, you have evidently no clear idea what you have really done. But I can assure you it was nothing more and nothing worse that made me an outcast from society.

NORA. You! You want me to believe that you did a brave thing to save your wife's life?

KROG. The law takes no account of motives.

NORA. Then it must be a very bad law.

KROG. Bad or not, if I lay this document before a court of law you will be condemned according to law.

NORA. I don't believe that. Do you mean to tell me that a daughter has no right to spare her dying father anxiety?—that a wife has no right to save her husband's life? I don't know much about the law, but I'm sure that, somewhere or another, you will find that that is allowed. And you don't know that—you, a lawyer! You must be a bad one, Mr. Krogstad.

KROG. Possibly. But business—such business as ours—I do understand. You believe that? Very well; now do as you please. But this I may tell you, that if I'm flung into the gutter a second time, you shall keep me company. [Bows and goes out through hall.]

NORA [stands awhile thinking, then throws her head back]. Never! He wants to frighten me. I'm not so foolish as that. [Begins folding the children's clothes. Pauses.] But—? No, it's impossible. I did it for love!

CHILDREN [at the door, left]. Mamma, the strange man is gone now.

NORA. Yes, yes, I know. But don't tell anyone about the strange man. Do you hear? Not even papa!

CHILDREN. No, mamma; and now will you play with us again?

NORA. No, no, not now.

CHILDREN. Oh, do, mamma; you know you promised.

NORA. Yes, but I can't just now. Run to the nursery; I've so much to do. Run along, run along, and be good, my darlings! [She pushes them gently into the inner room, and closes the door behind them. Sits on the sofa, embroiders a few stitches, but soon pauses.] No! [Throws down work, rises, goes to the hall-door and calls out.] Ellen, bring in the Christmas-tree! [Goes to table, left, and opens the drawer; again pauses.] No, it's quite impossible!

ELLEN [with the Christmas-tree]. Where shall I stand it, ma'am?

NORA. There, in the middle of the room.

ELLEN. Shall I bring in anything else?

NORA. No, thank you, I have all I want.

[ELLEN, having put down the tree, goes out.]

NORA [busy dressing the tree]. There must be a candle here, and flowers there.—The horrid man! Nonsense, nonsense! there's nothing in it. The Christmas-tree shall be beautiful. I will do everything to please you, Torvald; I'll sing and dance, and—

Enter HELMER by the hall-door, with bundle of documents.

NORA. Oh! you're back already?

HELM. Yes. Has anybody been here?

NORA. Here? No.

HELM. Curious! I saw Krogstad come out of the house.

NORA. Did you? Oh, yes, by the bye, he was here so for a minute.

HELM. Nora, I can see by your manner that he has been asking you to put in a good word for him.

NORA. Yes.

HELM. And you were to do it as if of your own accord? You were to say nothing to me of his having been here! Didn't he suggest that too?

NORA. Yes, Torvald; but—

HELM. Nora, Nora! and you could condescend to that! To speak to such a man, to make him a promise! And then to tell me an untruth about it!

NORA. An untruth!

HELM. Didn't you say nobody had been here? [Threatens with his finger.] My little bird must never do that again! A song-bird must never sing false notes. [Puts his arm round her.] That's so, isn't it? Yes, I was sure of it. [Lets her go.] And now we'll say no more about it. [Sits down before the fire.] Oh, how cozy and quiet it is here. [Glances into his documents.]

NORA [busy with the tree, after a short silence]. Torvald.

HELM. Yes.

NORA. I'm looking forward so much to the Stenborgs' fancy ball the day after tomorrow.

HELM. And I'm on tenterhooks to see what surprise you have in store for me.

NORA. Oh, it's too tiresome!

HELM. What is?

NORA. I can't think of anything good. Everything seems so foolish and meaningless.

HELM. Has little Nora made that discovery?

NORA [behind his chair, with her arms on the back]. Are you very busy, Torvald?

HELM. Well—

NORA. What sort of papers are those?

HELM. Bank business.

NORA. Already?

HELM. I got the retiring manager to let me make some changes in the staff, and so forth. This will occupy Christmas week. Everything will be straight by the New Year.

NORA. Then that's why that poor Krogstad—

HELM. H'm.

NORA [still leaning over the chair-back, and slowly stroking his hair]. If you hadn't been so very busy, I should have asked you a great, great favor, Torvald.

HELM. What can it be? Let's hear it.

NORA. Nobody has such exquisite taste as you. Now, I should so love to look well at the fancy ball. Torvald dear, couldn't you take me in hand, and settle what I'm to be, and arrange my costume for me?

HELM. Aha! so my willful little woman's at a loss, and making signals of distress.

NORA. Yes, please, Torvald. I can't get on without you.

HELM. Well, well, I'll think it over, and we'll soon hit upon something.

NORA. Oh, how good that is of you! [Goes to the tree again; pause.] How well the red flowers show. Tell me, was it anything so very dreadful this Krogstad got into trouble about?

HELM. Forgery, that's all. Don't you know what that means?

NORA. Mayn't he have been driven to it by need?

HELM. Yes, or like so many others, done it out of heedlessness. I'm not so hard-hearted as to condemn a man absolutely for a single fault.

NORA. No, surely not, Torvald.

HELM. Many a man can retrieve his character if he owns his crime and takes the punishment.

NORA. Crime?

HELM. But Krogstad didn't do that; he resorted to tricks and dodges, and it's that that has corrupted him.

NORA. Do you think that—?

HELM. Just think how a man with that on his conscience must be always lying and canting and shamming. Think of the mask he must wear even toward his own wife and children. It's worst for the children, Nora!

NORA. Why?

HELM. Because such a dust-cloud of lies poisons and contaminates the whole air of home. Every breath the children draw contains some germ of evil.

NORA [closer behind him]. Are you sure of that!

HELM. As a lawyer, my dear, I've seen it often enough. Nearly all cases of early corruption may be traced to lying mothers.

NORA. Why—mothers?

HELM. It generally comes from the mother's side, but of course the father's influence may act in the same way. And this Krogstad has been poisoning his own children for years past by a life of lies and hypocrisy—that's why I call him morally ruined. [Stretches out his hands toward her.] So my sweet little Nora must promise not to plead his cause. Shake hands upon it. Come, come, what's this? Give me your hand. That's right. Then it's a bargain. I assure you it would have been impossible for me to work with him. It gives me a positive sense of physical discomfort to come in contact with such people. [NORA snatches her hand away, and moves to the other side of the Christmas-tree.]

NORA. How warm it is here; and I have so much to do.

HELM. Yes, and I must try to get some of these papers looked through before dinner; and I'll think over your costume, too. And perhaps I may even find something to hang in gilt paper on the Christmas-tree! [Lays his hand on her head.] My precious little song-bird. [He goes into his room and shuts the door behind him.]

NORA [softly, after a pause]. It can't be— It's impossible. It must be impossible!

10 ANNA [at the door, left]. The little ones are begging so prettily to come to mamma.

NORA. No, no, don't let them come to me! Keep them with you, Anna.

ANNA. Very well, ma'am. [Shuts the door.]

NORA [pale with terror]. Corrupt my children!—Poison my home! [Short pause. She raises her head.] It's not true. It can never, never be true.

ACT II

The same room. In the corner, beside the piano, stands the Christmas-tree, stripped, and the candles burnt out. Nora's walking things lie on the sofa. Nora discovered walking about restlessly. She stops by sofa, takes up cloak, then lays it down again.

NORA. There's somebody coming. [Goes to hall door; listens.] Nobody; nobody is likely to come today, Christmas Day! nor tomorrow either. But perhaps— [Opens the door and looks out.] No, nothing in the letter box; quite empty. [Comes forward.] Stuff and nonsense! Of course he only meant to frighten me. There's no fear of any such thing. It's impossible! Why, I have three little children.

Enter ANNA, from the left with a large cardboard box.

ANNA. At last I've found the box with the fancy dress.

NORA. Thanks; put it down on the table.

ANNA [does so]. But it is very much out of order.

NORA. Oh, I wish I could tear it into a hundred thousand pieces.

ANNA. Oh, no. It can easily be put to rights—just a little patience.

NORA. I'll go and get Mrs. Linden to help me.

ANNA. Going out again! In such weather as this! You'll catch cold, ma'am, and be ill.

NORA. Worse things might happen— What are the children doing?

ANNA. They're playing with their Christmas presents, poor little dears; but—

NORA. Do they often ask for me?

ANNA. You see they've been so used to having their mamma with them.

NORA. Yes; but, Anna, in future I can't have them so much with me.

ANNA. Well, little children get used to anything.

NORA. Do you think they do? Do you believe they would forget their mother if she went quite away?

ANNA. Gracious me! Quite away?

NORA. Tell me, Anna—I've so often wondered about it—how could you bring yourself to give your child up to strangers?

ANNA. I had to when I came as nurse to my little Miss Nora.

NORA. But how could you make up your mind to it?

ANNA. When I had the chance of such a good place? A poor girl who's been in trouble must take what comes. That wicked man did nothing for me.

NORA. But your daughter must have forgotten you.

ANNA. Oh, no, ma'am, that she hasn't. She wrote to me both when she was confirmed and when she was married.

NORA [embracing her]. Dear old Anna—you were a good mother to me when I was little.

ANNA. My poor little Nora had no mother but me.

NORA. And if my little ones had nobody else, I'm sure you would—nonsense, nonsense! [Opens the box.] Go in to the children. Now I must—Tomorrow you shall see how beautiful I'll be.

ANNA. I'm sure there will be no one at the ball so beautiful as my Miss Nora. [She goes into the room on the left.]

NORA [takes the costume out of the box, but soon throws it down again]. Oh, if I dared go out. If only nobody would come. If only nothing would happen here in the meantime. Rubbish; nobody will come. Only not to think. What a delicious muff! Beautiful gloves, beautiful gloves! Away with it all—away with it all! One, two, three, four, five, six— [With a scream.] Ah, there they come— [Goes toward the door, then stands undecidedly.]

MRS. LINDEN enters from hall where she has taken off her things.

NORA. Oh, it's you, Christina. Is nobody else there? How delightful of you to come.

MRS. L. I hear you called at my lodgings.

NORA. Yes, I was just passing. I do so want you to help me. Let us sit here on the sofa—so. Tomorrow evening there's to be a fancy ball at Consul Stenborg's overhead, and Torvald wants me to appear as a Neapolitan fisher girl, and dance the tarantella; I learnt it at Capri.

MRS. L. I see—quite a performance!

NORA. Yes, Torvald wishes me to. Look, this is the costume. Torvald had it made for me in Italy; but now it is all so torn, I don't know—

MRS. L. Oh! we'll soon set that to rights. It's only the trimming that's got loose here and there. Have you a needle and thread? Ah! here's the very thing.

NORA. Oh, how kind of you.

MRS. L. So you're to be in costume, tomorrow, Nora? I'll tell you what—I shall come in for a moment to see you in all your glory. But I've quite forgotten to thank you for the pleasant evening yesterday.

NORA [rises and walks across room]. Oh! yesterday, it didn't seem so pleasant as usual. You should have come a little sooner, Christina. Torvald has certainly the art of making home bright and beautiful.

MRS. L. You, too, I should think, or you wouldn't be your father's daughter. But tell me—is Doctor Rank always so depressed as he was yesterday?

NORA. No; yesterday it was particularly striking. You see he has a terrible illness. He has spinal consumption, poor fellow. They say his father led a terrible life—kept mistresses and all sorts of things—so the son has been sickly from his childhood, you understand.

MRS. L. [lets her sewing fall into her lap]. Why, my darling Nora, how do you learn such things?

NORA [walking]. Oh! when one has three children one has visits from women who know something of medicine—and they talk of this and that.

MRS. L. [goes on sewing—a short pause]. Does Doctor Rank come here every day?

NORA. Every day. He's been Torvald's friend from boyhood, and he's a good friend of mine too. Doctor Rank is quite one of the family.

MRS. L. But tell me—is he quite sincere? I mean, doesn't he like to say flattering things to people?

NORA. On the contrary. Why should you think so?

MRS. L. When you introduced us yesterday he declared he had often heard my name; but I no—ticed your husband had no notion who I was. How could Doctor Rank—?

NORA. Yes, he was quite right, Christina. You sec, Torvald loves me so indescribably he wants to have me all to himself, as he says. When we were first married he was almost jealous if I even mentioned one of the people at home! so I naturally let it alone. But I often talk to Doctor Rank about the old times, for he likes to hear about them.

MRS. L. Listen to me, Nora! You're still a child ¹⁰ in many ways. I am older than you, and have more experience. I'll tell you something: you ought to get clear of the whole affair with Doctor Rank.

NORA. What affair?

MRS. L. You were talking yesterday of a rich admirer who was to find you money—

NORA. Yes, one who never existed, worse luck. What then?

MRS. L. Has Doctor Rank money?

NORA. Yes, he has.

MRS. L. And nobody to provide for?

NORA. Nobody. But—?

MRS. L. And he comes here every day?

NORA. Yes, every day.

MRS. L. I should have thought he'd have had better taste.

NORA. I don't understand you.

MRS. L. Don't pretend, Nora. Do you suppose I don't guess who lent you the twelve hundred dollars?

NORA. Are you out of your senses? You think that! A friend who comes here every day! How painful that would be!

MRS. L. Then it really is not he?

NORA. No, I assure you. I never for a moment occurred to me. Besides, at that time he had nothing to lend; he came into his property afterward.

MRS. L. Well, I believe that was lucky for you, Nora dear.

NORA. No, really, it would never have struck me ⁴⁰ to ask Doctor Rank. But I'm certain that if I did—

MRS. L. But of course you never would?

NORA. Of course not. It's inconceivable that it should ever be necessary. But I'm quite sure that if I spoke to Doctor Rank—

MRS. L. Behind your husband's back?

NORA. I must get out of the other thing; that's behind his back too. I must get out of that.

MRS. L. Yes, yes, I told you so yesterday; but— ⁵⁰

NORA [walking up and down]. A man can manage these things much better than a woman.

MRS. L. One's own husband, yes.

NORA. Nonsense. [Stands still.] When everything is paid, one gets back the paper?

MRS. L. Of course.

NORA. And can tear it into a hundred thousand pieces, and burn it, the nasty, filthy thing!

MRS. L. [looks at her fixedly, lays down her work, and rises slowly]. Nora, you're hiding something from me.

NORA. Can you see that in my face?

MRS. L. Something has happened since yesterday morning. Nora, what is it?

NORA [going toward her]. Christina [listens].—Hush! There's Torvald coming home. Here, go into the nursery. Torvald cannot bear to see dress-making. Let Anna help you.

MRS. L. [gathers some of the things together]. Very well, but I shan't go away until you've told me all about it. [She goes out to the left as HELMER enters from hall.]

²⁰ NORA [runs to meet him]. Oh! how I've been longing for you to come, Torvald dear.

HELM. Was the dressmaker here?

NORA. No, Christina. She is helping me with my costume. You'll see how well I shall look.

HELM. Yes, wasn't that a lucky thought of mine?

NORA. Splendid. But isn't it good of me, too, to have given in to you?

HELM. [takes her under the chin]. Good of you! ³⁰ To give in to your own husband? Well, well, you little madcap, I know you don't mean it. But I won't disturb you. I dare say you want to be "trying on."

NORA. And you're going to work, I suppose?

HELM. Yes. [Shows her bundle of papers.] Look here. [Goes toward his room.] I've just come from the Bank.

NORA. Torvald.

HELM. [stopping]. Yes?

NORA. If your little squirrel were to beg you for something so prettily—

HELM. Well?

NORA. Would you do it?

HELM. I must know first what it is.

NORA. The squirrel would jump about and play all sorts of tricks if you would only be nice and kind.

HELM. Come, then, out with it.

NORA. Your lark would twitter from morning ^{till night}—

HELM. Oh, that she does in any case.

NORA. I'll be an elf and dance in the moonlight for you, Torvald.

HELM. Nora—you can't mean what you were hinting at this morning?

NORA [coming nearer]. Yes, Torvald, I beg and implore you.

HELM. Have you really the courage to begin that again?

NORA. Yes, yes; for my sake, you must let Krogstad keep his place in the bank.

HELM. My dear Nora, it's his place I intend for Mrs. Linden.

NORA. Yes, that's so good of you. But instead of Krogstad, you could dismiss some other clerk.

HELM. Why, this is incredible obstinacy! Because you thoughtlessly promised to put in a word for him, I am to—

NORA. It's not that, Torvald. It's for your own sake. This man writes for the most scurrilous newspapers; you said so yourself. He can do you such a lot of harm. I'm terribly afraid of him.

HELM. Oh, I understand; it's old recollections ²⁰ that are frightening you.

NORA. What do you mean?

HELM. Of course you're thinking of your father.

NORA. Yes, of course. Only think of the shameful things wicked people used to write about father. I believe they'd have got him dismissed if you hadn't been sent to look into the thing and been kind to him and helped him.

HELM. My dear Nora, between your father and me there is all the difference in the world. Your ³⁰ father was not altogether unimpeachable. I am; and I hope to remain so.

NORA. Oh, no one knows what wicked men can hit upon. We could live so happily now, in our cozy, quiet home, you and I and the children, Torvald! That's why I beg and implore you—

HELM. And it's just by pleading his cause that you make it impossible for me to keep him. It's already known at the bank that I intend to dismiss Krogstad. If it were now reported that the new ⁴⁰ manager let himself be turned round his wife's little finger—

NORA. What then?

HELM. Oh, nothing! So long as a willful woman can have her way I am to make myself the laughing-stock of everyone, and set people saying I am under petticoat government? Take my word for it, I should soon feel the consequences. And besides, there's one thing that makes Krogstad impossible for me to work with.

NORA. What thing?

HELM. I could perhaps have overlooked his shady character at a pinch—

NORA. Yes, couldn't you, Torvald?

HELM. And I hear he is good at his work. But the fact is, he was a college chum of mine—there was one of those rash friendships between us that one so often repents of later. I don't mind confessing it—he calls me by my Christian name; and he insists on doing it even when others are present. He delights in putting on airs of familiarity—Torvald here, Torvald there! I assure you it's most ¹⁰ painful to me. He would make my position at the Bank perfectly unendurable.

NORA. Torvald, you're not serious?

HELM. No? Why not?

NORA. That's such a petty reason.

HELM. What! Petty! Do you consider me petty?

NORA. No, on the contrary, Torvald dear; and that's just why—

HELM. Never mind, you call my motives petty; then I must be petty too. Petty! Very well. Now we'll put an end to this once for all. [Goes to the door into the hall and calls.] Ellen!

NORA. What do you want?

HELM. [searching among his papers]. To settle the thing. [ELLEN enters.] There, take this letter, give it to a messenger. See that he takes it at once. The address is on it. Here is the money.

ELLEN. Very well. [Goes with the letter.]

HELM. [arranging papers]. There, Madame Obstinacy!

NORA [breathless]. Torvald—what was in that letter?

HELM. Krogstad's dismissal.

NORA. Call it back again, Torvald! There is still time. Oh, Torvald, get it back again! For my sake, for your own, for the children's sake! Do you hear, Torvald? Do it. You don't know what that letter may bring upon us all.

HELM. Too late.

NORA. Yes, too late.

HELM. My dear Nora, I forgive your anxiety, though it's anything but flattering to me. Why should I be afraid of a blackguard scribbler's spite? But I forgive you all the same, for it's a proof of your great love for me. [Takes her in his arms.] That's how it should be, my own dear Nora. Let what will happen—when the time comes, I shall have strength and courage enough. You shall see, my shoulders are broad enough to bear the whole burden.

⁵⁰ NORA [terror-struck]. What do you mean by that?

HELM. The whole burden, I say.

NORA [firmly]. That you shall never, never do.

HELM. Very well; then we'll share it, Nora, as man and wife. [Petting her.] Are you satisfied now? Come, come, come, don't look like a scared dove. It is all nothing—fancy. Now you must play the tarantella through, and practice the tambourine. I shall sit in my inner room and shut both doors, so that I shall hear nothing. You can make as much noise as you please. [Turns round in doorway.] And when Rank comes, just tell him where I'm to be found. [He nods to her and goes with his papers into his room, closing the door.]

NORA [bewildered with terror, stands as though rooted to the ground, and whispers]. He would do it. Yes, he would do it. He would do it, in spite of all the world. No, never that, never, never! Anything rather than that! Oh, for some way of escape! What to do! [Hall bell rings.] Anything rather than that—anything, anything! [Nora draws her hands over her face, pulls herself together, goes to the door and opens it. Rank stands outside, hanging up his greatcoat. During the following, it grows dark.]

NORA. Good afternoon, Doctor Rank. I knew you by your ring. But you mustn't go to Torvald now. I believe he's busy.

RANK. And you?

NORA. Oh, you know very well I've always time for you.

RANK. Thank you. I shall avail myself of your kindness as long as I can!

NORA. What do you mean? As long as you can?

RANK. Yes. Does that frighten you?

NORA. I think it's an odd expression. Do you expect anything to happen?

RANK. Something I've long been prepared for; but I didn't think it would come so soon.

NORA [seizing his arm]. What is it, Doctor Rank? You must tell me.

RANK [sitting down by the stove]. I am running down hill. There's no help for it.

NORA [draws a long breath of relief]. It's you?

RANK. Who else should it be? Why lie to one's self? I'm the most wretched of all my patients, Mrs. Helmer. I have been auditing my life-account—bankrupt! Before a month is over I shall lie rotting in the churchyard.

NORA. Oh! What an ugly way to talk!

RANK. The thing itself is so confoundedly ugly, you see. But the worst of it is, so many other ugly things have to be gone through first. There is one last investigation to be made, and when that is over I shall know exactly when the break-up will begin. There's one thing I want to say to you.

Helmer's delicate nature shrinks so from all that is horrible; I will not have him in my sick room.

NORA. But, Doctor Rank—

RANK. I won't have him, I say—not on any account! I shall lock my door against him. As soon as I have ascertained the worst, I shall send you my visiting card with a black cross on it; and then you will know that the horror has begun.

NORA. Why, you're perfectly unreasonable today. And I did so want you to be in a really good humor.

RANK. With death staring me in the face? And to suffer thus for another's sin! Where's the justice of it? And in every family you can see some such inexorable retribution—

NORA [stopping her ears]. Nonsense, nonsense; now cheer up.

RANK. Well, after all, the whole thing's only worth laughing at. My poor innocent spine must do penance for my father's wild oats.

NORA [at table, left]. I suppose he was too fond of asparagus and Strasbourg pâté, wasn't he?

RANK. Yes; and truffles.

NORA. Yes, truffles, to be sure. And oysters, I believe?

RANK. Yes, oysters; oysters of course.

NORA. And then all the port and champagne. It's sad all these good things should attack the spine.

RANK. Especially when the spine attacked never had the good of them.

NORA. Yes, that's the worst of it.

RANK [looks at her searchingly]. H'm—

NORA [a moment later]. Why did you smile?

RANK. No; it was you that laughed.

NORA. No; it was you that smiled, Doctor Rank.

RANK [standing up]. You're deeper than I thought.

NORA. I'm in such a crazy mood today.

RANK. So it seems.

NORA [with her hands on his shoulders]. Dear, dear Doctor Rank, death shall not take you away from Torvald and me.

RANK. Oh, you'll easily get over the loss. The absent are soon forgotten.

NORA [looks at him anxiously]. Do you think so?

RANK. People make fresh ties, and then—

NORA. Who make fresh ties?

RANK. You and Helmer will, when I'm gone. You yourself are taking time by the forelock, it seems to me. What was that Mrs. Linden doing here yesterday?

NORA. Oh! You're surely not jealous of Christina?

RANK. Yes, I am. She will be my successor in this house. When I'm gone, this woman will perhaps—

NORA. Hush! Not so loud; she is in there.

RANK. Today as well? You see!

NORA. Only to put my costume in order—how unreasonable you are! [Sits on sofa.] Now do be good, Doctor Rank. Tomorrow you shall see how beautifully I dance; and then you may fancy that I am doing it all to please you—and of course Torvald as well. [Takes various things out of box.] Doctor Rank, sit here, and I'll show you something.

RANK [sitting]. What is it?

NORA. Look here. Look!

RANK. Silk stockings.

NORA. Flesh-colored. Aren't they lovely? Oh, it's so dark here now; but tomorrow— No, no, no, ²⁰ you must only look at the feet. Oh, well, I suppose you may look at the rest too.

RANK. H'm—

NORA. What are you looking so critical about? Do you think they won't fit me?

RANK. I can't possibly have any valid opinion on that point.

NORA [looking at him a moment]. For shame! [Hits him lightly on the ear with the stockings.] Take that. [Rolls them up again.]

RANK. And what other wonders am I to see?

NORA. You shan't see any more, for you don't behave nicely. [She hums a little and searches among the things.]

RANK [after a short silence]. When I sit here gossiping with you, I simply can't imagine what would have become of me if I had never entered this house.

NORA [smiling]. Yes, I think you do feel at home with us.

RANK [more softly—looking straight before him]. And now to have to leave it all—

NORA. Nonsense. You shan't leave us.

RANK [in the same tone]. And not to be able to leave behind the slightest token of gratitude; scarcely even a passing regret—nothing but an empty place, that can be filled by the first comer.

NORA. And if I were to ask for—? No—

RANK. For what?

NORA. For a great proof of your friendship.

RANK. Yes?—Yes?

NORA. No, I mean—for a very, very great service.

RANK. Would you really for once make me so happy?

NORA. Oh! you don't know what it is.

RANK. Then tell me.

NORA. No, I really can't; it's far, far too much—not only a service, but help and advice besides—

RANK. So much the better. I can't think what you can mean. But go on. Don't you trust me?

NORA. As I trust no one else. I know you are my best and truest friend. So I will tell you. Well, then, Doctor Rank, you must help me to prevent something. You know how deeply, how wonderfully Torvald loves me; he would not hesitate a moment to give his very life for my sake.

RANK [bending toward her]. Nora, do you think he is the only one who—

NORA [with a slight start]. Who—?

RANK. Who would gladly give his life for you?

NORA [sadly]. Oh!

RANK. I have sworn that you shall know it before I—go. I should never find a better opportunity—Yes, Nora, now you know it, and now you know too that you can trust me as you can no one else.

NORA [standing up, simply and calmly]. Let me pass, please.

RANK [makes way for her, but remains sitting]. Nora—

NORA [in the doorway]. Ellen, bring the lamp. [Crosses to the stove.] Oh, dear, Doctor Rank, that ³⁰ was too bad of you.

RANK [rising]. That I have loved you as deeply as—anyone else? Was that too bad of me?

NORA. No, but that you should tell me so. It was so unnecessary—

RANK. What do you mean? Did you know—?

ELLEN enters with the lamp; sets it on table and goes out again.

RANK. Nora—Mrs. Helmer—I ask you, did you ⁴⁰ know?

NORA. Oh, how can I tell what I knew or didn't know. I really can't say— How could you be so clumsy, Doctor Rank? It was all so nice!

RANK. Well, at any rate, you know now that I am yours, soul and body. And now, go on.

NORA [looking at him]. Go on—now?

RANK. I beg you to tell what you want.

NORA. I can tell you nothing now.

RANK. Yes, yes! You mustn't punish me in that ⁵⁰ way. Let me do for you whatever a man can.

NORA. You can really do nothing for me now. Besides, I really want no help. You'll see it was only my fancy. Yes, it must be so. Of course! [Sits in the rocking-chair smiling at him.] You're a nice one, Doctor Rank. Aren't you ashamed of yourself now the lamp's on the table?

RANK. No, not exactly. But perhaps I ought to go—forever.

NORA. No, indeed you mustn't. Of course you must come and go as you've always done. You know very well that Torvald can't do without you.

RANK. Yes, but you?

NORA. Oh, you know I always like to have you ²⁰ here.

RANK. That's just what led me astray. You're a riddle to me. It has often seemed to me as if you liked being with me almost as much as being with Helmer.

NORA. Yes, don't you see?—there are some people one loves, and others one likes to talk to.

RANK. Yes—there's something in that.

NORA. When I was a girl I naturally loved papa best. But it always delighted me to steal into the servants' room. In the first place they never lectured me, and in the second it was such fun to hear them talk.

RANK. Oh, I see; then it's their place I have taken?

NORA [jumps up and hurries toward him]. Oh, my dear Doctor Rank, I don't mean that. But you understand, with Torvald it's the same as with papa—

ELLEN enters from the hall.

ELLEN. Please, ma'am— [Whispers to NORA and gives her a card.]

NORA [glances at the card]. Ah! [Puts it in her pocket.]

RANK. Anything wrong?

NORA. No, not in the least. It's only—it's my new costume—

RANK. Why, it's there.

NORA. Oh, that one, yes. But it's another that—⁴⁰ I ordered it—Torvald mustn't know—

RANK. Aha! so that's the great secret.

NORA. Yes, of course. Do just go to him; he's in the inner room; do keep him as long as you can.

RANK. Make yourself easy; he shan't escape. [Goes into Helmer's room.]

NORA [to ELLEN]. Is he waiting in the kitchen?

ELLEN. Yes, he came up the back stair—

NORA. Didn't you tell him I was engaged?

ELLEN. Yes, but it was no use.

NORA. He won't go away?

ELLEN. No, ma'am, not until he has spoken with you.

NORA. Then let him come in; but quietly. And, Ellen—say nothing about it; it's a surprise for my husband.

ELLEN. Oh, yes, ma'am, I understand—

[She goes out.]

NORA. It's coming. It's coming after all. No, no, no, it can never be; it shall not! [She goes to Helmer's door and slips the bolt. ELLEN opens the hall-door for KROGSTAD, and shuts it after him. He wears a traveling coat, high boots, and a fur cap.]

NORA. Speak quietly; my husband is at home.

KROG. All right. I don't care.

NORA. What do you want?

KROG. A little information.

NORA. Be quick then. What is it?

KROG. You know I've got my dismissal.

NORA. I could not prevent it, Mr. Krogstad. I fought for you to the last, but it was no good.

KROG. Does your husband care for you so little? He knows what I can bring upon you, and yet he dares—

NORA. How can you think I should tell him?

KROG. I knew very well you hadn't. It wasn't like my friend Torvald Helmer to show so much courage—

NORA. Mr. Krogstad, be good enough to speak respectfully of my husband.

KROG. Certainly, with all due respect. But since³⁰ you're so anxious to keep the matter secret, I suppose you're a little clearer than yesterday as to what you have done.

NORA. Clearer than you could ever make me.

KROG. Yes, such a bad lawyer as I—

NORA. What is it you want?

KROG. Only to see how you're getting on, Mrs. Helmer. I've been thinking about you all day. A mere money-lender, a penny-a-liner, a—in short, a creature like me—has a little bit of what people call "heart."

NORA. Then show it; think of my little children.

KROG. Did you and your husband think of mine? But enough of that. I only wanted to tell you that you needn't take this matter too seriously. I shan't lodge any information for the present.

NORA. No, surely not. I knew you would not.

KROG. The whole thing can be settled quite quietly. Nobody need know. It can remain among us three.

⁵⁰ NORA. My husband must never know.

KROG. How can you prevent it? Can you pay off the debt?

NORA. No, not at once.

KROG. Or have you any means of raising the money in the next few days?

NORA. None that I will make use of.

KROG. And if you had it would be no good to you now. If you offered me ever so much ready money you should not get back your I O U.

NORA. Tell me what you want to do with it.

KROG. I only want to keep it, to have it in my possession. No outsider shall hear anything of it. So, if you've got any desperate scheme in your ¹⁰ head—

NORA. What if I have?

KROG. If you should think of leaving your husband and children—

NORA. What if I do?

KROG. Or if you should think of—something worse—

NORA. How do you know that?

KROG. Put all that out of your head.

NORA. How did you know what I had in my ²⁰ mind?

KROG. Most of us think of that at first. I thought of it, too; but I had not the courage—

NORA [voicelessly]. Nor I.

KROG. [relieved]. No one has. You haven't the courage either, have you?

NORA. I haven't, I haven't.

KROG. Besides, it would be very silly—when the first storm is over—I have a letter in my pocket for your husband—

NORA. Telling him everything?

KROG. Sparing you as much as possible.

NORA [quickly]. He must never have that letter. Tear it up. I will get the money somehow.

KROG. Pardon me, Mrs. Helmer, but I believe I told you—

NORA. Oh, I'm not talking about the money I owe you. Tell me how much you demand from my husband—I'll get it.

KROG. I demand no money from your husband. ³⁰

NORA. What do you demand then?

KROG. I'll tell you. I want to regain my footing in the world. I want to rise; and your husband shall help me to do it. For the last eighteen months my record has been spotless; I've been in bitter need all the time; but I was content to fight my way up, step by step. Now, I've been thrust down, and I won't be satisfied with merely being allowed to sneak back again. I want to rise, I tell ⁵⁰ you. I must get into the bank again, in a higher position than before. Your husband shall create a place on purpose for me—

NORA. He will never do that!

KROG. He will do it; I know him—he won't dare to refuse! And when I'm in, you'll soon see! I shall be the manager's right hand. It won't be Torvald Helmer, but Nils Krogstad, that manages the Joint Stock Bank.

NORA. That will never be.

KROG. Perhaps you'll—?

NORA. Now I have the courage for it.

KROG. Oh, you don't frighten me. A sensitive, petted creature like you—

NORA. You shall see, you shall see!

KROG. Under the ice, perhaps? Down in the cold, black water? And next spring to come up again, ugly, hairless, unrecognizable—

NORA. You can't terrify me.

KROG. Nor you me. People don't do that sort of thing, Mrs. Helmer. And, after all, what good would it be? I have your husband in my pocket

NORA. all the same.

NORA. Afterward? When I am no longer—

KROG. You forget, your reputation remains in my hands! [NORA stands speechless and looks at him.] Well, now you are prepared. Do nothing foolish. So soon as Helmer has received my letter I shall expect to hear from him. And remember that it is your husband himself who has forced me back again into such paths. That I will never forgive him. Good-by, Mrs. Helmer. [Goes through ³⁰ hall. NORA hurries to the door, opens it a little, and listens.]

NORA. He's going. He is not putting the letter into the box. No, no, it would be impossible. [Opens the door farther and farther.] What's that? He's standing still; not going downstairs. Is he changing his mind? Is he—? [A letter falls into the box. Krogstad's footsteps are heard gradually receding down the stair. NORA utters suppressed shriek; pause.] In the letter box. [Slips shrinkingly up to the door.] There it lies—Torvald, Torvald—now we are lost!

MRS. LINDEN enters from the left with the costume.

MRS. L. There, I think it's all right now. Shall we just try it on?

NORA [hoarsely and softly]. Christina, come here.

MRS. L. [throws dress on sofa]. What's the matter? You look quite aghast.

NORA. Come here. Do you see that letter? There, see—through the glass of the letter-box.

MRS. L. Yes, yes, I see it.

NORA. That letter is from Krogstad—

MRS. L. Nora—it was Krogstad who lent you the money!

NORA. Yes, and now Torvald will know everything.

MRS. L. Believe me, Nora, it's the best thing for you both.

NORA. You don't know all yet. I have forged a name—

MRS. L. Good heavens!

NORA. Now listen to me, Christina, you shall bear me witness.

MRS. L. How "witness"? What am I to—?

NORA. If I should go out of my mind—it might easily happen—

MRS. L. Nora!

NORA. Or if anything else should happen to me—so that I couldn't be here myself—

MRS. L. Now, Nora, you're quite beside yourself!

NORA. In case anyone wanted to take it all upon himself—the whole blame, you understand—

MRS. L. Yes, but how can you think—

NORA. You shall bear witness that it's not true, Christina. I'm not out of my mind at all; I know quite well what I'm saying; and I tell you nobody else knew anything about it; I did the whole thing, I myself. Don't forget that.

MRS. L. I won't forget. But I don't understand what you mean—

NORA. Oh, how should you? It's the miracle coming to pass.

MRS. L. The miracle?

NORA. Yes, the miracle. But it's so terrible, Christina;—it mustn't happen for anything in the world.

MRS. L. I will go straight to Krogstad and talk to him.

NORA. Don't; he will do you some harm.

MRS. L. Once he would have done anything for me.

NORA. He?

MRS. L. Where does he live?

NORA. Oh, how can I tell—? Yes; [feels in her pocket] here's his card. But the letter, the letter—!

HELM. [knocking outside]. Nora.

NORA [shrieks in terror]. What is it? What do you want?

HELM. Don't be frightened, we're not coming in; you've bolted the door. Are you trying on your dress?

NORA. Yes, yes, I'm trying it on. It suits me so well, Torvald.

MRS. L. [who has read the card]. Then he lives close by here?

NORA. Yes, but it's no use now. The letter is actually in the box.

MRS. L. And your husband has the key?

NORA. Always.

MRS. L. Krogstad must demand his letter back, unread. He must make some excuse—

NORA. But this is the very time when Torvald generally—

MRS. L. Prevent him. Keep him occupied. I'll come back as quickly as I can.

[She goes out quickly through the hall door.

NORA [opens Helmer's door and peeps in]. Torvald!

HELM. Well, now may one come back into one's own room? Come, Rank, we'll have a look— [In the doorway.] But how's this?

NORA. What, Torvald dear?

HELM. Rank led me to expect a grand dressing-up.

RANK [in the doorway]. So I understood. I suppose I was mistaken.

NORA. No, no one shall see me in my glory till tomorrow evening.

HELM. Why, Nora dear, you look so tired. Have you been practicing too hard?

NORA. No, I haven't practiced at all yet.

HELM. But you'll have to—

NORA. Yes, it's absolutely necessary. But, Torvald, I can't get on without your help. I've forgotten everything.

HELM. Oh, we'll soon freshen it up again.

NORA. Yes, do help me, Torvald. You must promise— Oh, I'm so nervous about it. Before so many people—this evening you must give yourself up entirely to me. You mustn't do a stroke of work! Now promise, Torvald dear!

HELM. I promise. All this evening I will be your slave. Little helpless thing!—But, by the by, I must first— [Going to hall door.]

40 NORA. What do you want there?

HELM. Only to see if there are any letters.

NORA. No, no, don't do that, Torvald.

HELM. Why not?

NORA. Torvald, I beg you not to. There are none there.

HELM. Let me just see. [Is going. NORA, at the piano, plays the first bars of the tarantella.]

HELM. [at the door, stops]. Aha!

NORA. I can't dance tomorrow if I don't rehearse with you first.

HELM. [going to her]. Are you really so nervous, dear Nora?

NORA. Yes, dreadfully! Let me rehearse at once. We have time before dinner. Oh! do sit down and accompany me, Torvald dear; direct me as you used to do.

HELM. With all the pleasure in life, if you wish it. [Sits at piano. NORA snatches the tambourine out of the box, and hurriedly drapes herself in a long parti-colored shawl; then, with a bound, stands in the middle of the floor.]

NORA. Now play for me! Now I'll dance! [HELMER plays and NORA dances. RANK stands at the piano behind HELMER and looks on.]

HELM. [playing]. Slower! Slower!

NORA. Can't do it slower.

HELM. Not so violently, Nora.

NORA. I must! I must!

HELM. [stops]. Nora—that'll never do.

NORA [laughs and swings her tambourine]. Didn't I tell you so?

RANK. Let me accompany her.

HELM. [rising]. Yes, do—then I can direct her better. [RANK sits down to the piano. NORA dances more and more wildly. HELMER stands by the stove and addresses frequent corrections to her. She seems not to hear. Her hair breaks loose and falls over her shoulders. She does not notice it, but goes on dancing. MRS. LINDEN enters and stands spell-bound in the doorway.]

MRS. L. Ah!

NORA [dancing]. We're having such fun here, Christina!

HELM. Why, Nora dear, you're dancing as if it were a matter of life and death.

NORA. So it is.

HELM. Rank, stop! this is the merest madness. Stop, I say! [RANK stops playing, and NORA comes to a sudden standstill, HELMER going toward her.] I couldn't have believed it. You've positively forgotten all I taught you.

NORA [throws tambourine away]. You see for yourself.

HELM. You really do want teaching.

NORA. Yes, you see how much I need it. You must practice with me up to the last moment. Will you promise me, Torvald?

HELM. Certainly, certainly.

NORA. Neither today nor tomorrow you think of anything but me. You mustn't open a single letter—mustn't look at the letter-box!

HELM. Ah, you're still afraid of that man—

NORA. Oh, yes, yes, I am.

HELM. Nora, I can see it in your face—there's a letter from him in the box.

NORA. I don't know, I believe so. But you're not to read anything now; nothing must come between us until all is over.

RANK [softly to HELMER]. You mustn't contradict her.

HELM. [putting his arm around her]. The child shall have her own way. But tomorrow night, when the dance is over—

NORA. Then you will be free.

ELLEN appears in doorway, right.

ELLEN. Dinner is ready, ma'am.

NORA. We'll have some champagne, Ellen!

ELLEN. Yes, ma'am.

[Goes out.]

HELM. Dear me! Quite a feast.

NORA. Yes, and we'll keep it up till morning. [Calling out.] And macaroons, Ellen—plenty—just this once.

HELM. [seizing her hands]. Come, come, don't let's have this wild excitement! Be my own little lark again.

NORA. Oh, yes I will. But now go into the dining-room; and you too, Doctor Rank. Christina, you must help me to do up my hair.

RANK [softly as they go]. There is nothing in the wind? Nothing—I mean—

HELM. Oh, no, nothing of the kind. It's merely this babyish anxiety I was telling you about. [They go out to the right.]

NORA. Well?

MRS. L. He's gone out of town.

NORA. I saw it in your face.

MRS. L. He comes back tomorrow evening. I left a note for him.

NORA. You shouldn't have done that. Things must take their course. After all, there's something glorious in waiting for the miracle.

MRS. L. What are you waiting for?

NORA. Oh, you can't understand. Go to them in the dining-room; I'll come in a moment. [MRS. LINDEN goes into dining-room; NORA stands for a moment as though collecting her thoughts; then looks at her watch.] Five. Seven hours till midnight. Then twenty-four hours till the next midnight. Then the tarantella will be over. Twenty-four and seven? Still thirty-one hours to live.

HELMER appears at door, right.

HELM. What's become of my little lark?

NORA [runs to him with open arms]. Here she is!

ACT III

The same room. The table with the chairs around it is in the middle. A lamp lit on the table. The door to the hall stands open. Dance music is heard from the floor above. MRS. LINDEN sits by the table, and turns the pages of a book absently. She tries to read, but seems unable to fix her attention; she frequently listens and looks anxiously toward the hall door.

MRS. L. [looks at her watch]. Still not here; and the time's nearly up. If only he hasn't— [Listens again.] Ah, there he is— [She goes into the hall and opens the outer door; soft footsteps are heard on the stairs; she whispers:] Come in; there's no one here.

KROG. [in the doorway]. I found a note from you at my house. What does it mean?

MRS. L. I must speak with you.

KROG. Indeed? And in this house?

MRS. L. I could not see you at my rooms. They have no separate entrance. Come in; we are quite alone. The servants are asleep and the Helmers are at the ball upstairs.

KROG. [coming into room]. Ah! So the Helmers are dancing this evening. Really?

MRS. L. Yes. Why not?

KROG. Quite right. Why not?

MRS. L. And now let us talk a little.

KROG. Have we anything to say to each other?

MRS. L. A great deal.

KROG. I should not have thought so.

MRS. L. Because you have never really understood me.

KROG. What was there to understand? The most natural thing in the world—a heartless woman throws a man over when a better match offers.

MRS. L. Do you really think me so heartless? Do you think I broke with you lightly?

KROG. Did you not?

MRS. L. Do you really think so?

KROG. If not, why did you write me that letter?

MRS. L. Was it not best? Since I had to break with you, was it not right that I should try to put an end to your love for me?

KROG. [pressing his hands together]. So that was it? And all this—for the sake of money.

MRS. L. You ought not to forget that I had a helpless mother and two little brothers. We could not wait for you, as your prospects then stood.

KROG. Did that give you the right to discard me for another?

MRS. L. I don't know. I've often asked myself whether I did right.

KROG. [more softly]. When I had lost you the very ground seemed to sink from under my feet. Look at me now. I am a shipwrecked man clinging to a spar.

MRS. L. Rescue may be at hand.

KROG. It was at hand; but then you stood in the way.

MRS. L. Without my knowledge, Nils. I did not know till today that it was you I was to replace in the bank.

KROG. Well, I take your word for it. But now you do know, do you mean to give way?

MRS. L. No, for that would not help you.

KROG. Oh, help, help—! I should do it whether or no.

MRS. L. I have learnt prudence. Life and bitter necessity have schooled me.

KROG. And life has taught me not to trust fine speeches.

MRS. L. Then life has taught you a very sensible thing. But deeds you will trust?

KROG. What do you mean?

MRS. L. You said you were a shipwrecked man, clinging to a spar.

KROG. I have good reason to say so.

MRS. L. I am a shipwrecked woman clinging to a spar. I have no one to care for.

KROG. You made your own choice.

MRS. L. I had no choice.

KROG. Well, what then?

MRS. L. How if we two shipwrecked people could join hands?

KROG. What!

MRS. L. Suppose we lashed the spars together?

KROG. Christina!

MRS. L. What do you think brought me to town?

KROG. Had you any thought of me?

MRS. L. I must have work, or I can't live. All my life, as long as I can remember, I have worked; work has been my one great joy. Now I stand quite alone in the world, so terribly aimless and forsaken. There is no happiness in working for one's self. Nils, give me somebody and something to work for.

KROG. No, no, that can never be. It's simply a woman's romantic notion of self-sacrifice.

MRS. L. Have you ever found me romantic?

KROG. Would you really—? Tell me, do you know my past?

MRS. L. Yes.

KROG. And do you know what people say of me?

MRS. L. Did not you say just now that with me you would have been another man?

KROG. I am sure of it.

MRS. L. Is it too late?

KROG. Christina, do you know what you are doing? Yes, you do; I see it in your face. Have you the courage?

MRS. L. I need someone to tend, and your children need a mother. You need me, and I—I need you. Nils, I believe in your better self. With you I fear nothing.

KROG. [seizing her hands]. Thank you—thank you, Christina. Now I shall make others see me as you do. Ah, I forgot—

MRS. L. [listening]. Hush! The tarantella! Go, go!

KROG. Why? What is it?

MRS. L. Don't you hear the dancing overhead? As soon as that is over they will be here.

KROG. Oh, yes, I'll go. But it's too late now. Of course you don't know the step I have taken against the Helmers?

MRS. L. Yes, Nils, I do know.

KROG. And yet you have the courage to—

MRS. L. I know what lengths despair can drive a man to.

KROG. Oh, if I could only undo it!

MRS. L. You can—. Your letter is still in the box.

KROG. Are you sure?

MRS. L. Yes, but—

KROG. [looking at her searchingly]. Ah, now I understand. You want to save your friend at any price. Say it out—is that your idea?

MRS. L. Nils, a woman who has once sold herself for the sake of others does not do so again.

KROG. I will demand my letter back again.

MRS. L. No, no.

KROG. Yes, of course; I'll wait till Helmer comes; I'll tell him to give it back to me—that it's only about my dismissal—that I don't want it read.

MRS. L. No, Nils, you must not recall the letter.

KROG. But tell me, wasn't that just why you got me to come here?

MRS. L. Yes, in my first terror. But a day has passed since then, and in that day I have seen incredible things in this house. Helmer must know everything; there must be an end to this unhappy secret. These two must come to a full understanding. They can't possibly go on with all these shifts and concealments.

KROG. Very well, if you like to risk it. But one thing I can do, and at once—

MRS. L. [listening]. Make haste. Go, go! The dance is over; we are not safe another moment.

KROG. I'll wait for you in the street.

MRS. L. Yes, do; you must take me home.

KROG. I never was so happy in all my life!

[KROGSTAD goes, by the outer door. The door between the room and hall remains open.]

MRS. L. [setting furniture straight and getting her out-door things together]. What a change! What a change! To have someone to work for; a home to make happy. I shall have to set to work in earnest. I wish they would come. [Listens]. Ah, here they are! I must get my things on. [Takes bonnet and cloak. Helmer's and Nora's voices are heard outside; a key is turned in the lock, and HELMER drags NORA almost by force into the hall. She wears the Italian costume with a large black shawl over it. He is in evening dress and wears a black domino.]

NORA [still struggling with him in the doorway]. No, no, no; I won't go in! I want to go up-stairs again; I don't want to leave so early!

HELM. But, my dearest girl—!

NORA. Oh, please, please, Torvald, only one hour more.

HELM. Not one minute more, Nora dear; you know what we agreed! Come, come in; you are catching cold here! [He leads her gently into the room in spite of her resistance.]

MRS. L. Good evening.

NORA. Christina!

HELM. What, Mrs. Linden, you here so late!

MRS. L. Yes, pardon me! I did so want to see Nora in her costume!

NORA. Have you been sitting here waiting for me?

MRS. L. Yes, unfortunately I came too late. You had already gone up-stairs, and I couldn't go away without seeing you.

HELM. [taking Nora's shawl off]. Well then, just look at her! I think she's worth looking at. Isn't she lovely, Mrs. Linden?

MRS. L. Yes, I must say—

HELM. Isn't she exquisite? Everyone said so. But she is dreadfully obstinate, dear little creature. What's to be done with her? Just think, I had almost to force her away.

NORA. Oh, Torvald, you'll be sorry some day you didn't let me stop, if only for one half hour.

HELM. There! You hear her, Mrs. Linden? She dances her tarantella with wild applause, and well she deserved it, I must say—though there was, perhaps, a little too much nature in her rendering of the idea—more than was, strictly speaking, artistic. But never mind—she made a great success, and that's the main thing. Ought I to let her stop after that—to weaken the impression? Not if I know it. I took my sweet little Capri girl—my capricious little Capri girl, I might say—under my arm; a rapid turn round the room, a courtesy to all sides, and—as they say in novels—the lovely apparition vanished! An exit should always be effective, Mrs. Linden; but I can't get Nora to see it. By Jove, it's warm here. [Throws his domino on a chair, and opens the door to his room.] What! No light here? Oh, of course! Excuse me— [Goes in and lights candles.]

NORA [whispers breathlessly]. Well?

MRS. L. [softly]. I have spoken to him.

NORA. And—?

MRS. L. Nora—you must tell your husband everything—

NORA [almost voiceless]. I knew it!

MRS. L. You have nothing to fear from Krogstad; but you must speak out.

NORA. I shall not speak!

MRS. L. Then the letter will.

NORA. Thank you, Christina. Now I know what ²⁰ I have to do. Hush!

HELM. [coming back]. Well, Mrs. Linden, have you admired her?

MRS. L. Yes; and now I'll say good-night.

HELM. What, already? Does this knitting belong to you?

MRS. L. [takes it]. Yes, thanks; I was nearly forgetting it.

HELM. Then you do knit?

MRS. L. Yes.

HELM. Do you know, you ought to embroider instead?

MRS. L. Indeed! Why?

HELM. Because it's so much prettier. Look now! You hold the embroidery in the left hand so, and then work the needle with the right hand, in a long, easy curve, don't you?

MRS. L. Yes, I suppose so.

HELM. But knitting is always ugly. Look now, your arms close to your sides, and the needles going up and down—there's something Chinese about it.—They really gave us splendid champagne to-night.

MRS. L. Well, good-night, Nora, and don't be obstinate any more.

HELM. Well said, Mrs. Linden!

MRS. L. Good-night, Mr. Helmer.

HELM. [going with her to the door]. Good-night, good-night; I hope you'll get safely home. I should be glad to—but really you haven't far to go. Good-³⁰ night, good-night! [She goes; HELMER shuts the door after her and comes down again.] At last we've got rid of her; she's an awful bore.

NORA. Aren't you very tired, Torvald?

HELM. No, not in the least.

NORA. Nor sleepy?

HELM. Not a bit. I feel particularly lively. But you? You do look tired and sleepy.

NORA. Yes, very tired. I shall soon sleep now.

HELM. There, you see. I was right after all not to let you stop longer.

NORA. Oh, everything you do is right.

HELM. [kissing her forehead]. Now my lark is ¹⁰ speaking like a reasonable being. Did you notice how jolly Rank was this evening?

NORA. Was he? I had no chance of speaking to him.

HELM. Nor I, much; but I haven't seen him in such good spirits for a long time. [Looks at NORA a little, then comes nearer her.] It's splendid to be back in our own home, to be quite alone together! Oh, you enchanting creature!

NORA. Don't look at me in that way, Torvald.

HELM. I am not to look at my dearest treasure?—at the loveliness that is mine, mine only, wholly and entirely mine?

NORA [goes to the other side of the table]. You mustn't say these things to me this evening.

HELM. [following]. I see you have the tarantella still in your blood—and that makes you all the more enticing. Listen! the other people are going now. [More softly.] Nora—soon the whole house will be still.

³⁰ NORA. I hope so.

HELM. Yes, don't you, Nora darling? When we're among strangers do you know why I speak so little to you, and keep so far away, and only steal a glance at you now and then—do you know why I do it? Because I am fancying that we love each other in secret, that I am secretly betrothed to you, and that no one guesses there is anything between us.

NORA. Yes, yes, yes. I know all your thoughts are with me.

HELM. And then, when we have to go, and I put the shawl about your smooth, soft shoulders, and this glorious neck of yours, I imagine you are my bride, that our marriage is just over, that I am bringing you for the first time to my home, and that I am alone with you for the first time, quite alone with you, in your quivering loveliness. All this evening I was longing for you, and you only. When I watched you swaying and whirling in the tarantella—my blood boiled—I could endure it no longer; and that's why I made you come home with me so early.

NORA. Go now, Torvald. Go away from me. I won't have all this.

HELM. What do you mean? Ah! I see you're teasing me! Won't! won't! Am I not your husband? [A knock at the outer door.]

NORA [starts]. Did you hear?

HELM. [going toward the hall]. Who's there?

RANK [outside]. It's I; may I come in a moment?

HELM. [in a low tone, annoyed]. Oh! what can he want? [Aloud.] Wait a moment. [Opens door.] Come, it's nice of you to give us a look in.

RANK. I thought I heard your voice, and that I put it into my head. [Looks around.] Ah! this dear old place! How cozy you two are here!

HELM. You seemed to find it pleasant enough upstairs, too.

RANK. Exceedingly. Why not? Why shouldn't one get all one can out of the world? All one can for as long as one can. The wine was splendid—

HELM. Especially the champagne.

RANK. Did you notice it? It's incredible the quantity I contrived to get down.

NORA. Torvald drank plenty of champagne too.

RANK. Did he?

NORA. Yes, and it always puts him in such spirits.

RANK. Well, why shouldn't one have a jolly evening after a well-spent day?

HELM. Well spent! Well, I haven't much to boast of.

RANK [slapping him on the shoulder]. But I have, don't you see?

NORA. I suppose you've been engaged in a scientific investigation, Doctor Rank?

RANK. Quite right.

HELM. Bless me! Little Nora talking about scientific investigations!

NORA. Am I to congratulate you on the result?

RANK. By all means.

NORA. It was good then?

RANK. The best possible, both for doctor and patient—certainty.

NORA [quickly and searchingly]. Certainty?

RANK. Absolute certainty. Wasn't I right to enjoy myself after it?

NORA. Yes, quite right, Doctor Rank.

HELM. And so say I, provided you don't have to pay for it tomorrow.

RANK. Well, in this life nothing's to be had for nothing.

NORA. Doctor Rank, aren't you very fond of masquerades?

RANK. Yes, when there are plenty of comical disguises.

NORA. Tell me, what shall we two be at our next masquerade?

HELM. Little insatiable! Thinking of your next already!

RANK. We two? I'll tell you. You must go as a good fairy.

HELM. Oh, but what costume would indicate that?

RANK. She has simply to wear her every-day dress.

HELM. Capital! But don't you know what you yourself will be?

RANK. Yes, my dear friend, I'm perfectly clear upon that point.

HELM. Well?

RANK. At the next masquerade I shall be invisible.

HELM. What a comical idea!

RANK. There's a big, black hat—haven't you heard of the invisible hat? It comes down all over you, and then no one can see you.

HELM. [with a suppressed smile]. No, you're right there.

RANK. But I'm quite forgetting what I came for. Helmer, give me a cigar, one of the dark Havanas.

HELM. With the greatest pleasure. [Hands case.]

RANK [takes one and cuts the end off]. Thanks.

NORA [striking a wax match]. Let me give you a light.

RANK. A thousand thanks. [She holds match. He lights his cigar at it.] And now, good-by.

HELM. Good-by, good-by, my dear fellow.

NORA. Sleep well, Doctor Rank.

RANK. Thanks for the wish.

NORA. Wish me the same.

RANK. You? Very well, since you ask me—sleep well. And thanks for the light.

[He nods to them both and goes out.]

HELM. [in an undertone]. He's been drinking a good deal.

NORA [absently]. I dare say. [HELMER takes his bunch of keys from his pocket and goes into the hall.] Torvald, what are you doing there?

HELM. I must empty the letter-box, it's quite full; there will be no room for the newspapers tomorrow morning.

NORA. Are you going to work tonight?

HELM. Not very likely! Why, what's this? Someone's been at the lock.

NORA. The lock—?

HELM. I'm sure of it. What does it mean? I can't think that the servants—? Here's a broken hairpin.

Nora, it's one of yours.

NORA [quickly]. It must have been the children.

HELM. Then you must break them of such tricks. H'm, h'm! There! at last I've got it open. [Takes contents out and calls into the kitchen.] Ellen, Ellen, just put the hall-door lamp out. [He returns with letters in his hand, and shuts the inner door.] Just see how they've accumulated. [Turning them over.] Why, what's this?

NORA [at the window]. The letter! Oh, no, no, Torvald!

HELM. Two visiting cards—from Rank.

NORA. From Doctor Rank?

HELM. [looking at them]. Doctor Rank. They¹⁰ were on the top. He must just have put them in.

NORA. Is there anything on them?

HELM. There's a black cross over the name. Look at it. What a horrid idea! It looks just as if he were announcing his own death.

NORA. So he is.

HELM. What! Do you know anything? Has he told you anything?

NORA. Yes. These cards mean that he has taken his last leave of us. He intends to shut himself up²⁰ and die.

HELM. Poor fellow! Of course I knew we couldn't hope to keep him long. But so soon—and then to go and creep into his lair like a wounded animal—

NORA. What must be, must be, and the fewer words the better. Don't you think so, Torvald?

HELM. [walking up and down]. He had so grown into our lives. I can't realize that he's gone. He and his sufferings and his loneliness formed a³⁰ sort of cloudy background to the sunshine of our happiness. Well, perhaps it's best so—at any rate for him. [Stands still.] And perhaps for us, too, Nora. Now we two are thrown entirely upon each other. [Puts his arm round her.] My darling wife! I feel as if I could never hold you close enough. Do you know, Nora, I often wish some danger might threaten you, that I might risk body and soul, and everything, everything, for your dear sake.

NORA [tears herself from him and says firmly]. Now you shall read your letters, Torvald.

HELM. No, no; not tonight. I want to be with you, sweet wife.

NORA. With the thought of your dying friend?

HELM. You are right. This has shaken us both. Unloveliness has come between us—thoughts of death and decay. We must seek to cast them off. Till then we will remain apart.

NORA [her arms round his neck]. Torvald!⁴⁰ good-night, good-night.

HELM. [kissing her forehead]. Good-night, my little bird. Sleep well, Nora. Now I'll go and read my letters. [He goes into his room and shuts the door.]

NORA [with wild eyes, gropes about her, seizes Helmer's domino, throws it round her, and whispers quickly, hoarsely, and brokenly]. Never to see him again. Never, never, never. [Throws her shawl over her head.] Never to see the children again. Never, never. Oh, that black icy water! Oh, that bottomless— If it were only over! Now he has it; he's reading it. Oh, no, no, no, not yet. Torvald, good-by. Good-by, my little ones—! [She is rushing out by the hall; at the same moment HELMER tears his door open, and stands with an open letter in his hand.]

HELM. Nora!

NORA [shrieking]. Ah—!

HELM. What is this? Do you know what is in this letter.

NORA. Yes, I know. Let me go! Let me pass!

HELM. [holds her back]. Where do you want to go?

NORA [tries to get free]. You sha'n't save me, Torvald.

HELM. [falling back]. True! Is it true what he writes? No, no, it cannot be true.

NORA. It is true. I have loved you beyond all else in the world.

HELM. Pshaw—no silly evasions.

NORA [a step nearer him]. Torvald—!

HELM. Wretched woman! what have you done?

NORA. Let me go—you shall not save me. You shall not take my guilt upon yourself.

HELM. I don't want any melodramatic airs. [Locks the door.] Here you shall stay and give an account of yourself. Do you understand what you have done? Answer. Do you understand it?

NORA [looks at him fixedly, and says with a stif-fening expression]. Yes; now I begin fully to understand it.

HELM. [walking up and down]. Oh, what an awful awakening! During all these eight years—she who was my pride and my joy—a hypocrite, a liar—worse, worse—a criminal. Oh! the hideousness of it! Ugh! Ugh! [NORA is silent, and continues to look fixedly at him.] I ought to have foreseen something of the kind. All your father's dishonesty—be silent! I say all your father's dishonesty you have inherited—no religion, no morality, no sense of duty. How I am punished for shielding him! I did it for your sake, and you reward me like this.

NORA. Yes—like this!

HELM. You have destroyed my whole happiness.

You have ruined my future. Oh! it's frightful to think of! I am in the power of a scoundrel; he can do whatever he pleases with me, demand whatever he chooses, and I must submit. And all this disaster is brought upon me by an unprincipled woman.

NORA. When I'm gone, you will be free.

HELM. Oh, no fine phrases. Your father, too, was always ready with them. What good would it do to me if you were "gone" as you say? No good in the world! He can publish the story all the same; I might even be suspected of collusion. People will think I was at the bottom of it all and egged you on. And for all this I have you to thank—you whom I have done nothing but pet and spoil during our whole married life. Do you understand now what you have done to me?

NORA [with cold calmness]. Yes.

HELM. It's incredible. I can't grasp it. But we must come to an understanding. Take that shawl off. Take it off, I say. I must try to pacify him in one way or other—the secret must be kept, cost what it may. As for ourselves, we must live as we have always done; but of course only in the eyes of the world. Of course you will continue to live here. But the children cannot be left in your care. I dare not trust them to you—Oh, to have to say this to one I have loved so tenderly—whom I still—but that must be a thing of the past. Henceforward there can be no question of happiness, but merely of saving the ruins, the shreds, the show of it! [A ring; HELMER starts.] What's that? So late! Can it be the worst? Can he—? Hide yourself, Nora; say you are ill. [NORA stands motionless. HELMER goes to the door and opens it.]

ELLEN [half dressed, in the hall]. Here is a letter for you, ma'am.

HELM. Give it to me. [Seizes letter and shuts the door.] Yes, from him. You shall not have it. I shall read it.

NORA. Read it!

HELM. [by the lamp]. I have hardly courage to. We may be lost, both you and I. Ah! I must know. [Tears the letter hastily open; reads a few lines, looks at an enclosure; a cry of joy.] Nora. [NORA looks interrogatively at him.] Nora! Oh! I must read it again. Yes, yes, it is so. I am saved! Nora, I am saved!

NORA. And I?

HELM. You too, of course; we are both saved, both of us. Look here, he sends you back your promissory note. He writes that he regrets and apologizes—that a happy turn in his life—Oh, what matter what he writes. We are saved, Nora! No one can harm you. Oh! Nora, Nora—; no, first to get rid of this hateful thing. I'll just see— [Glances at the I O U.] No, I won't look at it; the whole thing shall be nothing but a dream to me. [Tears the I O U and both letters in pieces, throws them into the fire and watches them burn.] There, it's gone. He wrote that ever since Christmas Eve—Oh, Nora, they must have been three awful days for you!

NORA. I have fought a hard fight for the last three days.

HELM. And in your agony you saw no other outlet but—no; we won't think of that horror. We will only rejoice and repeat—it's over, all over. Don't you hear, Nora? You don't seem to be able to grasp it. Yes, it's over. What is this set look on your face? Oh, my poor Nora, I understand; you can't believe that I have forgiven you. But I have, Nora; I swear it. I have forgiven everything. I know that what you did was all for love of me.

NORA. That's true.

HELM. You loved me as a wife should love her husband. It was only the means you misjudged. But do you think I love you the less for your helplessness? No, no, only lean on me. I will counsel and guide you. I should be no true man if this very womanly helplessness did not make you doubly dear in my eyes. You mustn't think of the hard things I said in my first moment of terror, when the world seemed to be tumbling about my ears. I have forgiven you, Nora—I swear I have forgiven you.

NORA. I thank you for your forgiveness. [Goes out, right.]

HELM. No, stay. [Looks in.] What are you going to do?

NORA [inside]. To take off my doll's dress.

HELM. [in doorway]. Yes, do, dear. Try to calm down, and recover your balance, my scared little song-bird. You may rest secure, I have broad wings to shield you. [Walking up and down near the door.] Oh, how lovely—how cozy our home is, Nora. Here you are safe; here I can shelter you like a hunted dove, whom I have saved from the claws of the hawk. I shall soon bring your poor beating heart to rest, believe me, Nora, I will. Tomorrow all this will seem quite different—everything will be as before; I shall not need to tell you again that I forgive you; you will feel for yourself that it is true. How could I find it in my heart to drive you away, or even so much as to reproach you? Oh, you don't know a true man's heart, Nora. There is something indescribably sweet and soothing to a man in having forgiven his wife—honestly forgiven her from the bottom of his heart. She becomes his property in a double sense. She is as though born again; she has become, so to speak, at once his wife and his child. That is what you shall henceforth be to me, my bewildered, helpless darling. Don't worry about anything, Nora; only open your heart to me, and I will be both will and conscience to you. [NORA enters, crossing to table in everyday dress.] Why, what's this? Not gone to bed? You have changed your dress.

NORA. Yes, Torvald; now I have changed my dress.

HELM. But why now so late?

NORA. I shall not sleep tonight.

HELM. But, Nora dear—

NORA [looking at her watch]. It's not so late yet. Sit down, Torvald, you and I have much to say to each other. [She sits on one side of the table.]

HELM. Nora, what does this mean; your cold, set face—

NORA. Sit down. It will take some time; I have much to talk over with you. [HELMER sits at the other side of the table.]

HELM. You alarm me; I don't understand you.

NORA. No, that's just it. You don't understand me; and I have never understood you—till tonight. No, don't interrupt. Only listen to what I say. We must come to a final settlement, Torvald!

HELM. How do you mean?

NORA [after a short silence]. Does not one thing strike you as we sit here?

HELM. What should strike me?

NORA. We have been married eight years. Does it not strike you that this is the first time we two, you and I, man and wife, have talked together seriously?

HELM. Seriously! Well, what do you call seriously?

NORA. During eight whole years and more—ever since the day we first met—we have never exchanged one serious word about serious things.

HELM. Was I always to trouble you with the cares you could not help me to bear?

NORA. I am not talking of cares. I say that we have never yet set ourselves seriously to get to the bottom of anything.

HELM. Why, my dear Nora, what have you to do with serious things?

NORA. There we have it! You have never understood me. I have had great injustice done me, Torvald. First by my father and then by you.

HELM. What! by your father and me?—by us who have loved you more than all the world?

NORA [shaking her head]. You have never loved me. You only thought it amusing to be in love with me.

HELM. Why, Nora, what a thing to say!

NORA. Yes, it is so, Torvald. While I was at home with father he used to tell me all his opinions and I held the same opinions. If I had others I concealed them, because he would not have liked it. He used to call me his doll child, and play with me as I played with my dolls. Then I came to live in your house—

HELM. What an expression to use about our marriage!

NORA [undisturbed]. I mean I passed from father's hands into yours. You settled everything according to your taste; and I got the same tastes as you; or I pretended to—I don't know which—both ways perhaps. When I look back on it now, I seem to have been living here like a beggar, from hand to mouth. I lived by performing tricks for you, Torvald. But you would have it so. You and father have done me a great wrong. It's your fault that my life has been wasted.

HELM. Why, Nora, how unreasonable and ungrateful you are. Haven't you been happy here?

NORA. No, never; I thought I was, but I never was.

HELM. Not—not happy?

NORA. No, only merry. And you have always been so kind to me. But our house has been nothing but play-room. Here I have been your doll-wife, just as at home I used to be papa's doll-child. And the children in their turn have been my dolls. I thought it fun when you played with me, just as the children did when I played with them. That has been our marriage, Torvald.

HELM. There is some truth in what you say, exaggerated and overstrained though it be. But henceforth it shall be different. Playtime is over; now comes the time for education.

NORA. Whose education? Mine, or the children's.

HELM. Both, my dear Nora.

NORA. Oh, Torvald, you can't teach me to be a fit wife for you.

HELM. And you say that?

NORA. And I—am I fit to educate the children?

HELM. Nora!

NORA. Did you not say yourself a few minutes ago you dared not trust them to me?

HELM. In the excitement of the moment! Why should you dwell upon that?

NORA. No—you are perfectly right. That problem is beyond me. There's another to be solved first—I must try to educate myself. You are not the man to help me in that. I must set about it alone. And that is why I am now leaving you!

HELM. [jumping up]. What—do you mean to say—

NORA. I must stand quite alone to know myself and my surroundings; so I cannot stay with you.

HELM. Nora! Nora!

NORA. I am going at once. Christina will take me in for tonight—

HELM. You are mad. I shall not allow it. I forbid it.

NORA. It's no use your forbidding me anything now. I shall take with me what belongs to me. From you I will accept nothing, either now or afterward.

HELM. What madness!

NORA. Tomorrow I shall go home.

HELM. Home!

NORA. I mean to what was my home. It will be easier for me to find some opening there.

HELM. Oh, in your blind experience—

NORA. I must try to gain experience, Torvald.

HELM. To forsake your home, your husband, and your children! You don't consider what the world will say.

NORA. I can pay no heed to that! I only know that I must do it.

HELM. It's exasperating! Can you forsake your holiest duties in this way?

NORA. What do you call my holiest duties?

HELM. Do you ask me that? Your duties to your husband and your children.

NORA. I have other duties equally sacred.

HELM. Impossible! What duties do you mean?

NORA. My duties toward myself.

HELM. Before all else you are a wife and a mother.

NORA. That I no longer believe. I think that before all else I am a human being, just as much as you are—or, at least, I will try to become one. I know that most people agree with you, Torvald, and that they say so in books. But henceforth I can't be satisfied with what most people say, and what is in books. I must think things out for myself and try to get clear about them.

HELM. Are you not clear about your place in your own home? Have you not an infallible guide in questions like these? Have you not religion?

NORA. Oh, Torvald, I don't know properly what religion is.

HELM. What do you mean?

NORA. I know nothing but what our clergyman told me when I was confirmed. He explained that religion was this and that. When I get away from here and stand alone I will look into that matter too. I will see whether what he taught me is true, or, at any rate, whether it is true for me.

HELM. Oh, this is unheard of! But if religion cannot keep you right, let me appeal to your conscience—I suppose you have some moral feeling? Or, answer me, perhaps you have none?

NORA. Well, Torvald, it's not easy to say. I really don't know—I am all at sea about these things. I only know that I think quite differently from you about them. I hear, too, that the laws are different from what I thought; but I can't believe that they are right. It appears that a woman has no right to spare her dying father, or to save her husband's life. I don't believe that.

HELM. You talk like a child. You don't understand the society in which you live.

NORA. No, I don't. But I shall try to. I must make up my mind which is right—society or I.

HELM. Nora, you are ill, you are feverish. I almost think you are out of your senses.

NORA. I never felt so much clearness and certainty as tonight.

HELM. You are clear and certain enough to forsake husband and children?

NORA. Yes, I am.

HELM. Then there is only one explanation possible.

NORA. What is that?

HELM. You no longer love me.

NORA. No, that is just it.

HELM. Nora! Can you say so?

NORA. Oh, I'm so sorry, Torvald; for you've always been so kind to me. But I can't help it. I do not love you any longer.

HELM. [keeping his composure with difficulty]. Are you clear and certain on this point too?

NORA. Yes, quite. That is why I won't stay here any longer.

HELM. And can you also make clear to me, how I have forfeited your love?

NORA. Yes, I can. It was this evening, when the miracle did not happen. For then I saw you were not the man I had taken you for.

HELM. Explain yourself more clearly; I don't understand.

NORA. I have waited so patiently all these eight years; for, of course, I saw clearly enough that miracles do not happen every day. When this crushing blow threatened me, I said to myself, confidently, "Now comes the miracle!" When Krogstad's letter lay in the box, it never occurred to me that you would think of submitting to that man's conditions. I was convinced that you would say to him, "Make it known to all the world," and that then—

HELM. Well? When I had given my own wife's name up to disgrace and shame—?

NORA. Then I firmly believed that you would come forward, take everything upon yourself, and say, "I am the guilty one."

HELM. Nora!

NORA. You mean I would never have accepted ²⁰ such a sacrifice? No, certainly not. But what would my assertions have been worth in opposition to yours? That was the miracle that I hoped for and dreaded. And it was to hinder that that I wanted to die.

HELM. I would gladly work for you day and night, Nora—bear sorrow and want for your sake—but no man sacrifices his honor, even for one he loves.

NORA. Millions of women have done so.

HELM. Oh, you think and talk like a silly child.

NORA. Very likely. But you neither think nor talk like the man I can share my life with. When your terror was over—not for me, but for yourself—when there was nothing more to fear,—then it was to you as though nothing had happened. I was your lark again, your doll—whom you would take twice as much care of in the future, because she was so weak and fragile. [Stands up.] Torvald, in that moment it burst upon me, that I had been ³⁰ living here these eight years with a strange man, and had borne him three children—Oh! I can't bear to think of it—I could tear myself to pieces!

HELM. [sadly]. I see it, I see it; an abyss has opened between us—But, Nora, can it never be filled up?

NORA. As I now am, I am no wife for you.

HELM. I have strength to become another man.

NORA. Perhaps—when your doll is taken away from you.

HELM. To part—to part from you! No, Nora, no; I can't grasp the thought.

NORA [going into room, right]. The more reason for the thing to happen. [She comes back with outdoor things and a small traveling bag, which she puts on a chair.]

HELM. Nora, Nora, not now! Wait till tomorrow.

NORA [putting on cloak]. I can't spend the night in a strange man's house.

HELM. But can't we live here as brother and sister?

NORA [fastening her hat]. You know very well that would not last long. Good-by, Torvald. No, I won't go to the children. I know they are in better hands than mine. As I now am, I can be nothing to them.

HELM. But some time, Nora—some time—

NORA. How can I tell? I have no idea what will become of me.

HELM. But you are my wife, now and always?

NORA. Listen, Torvald—when a wife leaves her husband's house, as I am doing, I have heard that in the eyes of the law he is free from all the duties toward her. At any rate I release you from all duties. You must not feel yourself bound any more than I shall. There must be perfect freedom on both sides. There, there is your ring back. Give me mine.

HELM. That too?

NORA. That too.

²⁰ HELM. Here it is.

NORA. Very well. Now it is all over. Here are the keys. The servants know about everything in the house, better than I do. Tomorrow, when I have started, Christina will come to pack up my things. I will have them sent after me.

HELM. All over! All over! Nora, will you never think of me again?

NORA. Oh, I shall often think of you, and the children—and this house.

HELM. May I write to you, Nora?

NORA. No, never. You must not.

HELM. But I must send you—

NORA. Nothing, nothing.

HELM. I must help you if you need it.

NORA. No, I say. I take nothing from strangers.

HELM. Nora, can I never be more than a stranger to you?

NORA [taking her traveling bag]. Oh, Torvald, then the miracle of miracles would have to happen.

⁴⁰ HELM. What is the miracle of miracles?

NORA. Both of us would have to change so that—Oh, Torvald, I no longer believe in miracles.

HELM. But I will believe. We must so change that—?

NORA. That communion between us shall be a marriage. Good-by. [She goes out.]

HELM. [sinks in a chair by the door with his face in his hands.] Nora! Nora! [He looks around and stands up.] Empty. She's gone! [A hope inspires ⁵⁰ him.] Ah! The miracle of miracles—?! [From below is heard the reverberation of a heavy door closing.]

A number of weavers, young and old, of both sexes

The action passes in the forties, at Kaschbach, Peterswaldau and Langenbielau, in the Eulengebirge

ACT I

A large whitewashed room on the ground floor of DREISSIGER's house at Peterswaldau, where the weavers deliver their finished webs and the justian is stored. To the left are uncurtained windows, in the back wall there is a glass door, and to the right another glass door, through which weavers, male and female, and children, are passing in and out. All three walls are lined with shelves for the storing of the justian. Against the right wall stands a long bench, on which a number of weavers have already spread out their cloth. In the order of arrival each presents his piece to be examined by PFEIFER, DREISSIGER's manager, who stands, with compass and magnifying-glass, behind a large table, on which the web to be inspected is laid. When PFEIFER has satisfied himself, the weaver lays the justian on the scale, and an office apprentice tests its weight. The same boy stores the accepted pieces on the shelves. PFEIFER calls out the payment due in each case to NEUMANN, the cashier, who is seated at a small table.

It is a sultry day toward the end of May. The clock is on the stroke of twelve. Most of the waiting work-people have the air of standing before the bar of justice, in torturing expectation of a decision that means life or death to them. They are marked, too, by the anxious timidity characteristic of the receiver of charity, who has suffered many humiliations, and, conscious that he is barely tolerated, has acquired the habit of self-effacement. Add to this an expression on every face that tells of constant, fruitless brooding. There is a general resemblance among the men. They have something about them of the dwarf, something of the schoolmaster. The majority are flat-breasted, short-winded, sallow, and poor-looking—creatures of the loom, their knees bent with much sitting. At a first glance the women show fewer typical traits. They look over-driven, worried, reckless, whereas the men still make some show of a pitiful self-respect; and their clothes are ragged, while the men's are patched and mended. Some of the young girls are not without a certain charm, consisting in a wax-like pallor, a slender figure, and large, projecting, melancholy eyes.

NEUMANN [counting out money]. Comes to one and sevenpence halfpenny.

WEAVER'S WIFE [about thirty, emaciated, takes up the money with trembling fingers]. Thank you, sir.

NEUMANN [seeing that she does not move on]. Well, something wrong this time, too?

WEAVER'S WIFE [agitated, imploringly]. Do you think I might have a few pence in advance, sir? I need it that bad.

NEUMANN. And I need a few pounds. If it was only a question of needing it—! [Already occupied in counting out another weaver's money, shortly.]

WEAVER'S WIFE. Couldn't I speak to Mr. Dreissiger himself, then, sir?

PFEIFER [Now manager, formerly weaver. The type is unmistakable, only he is well fed, well dressed, clean-shaven; also takes snuff copiously. He calls out roughly.]. Mr. Dreissiger would have enough to do if he had to attend to every trifle himself. That's what we are here for. [He measures, and then examines through the magnifying-glass.] Mercy on us! what a draught! [Puts a thick muffler round his neck.] Shut the door, whoever comes in.

APPRENTICE [loudly to PFEIFER]. You might as well talk to stocks and stones.

PFEIFER. That's done!—Weigh! [The weaver places his web on the scales.] If you only understood your business a little better! Full of lumps again. . . . I hardly need to look at the cloth to see them. Call yourself a weaver, and "draw as long a bow" as you've done there!

BECKER has entered. A young, exceptionally powerfully-built weaver; offhand, almost bold in manner. PFEIFER, NEUMANN, and the APPRENTICE exchange looks of mutual understanding as he comes in.

BECKER. Devil take it! This is a sweating job, and no mistake.

FIRST WEAVER [in a low voice]. This blazing heat means rain.

OLD BAUMERT forces his way in at the glass door on the right, through which the crowd of weavers can be seen, standing shoulder to shoulder, waiting their turn. The old man stumbles forward and lays his bundle on the bench, beside BECKER's. He sits down by it, and wipes the sweat from his face.

OLD BAUMERT. A man has a right to a rest after that.

BECKER. Rest's better than money.

OLD BAUMERT. Yes, but we needs the money, too.
10 Good-mornin' to you, Becker!

BECKER. Morning, Father Baumert! Goodness knows how long we'll have to stand here again.

FIRST WEAVER. And what does that matter? What's to hinder a weaver waitin' for an hour, or for a day if need be? What else is he there for?

PFEIFER. Silence there! We can't hear our own voices.

BECKER [in a low voice]. This is one of his bad 20 days.

PFEIFER [to the weaver standing before him]. How often have I told you that you must bring cleaner cloth? What sort of mess is this? Knots, and straw, and all kinds of dirt.

REIMANN. It's for want of a new picker, sir.

APPRENTICE [has weighed the piece]. Short weight, too.

PFEIFER. I never saw such weavers. I hate to give out the yarn to them. It was another story in my day! I'd have caught it finely from my master for work like that. The business was carried on in different style then. A man had to know his trade—that's the last thing that's thought of nowadays. Reimann, one shilling.

REIMANN. But there's always a pound allowed for waste.

PFEIFER. I've no time. Next man!—What have you to show?

HEIBER [Lays his web on the table. While PFEIFER is examining it, he goes close up to him; eagerly in a low tone.]. Beg pardon, Mr. Pfeifer, but I wanted to ask you, sir, if you would perhaps be so very kind as do me the favor an' not take my advance money off this week's pay.

PFEIFER [measuring and examining the texture; jeeringly]. Well! What next, I wonder? This looks very much as if half the weft had stuck to the bobbins again.

HEIBER [continues]. I'll be sure to make it all right next week, sir. But this last week I've had to put in two days' work on the estate. And my missus is ill in bed. . . .

PFEIFER [giving the web to be weighed]. Another piece of real slop-work. [Already examining a new web.] What a selvage! Here it's broad, there it's narrow; here it's drawn in by the wefts goodness knows how tight, and there's it's torn out again by the temples. And hardly seventy threads weft to the inch. What's come of the rest? Do you call this honest work? I never saw anything like it.

HEIBER, repressing tears, stands humiliated and helpless.

BECKER [in a low voice to BAUMERT]. To please ¹⁰ that brute you would have to pay for extra yarn out of your own pocket.

THE WEAVER'S WIFE, who has remained standing near the cashier's table, from time to time looking round appealingly, takes courage and once more comes forward.

WEAVER'S WIFE [to cashier imploringly]. I don't know what's to come of me, sir, if you won't give me a little advance this time—O Lord, O Lord!

PFEIFER [calls across]. It's no good whining, or ²⁰ dragging the Lord's name into the matter. You're not so anxious about Him at other times. You look after your husband and see that he's not to be found so often lounging in the public house. We can give no pay in advance. We have to account for every penny. It's not our money. People that are industrious, and understand their work, and do it in the fear of God, never need their pay in advance. So now you know.

NEUMANN. If a Bielau weaver got four times as ³⁰ much pay, he would squander it four times over and be in debt into the bargain.

WEAVER'S WIFE [in a loud voice, as if appealing to the general sense of justice]. No one can't call me idle, but I'm not fit now for what I once was. I've twice had a miscarriage. And as to John, he's but a poor creature. He's been to the shepherd at Zerlau, but he couldn't do him no good, and . . . you can't do more than you've strength for. . . . We works as hard as ever we can. This many a ⁴⁰ week I've been at it till far on into the night. An' we'll keep our heads above water right enough if I can just get a bit of strength into me. But you must have pity on us, Mr. Pfeifer, sir. [Eagerly, coaxingly.] You'll please be so very kind as to let me have a few pence on the next job, sir?

PFEIFER [paying no attention]. Fiedler, one and twopence.

WEAVER'S WIFE. Only a few pence, to buy bread with. We can't get no more credit. We've a lot ⁵⁰ of little ones.

NEUMANN [half aside to the APPRENTICE, in a serio-comic tone]. "Every year brings a child to the linen-weaver's wife, heigh-ho, heigh-ho, heigh."

APPRENTICE [takes up the rhyme, half singing]. "And the little brat it's blind the first weeks of its life, heigh-ho, heigh-ho, heigh."

REIMANN [not touching the money which the cashier has counted out to him]. We've always got one and fourpence for the web.

PFEIFER [calls across]. If our terms don't suit you, Reimann, you have only to say so. There's no scarcity of weavers—especially of your sort. For full weight we give full pay.

REIMANN. How anything can be wrong with the weight is past . . .

PFEIFER. You bring a piece of fustian with no faults in it, and there will be no fault in the pay.

REIMANN. It's not possible that there's too many knots in this web.

PFEIFER [examining]. If you want to live well, then be sure you weave well.

HEIBER [Has remained standing near PFEIFER, so as to seize on any favorable opportunity. He laughs at PFEIFER's little witticism, then steps forward and again addresses him.] I wanted to ask you, sir, if you would perhaps have the great kindness not to take my advance of sixpence off to-day's pay? My missus has been bedridden since February. She can't do a hand's turn for me, and I've to pay a bobbin girl. And so . . .

PFEIFER [takes a pinch of snuff]. Heiber, do you think I have no one to attend to but you? The others must have their turn.

REIMANN. As the warp was given me I took it home and fastened it to the beam. I can't bring back better yarn than I get.

PFEIFER. If you are not satisfied, you need come for no more. There are plenty ready to tramp the soles off their shoes to get it.

NEUMANN [to REIMANN]. Do you not want your money?

REIMANN. I can't bring myself to take such pay.

NEUMANN [paying no further attention to REIMANN]. Heiber, one shilling. Deduct sixpence for pay in advance. Leave sixpence.

HEIBER [goes up to the table, looks at the money, stands shaking his head as if unable to believe his eyes, then slowly takes it up]. Well, I never!—[Sighing.] Oh, dear, oh, dear!

OLD BAUMERT [looking into HEIBER's face]. Yes, Franz, that's so! There's matter enough for sighing.

HEIBER [speaking with difficulty]. I've a girl lying sick at home, too, an' she needs a bottle of medicine.

OLD BAUMERT. What's wrong with her?

HEIBER. Well, you see, she's always been a sickly bit of a thing. I don't know. . . . I needn't mind tellin' you—she brought her trouble with her. It's in her blood, and it breaks out here, there, and everywhere.

OLD BAUMERT. It's always the way. Let folks be poor, and one trouble comes to them on the top of another. There's no help for it and there's no end to it.

HEIBER. What are you carryin' in that cloth, 10 Father Baumert?

OLD BAUMERT. We haven't so much as a bite in the house, and so I've had the little dog killed. There's not much on him, for the poor beast was half starved. A nice little dog he was! I couldn't kill him myself. I hadn't the heart to do it.

PFEIFER [has inspected BECKER's web—calls]. Becker, one and threepence.

BECKER. That's what you might give to a beggar: it's not pay.

PFEIFER. Every one who has been attended to must clear out. We haven't room to turn round in.

BECKER [to those standing near, without lowering his voice]. It's a beggarly pittance, nothing else. A man works his treadle from early morning till late at night, an' when he has bent over his loom for days an' days, tired to death every evening, sick with the dust and the heat, he finds he's made a beggarly one and threepence!

PFEIFER. No impudence allowed here.

BECKER. If you think I'll hold my tongue for your telling, you're much mistaken.

PFEIFER [exclaims]. We'll see about that! [Rushes to the glass door and calls into the office.] Mr. Dreissiger, Mr. Dreissiger, will you be good enough to come here?

Enter DREISSIGER. About forty, full-bodied, asthmatic. Looks severe.

DREISSIGER. What is it, Pfeifer?

PFEIFER [spitefully]. Becker says he won't be told 40 to hold his tongue.

DREISSIGER [draws himself up, throws back his head, stares at BECKER; his nostrils tremble]. Oh, indeed!—Becker. [To PFEIFER.] Is he the man? . . . [The clerks nod.]

BECKER [insolently]. Yes, Mr. Dreissiger, yes! [Pointing to himself.] This is the man. [Pointing to DREISSIGER.] And that's a man, too!

DREISSIGER [angrily]. Fellow, how dare you?

PFEIFER. He's too well off. He'll go dancing on 50 the ice once too often, though.

BECKER [recklessly]. You shut up, you Jack-in-the-box. Your mother must have gone dancing once too often with Satan to have got such a devil for a son.

DREISSIGER [now in a violent passion, roars]. Hold your tongue this moment, sir, or . . .

He trembles and takes a few steps forward.

BECKER [holding his ground steadily]. I'm not deaf. My hearing's quite good yet.

DREISSIGER [controls himself, asks in an apparently cool business tone]. Was this fellow not one of the pack? . . .

PFEIFER. He's a Bielau weaver. When there's any mischief going, they are sure to be in it.

DREISSIGER [trembling]. Well, I give you all warning: if the same thing happens again as last night—a troop of half-drunken cubs marching past my windows singing that low song . . .

BECKER. Is it "Bloody Justice" you mean?

DREISSIGER. You know well enough what I mean. 20 I tell you that if I hear it again I'll get hold of one of you, and—mind, I'm not joking—before the justice he shall go. And if I can find out who it was that made up that vile doggerel . . .

BECKER. It's a beautiful song, that's what it is!

DREISSIGER. Another word and I send for the police on the spot, without more ado. I'll make short work with you young fellows. I've got the better of very different men before now.

BECKER. I believe you there. A real thoroughbred 30 manufacturer will get the better of two or three hundred weavers in the time it takes you to turn round—swallow them up, and not leave as much as a bone. He's got four stomachs like a cow, and teeth like a wolf. That's nothing to him at all!

DREISSIGER [to his clerks]. That man gets no more work from us.

BECKER. It's all the same to me whether I starve at my loom or by the roadside.

DREISSIGER. Out you go, then, this moment! . . .

BECKER [determinedly]. Not without my pay.

DREISSIGER. How much is owing to the fellow, Neumann?

NEUMANN. One and threepence.

DREISSIGER [takes the money hurriedly out of the cashier's hand, and flings it on the table, so that some of the coins roll off on to the floor]. There you are, then; and now, out of my sight with you!

BECKER. Not without my pay.

DREISSIGER. Do you not see it lying there? If 50 you don't take it and go . . . It's exactly twelve now . . . The dyers are coming out for their dinner. . . .

BECKER. I get my pay into my hand—here.

Points with the fingers of his right hand at the palm of his left.

DREISSIGER [to the APPRENTICE]. Pick up the money, Tilgner.

The APPRENTICE lifts the money and puts it into BECKER's hand.

BECKER. Everything in proper order.
Deliberately takes an old purse out of his pocket and puts the money into it.

DREISSIGER [as BECKER still does not move away].¹⁰ Well? Do you want me to come and help you?

Signs of agitation are observable among the crowd of weavers. A long, loud sigh is heard, and then a fall. General interest is at once diverted to this new event.

DREISSIGER. What's the matter there?

CHORUS OF WEAVERS AND WOMEN. "Some one's fainted."—"It's a little sickly boy."—"Is it a fit, or what?"

DREISSIGER. What do you say? Fainted? [*He goes*²⁰ nearer.]

OLD WEAVER. There he lies, any way.
They make room. A boy of about eight is seen lying on the floor as if dead.

DREISSIGER. Does any one know the boy?

OLD WEAVER. He's not from our village.

OLD BAUMERT. He's like one of Weaver Heinrich's boys. [Looks at him more closely.] Yes, that's Heinrich's little Philip.

DREISSIGER. Where do they live?

OLD BAUMERT. Up near us in Kaschbach, sir. He goes round playin' music in the evenings, and all day he's at the loom. They've nine children an' a tenth a-coming.

CHORUS OF WEAVERS AND WOMEN. "They're terrible put to it."—"The rain comes through their roof."—"The woman hasn't two shirts among the nine."

OLD BAUMERT [taking the boy by the arm]. Now then, lad, what's wrong with you? Wake up, lad.⁴⁰

DREISSIGER. Some of you help me, and we'll get him up. It's disgraceful to send a sickly child this distance. Bring some water, Pfeifer.

WOMAN [helping to lift the boy]. Surely you're not going to die, lad!

DREISSIGER. Brandy, Pfeifer, brandy will be better.

BECKER [Forgotten by all, has stood looking on. With his hand on the door-latch, he now calls loudly and tauntingly.] Give him something to eat, an' he'll soon be all right. [Goes out.]

DREISSIGER. That fellow will come to a bad end.—Take him under the arm, Neumann. Easy now, easy; we'll get him into my room. What?

NEUMANN. He said something, Mr. Dreissiger. His lips are moving.

DREISSIGER. What—what is it, boy?

Boy [whispers]. I'm h—hungry.

WOMAN. I think he says . . .

DREISSIGER. We'll find out. Don't stop. Let us get him into my room. He can lie on the sofa there. We'll hear what the doctor says.

DREISSIGER, NEUMANN, and the woman lead the boy into the office. The weavers begin to behave like school-children when their master has left the classroom. They stretch themselves, whisper, move from one foot to the other, and in the course of a few moments are conversing loudly.

OLD BAUMERT. I believe as how Becker was right.

CHORUS OF WOMEN AND WEAVERS. "He did say something like that."—"It's nothing new here to fall down from hunger."—"God knows what's to come of them in winter if this cutting down of wages goes on."—"An' this winter the potatoes aren't no good at all."—"Things'll get worse and worse till we're all done for together."

OLD BAUMERT. The best thing a man could do would be put a rope round his neck and hang hisself on his own loom, like Weaver Nentwich. [To another old weaver.] Here, take a pinch. I was at Neurode yesterday. My brother-in-law, he works in the snuff factory there, and he give me a grain or two. Have you anything good in your³⁰ handkercher?

OLD WEAVER. Only a little pearl barley. I was coming along behind Ulbrich the miller's cart, and there was a slit in one of the sacks. I can tell you we'll be glad of it.

OLD BAUMERT. There's twenty-two mills in Peterswaldau, but of all they grind, there's never nothing comes our way.

OLD WEAVER. We must keep up heart. There's always something comes to help us on again.

HEIBER. Yes, when we're hungry, we can pray to all the saints to help us, and if that don't fill our bellies we can put a pebble in our mouths and suck it. Eh, Baumert?

Reënter DREISSIGER, PFEIFER, and NEUMANN.

DREISSIGER. It was nothing serious. The boy is all right again. [Walks about excitedly, panting.] But all the same it's a disgrace. The child's so weak that a puff of wind would blow him over. How people, how any parents can be so thoughtless is⁵⁰ what passes my comprehension. Loading him with two heavy pieces of fustian to carry a good six miles! No one would believe it that hadn't seen it. It simply means that I shall have to make a rule that no goods brought by children will be taken over. [He walks up and down silently for a few moments.] I sincerely trust such a thing will not occur again.—Who gets all the blame for it? Why, of course the manufacturer. It's entirely our fault. If some poor little fellow sticks in the snow in winter and goes to sleep, a special correspondent arrives posthaste, and in two days we have a blood-curdling story served up in all the papers. Is any blame laid on the father, the parents, that send such a child?—not a bit of it. How should they be to blame? It's all the manufacturer's fault—he's made the scapegoat. They flatter the weaver, and give the manufacturer nothing but abuse—he's a cruel man, with a heart like a stone, a wicked fellow, at whose calves every cur of a journalist may take a bite. He lives on the fat of the land, and pays the poor weavers starvation wages. In the flow of his eloquence the writer forgets to mention that such a man has his cares too and his sleepless nights; that he runs risks of which the workman never dreams; that he is often driven distracted by all the calculations he has to make, and all the different things he has to take into account; that he has to struggle for his very life against competition; and that no day passes without some annoyance or some loss. And think of the manufacturer's responsibilities, think of the numbers that depend on him, that look to him for their daily bread. No, no! none of you need wish yourselves in my shoes ³⁰—you would soon have enough of it. [After a moment's reflection.] You all saw how that fellow, that scoundrel Becker, behaved. Now he'll go and spread about all sorts of tales of my hard-heartedness, of how my weavers are turned off for a mere trifle, without a moment's notice. Is that true? Am I so very unmerciful?

CHORUS OF VOICES. No, sir.

DREISSIGER. It doesn't seem to me that I am. And yet these ne'er-do-wells come round singing low songs about us manufacturers—prating about hunger, with enough in their pockets to pay for quarts of bad brandy. If they would like to know what want is, let them go and ask the linen-weavers: they can tell something about it. But you here, you fustian-weavers, have every reason to thank God that things are no worse than they are. And I put it to all the old, industrious weavers present: Is a good workman able to gain a living in my employment, or is he not?

MANY VOICES. Yes, sir; he is, sir.

DREISSIGER. There now! You see! Of course such a fellow as that Becker can't. I advise you to keep these young lads in check. If there's much more of this sort of thing, I'll shut up shop—give up the business altogether, and then you can shift for yourselves, get work where you like—perhaps Mr. Becker will provide it.

FIRST WEAVER'S WIFE [has come close to DREISSIGER, obsequiously removes a little dust from his coat]. You've been an' rubbed ag'in' something, sir.

DREISSIGER. Business is as bad as it can be just now, you know that yourselves. Instead of making money, I am losing it every day. If, in spite of this, I take care that my weavers are kept in work, I look for some little gratitude from them. I have thousands of pieces of cloth in stock, and don't know if I'll ever be able to sell them. Well, now, I've heard how many weavers hereabouts are out of work, and—I'll leave Pfeifer to give the particulars—but this much I'll tell you, just to show you my good will. . . . I can't deal out charity all round; I'm not rich enough for that; but I can give the people who are out of work the chance of earning at any rate a little. It's a great business risk I run by doing it, but that's my affair. I say to myself: Better that a man should work for a bite of bread than that he should starve altogether. Am I not right?

CHORUS OF VOICES. Yes, yes, sir.

DREISSIGER. And therefore I am ready to give employment to two hundred more weavers. Pfeifer will tell you on what conditions. [He turns to go.]

FIRST WEAVER'S WIFE [comes between him and the door, speaks hurriedly, eagerly, imploringly]. Oh, if you please, sir, will you let me ask you if you'll be so good . . . I've been twice laid up for . . .

DREISSIGER [hastily]. Speak to Pfeifer, good woman. I'm too late as it is. [Passes on, leaving her standing.]

REIMANN [Stops him again. In an injured, complaining tone.] I have a complaint to make, if you please, sir. Mr. Pfeifer refuses to . . . I've always got one and twopence for a web . . .

DREISSIGER [interrupts him]. Mr. Pfeifer's my manager. There he is. Apply to him.

HEIBER [detaining DREISSIGER; hurriedly and confusedly]. O sir, I wanted to ask if you would p'r'aps, if I might p'r'aps . . . if Mr. Pfeifer might . . . might . . .

DREISSIGER. What is it you want?

⁵⁰ HEIBER. That advance pay I had last time, sir; I thought p'r'aps you would kindly . . .

DREISSIGER. I have no idea what you are talking about.

HEIBER. I'm awful hard up, sir, because . . .

DREISSIGER. These are things Pfeifer must look into—I really have not the time. Arrange the matter with Pfeifer.

He escapes into the office. The supplicants look helplessly at one another, sigh, and take their places again among the others.

PFEIFER [resuming his task of inspection]. Well, Annie, let us see what yours is like.

OLD BAUMERT. How much are we to get for the 10 web, then, Mr. Pfeifer?

HEIBER. One shilling a web.

OLD BAUMERT. Has it come to that!
Excited whispering and murmuring among the weavers.

ACT II

A small room in the house of WILHELM ANSORGE, weaver and house-owner in the village of Kasch-²⁰ bach, in the Eulengebirge.

In this room, which does not measure six feet from the dilapidated wooden floor to the smoke-blackened rafters, sit four people. Two young girls, EMMA and BERTHA BAUMERT, are working at their looms; MOTHER BAUMERT, a decrepit old woman, sits on a stool beside the bed, with a winding-wheel in front of her; her idiot son AUGUST sits on a footstool, also winding. He is twenty, has a small body and head, and long,³⁰ spider-like legs and arms.

Faint, rosy evening light makes its way through two small windows in the right wall, which have their broken panes pasted over with paper or stuffed with straw. It lights up the flaxen hair of the girls, which falls loose on their slender white necks and thin bare shoulders, and their coarse chemises. These, with a short petticoat of the roughest linen, form their whole attire. The warm glow falls on the old woman's face, neck,⁴⁰ and breast—a face worn away to a skeleton, with shriveled skin and sunken eyes, red and watery with smoke, dust, and working by lamplight; a long goitre neck, wrinkled and sinewy; a hollow breast covered with faded, ragged shawls.

Part of the right wall is also lighted up, with stove, stove-bench, bedstead, and one or two gaudily colored sacred prints. On the stove-rail rags are hanging to dry, and behind the stove is a collection of worthless lumber. On the bench stand⁵⁰ some old pots and cooking-utensils, and potato-parings are laid out on it, on paper, to dry. Hanks of yarn and reels hang from the rafters; baskets of bobbins stand beside the looms. In the backwall there is a low door without fastening. Beside it a bundle of willow wands is set up against the wall, and beyond them lie some damaged quarter-bushel baskets.

The room is full of sound—the rhythmic thud of the looms, shaking floor and walls, the click and rattle of the shuttles passing back and forward, and the steady whirr of the winding-wheels, like the hum of gigantic bees.

MOTHER BAUMERT [in a querulous, feeble voice, as the girls stop weaving and bend over their webs]. Got to make knots again already, have you?

EMMA [the elder of the two girls, about twenty-two, tying a broken thread]. It's the plagueyest web, this!

BERTHA [fifteen]. Yes, it's real bad yarn they've given us this time.

EMMA. What can have happened to father? He's been away since nine.

MOTHER BAUMERT. You may well ask. Where in the wide world can he be?

BERTHA. Don't you worry yourself, mother.

MOTHER BAUMERT. I can't help it, Bertha lass.

EMMA begins to weave again.

BERTHA. Stop a minute, Emma!

EMMA. What is it!

BERTHA. I thought I heard some one.

EMMA. It'll be Ansgorge coming home.

Enter FRITZ, a little, barefooted, ragged boy of four.

FRITZ [whimpering]. I'm hungry, mother.

EMMA. Wait, Fritz, wait a bit! Gran'father will be here very soon, an' he's bringin' bread along with him, an' coffee, too.

FRITZ. But I'm awful hungry, mother.

EMMA. Be a good boy now, Fritz. Listen to what I'm tellin' you. He'll be here this minute. He's bringin' nice bread an' nice corn-coffee; an' when we stop working mother'll take the tater peelin's and carry them to the farmer, and the farmer'll give her a drop o' good skim milk for her little boy.

FRITZ. Where's grandfather gone?

EMMA. To the manufacturer, Fritz, with a web.

FRITZ. To the manufacturer?

EMMA. Yes, yes, Fritz; down to Dreissiger's at Peterswaldau.

FRITZ. Is it there he gets the bread?

EMMA. Yes; Dreissiger gives him money, and then he buys the bread.

FRITZ. Does he give him a heap of money?

EMMA [impatiently]. Oh, stop that chatter, boy.

She and BERTHA go on weaving for a time, and then both stop again.

BERTHA. August, go and ask Ansoerge if he'll give us a light.

AUGUST goes out accompanied by FRITZ.

MOTHER BAUMERT [overcome by her childish apprehension, whimpers]. Emma! Berthal where can father be?

BERTHA. He'll have looked in to see Hauffen.

MOTHER BAUMERT [crying]. What if he's sittin' ¹⁰ drinkin' in the public house?

EMMA. Don't cry, mother! You know well enough father's not the man to do that.

MOTHER BAUMERT [half distracted by a multitude of gloomy forebodings]. What . . . what . . . what's to become of us if he doesn't come home?—if he drinks the money, and brings us nothin' at all? There's not so much as a handful of salt in the house—not a bite o' bread, nor a bit o' wood for the fire.

BERTHA. Wait a bit, mother! It's moonlight just now. We'll take August with us and go into the wood and get some sticks.

MOTHER BAUMERT. Yes, an' be caught by the forester.

ANSORGE, an old weaver of gigantic stature, who has to bend down to get into the room, puts his head and shoulders in at the door. Long, unkempt hair and beard.

ANSORGE. What's wanted?

BERTHA. Light, if you please.

ANSORGE [in a muffled voice, as if speaking in a sick-room]. There's good daylight yet.

MOTHER BAUMERT. Are we to sit in the dark next?

ANSORGE. I've to do the same myself. [Goes out.]

BERTHA. It's easy to see that he's a miser.

EMMA. Well, there's nothin' for it but to sit an' wait his pleasure.

Enter MRS. HEINRICH, a woman of thirty, enceinte; an expression of torturing anxiety and apprehen-⁴⁰ sion on her worn face.

MRS. HEINRICH. Good-evenin' t' you all.

MOTHER BAUMERT. Well, Jenny, and what's your news?

MRS. HEINRICH [who limps]. I've got a piece o' glass into my foot.

BERTHA. Come an' sit down, then, an' I'll see if I can get it out.

MRS. HEINRICH seats herself. BERTHA kneels down in front of her, and examines her foot.

MOTHER BAUMERT. How are you all at home, Jenny?

MRS. HEINRICH [breaks out despairingly]. Things is in a terrible way with us!

She struggles in vain against a rush of tears; then weeps silently.

MOTHER BAUMERT. The best thing as could happen to the likes of us, Jenny, would be if God had pity on us an' took us away out o' this weary world.

MRS. HEINRICH [no longer able to control herself, screams, still crying]. My children's starvin'. [Sobs and moans.] I'm at my wits' ends. Let me work till I fall down—I'm more dead than alive—it's all no use. Am I able to fill nine hungry mouths? We got a bit o' bread last night, but it wasn't enough even for the two smallest ones. Who was I to give it to, eh? They all cried: Me, me, mother! give it to me! . . . An' if it's like this while I'm still on my feet, what'll it be when I've to take to bed? Our few taters was washed away. We haven't a thing to put in our mouths.

BERTHA [has removed the bit of glass and washed²⁰ the wound]. We'll put a rag around it. Emma, see if you can find one.

MOTHER BAUMERT. We're no better off than you, Jenny.

MRS. HEINRICH. You have your girls, anyway. You've a husband as can work. Mine was taken with one of his fits last week again—so bad that I didn't know what to do with him, and was half out o' my mind with fright. And when he's had a turn like that, he can't stir out of bed under a ³⁰ week.

MOTHER BAUMERT. Mine's no better. His breathin' 's bad now as well as his back. An' there's not a farthin' nor a farthin's worth in the house. If he don't bring a few pence with him to-day, I don't know what we're to do.

EMMA. It's the truth she's tellin' you, Jenny. We had to let father take the little dog with him to-day, to have him killed, that we might get a bite into our stomachs again!

MRS. HEINRICH. Have you not got as much as a handful of flour to spare?

MOTHER BAUMERT. And that we have not, Jenny. There's not as much as a grain of salt in the house.

MRS. HEINRICH. Oh, whatever am I to do? [Rises; stands still, brooding.] I don't know what'll be the end of this! It's more nor I can bear. [Screams in rage and despair.] I would be contented if it was nothin' but pigs' food!—But I can't go home again ⁵⁰ empty-handed—that I can't. God forgive me, I see no other way out of it. [She limps quickly out.]

MOTHER BAUMERT [calls after her in a warning voice]. Jenny, Jenny! don't you be doin' anything foolish, now!

BERTHA. She'll do herself no harm, mother. You needn't be afraid.

EMMA. That's the way she always goes on. [Sits herself at the loom and weaves for a few seconds.]

AUGUST enters, carrying a tallow candle, and lighting his father, OLD BAUMERT, who follows close behind him, staggering under a heavy bundle of yarn.

MOTHER BAUMERT. Oh, father, where have you been all this long time? Where have you been?

OLD BAUMERT. Come now, mother, don't fall on a man like that. Give me time get my breath first. An' look who I've brought with me.

MORITZ JAEGER comes stooping in at the low door.

Reserve soldier, newly discharged. Middle height, rosy-cheeked, military carriage. His cap on the side of his head, hussar fashion, whole clothes and shoes, a clean shirt without collar. Draws himself up and salutes.

JAEGER [in a hearty voice]. Good-evening, Auntie Baumert!

MOTHER BAUMERT. Well, well, now! And to think you've got back! An' you've not forgotten us? Take a chair, then, lad.

EMMA [wiping a wooden chair with her apron, and pushing it toward MORITZ]. An' so you've come to see what poor folks are like again, Moritz?

JAEGER. I say, Emma, is it true that you've got a boy nearly old enough to be a soldier? Where did you get hold of him, eh?

BERTHA, having taken the small supply of provisions which her father has brought, puts meat into a saucepan, and shoves it into the oven, while AUGUST lights the fire.

BERTHA. You knew Weaver Finger, didn't you?

MOTHER BAUMERT. We had him here in the house with us. He was ready enough to marry her; but he was too far gone in consumption; he was as good as a dead man. It didn't happen for want of warning from me. But do you think she would listen? Not she. Now he's dead an' forgotten long ago, an' she's left with the boy to provide for as best she can. But now tell us how you've been gettin' on, Moritz.

OLD BAUMERT. You've only to look at him, mother, to know that. He's had luck. It'll be about as much as he can do to speak to the likes of us. He's got clothes like a prince, an' a silver watch, an' thirty shillings in his pocket into the bargain.

JAEGER [stretching himself consequentially, a knowing smile on his face]. I can't complain. I didn't get on at all badly in the regiment.

OLD BAUMERT. He was the major's own servant.

Just listen to him—he speaks like a gentleman.

JAEGER. I've got so accustomed to it that I can't help it.

MOTHER BAUMERT. Well, now, to think that such a good-for-nothing as you were should have come to be a rich man. For there wasn't nothing to be made of you. You would never sit still to wind more than a hank of yarn at a time, that you wouldn't. Off you went to your tom-tit boxes an' your robin redbreast snares—they was all you cared about. Is it not the truth I'm telling?

JAEGER. Yes, yes, auntie, it's true enough. It wasn't only redbreasts. I went after swallows, too.

EMMA. Though we were always tellin' you that swallows were poison.

JAEGER. What did I care?—But how have you all been getting on, Auntie Baumert?

MOTHER BAUMERT. Oh, badly, lad, badly these last four years. I've had the rheumatics—just look at them hands. And it's more than likely as I've had a stroke o' some kind, too, I'm that helpless. I can hardly move a limb, an' nobody knows the pains I suffers.

OLD BAUMERT. She's in a bad way, she is. She'll not hold out long.

BERTHA. We've to dress her in the mornin' an' undress her at night, an' to feed her like a baby.

MOTHER BAUMERT [speaking in a complaining, tearful voice]. Not a thing can I do for myself. It's far worse than bein' ill. For it's not only a burden to myself I am, but to every one else. Often and often do I pray to God to take me. For oh! mine's a weary life. I don't know . . . p'raps they think . . . but I'm one that's been a hard worker all my days. An' I've always been able to do my turn, too; but now, all at once [she vainly attempts to rise]. I can't do nothing.—I've a good husband an' good children, but to have to sit here and see them! . . . Look at the girls! There's hardly any blood left in them—faces the color of a sheet. But on they must work at these weary looms whether they earn enough to keep themselves or not. What sort o' life is it they lead? Their feet never off the treadle from year's end to year's end. An' with it all they can't scrape together as much as'll buy them clothes that they can let themselves be seen in; never a step can they go to church, to hear a word of comfort. They're liker scarecrows than young girls of fifteen and twenty.

BERTHA [at the stove]. It's beginnin' to smoke again!

OLD BAUMERT. There now; look at that smoke. And we can't do nothin' for it. The whole stove's goin' to pieces. We must let it fall, and swallow the soot. We're coughin' already, one worse than the other. We may cough till we choke, or till we cough our lungs up—nobody cares.

JAEGER. But this here is Ansortge's business; he must see to the stove.

BERTHA. He'll see us out of the house first; he has plenty against us without that.

MOTHER BAUMERT. We've only been in his way this long time past.

OLD BAUMERT. One word of complaint an' out ¹⁰ we go. He's had no rent from us this last half-year.

MOTHER BAUMERT. A well-off man like him needn't be so hard.

OLD BAUMERT. He's no better off than we are, mother. He's hard put to it, too, for all he holds his tongue about it.

MOTHER BAUMERT. He's got his house.

OLD BAUMERT. What are you talkin' about, mother? Not one stone in the wall is the man's own.

JAEGER [has seated himself, and taken a short pipe with gay tassels out of one coat-pocket, and a quart bottle of brandy out of another]. Things can't go on like this. I'm dumbfounded when I see the life the people live here. The very dogs in the towns live better.

OLD BAUMERT [eagerly]. That's what I say! Eh? eh? You know it, too! But if you say that here, they'll tell you that it's only bad times.

Enter ANSORGE, an earthenware pan with soup in ³⁰ one hand, in the other a half-finished quarter-bushel basket.

ANSORGE. Glad to see you again, Moritz!

JAEGER. Thank you, Father Ansortge—same to you!

ANSORGE [shoving his pan into the oven]. Why, lad, you look like a duke!

OLD BAUMERT. Show him your watch, Moritz! An' he's got a new suit of clothes besides them he's on, an' thirty shillings in his purse.

ANSORGE [shaking his head]. Is that so? Well, well!

EMMA [puts the potato-parings into a bag]. I must be off; I'll maybe get a drop o' skim milk for these. [Goes out.]

JAEGER [the others hanging on his words]. You know how you all used to be down on me. It was always: Wait, Moritz, till your soldiering time comes—you'll catch it then. But you see how well I've got on. At the end of the first half-year I had ⁵⁰ got my good conduct stripes. You've got to be willing—that's where the secret lies. I brushed the sergeant's boots; I groomed his horse; I fetched his beer. I was as sharp as a needle. Always ready, accoutrements clean and shining—first at stables, first at roll-call, first in the saddle. And when the bugle sounded to the assault—why, then, blood and thunder, and ride to the devil with you! I was as keen as a pointer. Says I to myself: There's no help for it now, my boy, it's got to be done; and I set my mind to it and did it. Till at last the major said before the whole squadron: There's a hussar now that shows you what a hussar should be!

Silence. He lights his pipe.

ANSORGE [shaking his head]. Well, well, well! You had luck with you, Moritz.

Sits down on the floor, with his willow twigs beside him, and continues mending the basket, which he holds between his legs.

OLD BAUMERT. Let's hope you've brought some of it to us.—Are we to have a drop to drink your health in?

²⁰ JAEGER. Of course you are, Father Baumert. And when this bottle's done, we'll send for more. [He flings a coin on the table.]

ANSORGE [open-mouthed with amazement]. Oh, my! Oh, my! What goes on to be sure! Roast meat frizzlin' in the oven! A bottle o' brandy on the table! [He drinks out of the bottle.] Here's to you, Moritz!—Well, well, well!

The bottle circulates freely after this.

OLD BAUMERT. If we could anyway have a bit o' meat on Sundays and holidays, instead of never seein' the sight of it from year's end to year's end! Now we'll have to wait till another poor little dog find its way into the house like this one did four weeks gone by—an' that's not likely to happen soon again.

ANSORGE. Have you killed the little dog?

OLD BAUMERT. We had to do that or starve.

ANSORGE. Well, well!

MOTHER BAUMERT. A nice, kind little beast he ⁴⁰ was, too!

JAEGER. Are you as keen as ever on roast dog hereabouts?

OLD BAUMERT. My word, if we could only get enough of it!

MOTHER BAUMERT. A nice little bit o' meat like that does you a lot o' good.

OLD BAUMERT. Have you lost the taste for it, Moritz? Stay with us a bit, and it'll soon come back to you.

ANSORGE [sniffing]. Yes, yes! That will be a tasty bite—what a good smell it has!

OLD BAUMERT [sniffing]. Splendid!

ANSORGE. Come, then, Moritz, tell us your opinion, you that's been out and seen the world. Are things at all like improving for us weavers, eh?

JAEGER. They would need to.

ANSORGE. We're in an awful state here. It's not livin' an' it's not dyin'. A man fights to the bitter end, but he's bound to be beat at last—to be left without a roof over his head, you may say without ground under his feet. As long as he can work at the loom he can earn some sort o' poor, miserable livin'. But it's many a day since I've been able to¹⁰ get that sort o' job. Now I tries to put a bite into my mouth with this here basket-makin'. I sits at it late into the night, and by the time I tumbles into bed I've earned three-halfpence. I put it to you if a man can live on that, when everything's so dear? Nine shillin' goes in one lump for house tax, three shillin' for land tax, nine shillin' for mortgage interest—that makes one pound one. I may reckon my year's earnin' at just double that money, and that leaves me twenty-one shillin' for a whole year's²⁰ food, an' fire, an' clothes, an' shoes; and I've got to keep up some sort of a place to live in. Is it any wonder if I'm behind-hand with my interest payments?

OLD BAUMERT. Some one would need to go to Berlin and tell the King how hard put to it we are.

JAEGER. Little good that would do, Father Baumert. There's been plenty written about it in the newspapers. But the rich people, they can turn and twist things round . . . as cunning as the devil himself.

OLD BAUMERT [shaking his head]. To think they've no more sense than that in Berlin!

ANSORGE. And is it really true, Moritz? Is there no law to help us? If a man hasn't been able to scrape together enough to pay his mortgage interest, though he's worked the very skin off his hands, must his house be taken from him? The peasant that's lent the money on it, he wants his rights—⁴⁰ what else can you look for from him? But what's to be the end of it all, I don't know.—If I'm put out o' the house. . . . [In a voice choked by tears.] I was born here, and here my father sat at his loom for more than forty year. Many was the time he said to mother: Mother, when I'm gone, the house'll still be here. I've worked hard for it. Every nail means a night's weaving, every plank a year's dry bread. A man would think that . . .

JAEGER. They're quite fit to take the last bite out⁵⁰ of your mouth—that's what they are.

ANSORGE. Well, well, well! I would rather be carried out than have to walk out now in my old days. Who minds dyin'? My father, he was glad to die. At the very end he got frightened, but I crept into bed beside him, an' he quieted down again. I was a lad of thirteen then. I was tired and fell asleep beside him—I knew no better—and when I woke he was quite cold.

MOTHER BAUMERT [after a pause]. Give Ansortge his soup out o' the oven, Bertha.

BERTHA. Here, Father Ansortge, it'll do you good.

ANSORGE [eating and shedding tears]. Well, well! OLD BAUMERT has begun to eat the meat out of the saucepan.

MOTHER BAUMERT. Father, father, can't you have patience an' let Bertha serve it up properly?

OLD BAUMERT [chewing]. It's two years now since I took the Sacrament. I went straight after that an' sold my Sunday coat, an' we bought a good bit o' pork, an' since then never a mouthful of meat has passed my lips till to-night.

JAEGER. How should we need meat? The manufacturers eat it for us. It's the fat of the land they live on. Whoever doesn't believe that has only to go down to Bielau and Peterswaldau. He'll see fine things there—palace upon palace, with towers and iron railings and plate-glass windows. Who do they all belong to? Why, of course, the manufacturers! No signs of bad times there! Baked and boiled and fried—horses and carriages and governesses—they've money to pay for all that and goodness knows how much more. They're swelled out to bursting with pride and good living.

ANSORGE. Things was different in my young days. Then the manufacturers let the weaver have his share. Now they keep everything to theirselves. An' would you like to know what's at the bottom of it all? It's that the fine folks nowadays believes neither in God nor devil. What do they care about commandments or punishments? And so they steal our last scrap o' bread, an' leave us no chance of earnin' the barest living. For it's their fault. If our manufacturers was good men, there would be no bad times for us.

JAEGER. Listen, then, and I'll read you something that will please you. [He takes one or two loose papers from his pocket.] I say, August, run and fetch another quart from the public-house. Eh, boy, do you laugh all day long?

MOTHER BAUMERT. No one knows why, but our August's always happy—grins an' laughs, come what may. Off with you, then, quick! [Exit AUGUST with the empty brandy-bottle.] You've got something good now, eh, father?

OLD BAUMERT [still chewing; spirits rising from the effect of food and drink]. Moritz, you're the very man we want. You can read an' write. You understand the weavin' trade, and you've a heart to feel for the poor weavers' sufferin's. You should stand up for us here.

JAEGER. I'd do that quick enough! There's nothing I'd like better than to give the manufacturers round here a bit of a fright—dogs that they are! I'm an easy-going fellow, but let me once get worked up into a real rage, and I'll take Dreissiger in the one hand and Dittrich in the other, and knock their heads together till the sparks fly out of their eyes.—If we could only arrange all to join together, we'd soon give the manufacturers a proper lesson . . . without help from King or Government . . . all we'd have to do would be to say: We want this and that, and we don't want the other thing. There would be a change of days then. As soon as they see that there's some pluck in us, they'll cave in. I know the rascals; they're a pack of cowardly hounds.

MOTHER BAUMERT. There's some truth in what you say. I'm not an ill-natured woman. I've always been the one to say as how there must be rich folks as well as poor. But when things come to such a pass as this. . . .

JAEGER. The devil may take them all, for what I care. It would be no more than they deserve.

OLD BAUMERT has quietly gone out.

BERTHA. Where's father?

MOTHER BAUMERT. I don't know where he can have gone.

BERTHA. Do you think he's not been able to stomach the meat, with not gettin' none for so long?

MOTHER BAUMERT [in distress, crying]. There, now, there! He's not even able to keep it down when he's got it. Up it comes again, the only bite o' good food as he's tasted this many a day.

Reënter OLD BAUMERT, crying with rage.

OLD BAUMERT. It's no good! I'm too far gone! Now that I've at last got hold of somethin' with a taste in it, my stomach won't keep it.

He sits down on the bench by the stove crying.

JAEGER [with a sudden violent ebullition of rage]. And yet there are people not far from here, justices they call themselves too, over-fed brutes, that have nothing to do all the year round but invent new ways of wasting their time. And these people say that the weavers would be quite well off if only they weren't so lazy.

ANSORGE. The men as say that are no men at all, they're monsters.

JAEGER. Never mind, Father Ansgorge; we're making the place hot for 'em. Becker and I have been and given Dreissiger a piece of our mind, and before we came away we sang him "Bloody Justice."

ANSORGE. Good Lord! Is that the song?

JAEGER. Yes; I have it here.

ANSORGE. They call it Dreissiger's song, don't they?

JAEGER. I'll read it to you.

MOTHER BAUMERT. Who wrote it?

JAEGER. That's what nobody knows. Now listen. He reads, hesitating like a schoolboy, with incorrect accentuation, but unmistakably strong feeling. Despair, suffering, rage, hatred, thirst for revenge, all find utterance.

The justice to us weavers dealt

Is bloody, cruel, and hateful;

Our life's one torture, long drawn out:

For Lynch law we'd be grateful.

Stretched on the rack day after day,

Hearts sick and bodies aching,

Our heavy sighs their witness bear

To spirits slowly breaking.

The words of the song make a strong impression on OLD BAUMERT. Deeply agitated, he struggles against the temptation to interrupt JAEGER. At last he can keep quiet no longer.

OLD BAUMERT [to his wife, half laughing, half crying, stammering]. Stretched on the rack day after day. Whoever wrote that, mother, wrote the truth. You can bear witness . . . eh, how does it go? "Our heavy sighs their witness bear" . . . what's the rest?

JAEGER. "To spirits slowly breaking."

OLD BAUMERT. You know the way we sigh, mother, day and night, sleepin' and wakin'.

ANSORGE has stopped working, and cowers on the floor, strongly agitated. MOTHER BAUMERT and BERTHA wipe their eyes frequently during the course of the reading.

JAEGER [continues to read].

The Dreissigers true hangmen are,

Servants no whit behind them;

Masters and men with one accord

Set on the poor to grind them.

You villains all, you brood of hell . . .

OLD BAUMERT [trembling with rage, stamping on the floor]. Yes, brood of hell!!!

JAEGER [reads].

You fiends in fashion human,

A curse will fall on all like you,

Who prey on man and woman.

ANSORGE. Yes, yes, a curse upon them!

OLD BAUMERT [clenching his fist threateningly].
You prey on man and woman.

JAEGER [reads].

The suppliant knows he asks in vain,

Vain every word that's spoken.

"If not content, then go and starve—

Our rules cannot be broken."

OLD BAUMERT. What is it? "The suppliant knows he asks in vain"? Every word of it's true . . . every 10 word . . . as true as the Bible. He knows he asks in vain.

ANSORGE. Yes, yes! It's all no good.

JAEGER [reads].

Then think of all our woe and want,

O ye who hear this ditty!

Our struggle vain for daily bread

Hard hearts would move to pity.

But pity's what you've never known,—

You'd take both skin and clothing,

You cannibals, whose cruel deeds

Fill all good men with loathing.

OLD BAUMERT [jumps up, beside himself with excitement]. Both skin and clothing. It's true, it's all true! Here I stand, Robert Baumert, master-weaver of Kaschbach. Who can bring up anything against me? I've been an honest, hard-working man all my life long, an' look at me now! What have I to show for it? Look at me! See what they've made of me! Stretched on the rack day 30 after day. [He holds out his arms.] Feel that! Skin and bone! "You villains all, you brood of hell!" He sinks down on a chair, weeping with rage and despair.

ANSORGE [flings his basket from him into a corner, rises, his whole body trembling with rage, gasps]. And the time's come now for a change, I say. We'll stand it no longer! We'll stand it no longer! Come what may!

ACT III

The common room of the principal public house in Peterswaldau. A large room with a raftered roof supported by a central wooden pillar, round which a table runs. In the back wall, a little to the right of the pillar, is the entrance door, through the opening of which the spacious lobby or outer room is seen, with barrels and brewing utensils. To the right of this door, in the corner, is the 50 bar—a high wooden counter with receptacles for beer-mugs, glasses, etc.; a cupboard with rows of brandy and liqueur bottles on the wall behind, and between counter and cupboard a narrow space for the barkeeper. In front of the bar stands a table with a gay-colored cover, a pretty lamp hanging above it, and several cane chairs placed around it. Not far off, in the right wall, is a door with the inscription: Bar Parlor. Nearer the front on the same side an old eight-day clock stands ticking. At the back, to the left of the entrance door, is a table with bottles and glasses, and beyond this, in the corner, is the great stove. In the left wall there are three small windows. Below them runs a long bench; and in front of each stands a large oblong wooden table, with the end towards the wall. There are benches with backs along the sides of these tables, and at the end of each facing the window stands a wooden chair. The walls are washed blue and decorated with advertisements, colored prints and oleographs, among the latter a portrait of Frederick Wil- 20 liam III.

WELZEL, the publican, a good-natured giant, upwards of fifty, stands behind the counter, letting beer run from a barrel into a glass.

MRS. WELZEL is ironing by the stove. She is a handsome, tidily dressed woman in her thirty-fifth year.

ANNA WELZEL, a good-looking girl of seventeen, with a quantity of beautiful, fair, reddish hair, sits, nicely dressed, with her embroidery, at the table with the colored cover. She looks up from her work for a moment and listens, as the sound of a funeral hymn sung by school-children is heard in the distance.

WIEGAND, the joiner, in his working clothes, is sitting at the same table, with a glass of Bavarian beer before him. His face shows that he understands what the world requires of a man if he is to attain his ends—namely, craftiness, sharpness, 40 and relentless determination.

A COMMERCIAL TRAVELER is seated at the pillar-table, vigorously masticating a beefsteak. He is of middle height, stout and thriving-looking, inclined to jocosity, lively, and impudent. He is dressed in the fashion of the day, and his portmanteau, pattern-case, umbrella, overcoat, and traveling-rug lie on chairs beside him.

WELZEL [carrying a glass of beer to the TRAVELER, 50 but addressing WIEGAND]. The devil's loose in Peterswaldau to-day.

WIEGAND [in a sharp, shrill voice]. That's because it's delivery day at Dreissiger's.

MRS. WELZEL. But they don't generally make such an awful row.

WIEGAND. It's maybe because of the two hundred new weavers that he's going to take on.

MRS. WELZEL [at her ironing]. Yes, yes, that'll be it. If he wants two hundred, six hundred's sure to have come. There's no lack of them.

WIEGAND. You may well say that. There's no fear of their dying out, let them be ever so badly off. They bring more children into the world than we know what do with. [The strains of the funeral hymn are suddenly heard more distinctly.] There's a funeral to-day, too. Weaver Nentwich is dead, as no doubt you know.

WELZEL. He's been long enough about it. He's been goin' about like a livin' ghost this many a day.

WIEGAND. You never saw such a little coffin, Welzel; it was the tiniest, miserablest little thing I ever glued together. And what a corpse! It didn't weigh ninety pounds.

TRAVELER [his mouth full]. What I don't understand's this. . . . Take up whatever paper you like and you'll find the most heartrending accounts of the destitution among the weavers. You get the impression that three-quarters of the people in this neighborhood are starving. Then you come and see a funeral like what's going on just now. I met it as I came into the village. Brass band, school-master, school-children, pastor, and such a procession behind them that you would think it was the Emperor of China that was getting buried. If the people have money to spend on this sort of thing, well! . . . [He takes a drink of beer; puts down the glass; suddenly and jocosely.] What do you say to it, miss? Don't you agree with me?

ANNA gives an embarrassed laugh, and goes on working busily.

TRAVELER. Now, I'll take a bet that these are slippers for papa.

WELZEL. You're wrong, then; I wouldn't put such things on my feet.

TRAVELER. You don't say so! Now, I would give half of what I'm worth if these slippers were for me.

MRS. WELZEL. Oh, you don't know nothing about such things.

WIEGAND [has coughed once or twice, moved his chair, and prepared himself to speak]. You were saying, sir, that you wondered to see such a funeral as this. I tell you, and Mrs. Welzel here will bear me out, that it's quite a small funeral.

TRAVELER. But, my good man . . . what a monstrous lot of money it must cost! Where does that all come from?

WIEGAND. If you'll excuse me for saying so, sir, there's a deal of foolishness among the poorer working-people hereabouts. They have a kind of inordinate idea, if I may say so, of the respect an' duty an' honor they're bound to show to such as are taken from their midst. And when it comes to be a case of parents, then there's no bounds whatever to their superstitiousness. The children and the nearest family scrapes together every farthing they can call their own, an' what's still wanting, that they borrow from some rich man. They run themselves into debt over head and ears; they're owing money to the pastor, to the sexton, and to all concerned. Then there's the victuals an' the drink, an' such like. No, sir, I'm far from speaking against dutifulness to parents; but it's too much when it goes the length of the mourners having to bear the weight of it for the rest of their lives.

TRAVELER. But surely the pastor might reason them out of such foolishness.

WIEGAND. Begging your pardon, sir, but I must mention that every little place hereabouts has its church an' its respected pastor to support. These honorable gentlemen has their advantages from big funerals. The larger the attendance is, the larger the offertory is bound to be. Whoever knows the circumstances connected with the working classes here, sir, will assure you that the pastors are strong against quiet funerals.

Enter HORNIG, the rag-dealer, a little bandy-legged old man, with a strap round his chest.

HORNIG. Good-mornin', ladies and gentlemen! A glass of schnapps, if you please, Mr. Welzel. Has the young mistress anything for me to-day? I've got beautiful ribbons in my cart, Miss Anna, an' tapes, an' garters, an' the very best of pins an' hair-pins an' hooks an' eyes. An' all in exchange for a few rags. [He changes his voice.] An' out of them rags fine white paper's to be made, for your sweet-heart to write you a letter on.

ANNA. Thank you, but I've nothing to do with sweethearts.

MRS. WELZEL [putting a bolt into her iron]. No, she's not that kind. She'll not hear of marrying.

TRAVELER [jumps up, affecting delighted surprise, goes forward to ANNA's table, and holds out his hand to her across it]. That's right, miss. You and I think alike in this matter. Give me your hand on it. We'll both remain single.

ANNA [blushing scarlet, gives him her hand]. But you are married already!

TRAVELER. Not a bit of it. I only pretend to be. You think so because I wear a ring. I only have it on my finger to protect my charms against shameless attacks. I'm not afraid of you, though. [He puts the ring into his pocket.] But tell me, truly, miss, are you quite determined never, never, never, to marry?

ANNA [shakes her head]. Oh, get along with you!

MRS. WELZEL. You may trust her to remain single unless something very extra good turns up.

TRAVELER. And why should it not? I know of a rich Silesian proprietor who married his mother's lady's maid. And there's Dreissiger, the rich manufacturer, his wife is an innkeeper's daughter, too, and not half so pretty as you, miss, though she rides in her carriage now, with servants in livery. And why not? [He marches about, stretching himself, and stamping his feet.] Let me have a cup of coffee, please.

Enter ANSORGE and OLD BAUMERT, each with a ²⁰ bundle. They seat themselves meekly and silently beside HORNIG, at front table to left.

WELZEL. How are you, Father Ansoerge? Glad to see you once again.

HORNIG. Yes, it's not often as you crawl down from that smoky old nest.

ANSORGE [visibly embarrassed, mumbles]. I've been fetchin' myself a web again.

BAUMERT. He's goin' to work at a shilling the web.

ANSORGE. I wouldn't have done it, but there's no more to be made now by basket-weavin'.

WIEGAND. It's always better than nothing. He does it only to give you employment. I know Dreissiger very well. When I was up there taking out his double windows last week we were talking about it, him and me. It's out of pity he does it.

ANSORGE. Well, well, well! That may be so.

WELZEL [setting a glass of schnapps on the table before each of the weavers]. Here you are, then. I ⁴⁰ say, Ansoerge, how long is it since you had a shave? The gentleman over there would like to know.

TRAVELER [calls across]. Now, Mr. Welzel, you know I didn't say that. I was only struck by the venerable appearance of the master-weaver. It isn't often one sees such a gigantic figure.

ANSORGE [scratching his head, embarrassed]. Well, well!

TRAVELER. Such specimens of primitive strength are rare nowadays. We're all rubbed smooth by ⁵⁰ civilization . . . but I can still take pleasure in nature untampered with. . . . These bushy eyebrows! That tangled length of beard!

HORNIG. Let me tell you, sir, that these people haven't the money to pay a barber, and as to a razor for themselves, that's altogether beyond them. What grows, grows. They haven't nothing to throw away on their outsides.

TRAVELER. My good friend, you surely don't imagine that I would. . . . [Aside to WELZEL.] Do you think I might offer the hairy one a beer?

WELZEL. No, no; you mustn't do that. He wouldn't take it. He's got some queer ideas in that ¹⁰ head of his.

TRAVELER. All right, then, I won't. With your permission, miss. [He seats himself at ANNA's table.] I declare, miss, that I've not been able to take my eyes off your hair since I came in—such glossy softness, such a splendid quantity! [Ecstatically kisses his finger-tips.] And what a color! . . . like ripe wheat. Come to Berlin with that hair and you'll create no end of a sensation. On my honor, with hair like that you may go to Court. . . . [Leans back, looking at it.] Glorious, simply glorious!

WIEGAND. They've given her a name because of it.

TRAVELER. And what may that be?

HORNIG. The chestnut filly, isn't it?

WELZEL. Come, now, we've had enough o' this. I'm not goin' to have the girl's head turned altogether. She's had a-plenty of silly notions put into it already. She'll hear of nothing under a count ³⁰ to-day, and to-morrow it'll be a prince.

MRS. WELZEL. You let her alone, father. There's no harm in wantin' to rise in the world. It's as well that people don't all think as you do, or nobody would get on at all. If Dreissiger's grandfather had been of your way of thinkin', they would be poor weavers still. And now they're rollin' in wealth. An' look at old Tromtra. He was nothing but a weaver, too, and now he owns twelve estates, an' he's been made a nobleman into the bargain.

WIEGAND. Yes, Welzel, you must look at the thing fairly. Your wife's in the right this time. I can answer for that. I'd never be where I am, with seven workmen under me, if I had thought like you.

HORNIG. Yes, you understand the way to get on; that your worst enemy must allow. Before the weaver has taken to bed, you're gettin' his coffin ready.

WIEGAND. A man must attend to his business if he's to make anything of it.

HORNIG. No fear of you for that. You know before the doctor when death's on the way to knock at a weaver's door.

WIEGAND [attempting to laugh, suddenly furi- ous]. And you know better than the police where the thieves are among the weavers, that keep back two or three bobbins full every week. It's rags you ask for, but you don't say No, if there's a little yarn among them.

HORNIG. An' your corn grows in the churchyard. The more that are bedded on the sawdust, the better for you. When you see the rows of little children's graves, you pats yourself on the belly, and says you: This has been a good year; the little brats have fallen like cockchafers off the trees. I can allow myself a quart extra in the week again.

WIEGAND. And supposing this is all true, it still doesn't make me a receiver of stolen goods.

HORNIG. No; perhaps the worst you do is to send in an account twice to the rich fustian manufacturers, or to help yourself to a plank or two at Dreissiger's when there's building goin' on and the moon happens not to be shinin'.

WIEGAND [turning his back]. Talk to any one you like, but not to me. [Then suddenly.] Hornig the liar!

HORNIG. Wiegand the coffin-jobber!

WIEGAND [to the rest of the company]. He knows charms for bewitching cattle.

HORNIG. If you don't look out, I'll try one on you.

WIEGAND turns pale.

MRS. WELZEL [had gone out; now returns with the TRAVELER's coffee; in the act of putting it on the table]. Perhaps you would rather have it in the parlor, sir?

TRAVELER. Most certainly not! [With a languishing look at ANNA.] I could sit here till I die.

Enter a YOUNG FORESTER and a PEASANT, the latter carrying a whip. They wish the others "Good-Morning," and remain standing at the counter.

PEASANT. Two brandies, if you please.

WELZEL. Good-morning to you, gentlemen.

He pours out their beverage; the two touch glasses, take a mouthful, and then set the glasses down on the counter.

TRAVELER [to FORESTER]. Come far this morning, sir?

FORESTER. From Steinseiffersdorf—that's a good step.

Two old WEAVERS enter, and seat themselves beside

ANSORGE, BAUMERT, and HORNIG.

TRAVELER. Excuse me asking, but are you in Count Hochheim's service?

FORESTER. No, I'm in Count Keil's.

TRAVELER. Yes, yes, of course—that was what I meant. One gets confused here among all the counts and barons and other gentlemen. It would take a giant's memory to remember them all. Why do you carry an ax, if I may ask?

FORESTER. I've just taken this one from a man who was stealing wood.

OLD BAUMERT. Yes, their lordships are mighty strict with us about a few sticks for the fire.

TRAVELER. You must allow that if every one were to help himself to what he wanted. . . .

OLD BAUMERT. By your leave, sir, but there's a difference made here as elsewhere between the big an' the little thieves. There's some here as deals in stolen wood wholesale, and grows rich on it. But if a poor weaver . . .

FIRST OLD WEAVER [interrupts BAUMERT]. We're forbid to take a single branch; but their lordships, they take the very skin off of us—we've assurance money to pay, an' spinning-money, an' charges in kind—we must go here an' go there, an' do so an' so much field work, all willy-nilly.

ANSORGE. That's just how it is—what the manufacturer leaves us, their lordships takes from us.

SECOND OLD WEAVER [has taken a seat at the next table]. I've said it to his lordship himself. By your leave, my lord, says I, it's not possible for me to work on the estate so many days this year. For why—my own bit of ground, my lord, it's been next to carried away by the rains. I've to work both night and day if I'm to live at all. For oh, what a flood that was! . . . There I stood an' wrung my hands, an' watched the good soil come pourin' down the hill, into the very house! And all that dear, fine seed! . . . I could do nothing but roar an' cry until I couldn't see out o' my eyes for a week. And then I had to start an' wheel eighty heavy barrow-loads of earth up that hill, till my back was all but broken.

PEASANT [roughly]. You weavers here make such an awful outcry. As if we hadn't all to put up with what Heaven sends us. An' if you are badly off just now, whose fault is it but your own? What did you do when trade was good? Drank an' squandered all you made. If you had saved a bit then, you'd have it to fall back on now when times is bad, and not need to be goin' stealin' yarn and wood.

FIRST YOUNG WEAVER [standing with several comrades in the lobby or outer room, calls in at the door]. What's a peasant but a peasant, though he lies in bed till nine?

FIRST OLD WEAVER. The peasant an' the count, it's the same story with 'em both. Says the peasant when a weaver wants a house: I'll give you a little bit of a hole to live in, an' you'll pay me so much rent in money, an' the rest of it you'll make up by helpin' me to get in my hay an' my corn—an' if that doesn't please you, why, then you may go elsewhere. He tries another, and the second he says the same as the first.

BAUMERT [angrily]. The weaver's like a bone that every dog takes a gnaw at.

PEASANT [furious]. You starving curs, you're no good for anything. Can you yoke a plough? Can you draw a straight furrow or throw a bundle of sheaves on to a cart. You're fit for nothing but to ¹⁰ idle about an' go after the women. A pack of scoundrelly ne'er-do-wells!

He has paid and now goes out. The FORESTER follows, laughing. WELZEL, the JOINER, and Mrs. WELZEL laugh aloud; the TRAVELER laughs to himself. Then there is a moment's silence.

HORNIG. A peasant like that's as stupid as his own ox. As if I didn't know all about the distress in the villages round here. Sad sights I've seen! Four and five lyin' naked on one sack of straw.

TRAVELER [in a mildly remonstrative tone]. Allow me to remark, my good man, that there's a great difference of opinion as to the amount of distress here in the Eulengebirge. If you can read . . .

HORNIG. I can read straight off, as well as you. An' I know what I've seen with my own eyes. It would be queer if a man that's traveled the country with a pack on his back these forty years an' more didn't know something about it. There was Fullern, now. You saw the children scraping about among ³⁰ the dung-heaps with the peasants' geese. The people up there died naked, on the bare stone floors. In their sore need they ate the stinking weavers' glue. Hunger carried them off by the hundred.

TRAVELER. You must be aware, since you are able to read, that strict investigation has been made by the Government, and that . . .

HORNIG. Yes, yes, we all know what that means. They send a gentleman that knows all about it already better nor if he had seen it, an' he goes about a bit in the village, at the lower end, where the best houses are. He doesn't want to dirty his shining boots. Thinks he to himself: All the rest'll be the same as this. An' so he steps into his carriage, an' drives away home again, an' then writes to Berlin that there's no distress in the place at all. If he had but taken the trouble to go higher up into a village like that, to where the stream comes in, or across the stream on to the narrow side—or, ⁴⁰ better still, if he'd gone up to the little out-o'-the-way hovels on the hill above, some of 'em that black an' tumbledown as it would be the waste of a good match to set fire to 'em—it's another kind of report he'd have sent to Berlin. They should have come to me, these government gentlemen that wouldn't believe there was no distress here. I would have shown them something. I'd have opened their eyes for 'em in some of these starvation holes.

The strains of the WEAVERS' SONG are heard, sung outside.

WELZEL. There they are, roaring at that devil's song again.

WIEGAND. They're turning the whole place upside down.

Mrs. WELZEL. You'd think there was something in the air.

JAEGER and BECKER arm in arm, at the head of a troop of young weavers, march noisily through the outer room and enter the bar.

JAEGER. Halt! To your places!

The new arrivals sit down at the various tables, and begin to talk to other weavers already seated.

²⁰ HORNIG [calls out to BECKER]. What's up now, Becker, that you've got together a crowd like this?

BECKER [significantly]. Who knows but something may be going to happen? Eh, Moritz?

HORNIG. Come, come, lads. Don't you be a-gettin' of yourselves into mischief.

BECKER. Blood's flowed already. Would you like to see it?

He pulls up his sleeve and shows bleeding tattoo-marks on the upper part of his arm. Many of the other young weavers do the same.

BECKER. We've been at Father Schmidt's gettin' ourselves vaccinated.

HORNIG. Now the thing's explained. Little wonder there's such an uproar in the place, with a band of young rascallions like you paradin' round.

JAEGER [consequently, in a loud voice]. You may bring two quarts at once, Welzel! I pay. Perhaps you think I haven't got the needful. You're wrong, then. If we wanted we could sit an' drink your best brandy an' swill coffee till to-morrow morning with any bagman in the land.

Laughter among the young weavers.

TRAVELER [affecting comic surprise]. Is the young gentleman kind enough to take notice of me?

Host, hostess, and their daughter, WIEGAND, and the TRAVELER all laugh.

JAEGER. If the cap fits wear it.

TRAVELER. Your affairs seem to be in a thriving condition, young man, if I may be allowed to say so.

JAEGER. I can't complain. I'm a traveler in made-up goods. I go shares with the manufacturers.

The nearer starvation the weaver is, the better I fare. His want butters my bread.

BECKER. Well done, Moritz! You gave it to him that time. Here's to you!

WELZEL has brought the corn-brandy. On his way back to the counter he stops, turns round slowly, and stands, an embodiment of phlegmatic strength, facing the weavers.

WELZEL [calmly but emphatically]. You let the gentleman alone. He's done you no harm.

YOUNG WEAVERS. And we're doing him no harm.

MRS. WELZEL has exchanged a few words with the TRAVELER. She takes the cup with the remains of his coffee and carries it into the parlor. The TRAVELER follows her amidst the laughter of the weavers.

YOUNG WEAVERS [singing].

"The Dreissigers the hangmen are,
Servants no whit behind them."

WELZEL. Hush-sh! Sing that song anywhere else ²⁰ now, Wittig.

FIRST OLD WEAVER. He's quite right. Stop that singin', lads.

BECKER [roars]. But we must march past Dreissiger's, boys, and let them hear it once more.

WIEGAND. You'd better take care—you may march once too often.

Laughter and cries of Ho, ho!

WITTIG has entered; a gray-haired old smith, bare-headed, with leather apron and wooden shoes, 30 sooty from the smithy. He is standing at the counter waiting for his schnapps.

YOUNG WEAVER. Wittig, Wittig!

WITTIG. Here he is. What do you want with him?

YOUNG WEAVERS. "It's Wittig!"—"Wittig, Wittig!"—"Come here, Wittig."—"Sit beside us, Wittig."

WITTIG. Do you think I would sit beside a set of rascals like you?

JAEGER. Come and take a glass with us.

WITTIG. Keep your brandy to yourselves. I pay for my own drink. [Takes his glass and sits down beside BAUMERT and ANSORGE. Clapping the latter on the stomach.] What's the weavers' food so nice? Sauerkraut and roasted lice!

OLD BAUMERT [excitedly]. But what would you say now if they'd made up their minds as how they would put up with it no longer.

WITTIG [with pretended astonishment, staring 50 open-mouthed at the old weaver]. Heinerle! you don't mean to tell me that that's you? [Laughs immoderately.] O Lord, O Lord! I could laugh myself to death. Old Baumert risin' in rebellion! We'll have the tailors at it next, and then there'll be a rebellion among the baa-lambs, and the rats and the mice. Damn it all, but we'll see some sport. [He nearly splits with laughter.]

OLD BAUMERT. You needn't go on like that, Wittig. I'm the same man I've always been. I still say 't would be better if things could be put right peaceably.

¹⁰ WITTIG. Peaceably! How could it be done peaceably? Did they do it peaceably in France? Did Robespier tickle the rich men's palms? No! It was: Away with them, everyone! To the gilyoteen with them! Allongs onfong! You've got your work before you. The geese'll not fly ready roasted into your mouths.

OLD BAUMERT. If I could make even half a livin'—

FIRST OLD WEAVER. The water's up to our chins now, Wittig.

SECOND OLD WEAVER. We're afraid to go home. It's all the same whether we works or whether we lies abed; it's starvation both ways.

FIRST OLD WEAVER. A man's like to go mad at home.

OLD ANSORGE. It's that length with me now that I don't care how things go.

OLD WEAVERS [with increasing excitement]. "We've no peace anywhere."—"We've no spirit left to work."—"Up with us in Steenkunzendorf you can see a weaver sittin' by the stream washin' hisself the whole day long, naked as God made him. It's driven him clean out of his mind."

THIRD OLD WEAVER [moved by the spirit, stands up and begins to "speak with tongues," stretching out his hand threateningly]. Judgment is at hand! Have no dealings with the rich and the great! Judgment is at hand! The Lord God of Sabaoth . . .

⁴⁰ Some of the weavers laugh. He is pulled down on to his seat.

WELZEL. That's a chap that can't stand a single glass—he gets wild at once.

THIRD OLD WEAVER [jumps up again]. But they—they believe not in God, not in hell, not in heaven. They mock at religion . . .

FIRST OLD WEAVER. Come, come now, that's enough!

BECKER. You let him do his little bit o' preaching. There's many a one would be the better for taking it to heart.

VOICES [in excited confusion]. "Let him alone!"—"Let him speak!"

THIRD OLD WEAVER [raising his voice]. But hell is opened, saith the Lord; its jaws are gaping wide, to swallow up all those that oppress the afflicted and pervert judgment in the cause of the poor.

Wild excitement.

THIRD OLD WEAVER [suddenly declaiming, school-boy fashion].

When one has thought upon it well,

It's still more difficult to tell

Why they the linen-weaver's work despise.

BECKER. But we're fustian-weavers, man.

Laughter.

HORNIG. The linen-weavers is ever so much worse off than you. They're wandering about among the hills like ghosts. You people here have still got the pluck left in you to kick up a row.

WITTIG. Do you suppose the worst's over here? It won't be long till the manufacturers drain away that little bit of strength they still have left in their bodies.

BECKER. You know what he said: It will come to the weavers working for a bite of bread.

Uproar.

SEVERAL OLD AND YOUNG WEAVERS. Who said that?

BECKER. Dreissiger said it.

A YOUNG WEAVER. The damned rascal should be hung up by the heels.

JAEGER. Look here, Wittig. You've always jawed such a lot about the French revolution, and a good deal too about your own doings. A time may be coming, and that before long, when every one will have a chance to show whether he's a braggart or a true man.

WITTIG [flaring up angrily]. Say another word if you dare! Have you heard the whistle of bullets? Have you done outpost duty in an enemy's country?

JAEGER. You needn't get angry about it. We're comrades. I meant no harm.

WITTIG. None of your comradeship for me, you impudent young fool.

Enter KUTCHE, the policeman.

SEVERAL VOICES. Hush—sh! Police!

This calling goes on for some time, till at last there is complete silence, amidst which KUTCHE takes his place at the central pillar-table.

KUTCHE. A small brandy, please.

Again complete silence.

WITTIG. I suppose you've come to see if we're all behaving ourselves, Kutsche?

KUTCHE [paying no attention to Wittig]. Good-morning, Mr. Wiegand.

WIEGAND [still in the corner in front of the counter]. Good-morning t' you, sir.

KUTCHE. How's trade?

WIEGAND. Thank you, much as usual.

BECKER. The chief constable's sent him to see if we're spoiling our stomach on these big wages we're getting.

Laughter.

JAEGER. I say, Welzel, you will tell him how we've been feasting on roast pork an' sauce an' dumplings and sauerkraut, and now we're sitting at our champagne wine.

Laughter.

WELZEL. The world's upside down with them to-day.

KUTCHE. An' even if you had the champagne wine and the roast meat, you wouldn't be satisfied. I've to get on without champagne wine as well as you.

BECKER [referring to KUTCHE's nose]. He waters his beet-root with brandy and gin. An' it thrives upon it, too.

Laughter.

WITTIG. A p'liceman like that has a hard life. Now it's a starving beggar boy he has to lock up, then it's a pretty weaver girl he has to lead astray; then he has to get roarin' drunk an' beat his wife till she goes screamin' to the neighbors for help; and there's the ridin' about on horseback and the lyin' in bed till nine—nay, faith, but it's no easy job!

KUTCHE. Jaw away; you'll jaw a rope round your neck in time. It's long been known what sort of a fellow you are. The magistrates know all about that dangerous tongue of yours. I know who'll drink wife and child into the poorhouse an' himself into jail before long, who it is that'll go on agitatin' and agitatin' till he brings down judgment on himself and all concerned.

WITTIG [laughs bitterly]. It's true enough—no one knows what'll be the end of it. You may be right yet. [Bursts out in fury.] But if it does come to that, I know who I've got to thank for it, who it is that's blabbed to the manufacturers an' all the gentlemen round, an' blackened my character to that extent that they never give me a hand's turn of work to do—an' set the peasants an' the millers against me, so that I'm often a whole week without a horse to shoe or a wheel to put a tire on. I know who's done it. I once pulled the damned brute off his horse, because he was givin' a little stupid boy the most awful flogging for stealin' a few unripe pears. But I tell you this, Kutsche, and you know me—if you get me put into prison, you may make your own will. If I hear as much as a whisper of it, I'll take the first thing as comes handy, whether it's a horseshoe or a hammer, a wheel-spoke or a pail; I'll get hold of you if I've to drag you out of bed from beside your wife, and I'll beat in your brains, as sure as my name's Wittig. [He has jumped up and is going to rush at KUTSCHE.]

OLD AND YOUNG WEAVERS [holding him back]. 10
Wittig, Wittig! Don't lose your head!

KUTSCHE [has risen involuntarily, his face pale. He backs toward the door while speaking. The nearer the door the higher his courage rises. He speaks the last words on the threshold, and then instantly disappears.] What are you goin' on at me about? I didn't meddle with you. I came to say something to the weavers. My business is with them an' not with you, and I've done nothing to you. But I've this to say to you weavers: The Super- 20 intendent of Police herewith forbids the singing of that song—Dreissiger's song, or whatever it is you call it. And if the yelling of it on the streets isn't stopped at once, he'll provide you with plenty of time and leisure for going on with it in jail. You may sing there, on bread and water, to your hearts' content. [Goes out.]

WITTIG [roars after him]. He's no right to forbid it—not if we were to roar till the windows 30 shook an' they could hear us at Reichenbach—not if we sang till the manufacturers' houses tumbled about their ears an' all the Superintendents' helmets danced on the top of their heads. It's nobody's business but our own.

BECKER has in the meantime got up, made a signal for singing, and now leads off, the others joining in.

The justice to us weavers dealt
Is bloody, cruel, and hateful;
Our life's one torture, long drawn out; 40
For Lynch law we'd be grateful.

WELZEL attempts to quiet them but they pay no attention to him. WIEGAND puts his hands to his ears and rushes off. During the singing of the next verse the weavers rise and form into procession behind BECKER and WITTIG, who have given pantomimic signs for a general break-up.

Stretched on the rack, day after day,
Hearts sick and bodies aching,
Our heavy sighs their witness bear 50
To spirit slowly breaking.

Most of the weavers sing the following verse out on the street, only a few young fellows, who are paying, being still in the bar. At the conclusion of the verse no one is left in the room except WELZEL and his wife and daughter, HORNIG, and OLD BAUMERT.

You villains all, you brood of hell,
You fiends in fashion human,
A curse will fall on all like you
Who prey on man and woman.

WELZEL [phlegmatically collecting the glasses].
Their backs are up to-day, and no mistake.

HORNIG [to OLD BAUMERT, who is preparing to go]. What in the name of Heaven are they up to, Baumert?

BAUMERT. They're goin' to Dreissiger's to make him add something on to the pay.

WELZEL. And are you joining in these foolish goings-on?

OLD BAUMERT. I've no choice, Welzel. The young men may an' the old men must. [Goes out rather shamefacedly.]

HORNIG. It'll not surprise me if this ends badly.

WELZEL. To think that even old fellows like him are goin' right off their heads!

HORNIG. We all set our hearts on something!

ACT IV

Peterswaldau. Private room of DREISSIGER, the fusian manufacturer—luxuriously furnished in the chilly taste of the first half of this century. Ceiling, doors, and stove are white, and the wall paper, with its small, straight-lined floral pattern, is dull and cold in tone. The furniture is mahogany, richly-carved, and upholstered in red. On the right, between two windows with crimson damask curtains, stands the writing-table, a high bureau with falling flap. Directly opposite to this is the sofa, with the strong-box beside it; in front of the sofa a table, with chairs and easy-chairs arranged about it. Against the back wall is a gun-cupboard. All three walls are decorated with bad pictures in gilt frames. Above the sofa is a mirror with a heavily gilt rococo frame. On the left an ordinary door leads into the hall. An open folding-door at the back shows the drawing-room, over-furnished in the same style of comfortless splendor. Two ladies, Mrs. DREISSIGER and Mrs. KITTELHAUS, the Pastor's wife, are seen in the drawing-room, looking at pictures. PASTOR KITTELHAUS is there too, engaged in conversation with WEINHOLD, the tutor, a theological graduate.

KITTELHAUS [a kindly little elderly man, enters the front room, smoking and talking to the tutor, who is also smoking; he looks round and shakes his head in surprise at finding the room empty].

You are young, Mr. Weinhold, which explains everything. At your age we old fellows held—well, I won't say the same opinions—but certainly opinions of the same tendency. And there's something fine about youth—youth with its grand ideals. But unfortunately, Mr. Weinhold, they don't last; they are as fleeting as April sunshine. Wait till you are my age. When a man has said his say from the pulpit for thirty years—fifty-two times every year, not including saints' days—he has inevitably calmed down. Think of me, Mr. Weinhold, when you come that length.

WEINHOLD [nineteen, pale, thin, tall, with lanky fair hair; restless and nervous in his movements]. With all due respect, Mr. Kittelhaus—I can't think—people have such different natures.

KITTELHAUS. My dear Mr. Weinhold, however restless-minded and unsettled a man may be—[in a tone of reproof]²⁰—and you are a case in point—however violently and wantonly he may attack the existing order of things, he calms down in the end. I grant you, certainly, that among our professional brethren individuals are to be found, who, at a fairly advanced age, still play youthful pranks. One preaches against the drink evil and founds temperance societies, another publishes appeals which undoubtedly read most effectively. But what good do they do? The distress among the weavers, where it does exist, is in no way lessened—but the peace of society is undermined. No, no; one feels inclined in such cases to say: Cobbler, stick to your last; don't take to caring for the belly, you who have the care of souls. Preach the pure Word of God, and leave all else to Him who provides shelter and food for the birds, and clothes the lilies of the field. But I should like to know where our good host, Mr. Dreissiger, has suddenly disappeared to. MRS. DREISSIGER, followed by MRS. KITTELHAUS, now comes forward. She is a pretty woman of thirty, of a healthy, florid type. A certain discordance is noticeable between her deportment and way of expressing herself and her rich, elegant toilette.

MRS. DREISSIGER. That's what I want to know, too, Mr. Kittelhaus. But it's what William always does. No sooner does a thing come into his head than off he goes and leaves me in the lurch. I've said enough about it, but it does no good.

KITTELHAUS. It's always the way with business men, my dear Mrs. Dreissiger.

WEINHOLD. I'm almost certain that something has happened downstairs.

DREISSIGER enters, hot and excited.

DREISSIGER. Well, Rosa, is coffee served?

MRS. DREISSIGER [sulkily]. Fancy your needing to run away again!

DREISSIGER [carelessly]. Ah! these are things you don't understand.

KITTELHAUS. Excuse me—has anything happened to annoy you, Mr. Dreissiger?

DREISSIGER. Never a day passes without that, my dear sir. I am accustomed to it. What about that coffee, Rosa?

MRS. DREISSIGER goes ill-humoredly and gives one or two violent tugs at the broad embroidered bell-pull.

DREISSIGER. I wish you had been down stairs just now, Mr. Weinhold. You'd have gained a little experience. Besides . . . But now let us have our game of whist.

KITTELHAUS. By all means, sir. Shake off the dust and burden of the day, Mr. Dreissiger; forget it in our company.

DREISSIGER [has gone to the window, pushed aside a curtain, and is looking out]. Vile rabble!! Come here, Rosa! [She goes to the window.] Look . . . that tall red-haired fellow there! . . .

KITTELHAUS. That's the man they call Red Becker.

DREISSIGER. Is he the man that insulted you the day before yesterday? You remember what you told me—when John was helping you into the carriage?

MRS. DREISSIGER [pouting, carelessly]. I'm sure I don't know.

DREISSIGER. Come now, what's the use of being cross? I must know. If he's the man, I mean to have him arrested. [The strains of the Weavers' Song are heard.] Listen to that! Just listen!

KITTELHAUS [highly incensed]. Is there to be no end to this nuisance? I must acknowledge now that it is time for the police to interfere. Permit me. [He goes forward to the window.] See, see, Mr. Weinhold! These are not only young people. There are numbers of steady-going old weavers among them, men whom I have known for years and looked upon as most deserving and God-fearing. There they are, taking part in this intolerable uproar, trampling God's law under foot. Do you mean to tell me that you still defend these people?

WEINHOLD. Certainly not, Mr. Kittelhaus. That is, sir . . . cum grano salis. For after all, they are hungry and they are ignorant. They are giving expression to their dissatisfaction in the only way they understand. I don't expect that such people . . .

MRS. KITTELHAUS [short, thin, faded, more like an old maid than a married woman]. Mr. Weinhold, Mr. Weinhold, how can you?

DREISSIGER. Mr. Weinhold, I am sorry to be obliged to . . . I didn't bring you into my house to give me lectures on philanthropy, and I must request that you will confine yourself to the education of my boys, and leave my other affairs entirely to me—entirely! Do you understand?

WEINHOLD [stands for a moment rigid and deathly pale, then bows, with a strained smile. In a low voice.] Certainly, of course I understand. I have seen this coming. It is my wish too. [Goes out.]

DREISSIGER [rudely]. As soon as possible then, please. We require the room.

MRS. DREISSIGER. William, William!

DREISSIGER. Have you lost your senses, Rosa, that you're taking the part of a man who defends a low, blackguardly libel like that song?

MRS. DREISSIGER. But, William, he didn't defend it.

DREISSIGER. Mr. Kittelhaus, did he defend it or did he not?

KITTELHAUS. His youth must be his excuse, Mr. Dreissiger.

MRS. KITTELHAUS. I can't understand it. The young man comes of such a good, respectable family. His father held a public appointment for forty years, without a breath on his reputation. His mother was overjoyed at his getting this good situation here. And now . . . he himself shows so little appreciation of it.

PFEIFER [suddenly opens the door leading from the hall and shouts in]. Mr. Dreissiger, Mr. Dreissiger! they've got him! Will you come, please? They've caught one of them.

DREISSIGER [hastily]. Has some one gone for the police?

PFEIFER. The Superintendent's on his way upstairs.

DREISSIGER [at the door]. Glad to see you, sir. We want you here.

KITTELHAUS makes signs to the ladies that it will be better for them to retire. He, his wife, and Mrs.

DREISSIGER disappear into the drawing-room.

DREISSIGER [exasperated, to the POLICE SUPERINTENDENT, who has now entered]. I have at last had one of the ringleaders seized by my dyers. I could stand it no longer—their insolence was beyond all bounds—quite unbearable. I have visitors in my house, and these blackguards dare to . . . They insult my wife whenever she shows herself; my boys' lives are not safe. My visitors run the risk of being jostled and cuffed. Is it possible that in a well-ordered community incessant public insult offered to unoffending people like myself and my family should pass unpunished? If so . . . then . . . then I must confess that I have other ideas of law and order.

SUPERINTENDENT [A man of fifty, middle height, corpulent, full-blooded. He wears cavalry uniform with a long sword and spurs.] No, no, Mr. Dreissiger . . . certainly not! I am entirely at your disposal. Make your mind easy on the subject. Dispose of me as you will. What you have done is quite right. I am delighted that you have had one of the ringleaders arrested. I am very glad indeed that a settling day has come. There are a few disturbers of the peace here whom I have long had my eye on.

DREISSIGER. Yes, one or two raw lads, lazy vagabonds, that shirk every kind of work, and lead a life of low dissipation, hanging about the public-houses until they've sent their last halfpenny down their throats. But I'm determined to put a stop to the trade of these professional blackguards once and for all. It's in the public interest to do so, not only my private interest.

SUPERINTENDENT. Of course it is! Most undoubtedly, Mr. Dreissiger! No one can possibly blame you. And everything that lies in my power . . .

DREISSIGER. The cat-o'-nine tails is what should be taken to the beggarly pack.

SUPERINTENDENT. You're right, quite right. We must make an example.

KUTSCHE, the policeman, enters and salutes. The door is open, and the sound of heavy steps stumbling up the stair is heard.

KUTSCHE. I have to inform you, sir, that we have arrested a man.

DREISSIGER [to SUPERINTENDENT]. Do you wish to see the fellow?

SUPERINTENDENT. Certainly, most certainly. We must begin by having a look at him at close quarters. Oblige me, Mr. Dreissiger, by not speaking to him at present. I'll see to it that you get complete satisfaction, or my name's not Heide.

DREISSIGER. That's not enough for me, though. He goes before the magistrates. My mind's made up.

JAEGER is led in by five dyers, who have come straight from their work—faces, hands, and clothes stained with dye. The prisoner, his cap set jauntily on the side of his head, presents an appearance of impudent gayety; he is excited by the brandy he has just drunk.

JAEGER. Hounds that you are!—Call yourselves workingmen!—Pretend to be comrades! Before I would do such a thing as lay my hands on a mate, I'd see my hand rot off my arm!

At a sign from the SUPERINTENDENT, KUTCHE orders the dyers to let go their victim. JAEGER straightens himself up, quite free and easy. Both doors are guarded.

SUPERINTENDENT [shouts to JAEGER]. Off with your cap, sir. [JAEGER takes it off, but very slowly, still with an impudent grin on his face.] What's your name!

JAEGER. What's yours? I'm not your swine-herd. Great excitement is produced among the audience by this reply.

DREISSIGER. This is too much of a good thing.

SUPERINTENDENT [changes color, is on the point of breaking out furiously, but controls his rage]. We'll see about this afterwards.—Once more, what's your name? [Receiving no answer, furiously.] If you don't answer at once, fellow, I'll have you flogged on the spot.

JAEGER [perfectly cheerful, not showing by so much as the twitch of an eyelid that he has heard the SUPERINTENDENT's angry words, calls over the heads of those around him to a pretty servant girl, who has brought in the coffee and is standing open-mouthed with astonishment at the unexpected sight]. Hullo, Emmy, do you belong to this company now? The sooner you find your way out of it, then, the better. A wind may begin to blow here, an' blow everything away overnight.

The girl stares at JAEGER, and as soon as she comprehends that it is to her he is speaking, blushes with shame, covers her eyes with her hands, and rushes out, leaving the coffee things in confusion. Renewed excitement among those present.

SUPERINTENDENT [half beside himself, to DREISSIGER]. Never in all my long service . . . such a case of shameless effrontery . . .

JAEGER spits on the floor.

DREISSIGER. I'll thank you to remember that this is not a stable.

SUPERINTENDENT. My patience is at an end now. ⁴⁰ For the last time: What's your name?

KITTELHAUS, who has been peering out at the partly opened drawing-room door, listening to what has been going on, can no longer refrain from coming forward to interfere. He is trembling with excitement.

KITTELHAUS. His name is Jaeger, sir. Moritz . . . is it not? Moritz Jaeger. [To JAEGER.] And, Jaeger, you know me.

JAEGER [seriously]. You are Pastor Kittelhaus. ⁵⁰

KITTELHAUS. Yes, I am your pastor, Jaeger! It was I who received you, a babe in swaddling clothes, into the Church of Christ. From my hands you took for the first time the body of the Lord.

Do you remember that, and how I toiled and strove to bring God's Word home to your heart? Is this your gratitude?

JAEGER [like a scolded schoolboy, in a surly voice]. I paid my half-crown like the rest.

KITTELHAUS. Money, money . . . Do you imagine that the miserable little bit of money . . . Such utter nonsense! I'd much rather you kept your money. Be a good man, be a Christian! Think of what you promised. Keep God's law. Money, money! . . .

JAEGER. I'm a Quaker now, sir. I don't believe in anything.

KITTELHAUS. Quaker! What are you talking about? Try to behave yourself, and don't use words you don't understand. Quaker, indeed! They are good Christian people, and not heathens like you.

SUPERINTENDENT. Mr. Kittelhaus, I must ask you . . . [He comes between the PASTOR and JAEGER.] Kutsche! tie his hands!

Wild yelling outside: "Jaeger, Jaeger! come out!"

DREISSIGER [like the others, slightly startled, goes instinctively to the window]. What's the meaning of this next?

SUPERINTENDENT. Oh, I understand well enough. It means that they want to have the blackguard out among them again. But we're not going to oblige them. Kutsche, you have your orders. He goes to the lock-up.

KUTCHE [with the rope in his hand, hesitating]. By your leave, sir, but it'll not be an easy job. There's a confounded big crowd out there—a pack of raging devils. They've got Becker with them, and the smith . . .

KITTELHAUS. Allow me one more word!—So as not to rouse still worse feeling, would it not be better if we tried to arrange things peaceably? Perhaps Jaeger will give his word to go with us quietly, or . . .

SUPERINTENDENT. Quite impossible! Think of my responsibility. I couldn't allow such a thing. Come, Kutsche! lose no more time.

JAEGER [putting his hands together, and holding them out]. Tight, tight, as tight as ever you can! It's not for long.

KUTCHE, assisted by the workmen, ties his hands.

SUPERINTENDENT. Now, off with you, march [to DREISSIGER]. If you feel anxious, let six of the weavers go with them. They can walk on each side of him, I'll ride in front, and Kutsche will bring up the rear. Whoever blocks the way will be cut down.

Cries from below: "Cock-a-doodle-doo-oo-oo! ow wow, wow!"

SUPERINTENDENT [with a threatening gesture in the direction of the window]. You rascals, I'll cock-a-doodle-doo and bow-wow you! Forward! March! He marches out first, with drawn sword; the others, with JAEGER, follow.

JAEGER [shouts as he goes]. An' Mrs. Dreissiger there may play the lady as proud as she likes, but for all that she's no better than us. Many a hundred times she's served my father with a half penny-worth of schnapps. Left wheel—march! [Exit laughing.]

DREISSIGER [after a pause, with apparent calmness]. Well, Mr. Kittelhaus, shall we have our game now? I think there will be no further interruption. [He lights a cigar, giving short laughs as he does so; when it is lighted, bursts into a regular fit of laughing.] I'm beginning now to think the whole thing very funny. That fellow! [Still laughing nervously.] It really is too comical: first came the dispute at dinner with Weinhold—five minutes after that he takes leave—off to the other end of the world; then this affair crops up—and now we'll proceed with our whist.

KITTELHAUS. Yes, but . . . [Roaring is heard outside.] Yes, but . . . that's a terrible uproar they're making outside.

DREISSIGER. All we have to do is to go into the other room; it won't disturb us in the least there.

KITTELHAUS [shaking his head]. I wish I knew what has come over these people. In so far I must agree with Mr. Weinhold, or at least till quite lately I was of his opinion, that the weavers were a patient, humble, easily-led class. Was it not your idea of them, too, Mr. Dreissiger?

DREISSIGER. Most certainly that is what they used to be—patient, easily managed, peaceable people. They were that as long as these so-called humanitarians let them alone. But for ever so long now they've had the awful misery of their condition held up to them. Think of all the societies and associations for the alleviation of the distress among the weavers. At last the weaver believes in it himself, and his head's turned. Some of them had better come and turn it back again, for now he's fairly set a-going there's no end to his complaining. This doesn't please him, and that doesn't please him. He must have everything of the best.

A loud roar of "Hurrah!" is heard from the crowd.

KITTELHAUS. So that with all their humanitarianism they have only succeeded in almost literally turning lambs into wolves.

DREISSIGER. I won't say that, sir. When you take time to think of the matter coolly, it's possible that some good may come of it yet. Such occurrences as this will not pass unnoticed by those in authority, and may lead them to see that things can't be allowed to go on as they are doing—that means must be taken to prevent the utter ruin of our home industries.

KITTELHAUS. Possibly. But what is the cause, then, of this terrible falling off of trade?

DREISSIGER. Our best markets have been closed to us by the heavy import duties foreign countries have laid on our goods. At home the competition is terrible, for we have no protection, none whatever.

PFEIFER [staggers in, pale and breathless]. Mr. Dreissiger, Mr. Dreissiger!

DREISSIGER [in the act of walking into the drawing-room, turns round, annoyed]. Well, Pfeifer, what now?

PFEIFER. Oh, sir! Oh, sir! . . . It's worse than ever!

DREISSIGER. What are they up to next?

KITTELHAUS. You're really alarming us—what is it?

PFEIFER [still confused]. I never saw the like. Good Lord!—The Superintendent himself . . . they'll catch it for this yet.

DREISSIGER. What's the matter with you, in the devil's name? Is any one's neck broken?

PFEIFER [almost crying with fear, screams]. They've set Moritz Jaeger free—they've thrashed the Superintendent and driven him away—they've thrashed the policeman and sent him off to—with-out his helmet . . . his sword broken . . . Oh dear, oh dear!

DREISSIGER. I think you've gone crazy, Pfeifer.

KITTELHAUS. This is actual riot.

PFEIFER [sitting on a chair, his whole body trembling]. It's turning serious, Mr. Dreissiger! Mr. Dreissiger, it's serious now!

DREISSIGER. Well, if that's all the police . . .

PFEIFER. Mr. Dreissiger, it's serious now!

DREISSIGER. Damn it all, Pfeifer, will you hold your tongue?

MRS. DREISSIGER [coming out of the drawing-room with Mrs. KITTELHAUS]. This is really too bad, William. Our whole evening's being spoiled. Here's Mrs. Kittelhaus saying that she'd better go home.

KITTELHAUS. You mustn't take it amiss, dear Mrs. Dreissiger, but perhaps, under the circumstances, it would be better . . .

MRS. DREISSIGER. But, William, why in the world don't you go out and put a stop to it?

DREISSIGER. Go you and try if you can do it. Try! Go and speak to them! [Standing helplessly in front of the PASTOR.] Am I such a tyrant? Am I a cruel master?

Enter JOHN the coachman.

JOHN. If you please, m'm, I've put to the horses. Mr. Weinhold's put Georgie and Charlie into the carriage. If it comes to the worst, we're ready to be off.

MRS. DREISSIGER. If what comes to the worst?

JOHN. I'm sure I don't know, m'm. But the crowd's gettin' bigger and bigger, an' they've sent the Superintendent an' the p'liceman to the right-about.

PFEIFER. It's serious now, Mr. Dreissiger! It's serious!

MRS. DREISSIGER [with increasing alarm]. What's going to happen?—What do the people want?—They're never going to attack us, John?

JOHN. There's some rascally hounds among 'em, ma'am.

PFEIFER. It's serious now! serious!

DREISSIGER. Hold your tongue, fool!—Are the doors barred?

KITTELHAUS. I ask you as a favor, Mr. Dreissiger . . . as a favor . . . I am determined to . . . I ask you as a favor . . . [To JOHN.] What demands are the people making?

JOHN [awkwardly]. It's higher wages they're after, the blackguards.

KITTELHAUS. Good, good!—I shall go out and do my duty. I shall speak seriously to these people.

JOHN. Oh, sir, please, sir, don't do any such thing. Words is quite useless.

KITTELHAUS. One little favor, Mr. Dreissiger. May I ask you to post men behind the door, and to have it closed at once after me?

MRS. KITTELHAUS. O Joseph, Joseph! you're not really going out?

KITTELHAUS. I am. Indeed I am. I know what I'm doing. Don't be afraid. God will protect me.

MRS. KITTELHAUS presses his hand, draws back, and wipes tears from her eyes.

KITTELHAUS [while the murmur of a great, excited crowd is heard uninterruptedly outside]. I'll go . . . I'll go out as if I were simply on my way home. I shall see if my sacred office . . . if the people have not sufficient respect for me left to . . . I shall try . . . [He takes his hat and stick.] Forward, then, in God's name!

Goes out accompanied by DREISSIGER, PFEIFER, and JOHN.

MRS. KITTELHAUS. Oh, dear Mrs. Dreissiger! [She bursts into tears and embraces her.] I do trust nothing will happen to him.

MRS. DREISSIGER [absently]. I don't know how it is, Mrs. Kittelhaus, but I . . . I can't tell you how I feel. I didn't think such a thing was possible.

It's . . . it's as if it was a sin to be rich. If I had been told about all this beforehand, Mrs. Kittelhaus, I don't know but what I would rather have been left in my own humble position.

MRS. KITTELHAUS. There are troubles and disappointments in every condition of life, Mrs. Dreissiger.

MRS. DREISSIGER. True, true, I can well believe that. And suppose we have more than other people
10 . . . goodness me! we didn't steal it. It's been honestly got, every penny of it. It's not possible that the people can be going to attack us! If trade's bad, that's not William's fault, is it?

Loud, confused yelling is heard outside. While the two women stand gazing at each other, pale and startled, DREISSIGER rushes in.

DREISSIGER. Quick, Rosa—put on something, and get into the carriage. I'll be after you this moment.
He rushes to the strong box, and takes out papers and various articles of value.

Enter JOHN.

JOHN. We're ready to start. But come quickly, before they get round to the back door.

MRS. DREISSIGER [in a transport of fear, throwing her arms around JOHN's neck]. John, John, dear, good John! Save us, John. Save my boys! Oh, what is to become of us?

DREISSIGER. Rosa, try to keep your head. Let John go.

30 JOHN. Yes, yes, ma'am! Don't you be frightened. Our good horses'll soon leave them all behind; an' whoever doesn't get out of the way'll be driven over.

MRS. KITTELHAUS [in helpless anxiety]. But my husband . . . my husband? But, Mr. Dreissiger, my husband?

DREISSIGER. He's in safety now, Mrs. Kittelhaus. Don't alarm yourself; he's all right.

MRS. KITTELHAUS. Something dreadful has happened to him. I know it. You needn't try to keep it from me.

DREISSIGER. You mustn't take it to heart—they'll be sorry for it yet. I know exactly whose fault it was. Such a detestable, shameful outrage will not go unpunished. A community laying hands on its own pastor and maltreating him—abominable! Mad dogs they are—raging brutes—and they'll be treated as such. [To his wife who still stands petrified.] Go, for my sake, Rosa, go quickly! [The clatter of window panes being smashed on the ground floor is heard.] They've gone quite mad. There's nothing for it but to get away as fast as we can.

Cries of "Pfeifer, come out!"—"We want Pfeifer!"—"Pfeifer, come out!" are heard.

MRS. DREISSIGER. Pfeifer, Pfeifer, they want Pfeifer!

PFEIFER [dashes in]. Mr. Dreissiger, there are people at the back gate already, and the house door won't hold much longer. The smith's battering it in with a stable pail.

The cry sounds louder and clearer: "Pfeifer! Pfeifer! Pfeifer! come out!" MRS. DREISSIGER rushes 10 off as if pursued. MRS. KITTELHAUS follows. PFEIFER listens, and changes color as he hears what the cry is. A perfect panic of fear seizes him; he weeps, entreats, whimpers, writhes, all at the same moment. He overwhelms DREISSIGER with childish caresses, strokes his cheeks and arms, kisses his hands, and at last, like a drowning man, throws his arms round him and prevents him moving.

PFEIFER. Dear, good, kind Mr. Dreissiger, don't 20 leave me behind. I've always served you faithfully. I've always treated the people well. I couldn't give them more wages than the fixed rate. Don't leave me here—they'll do for me! If they find me, they'll kill me. O God! O God! My wife, my children!

DREISSIGER [making his way out, vainly endeavoring to free himself from PFEIFER's clutch]. Can't you let me go, fellow? It'll be all right; it'll be all right.

For a few seconds the room is empty. Windows 30 are broken in the drawing-room. A loud crash resounds through the house, followed by shouts of "Hurrah!" For an instant there is silence. Then gentle, cautious steps are heard on the stair, then timid, hushed ejaculations: "To the left!"—"Up with you!"—"Hush!"—"Slow, slow!"—"Don't shove like that!"—"It's a wedding we're goin' to!"—"Stop that crowding!"—"You go first!"—"No, you go!"

Young weavers and weaver girls appear at the door leading from the hall, not daring to enter, but each trying to shove the other in. In the course of a few moments their timidity is overcome, and the poor, thin, ragged or patched figures, many of them sickly-looking, disperse themselves through DREISSIGER's room and the drawing-room, first gazing timidly and curiously at everything, then beginning to touch things. Girls sit down on the sofas, whole groups admire them- 50 selves in the mirrors, men stand up on chairs, examine the pictures and take them down. There is a steady influx of miserable-looking creatures from the hall.

FIRST OLD WEAVER [entering]. No, no, this is carryin' it too far. They've started smashing things downstairs. There's no sense nor reason in that. There'll be a bad end to it. No man in his wits would do that. I'll keep clear of such goings-on.

JAEGER, BECKER, WITTIG carrying a wooden pail, BAUMERT, and a number of other old and young weavers, rush in as if in pursuit of something, shouting hoarsely.

JAEGER. Where has he gone?

BECKER. Where's the cruel brute?

BAUMERT. If we can eat grass, he may eat sawdust.

WITTIG. We'll hang him whenever we catch him.

FIRST YOUNG WEAVER. We'll take him by the legs and fling him out at the window, onto the stones. He'll never get up again.

SECOND YOUNG WEAVER [enters]. He's off!

ALL. Who?

SECOND YOUNG WEAVER. Dreissiger.

BECKER. Pfeifer too?

VOICES. Let's get hold of Pfeifer. Look for Pfeifer!

BAUMERT. Yes, yes! Pfeifer! Tell him there's a weaver here for him to starve.

Laughter.

JAEGER. If we can't lay hands on that brute Dreissiger himself . . . we'll at any rate make a poor man of him.

BAUMERT. As poor as a church mouse . . . we'll see to that!

All, bent on the work of destruction, rush towards the drawing-room door.

BECKER [who is leading, turns round and stops the others]. Halt! Listen to me! This is nothing but a beginning. When we're done here, we'll go straight to Bielau, to Dittrich's, where the steam power-looms are. The whole mischief's done by these factories.

OLD ANSORGE [Enters from hall. Takes a few steps, then stops and looks round, bewildered; shakes his head, taps his forehead.] Who am I? Weaver Anton Ansoerge. Has he gone mad, Old Ansoerge? My head's goin' round like a humming-top, sure enough. What's he doing here? He'll do whatever he's a mind to. Where is Ansoerge? [He taps his forehead repeatedly.] Something's wrong! I'm not answerable! I'm off my head! Off with you, off with you, rioters that you are! Heads off, legs off, hands off! If you take my house, I take your house. Forward, forward!

Goes yelling into the drawing-room, followed by a yelling, laughing mob.

Langenbielau. OLD WEAVER HILSE's workroom. On the left a small window, in front of which stands the loom. On the right a bed, with a table pushed close to it. Stove, with stove-bench, in the right-hand corner. Family worship is going on. HILSE, his old, blind, and almost deaf wife, his son GOTTLIEB, and LUISE, GOTTLIEB's wife, are sitting at the table, on the bed and wooden stools. A winding-wheel and bobbins on the floor between table and loom. Old spinning, weaving, and winding implements are disposed of on the smoky rafters; hanks of yarn are hanging down. There is much useless lumber in the low narrow room. The door, which is in the back wall, and leads into the big outer passage, or entry-room of the house, stands open. Through another open door on the opposite side of the passage, a second, in most respects similar weaver's room is seen. The large passage, or entry-room of the house, is paved with stone, has damaged plaster, and a tumble-down wooden staircase leading to the attics; a washing-tub on a stool is partly visible; dirty linen of the most miserable description and poor household utensils lie about untidily. The light falls from the left into all three apartments.

OLD HILSE is a bearded man of strong build, but bent and wasted with age, toil, sickness, and hardship. He is an old soldier, and has lost an arm. His nose is sharp, his complexion ashen-gray, and he shakes; he is nothing but skin and bone, and has the deep-set, sore weaver's eyes.

OLD HILSE [stands up, as do his son and daughter-in-law; prays]. O Lord, we know not how to be thankful enough to Thee, for that Thou hast spared us this night again in thy goodness . . . an' hast had pity on us . . . an' hast suffered us to take no harm. Thou art the All-Merciful, an' we are poor, sinful children of men—that bad that we are not worthy to be trampled under thy feet. Yet Thou art our loving Father, an' Thou will look upon us an' accept us for the sake of thy dear Son, our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. "Jesus' blood and righteousness, Our covering is and glorious dress." An' if we're sometimes too sore cast down under thy chastening—when the fire of thy purification burns too raging hot—oh, lay it not to our charge; forgive us our sin. Give us patience, heavenly Father, that after all these sufferin's we may be made partakers of thy eternal blessedness. Amen.

MOTHER HILSE [who has been bending forward, trying hard to hear]. What a beautiful prayer you do say, father!

LUISE goes off to the wash-tub, GOTTLIEB to the room on the other side of the passage.

OLD HILSE. Where's the little lass?

LUISE. She's gone to Peterswaldau, to Dreisiger's. She finished all she had to wind last night.

OLD HILSE [speaking very loud]. You'd like the wheel now, mother, eh?

MOTHER HILSE. Yes, father, I'm quite ready.

OLD HILSE [setting it down before her]. I wish I could do the work for you.

MOTHER HILSE. An' what would be the good of that, father? There would I be, sittin' not knowin' what to do.

OLD HILSE. I'll give your fingers a wipe, then, so that they'll not grease the yarn. [He wipes her hands with a rag.]

LUISE [at her tub]. If there's grease on her hands, it's not from what she's eaten.

OLD HILSE. If we've no butter, we can eat dry bread—when we've no bread, we can eat potatoes—when there's no potatoes left, we can eat bran.

LUISE [saucily]. An' when that's all eaten, we'll do as the Wenglers did—we'll find out where the skinner's buried some stinking old horse, an' we'll dig it up an' live for a week or two on rotten carrion—how nice that'll be!

GOTTLIEB [from the other room]. There you are, letting that tongue of yours run away with you again.

OLD HILSE. You should think twice, lass, before you talk that godless way. [He goes to his loom, calls.] Can you give me a hand, Gottlieb?—there's a few threads to pull through.

LUISE [from her tub]. Gottlieb, you're wanted to help father.

GOTTLIEB comes in, and he and his father set themselves to the troublesome task of "drawing and slaying," that is, pulling the strands of the warp through the "heddles" and "reed" of the loom. They have hardly begun to do this when HORNIG appears in the outer room.

HORNIG [at the door]. Good luck to your work!

HILSE AND HIS SON. Thank you, Hornig.

GOTTLIEB. I say, Hornig, when do you take your sleep? You're on your rounds all day, and on watch all night.

HORNIG. Sleep's gone from me nowadays.

LUISE. Glad to see you, Hornig!

OLD HILSE. And what's the news?

HORNIG. It's queer news this mornin'. The weavers at Peterswaldau have taken the law into their own hands, an' chased Dreissiger an' his whole family out of the place.

LUISE [perceptibly agitated]. Hornig's at his lies again.

HORNIG. No, missus, not this time, not to-day.—I've some beautiful pinafores in my cart.—No, it's God's truth I'm telling you. They've sent him to the right-about. He came down to Reichenbach last night, but, Lord love you! they daren't take him in there, for fear of the weavers—off he had to go again, all the way to Schweidnitz.

OLD HILSE [has been carefully lifting threads of the web and approaching them to the holes, through which, from the other side, GOTTLIEB pushes a wire hook, with which he catches them and draws them through]. It's about time you were stopping now, Hornig!

HORNIG. It's as sure as I'm a livin' man. Every child in the place'll soon tell you the same story.

OLD HILSE. Either your wits are a-wool-gatherin' or mine are.

HORNIG. Not mine. What I'm telling you's as true as the Bible. I wouldn't believe it myself if I hadn't stood there an' seen it with my own eyes—as I see you now, Gottlieb. They've wrecked his house from the cellar to the roof. The good china came flyin' out at the garret windows, rattlin' down the roof. God only knows how many pieces of fustian are lying soakin' in the river! The water can't get away for them—it's running over the banks, the color of washin'-blue with all the indigo they've poured out at the windows—it was flyin' like clouds of sky-blue dust. Oh, it's a terrible destruction they've worked! And it's not only the house—it's the dyeworks, too—an' the stores! They've broken the stair rails, they've torn up the fine flooring—smashed the lookin'-glasses—cut an' hacked an' torn an' smashed the sofas an' the chairs.—It's awful—it's worse than war.

OLD HILSE. An' you would have me believe that my fellow weavers did all that?

He shakes his head incredulously. Other tenants of the house have collected at the door and are listening eagerly.

HORNIG. Who else, I'd like to know? I could put names to every one of 'em. It was me took the sheriff through the house, an' I spoke to a whole lot of 'em, an' they answered me back quite friendly like. They did their business with little noise, but my word! they did it well. The sheriff spoke to them, and they answered him mannerly, as they always do. But there wasn't no stoppin' of them. They hacked on at the beautiful furniture as if they were workin' for wages.

OLD HILSE. You took the sheriff through the house?

HORNIG. An' what would I be frightened of? Every one knows me. I'm always turning up, like a bad penny. But no one has anything agin' me. They're all glad to see me. Yes, I went the rounds with him, as sure as my name's Hornig. An' you may believe me or not as you like, but my heart's sore yet from the sight—an' I could see by the sheriff's face that he felt queer enough, too. Not a living word did we hear—they were doin' their work and holdin' their tongues. It was a solemn an' a woeful sight to see the poor starving creatures for once in a way takin' their revenge.

LUISE [with irrepressible excitement, trembling, wiping her eyes with her apron]. An' right they are! It's only what should be!

VOICES AMONG THE CROWD AT THE DOOR. "There's some of the same sort here."—"There's one no farther away than across the river."—"He's got four horses in his stable an' six carriages, an' he starves his weavers to keep them."

OLD HILSE [still incredulous]. What was it set them off?

HORNIG. Who knows? Who knows? One says this, another says that.

OLD HILSE. What do they say?

HORNIG. The story as most of them tells is that it began with Dreissiger sayin' that if the weavers were hungry they might eat grass.

Excitement at the door, as one person repeats this to the other, with signs of indignation.

OLD HILSE. Well, now, Hornig—if you was to say to me: Father Hilse, says you, you'll die to-morrow, I would answer back: That may be—an' why not? You might even go to the length of saying: You'll have a visit to-morrow from the King of Prussia. But to tell me that weavers, men like me an' my son, have done such things as that—never! I'll never in this world believe it.

MIELCHEN [a pretty girl of seven, with long, loose flaxen hair, carrying a basket on her arm, comes running in, holding out a silver spoon to her mother]. Mammy, mammy! look what I've got! An' you're to buy me a new frock with it.

LUISE. What d'you come tearing in like that for, girl? [With increased excitement and curiosity]. An' what's that you've got hold of now? You've been runnin' yourself out o' breath, an' there—if the bobbins aren't in her basket yet? What's all this about?

OLD HILSE. Mielchen, where did that spoon come from?

LUISE. She found it, maybe.

HORNIG. It's worth is seven or eight shillin's at least.

OLD HILSE [in distressed excitement]. Off with you, lass—out of the house this moment—unless you want a lickin'! Take that spoon back where you got it from. Out you go! Do you want to make thieves of us all, eh? I'll soon drive that out of you. [He looks round for something to beat her with.]

MIELCHEN [clinging to her mother's skirts, crying]. No, grandfather, no! don't lick me! We—we did find them. All the other bob—bobbin . . . girls has . . . has them, too.

LUISE [half frightened, half excited]. I was right, you see. She found it. Where did you find it, Mielchen?

MIELCHEN [sobbing]. At—at Peterswaldau. We—we found them in front of—in front of Drei—Dreissiger's house.

OLD HILSE. This is worse an' worse! Get off²⁰ with you this moment, unless you would like me to help you.

MOTHER HILSE. What's all the to-do about?

HORNIG. I'll tell you what, Father Hilse. The best way'll be for Gottlieb to put on his coat an' take the spoon to the police office.

OLD HILSE. Gottlieb, put on your coat.

GOTTLIEB [pulling it on, eagerly]. Yes, an' I'll go right in to the office an' say they're not to blame us for it, for what can a child like that understand about it? an' I brought the spoon back at once. Stop your crying now, Mielchen!

The crying child is taken into the opposite room by her mother, who shuts her in and comes back.

HORNIG. I believe it's worth as much as nine shillin's.

GOTTLIEB. Give us a cloth to wrap it in, Luise, so that it'll take no harm. To think of the thing bein' worth all that money!

Tears come into his eyes while he is wrapping up the spoon.

LUISE. If it was only ours, we could live on it for many a day.

OLD HILSE. Hurry up, now! Look sharp! As quick as ever you can. A fine state o' matters, this! Get that devil's spoon out o' the house.

GOTTLIEB goes off with the spoon.

HORNIG. I must be off now, too.

He goes, is seen talking to the people in the entry-room before he leaves the house.

SURGEON SCHMIDT [a jerky little ball of a man, with a red, knowing face, comes into the entry-room]. Good-morning, all! These are fine goings on! Take care! Take care! [Threatening with his finger.] You're a sly lot—that's what you are. [At Hilse's door without coming in.] Morning, Father Hilse. [To a woman in the outer room.] And how are the pains, mother? Better, eh? Well, well. And how's all with you, Father Hilse? [Enters.] Why the deuce! what's the matter with mother?

LUISE. It's the eye veins, sir—they've dried up, so as she can't see at all now.

SURGEON SCHMIDT. That's from the dust and weaving by candle-light. Will you tell me what it means that all Peterswaldau's on the way here? I set off on my rounds this morning as usual, thinking no harm; but it wasn't long till I had my eyes opened. Strange doings, these! What in the devil's name has taken possession of them, Hilse? They're like a pack of raging wolves. Riot—why, it's revolution! they're plundering and laying waste right and left . . . Mielchen! where's Mielchen?

[MIELCHEN, her face red with crying, is pushed in by her mother.] Here, Mielchen, put your hand into my coat pocket. [MIELCHEN, does so.] The ginger-bread nuts are for you. Not all at once, though, you baggage! And a song first! The fox jumped up on a . . . come, now . . . The fox jumped up . . . on a moonlight . . . Mind, I've heard what you did. You called the sparrows on the church-yard hedge a nasty name, and they're gone and told the pastor. Did any one ever hear the like? Fifteen hundred of them agog—men, women, and children. [Distant bells are heard.] That's at Reichenbach—alarm-bells! Fifteen hundred people! Uncomfortably like the world coming to an end!

OLD HILSE. An' is it true that they're on their way to Bielau?

SURGEON SCHMIDT. That's just what I'm telling you. I've driven through the middle of the whole crowd. What I'd have liked to do would have been to get down and give each of them a pill there and then. They were following on each other's heels like grim death, and their singing was more than enough to turn a man's stomach. I was nearly sick, and Friedrich was shaking on the box like an old woman. We had to take a stiff glass at the first opportunity. I wouldn't be a manufacturer, not though I could drive my carriage and pair. [Distant singing.] Listen to that! It's for all the world as if they were beating at some broken old boiler. We'll have them here in five minutes, friends. Good-bye! Don't you be foolish. The troops will be upon them in no time. Keep your wits about you. The Peterswaldau people have lost theirs. [Bells ring close at hand.] Good gracious!

There are our bells ringing too! Every one's going mad. [He goes upstairs.]

GOTTLIEB [Comes back. In the entry-room, out of breath.] I've seen them, I've seen them! [To a woman.] They're here, auntie, they're here! [At the door.] They're here, father, they're here! They've got bean-poles, an' ox-goads, an' axes. They're standin' outside the upper Dittrich's kickin' up an awful row. I think he's payin' them money. O Lord! whatever's goin' to happen? What a crowd! Oh, you never saw such a crowd! Dash it all—if once they make a rush, our manufacturers'll be hard put to it.

OLD HILSE. What have you been runnin' like that for? You'll go racin' till you bring on your old trouble, and then we'll have you on your back again, strugglin' for breath.

GOTTLIEB [almost joyously excited]. I had to run, or they would have caught me an' kept me. They were all roarin' to me to join them. Father Baumert was there too, and says he to me: You come an' get your sixpence with the rest—you're a poor starving weaver, too. An' I was to tell you, father, from him, that you were to come an' help to pay out the manufacturers for their grindin' of us down. Other times is coming, he says. There's going to be a change of days for us weavers. An' we're all to come an' help to bring it about. We're to have our half-pound of meat on Sundays, and now and again on a holiday sausage with our cabbage. Yes, things is to be quite different, by what he tells me.

OLD HILSE [with repressed indignation]. An' that man calls himself your godfather! and he bids you take part in such works of wickedness? Have nothing to do with them, Gottlieb. They've let themselves be tempted by Satan, an' it's his works they're doin'.

LUISE [no longer able to restrain her passionate excitement, vehemently]. Yes, Gottlieb, get into the chimney corner, an' take a spoon in your hand, an' a dish of skim milk on your knee, an' put on a petticoat an' say your prayers, an' then father'll be pleased with you. And he sets up to be a man!

Laughter from the people in the entry-room.

OLD HILSE [quivering with suppressed rage]. An' you set up to be a good wife, eh? You call yourself a mother, an' let your evil tongue run away with you like that? You think yourself fit to teach your girl, you that would egg on your husband to crime an' wickedness?

LUISE [has lost all control of herself]. You an' your piety an' religion—did they serve to keep the life in my poor children? In rags an' dirt they lay, all the four—it didn't as much as keep them

dry. Yes! I set up to be a mother, that's what I do—an' if you'd like to know it, that's why I would send all the manufacturers to hell—because I'm a mother!—Not one of the four could I keep in life! It was cryin' more than breathin' with me from the time each poor little thing came into the world till death took pity on it. The devil a bit you cared! You sat there prayin' and singin', and let me run about till my feet bled, tryin' to get one little drop o' skim milk. How many hundred nights have I lain an' racked my head to think what I could do to cheat the churchyard of my little one? What harm has a baby like that done that it must come to such a miserable end—eh? An' over there at Dittrich's they're bathed in wine an' washed in milk. No! you may talk as you like, but if they begin here, ten horses won't hold me back. An' what's more—if there's a rush on Dittrich's, you'll see me in the forefront of it—an' pity the man as tries to prevent me—I've stood it long enough, so now you know it.

OLD HILSE. You're a lost soul—there's no help for you.

LUISE [frenzied]. It's you that there's no help for! Tatter-breeched scarecrows—that's what you are—an' not men at all. Whey-faced gutter-scrappers that take to your heels at the sound of a child's rattle. Fellows that say "thank you" to the man as gives you a hidin'. They've not left that much blood in you as that you can turn red in the face. You should have the whip taken to you, an' a little pluck flogged into your rotten bones. [She goes out quickly.]

Embarrassed pause.

MOTHER HILSE. What's the matter with Liesl, father?

OLD HILSE. Nothin', mother! What should be the matter with her?

MOTHER HILSE. Father, is it only me that's thinkin' it, or are the bells ringin'?

OLD HILSE. It'll be a funeral, mother.

MOTHER HILSE. An' I've got to sit waitin' here yet. Why must I be so long a-dyin', father?

Pause.

OLD HILSE [leaves his work, holds himself up straight; solemnly]. Gottlieb!—you heard all your wife said to us. Look here, Gottlieb! [He bares his breast.] Here they cut out a bullet as big as a thimble. The King knows where I lost my arm. It wasn't the mice as ate it. [He walks up and down.] Before that wife of yours was ever thought of, I had spilled my blood by the quart for King an' country. So let her call what names she likes—an' welcome! It does me no harm.—Frightened?

Me frightened? What would I be frightened of, will you tell me that? Of the few soldiers, maybe, that'll be comin' after the rioters? Good gracious me! That would be a lot to be frightened at! No, no, lad; I may be a bit stiff in the back, but there's some strength left in the old bones; I've got the stuff in me yet to make a stand against a few rubbishin' bay'nets.—An' if it came to the worst! Willin', willin' would I be to say good-bye to this weary world. Death would be welcome—welcomer to me to-day than to-morrow. For what is it we leave behind? That old bundle of aches an' pains we call our body, the care an' the oppression we call by the name of life. We may be glad to get away from it.—But there's something to come after, Gottlieb!—an' if we've done ourselves out of that too—why, then it's all over with us!

GOTTLIEB. Who knows what's to come after? Nobody's seen it.

OLD HILSE. Gottlieb! don't you be throwin' doubts on the one comfort us poor people have. Why have I sat here an' worked my treadle like a slave this forty year an' more?—sat still an' looked on at him over yonder livin' in pride an' wastefulness—why? Because I have a better hope, something as supports me in all my troubles. [Points out at the window.] You have your good things in this world—I'll have mine in the next. That's been my thought. An' I'm that certain of it—I'd let myself be torn in pieces. Have we not His promise? There's a Day of Judgment coming; but it's not us as are the judges—no: vengeance is mine, saith the Lord.

A cry of "Weavers, come out!" is heard outside the window.

OLD HILSE. Do what you will for me. [He seats himself at his loom.] I stay here.

GOTTLIEB [after a short struggle]. I'm going to work, too—come what may. [Goes out.]

The Weavers' Song is heard, sung by hundreds of voices quite close at hand; it sounds like a dull monotonous wail.

INMATES OF THE HOUSE [in the entry-room]. "Oh, mercy on us! there they come swarmin' like ants!"—"Where can all these weavers be from?"—"Don't shove like that, I want to see too."—"Look at that great maypole of a woman leadin' on in front!"—"Gracious! they're comin' thicker an' thicker."

HORNIG [comes into the entry-room from outside]. There's a theayter play for you now! That's what you don't see every day. But you should go up to the other Dittrich's an' look what they've done there. It's been no half work. He's got no house now, nor no factory, nor no wine-cellar, nor nothing. They're drinkin' out of the bottles—not so much as takin' the time to get out the corks. One, two, three, an' off with the neck, an' no matter whether they cut their mouths or not. There's some of them runnin' about bleedin' like stuck pigs.—Now they're goin' to do for this Dittrich.

The singing has stopped.

INMATES OF THE HOUSE. There's nothin' so very wicked-like about them.

HORNIG. You wait a bit! you'll soon see! All they're doin' just now is makin' up their minds where they'll begin. Look, they're inspectin' the palace from every side. Do you see that little stout man there, him with the stable pail? That's the smith from Peterswaldau—an' a dangerous little chap he is. He batters in the thickest doors as if they were made o' pie-crust. If a manufacturer was to fall into his hands it would be all over with him!

INMATES OF THE HOUSE. "That was a crack!"—"There went a stone through the window!"—"There's old Dittrich, shakin' with fright."—"He's hangin' out a board."—"Hangin' out a board?"—"What's written on it?"—"Can you not read?"—"It would be a bad job for me if I couldn't read!"—"Well, read it, then!"—"You—shall have—full—satisfaction! You—shall have full satisfaction."

HORNIG. He might ha' spared himself the trouble—that won't help him. It's something else they've set their minds on here. It's the factories. They're goin' to smash up the power-looms. For it's them that are ruinin' the hand-loom weaver. Even a blind man might see that. No! the good folks know what they're after, an' no sheriff an' no p'lice superintendent'll bring them to reason—much less a bit of a board. Him as has seen them at work already knows what's comin'.

INMATES OF THE HOUSE. "Did any one ever see such a crowd?"—"What can these ones be wantin'?"—[Hastily.] "They're crossin' the bridge!"—[Anxiously.] "They're never comin' over on this side, are they?"—[In excitement and terror.] "It's to us they're comin'!"—"They're comin' to us!"—"They're comin' to fetch the weavers out of their houses!"

General flight. The entry-room is empty. A crowd of dirty, dusty rioters rush in, their faces scarlet with brandy and excitement; tattered, untidy-looking, as if they had been up all night. With the shout: "Weavers, come out!" they disperse themselves through the house. BECKER and several other young weavers, armed with cudgels and poles, come into OLD HILSE's room. When they see the old man at his loom they start, and cool down a little.

BECKER. Come, Father Hilse, stop that. Leave your work to them as wants to work. There's no need now for you to be doin' yourself harm. You'll be well taken care of.

FIRST YOUNG WEAVER. You'll never need to go hungry to bed again.

SECOND YOUNG WEAVER. The weaver's goin' to have a roof over his head and a shirt on his back ¹⁰ once more.

OLD HILSE. An' what's the devil sendin' you to do now, with your poles an' axes?

BECKER. These are what we're goin' to break on Dittrich's back.

SECOND YOUNG WEAVER. We'll beat them red hot an' stick them down the manufacturers' throats, so as they'll feel for once what burnin' hunger tastes like.

THIRD YOUNG WEAVER. Come along, Father ²⁰ Hilse! We'll give no quarter.

SECOND YOUNG WEAVER. No one had mercy on us—neither God nor man. Now we're standin' up for our rights ourselves.

OLD BAUMERT enters, somewhat shaky on the legs, a newly killed cock under his arm.

OLD BAUMERT [stretching out his arms]. My brothers—we're all brothers! Come to my arms, brothers!

Laughter.

OLD HILSE. And that's the state you're in, Willem?

OLD BAUMERT. Gustav, is it you? My poor starvin' friend! Come to my arms, Gustav!

OLD HILSE [mutters]. Let me alone.

OLD BAUMERT. I'll tell you what, Gustav. It's nothin' but luck that's wanted. You look at me. What do I look like? Luck's what's wanted. Do I not look like a lord? [Pats his stomach.] Guess what's in there! There's food fit for a prince in ⁴⁰ that belly. When luck's with him a man gets roast hare to eat an' champagne wine to drink.—I'll tell you something: We've made a big mistake—we must help ourselves.

ALL [speaking at once]. We must help ourselves, hurrah!

OLD BAUMERT. As soon as we get the first good bite inside us we're different men. Damn it all! but you feel the power comin' into you till you're like an ox, an' that wild with strength that you ⁵⁰ hit out right an' left without as much as takin' time to look. Dash it, but it's grand!

JAEGER [at the door, armed with an old cavalry sword]. We've made one or two first-rate attacks.

BECKER. We know how to set about it now. One, two, three, an' we're inside the house. Then, at it like lightning—bang, crack, shiver! till the sparks are flyin' as if it was a smithy.

FIRST YOUNG WEAVER. It wouldn't be half bad to light a bit o' fire.

SECOND YOUNG WEAVER. Let's march to Reichenbach an' burn the rich folks' houses over their heads!

JAEGER. That would be nothing but butterin' their bread. Think of all the insurance money they'd get.

Laughter.

BECKER. No, from here we'll go to Freiburg, to Tromtra's.

JAEGER. What would you say to givin' all them as holds Government appointments a lesson? I've read somewhere as how all our troubles come from them biocrats, as they call them.

SECOND YOUNG WEAVER. Before long we'll go to Breslau, for more an' more'll be joining us.

OLD BAUMERT [to Hilse]. Won't you take a drop, Gustav?

OLD HILSE. I never touches it.

OLD BAUMERT. That was in the old world; we're in a new world to-day, Gustav.

FIRST YOUNG WEAVER. Christmas comes but once a year.

Laughter.

³⁰ OLD HILSE [impatiently]. What is it you want in my house, you limbs of Satan?

OLD BAUMERT [a little intimidated, coaxingly]. I was bringin' you a chicken, Gustav. I thought it would make a drop o' soup for mother.

OLD HILSE [embarrassed, almost friendly]. Well, you can tell mother yourself.

MOTHER HILSE [who has been making efforts to hear, her hand at her ear, motions them off]. Let me alone. I don't want no chicken soup.

OLD HILSE. That's right, mother. An' I want none, an' least of all that sort. An' let me say this much to you, Baumert: The devil stands on his head for joy when he hears the old ones jabberin' and talkin' as if they was infants. An' to you all I say—to every one of you: Me and you, we've got nothing to do with each other. It's not with my will that you're here. In law an' justice you've no right to be in my house.

A VOICE. Him that's not with us is against us. JAEGER [roughly and threateningly]. You're a cross-grained old chap, and I'd have you remember that we're not thieves.

A VOICE. We're hungry men, that's all.

FIRST YOUNG WEAVER. We want to live—that's all. An' so we've cut the rope we were hung up with.

JAEGER. And we were in our right! [Holding his fist in front of the old man's face.] Say another word, and I'll give you one between the eyes.

BECKER. Come now, Jaeger, be quiet. Let the old man alone.—What we say to ourselves, Father Hilse, is this: Better dead than begin the old life again.

OLD HILSE. Have I not lived that life for sixty ¹⁰ years an' more?

BECKER. That doesn't help us—there's got to be a change.

OLD HILSE. On the Judgment Day.

BECKER. What they'll not give us willingly we're going to take by force.

OLD HILSE. By force. [Laughs.] You may as well go an' dig your graves at once. They'll not be long showin' you where the force lies. Wait a bit, lad!

JAEGER. Is it the soldiers you're meaning? We've been soldiers, too. We'll soon do for a company or two of them.

OLD HILSE. With your tongues, maybe. But supposin' you did—for two that you'd beat off, ten'll come back.

VOICES [call through the window]. The soldiers are comin'! Look out!

General, sudden silence. For a moment a faint sound of fifes and drums is heard; in the ensu-³⁰ ing silence a short, involuntary exclamation, "The devil! I'm off!" followed by general laughter.

BECKER. Who was that? Who speaks of running away?

JAEGER. Which of you is it that's afraid of a few paltry helmets? You have me to command you, and I've been in the trade. I know their tricks.

OLD HILSE. An' what are you goin' to shoot with? Your sticks, eh?

FIRST YOUNG WEAVER. Never mind that old chap; he's wrong in the upper story.

SECOND YOUNG WEAVER. Yes, he's a bit off his head.

GOTTLIEB [has made his way unnoticed among the rioters; catches hold of the speaker]. Would you give your impudence to an old man like him?

SECOND YOUNG WEAVER. Let me alone. 'Twasn't anything bad I said.

OLD HILSE [interfering]. Let him jaw, Gottlieb. What would you be meddlin' with him for? He'll soon see who it is that's been off his head to-day, him or me.

BECKER. Are you comin', Gottlieb?

OLD HILSE. No, he's goin' to do no such thing.

LUISE [comes into the entry-room, calls]. What are you puttin' off your time with prayin' hypocrites like them for? Come quick to where you're wanted! Quick! Father Baumert, run all you can! The Major's speakin' to the crowd from horse-back. They're to go home. If you don't hurry up, it'll be all over.

JAEGER [as he goes out]. That's a brave husband of yours.

LUISE. Where is he? I've got no husband!

Some of the people in the entry-room sing.

Once on a time a man so small,

Heigh-ho, heigh!

Set his heart on a wife so tall,

Heigh diddle-di-dum-di!

WITTIG, THE SMITH [comes downstairs, still carrying the stable pail; stops on his way through the⁴⁰ entry-room]. Come on! all of you that are not cowardly scoundrels!—hurrah!

He dashes out, followed by LUISE, JAEGER, and others, all shouting "Hurrah!"

BECKER. Good-bye, then, Father Hilse; we'll see each other again. [Is going.]

OLD HILSE. I doubt that. I've not five years to live, and that'll be the soonest you'll get out.

BECKER [stops, not understanding]. Out o' what, Father Hilse?

OLD HILSE. Out of prison—where else?

BECKER [laughs wildly]. Do you think I would mind that? There's bread to be had there anyhow! [Goes out.]

OLD BAUMERT [has been cowering on a low stool, painfully beating his brains; he now gets up]. It's true, Gustav, as I've had a drop too much. But for all that I know what I'm about. You think one way in this here matter; I think another. I say Becker's right: even if it ends in chains an' ropes ⁴⁰—we'll be better off in prison than at home. You're cared for there, an you don't need to starve. I wouldn't have joined them, Gustav, if I could have let it be; but once in a lifetime a man's got to show what he feels. [Goes slowly toward the door.] Good-bye, Gustav. If anything happens, mind you put in a word for me in your prayers. [Goes out.] The rioters are now all gone. The entry-room gradually fills again with curious onlookers from the different rooms of the house. OLD HILSE knots at his web. GOTTLIEB has taken an ax from behind the stove and is unconsciously feeling its edge. He and the old man are silently agitated. The hum and roar of a great crowd penetrate into the room.

MOTHER HILSE. The very boards is shakin', father—what's goin' on? What's goin' to happen to us?

Pause.

OLD HILSE. Gottlieb!

GOTTLIEB. What is it?

OLD HILSE. Let that ax alone.

GOTTLIEB. Who's to split the wood, then? [He leans the ax against the stove.]

Pause.

MOTHER HILSE. Gottlieb, you listen to what ¹⁰ father says to you.

Some one sings outside the window.

Our little man does all that he can,

Heigh-ho, heigh!

At home he cleans the pots an' the pan,

Heigh-diddle-di-dum-di!

Passes on.

GOTTLIEB [jumps up, shakes his clenched fist at the window]. Brute that you are, would you drive me crazy?

A volley of musketry is heard.

MOTHER HILSE [starts and trembles]. Good Lord! is that thunder again?

OLD HILSE [instinctively folding his hands]. Oh, our Father in heaven! defend the poor weavers, protect my poor brothers!

A short pause ensues.

OLD HILSE [to himself, painfully agitated]. There's blood flowing now.

GOTTLIEB [had started up and grasped the ax ³⁰ when the shooting was heard; deathly pale, almost beside himself with excitement]. And am I to lie to heel like a dog still?

A GIRL [calls from the entry-room]. Father Hilse, Father Hilse! get away from the window. A bullet's just flown in at ours upstairs. [Disappears.]

MIELCHEN [puts her head in at the window, laughing]. Gran'father, gran'father, they've shot with their guns. Two or three's been knocked down, an' one of them's turnin' round and round ⁴⁰ like a top, an' one's twistin' himself like a sparrow when its head's bein' pulled of. An' oh, if you saw all the blood that came pourin'—! [Disappears.]

A WEAVER'S WIFE. Yes, there's two or three'll never get up again.

AN OLD WEAVER [in the entry-room]. Look out! They're goin' to make a rush on the soldiers.

A SECOND WEAVER [wildly]. Look, look, look at ⁵⁰ the women!—skirts up, an' spittin' in the soldiers' faces already!

A WEAVER'S WIFE [calls in]. Gottlieb, look at your wife. She's more pluck in her than you.

She's jumpin' about in front o' the bay'nets as if she was dancin' to music.

Four men carry a wounded rioter through the entry-room. Silence, which is broken by some one saying in a distinct voice, "It's Weaver Ulbrich." Once more silence for a few seconds, when the same voice is heard again: "It's all over with him; he's got a bullet in his ear."

The men are heard climbing the wooden stair.

Sudden shouting outside: "Hurrah, hurrah!"

VOICES IN THE ENTRY-ROOM. "Where did they get the stones from?"—"Yes, it's time you were off!"—"From the new road."—"Ta-ta, soldiers!"—"It's raining paving-stones."

Shrieks of terror and loud roaring outside, taken up by those in the entry-room. There is a cry of fear, and the house door is shut with a bang.

VOICES IN THE ENTRY-ROOM. "They're loading again."—"They'll fire another volley this minute."

²⁰—"Father Hilse, get away from that window."

GOTTLIEB [clutches the ax]. What! are we mad dogs? Are we to eat powder an' shot now instead of bread? [Hesitating an instant: to the old man.] Would you have me sit here an' see my wife shot? Never! [As he rushes out.] Look out! I'm coming!

OLD HILSE. Gottlieb, Gottlieb!

MOTHER HILSE. Where's Gottlieb gone?

OLD HILSE. He's gone to the devil.

VOICES FROM THE ENTRY-ROOM. Go away from the window, Father Hilse.

OLD HILSE. Not I! Not if you all go crazy together! [To MOTHER HILSE, with rapt excitement.] My heavenly Father has placed me here. Isn't that so, mother? Here we'll sit, an' do our bounden duty—ay, though the snow was to go on fire. [He begins to weave.]

Rattle of another volley. OLD HILSE, mortally wounded, starts to his feet and then falls forward over the loom. At the same moment loud shouting of "Hurrah!" is heard. The people who till now have been standing in the entry-room dash out, joining in the cry. The old woman repeatedly asks: "Father, father, what's wrong with you?" The continued shouting dies away gradually in the distance. MIELCHEN rushes in.

MIELCHEN. Gran'father, gran'father, they're drivin' the soldiers out of the village; they've got into Dittrich's house, an' they're doin' what they did at Dreissiger's. Gran'father! [The child grows frightened, notices that something has happened, puts her finger in her mouth, and goes up cautiously to the dead man.] Gran'father!

MOTHER HILSE. Come now, father, can't you say something? You're frightenin' me.

THE RUSSIAN SOUL

It was only in the nineteenth century that Russia began to contribute to our literary heritage. It was then that Western liberalism and science invaded the land of the autocratic Tzars, that Napoleon was crushed by the powerful arms of the Russian giant, and that the latter began to rouse himself. Russia forged ahead and became one of the chief cultural and social forces of the world.

The most singular cultural contribution of the Russians was their development of realistic literature, for masters like Gogol, Turgenev, Tolstoy, Dostoyevsky, and Chekhov became second to none in the art of revealing life. The West has never been entirely able to understand Russia, a nation torn between the orient and the occident, and conditioned by insufficiently comprehended economic forces. "The Russian soul," a term employed by writers both in Russia and in Western Europe, may mean much or little; it is certainly another name for an enigma to the West. In literature, however, it means a unique combination of the most vigorous and candid realism with extreme sensitiveness, awareness of the pangs of the human heart, and aspiration toward the highest ideals. Above all, the well-spring of nineteenth-century Russian literature was sympathy with mankind, respect for its strivings, pity for its failures. Realism in the writings of a Flaubert or a Maupassant had a brain, but realism in the work of the Russian masters had a heart.

The peculiar nature of Russian literature became apparent early in the last century when the prevailing fashion was still romanticism and when Byron was the idol of the intellectuals. Russia's two great romantic poets, Alexander Pushkin (1799-1837) and Michael Lermontov (1814-1841), were realists in their treatment of character. The former's great verse novel Eugene Onegin was an incisive study of society and social types; the latter's prose novel, A Hero of Our Times, a thoroughgoing analysis of a restless and bedevilled personality. Moreover, they were quickly followed by one of the chief masters of early realism, Nikolay V. Gogol (1809-1852).

Gogol was a Ukrainian by birth and a descendant of Cossacks, on the paternal side. He wrote both plays and novels, and among the former is Revizor or The Inspector-General, a satire on bureaucratic corruption and one of the most trenchant of modern comedies. Even better known is his work in fiction, which he started with beautiful tales of Ukrainian folk life. To his Cossack ancestry he also paid the tribute of a stirring prose epic, Taras Bulba. But he attained full stature only when he began to write out of the pity and grief that overwhelmed him. As he looked around him, he saw a vast and potentially great nation sunk in a mire of corruption and listlessness, and in describing these conditions in his unique style—compounded of realism, laughter, and tears—he became a great realist.

His most ambitious work was the long adventure novel Dead Souls. His rogue, Chichikov, covers large stretches of the Russian land in an ingenious effort to collect collateral for a loan by buying up "dead souls"—that is, serfs who have died since the last census. The picture is terrifying: Most of the people are virtual slaves bound to their masters' estates and can be bought and sold. The rural gentry consists of downright boors, sharp horse-traders, refined people who subsist on charm and procrastinate for years, and intelligent men steeped in despair. It is slight wonder that Gogol should have found reality unendurable in the end. He sought escape in religious mysticism and died under a cloud of melancholy in 1852.

Dead Souls is one of the great novels of Europe. Gogol was also a master of the short story. The best of his stories is The Cloak, the tale of a poor government clerk's misadventures when he finally buys himself a new coat. It exemplifies this writer's talent for recording the paltry life of little people, his pity for the weak, and his wry humor and ironic fantasticality.

"We have all emerged from Gogol's cloak," said one of his successors, Dostoyevsky, in a memorable eulogy on the father of Russian realism. Many writers followed him, all distinguished for their graphic descriptions of common reality. But the greatest of Gogol's immediate successors and the first to win international recognition was Ivan Sergeyevich Turgenev (1818-1883). He was the author of several plays, including a beautiful drama of unhappiness in the provinces, A Month in the Country, and of many works of fiction.

Born of an aristocratic family, and well educated in Moscow, St. Petersburg, and Berlin, Turgenev fell under the influence of Western ideas and became a liberal. A giant in size but one of the gentlest of men, he could not brook serfdom, and was depressed by political oppression and the listlessness of the educated classes. Inheriting considerable wealth after his mother's death, he freed the serfs on his estate and, chafing under Tzarist censorship, left his native land, following a famous singer throughout Europe in a fruitless pursuit. In Paris he won the friendship of Flaubert, and was looked up to by younger writers like Maupassant.

Among his novels, the most famous is Fathers and Sons, a moving and balanced study of a Russian intellectual or "nihilist," Bazarov, who challenges all conventions in the name of science but is destroyed by such natural forces as infatuation and disease. In his novels Rudin and Virgin Soil, he created other memorable intellectuals, and exposed their weakness—their inability to support their fine ideals with action, their contradictions and vacillations. At the same time, Turgenev evoked a new and vigorous generation that would grapple with the old order practically and scientifically. The pathos of his Russian Hamlets and the freshness of his heroines, combined with his simple prose lyricism, make him one of the most appealing of modern writers.

Some of his best work is to be found in his stories, and the most memorable of them appeared in his Annals of a Sportsman (1852). Here he sketched the various aspects of the Russian countryside, portraying characters in all walks of life, and evoking beauty and tenderness out of man and nature. These qualities are well exhibited in the sympathetic story Biryuk.

Turgenev was a perfect artist and a most temperate man. His successors, Dostoyevsky and Tolstoy, both artists in their own right, cared less for art and were intemperate. But they overshadowed him, for they were truly giants of the earth.

Perhaps the most tortured of all writers was Fiodor Mikhaylovitch Dostoyevsky (1821-1881), and his sufferings gave him uncanny penetration into the anguish of the soul. He was the sensitive and moody son of a tyrannical Lithuanian army surgeon, who sent him to an engineering school in St. Petersburg but kept him penniless there. Dostoyevsky's attitude toward his father was one of bitter enmity mingled with an acute sense of guilt because of this hatred. It was the murder of this parent by peasants he had oppressed that sent Dostoyevsky into his first epileptic fit. The memory of his father seems to be the undercurrent of Dostoyevsky's concern with murder and remorse in his writings.

The remainder of this writer's life only served to deepen his morbid inclinations and his comprehension of suffering. He scored an early success with Poor People, a novel of humble people's attachments and frustration that recalls Dickens, but followed this with many unsuccessful, imitative writings. He seemed stalemated when an unhappy event changed the course of his life. Dostoyevsky was arrested for participating in a conspiracy to overthrow the Tzarist regime, condemned to death, taken out at dawn with a halter around his neck, and saved from hanging only by a last-minute reprieve. This diabolical trick, ordered by the sadistic Nicholas I, shook Dostoyevsky's spirit; henceforth he was keenly sensible of death and felt like Lazarus risen from the grave. Then came experiences worse than death when Dostoyevsky's sentence was commuted to hard labor for life in Siberia. He was paroled after four years, and after some years of penal service in the army, completely released. His record of his years in the convict camp in House of the Dead is one of the most harrowing of all books. There followed an unhappy marriage with a frivolous woman who tortured him with her infidelity and hated him until the day she died of tuberculosis. (The experiences of a betrayed husband make painful but penetrative reading in his novel The Eternal Husband.) No more fortunate in his next affair, a comic-opera infatuation with a young woman student, he found understanding only late in life when he married his secretary, a long-suffering young woman who bore with his eccentricities. He had an inordinate passion for gambling, which often made him lose all his earnings; it was a disease in his case, and his long story The Gambler records it with searing intensity. Moreover he still had his epilepsy to contend with; it is the subject of his profound book, The Idiot.

Dostoyevsky wrote hastily and carelessly under excruciating conditions of poverty, illness, and suffering. But out of his writings came novels of superlative psychological insight and profound sympathy with suffering humanity. This son of devout Catholic parents knew all the stations of the Cross and followed them with loving-kindness and forgiveness. His work can be represented adequately only by his great novels: preferably by his study of guilt, Crime and Punishment; his analysis of demoniacal passion set against the gentle Christianity of an epileptic, The Idiot; and above all, his The Brothers Karamazov, a dramatic treatment of the grossly sensual, inordinately passionate, nihilistically intellectual, and altruistic types of personality that exist in society and are contained, at least potentially, in nearly every individual. The short story, The Christmas Tree and the Wedding, can convey only this titan's consummate pity in its less Promethean proportions.

Count Lev Nikolaevich Tolstoy (1828-1910) enjoyed the advantages of wealth, social connections, and a lusty body. But his entire life history was a restless struggle with himself and with the world. Reared by a pious aunt after losing his mother at an early age, he became filled with an intense sense of sin while remaining a man of strong passions, given to lust, debauchery, and gambling. His conscience and his animal self engaged in a long-drawn struggle that led Tolstoy to fill his diary with unsavory confessions, to enlist in a regiment of Cossacks in the Caucasus in order to find purification in nature, to try to educate the peasantry and convert his estate into a village commune. After this period of restlessness he settled down to an at first very happy and fruitful marriage with the daughter of a Moscow court physician. In the midst of this marriage, however, and at the height of his fame, he succumbed to an agonizing depression, contemplated hanging himself, and became profoundly religious, adopting a primitive form of Christianity that became known as Tolstoyism. Denying all creeds and courting expulsion from the Russian Church, he expounded a doctrine of absolute pacifism and non-resistance, which gave rise to a religious sect persecuted in Russia for its refusal to serve in the army. He became the center of a cult, drawing to himself disciples from all parts of Europe. All this resulted in a protracted struggle with his wife, who did not share his beliefs, was jealous of his followers, and refused to let him give away his wealth. The situation became so unbearable that Tolstoy ran away from home in his eighty-second year. He contracted pneumonia on the way and died on November 20, 1910.

Regardless of his feelings or convictions at any one time, Tolstoy invariably proved himself a superlative writer. His early work, before his marriage in 1862, included one of the best autobiographies, Childhood, Boyhood, and Youth; The Cossacks, a beautiful novel about life in the Caucasus, rich in descriptions of nature; his Sebastopol sketches of the Crimean War, notable as one of the first realistic pictures of the horrors of the battlefield; and some superb stories, such as The Two Hussars, The Three Deaths, The Snow Storm, and Polikushka, one of the tenderest studies of a hapless common man—a serf.

In the happy early years of his marriage Tolstoy turned out those two masterpieces of the modern novel: his epic of the Napoleonic age War and Peace, and his profoundly psychological tragedy of illicit passion Anna Karenina. Both are novels of tremendous scope, replete with wonderful portraits.

Although he passed the high-water mark of his creative output with the completion of Anna Karenina, the work of his long religious period revealed no reduction of his talent, even though it was now limited and often side-tracked by his didactic intentions. His Confessions, in which he announced his new-won faith, is worthy of being ranked with St. Augustine's Confessions. At this time he wrote a series of plays: The Power of Darkness, the strongest naturalistic peasant drama of the century; Redemption, an attack on Russian marriage laws combined with Tolstoy's gospel of self-sacrifice; The Fruits of Enlightenment, a delightful satire on the upper classes; and the uncompleted The Light Shines in Darkness, an autobiographical tragedy of an idealist at war with his wife and her world. His two late novels, Hadji Murad and Resurrection, a social study of the conversion of a worldly nobleman, are also impressive.

In this last period Tolstoy also wrote a number of little folk stories that have remained unsurpassed. To these he added several larger stories, The Death of Ivan Ilyitch and Master and Man, both dealing with the imminence of death and the transformation this effects in human beings. The Death of Ivan Ilyitch is one of the great short novels of the world by virtue of its realistic observation of the mental processes of a suffering man and its deep humanity.

The last important Russian writer before the present century, Anton Pavlovich Chekhov (1860-1904), was less Promethean than either Dostoyevsky or Tolstoy. He was a gentle person with a rich capacity for humor; his life was uneventful, though shattered by illness and saddened by the stagnation of the pre-revolutionary period in Russia. The son of an emancipated serf, he studied medicine while supporting himself and his large family by writing humorous stories that proved very successful. After receiving his degree in 1884, he practiced medicine for a while, and then achieved fame as a master of the short story and the drama. He married the famous actress, Madame Olga Knipper of the Moscow Art Theater, which alone understood how to stage his plays and made them successful. But he became the victim of tuberculosis at an early age, and he died shortly after the production of his masterpiece The Cherry Orchard.

After the success of two collections of amusing tales, Chekhov's artistry deepened. He no longer wrote cleverly contrived stories, but deep and somber records of life. Some of them are tender portraits of people, like The Darling and The Kiss; others are studies of the frustration in an oppressive and spiritually empty environment, like A Tiresome Story and the terrifying Ward No. 6; and still others are depressing pictures of the ignorant and brutalized peasantry, like The Hollow. His realistic and pessimistic stories resemble Maupassant's but are always suffused with sympathy and always free from cynicism.

These qualities also appear in his plays, which, though few in number, give him his greatest claim to immortality. The best of them, The Sea-Gull,

Uncle Vanya, The Three Sisters, and The Cherry Orchard, are all studies in stagnation, heightened by the passionate longings of the characters and (in the last three plays) by their sense of the coming of a new world in which their tentative struggles would attain fulfillment. He gave to the realistic drama its final sublimation, avoiding all theatrical contrivances, creating a counterpoint of characters, and immersing them in their own thoughts and feelings as if they were often unaware of any external reality, though they are painfully conscious of it. The final tragedy in Chekhov's plays is the inability of people to act; theirs is the tragedy of attrition, of rusting away in the manner of so many people, and yet being aware of their failure and struggling against it.

The Cherry Orchard is the supreme achievement of this contrapuntal realistic technique and tragedy of frustration. But despite its superb characterizations, the play, produced one year before the unsuccessful revolution of 1905 which became a dress-rehearsal for the Marxist revolution of 1917, goes beyond personal drama in its representation of the social upheaval that Chekhov expected. Its nearest equivalents in our English heritage are Shaw's Heartbreak House and Odets' Awake and Sing! It is a wistful elegy on the decay of Russia's aristocracy and the futility of her unrealistic, inactive educated classes. At the same time, the play heralds the dawn of a new world, unpleasant to members of the old but strong and pregnant with new possibilities. The Cherry Orchard, in short, is the tragedy of the process of social transition as it affects people. This is peculiarly a problem of our own age, and may be traced through the whole fabric of our present life and thought.

NIKOLAY V. GOGOL

The Cloak

In the department of —, but it is better not to mention the department. The touchiest things in the world are departments, regiments, courts of justice, in a word, all branches of public service. Each individual nowadays thinks all society insulted in his person. Quite recently, a complaint was received from a district chief of police in which he plainly demonstrated that all the imperial institutions were going to the dogs, and that the Czar's sacred name was being taken in vain; and in proof he appended to the complaint a romance, in which the district chief of police is made to appear about once in every ten pages, and sometimes in a downright drunken condition. Therefore, in order to avoid all unpleasantness, it will be better to designate the department in question, as a certain department.

So, in a certain department there was a certain official—not a very notable one, it must be allowed—short of stature, somewhat pock-marked, red-haired, and mole-eyed, with a bald forehead, wrinkled cheeks, and a complexion of the kind known as sanguine. The St. Petersburg climate was responsible for this. As for his official rank—with us Russians the rank comes first—he was what is called a perpetual titular councillor, over which, as is well known, some writers make merry and crack their jokes, obeying the praiseworthy custom of attacking those who cannot bite back.

His family name was Bashmachkin. This name is evidently derived from bashmak (shoe); but, when, at what time, and in what manner, is not known. His father and grandfather, and all the Bashmachkins, always wore boots, which were re-soled two or three times a year. His name was Akaky Akakiyevich. It may strike the reader as rather singular and far-fetched; but he may rest assured that it was by no means far-fetched, and that the circumstances were such that it would have been impossible to give him any other.

This was how it came about.

Akaky Akakiyevich was born, if my memory fails me not, in the evening on the 23rd of March. His mother, the wife of a Government official, and a very fine woman, made all due arrangements for having the child baptised. She was lying on the bed opposite the door; on her right stood the godfather, Ivan Ivanovich Eroshkin, a most estimable man, who served as the head clerk of the senate; and the godmother, Arina Semyonovna Bielobrinshkova, the wife of an officer of the quarter, and a woman of rare virtues. They offered the mother her choice of three names, Mokiya, Sossiia, or that the child should be called after the martyr Khozdazat. "No," said the good woman, "all those names are poor." In order to please her, they opened the calendar at another place; three more names appeared, Triphily, Dula, and Varakhasy. "This is awful," said the old woman. "What names! I truly never heard the like. I might have put up with Varadat or Varukh, but not Triphily and Varakhasy!" They turned to another page and found Pavsikakhy and Vakhtisy. "Now I see," said the old woman, "that it is plainly fate. And since such is the case, it will be better to name him after his father. His father's name was Akaky, so let his son's name be Akaky too." In this manner he became Akaky Akakiyevich. They christened the child, whereat he wept, and made a grimace, as though he foresaw that he was to be a titular councillor.

In this manner did it all come about. We have mentioned it in order that the reader might see for himself that it was a case of necessity, and that it was utterly impossible to give him any other name.

When and how he entered the department, and who appointed him, no one could remember. However much the directors and chiefs of all kinds were changed, he was always to be seen in the same place, the same attitude, the same occupation—always the letter-copying clerk—so that it was afterwards affirmed that he had been born in uniform with a bald head. No respect was shown him in the department. The porter not only did not rise from his seat when he passed, but never even glanced at him, any more than if a fly had flown through the reception-room. His superiors treated him in coolly despotic fashion. Some insignificant assistant to the head clerk would thrust a paper under his nose without so much as saying, "Copy," or, "Here's an interesting little case," or anything else agreeable, as is customary amongst well-bred officials. And he took it, looking only at the paper, and not observing who handed it to him, or whether he had the right to do so; simply took it, and set about copying it.

The young officials laughed at and made fun of him, so far as their official wit permitted; told in his presence various stories concocted about him, and about his landlady, an old woman of seventy; declared that she beat him; asked when the wedding was to be; and strewed bits of paper over his head, calling them snow. But Akaky Akakiyevich answered not a word, any more than if there had been no one there besides himself. It even had no effect upon his work. Amid all these annoyances he never made a single mistake in a letter. But if the joking became wholly unbearable, as when they jogged his head, and prevented his attending to his work, he would exclaim:

"Leave me alone! Why do you insult me?"

And there was something strange in the words and the voice in which they were uttered. There was in it something which moved to pity; so much so that one young man, a newcomer, who, taking pattern by the others, had permitted himself to make sport of Akaky, suddenly stopped short, as though all about him had undergone a transformation, and presented itself in a different aspect. Some unseen force repelled him from the comrades whose acquaintance he had made, on the supposition that they were decent, well-bred men. Long afterwards, in his gayest moments, there recurred to his mind the little official with the bald forehead, with his heart-rending words, "Leave me alone! Why do you insult me?" In these moving words, other words resounded—"I am thy brother." And the young man covered his face with his hand; and many a time afterwards, in the course of his life, shuddered at seeing how much inhumanity there is in man, how much savage coarseness is concealed beneath refined, cultured, worldly refinement, and even, O God! in that man whom the world acknowledges as honourable and upright.

It would be difficult to find another man who lived so entirely for his duties. It is not enough to say that Akaky laboured with zeal; no, he laboured with love. In his copying, he found a varied and agreeable employment. Enjoyment was written on his face; some letters were even favourites with him; and when he encountered these, he smiled, winked, and worked with his lips, till it seemed as though each letter might be read in his face, as his pen traced it. If his pay had been in proportion to his zeal, he would, perhaps, to his great surprise, have been made even a councillor of state. But he worked, as his companions, the wits, put it, like a horse in a mill.

However, it would be untrue to say that no attention was paid to him. One director being a kindly man, and desirous of rewarding him for his long service, ordered him to be given something more important than mere copying. So he was ordered to make a report of an already concluded affair, to another department; the duty consisting simply in changing the heading and altering a few words from the first to the third person. This caused him so much toil, that he broke into a perspiration, rubbed his forehead, and finally said, "No, give me rather something to copy." After that they let him copy on forever.

Outside this copying, it appeared that nothing existed for him. He gave no thought to his clothes. His uniform was not green, but a sort of rusty-meal colour. The collar was low, so that his neck, in spite of the fact that it was not long, seemed inordinately so as it emerged from it, like the necks of the plaster cats which pedlars carry about on their heads. And something was always sticking to his uniform, either a bit of hay or some trifle. Moreover, he had a peculiar knack, as he walked along the street, of arriving beneath a window just as all sorts of rubbish was being flung out of it; hence he always bore about on his hat scraps of melon rinds, and other such articles. Never once in his life did he give heed to what was going on every day in the street; while it is well known that his young brother officials trained the range of their glances till they could see when any one's trouser-straps came undone upon the opposite sidewalk, which always brought a malicious smile to their faces. But Akaky Akakiyevich saw in all things the clean, even strokes of his written lines; and only when a horse thrust his nose, from some unknown quarter, over his shoulder, and sent a whole gust of wind down his neck from his nostrils, did he observe that he was not in the middle of a line, but in the middle of the street.

On reaching home, he sat down at once at the table, sipped his cabbage-soup up quickly, and swallowed a bit of beef with onions, never noticing their taste, and gulping down everything with flies and anything else which the Lord happened to send at the moment. When he saw that his stomach was beginning to swell, he rose from the table, and copied papers which he had brought home. If there happened to be none, he took copies for himself, for his own gratification, especially if the document was noteworthy, not on account of its style, but of its being addressed to some distinguished person.

Even at the hour when the grey St. Petersburg sky had quite disappeared, and all the official world had eaten or dined, each as he could, in accordance with the salary he received and his own fancy; when all were resting from the department jar of pens, running to and fro, for their own and other people's indispensable occupations, and from all the work that an uneasy man makes willingly for himself, rather than what is necessary; when officials hasten to dedicate to pleasure the time which is left to them, one bolder than the rest going to the theatre; another, into the street looking under the bonnets; another wasting his evening in compliments to some pretty girl, the star of a small official circle; another—and this is the common case of all—visiting his comrades on the third or fourth floor, in two small rooms with an ante-room or kitchen, and some pretensions to fashion, such as a lamp or some other trifle which has cost many a sacrifice of dinner or pleasure trip; in a word, at the hour when all officials disperse among the contracted quarters of their friends, to play whist, as they sip their tea from glasses with a kopek's worth of sugar, smoke long pipes, relate at time some bits of gossip which a Russian man can never, under any circumstances, refrain from, and when there is nothing else to talk of, repeat eternal anecdotes about the commandant to whom they had sent word that the tails of the horses on the Falconet Monument had been cut off; when all strive to divert themselves, Akaky Akakiyevich indulged in no kind of diversion. No one could even say that he had seen him at any kind of evening party. Having written to his heart's content, he lay down to sleep, smiling at the thought of the coming day—of what God might send him to copy on the morrow.

Thus flowed on the peaceful life of the man, who, with a salary of four hundred rubles, understood how to be content with his lot; and thus it would have continued to flow on, perhaps, to extreme old age, were it not that there are various ills strewn along the path of life for titular councillors as well as for private, actual, court, and every other species of councillor, even to those who never give any advice or take any themselves.

There exists in St. Petersburg a powerful foe of all who receive a salary of four hundred rubles a year, or thereabouts. This foe is no other than the Northern cold, although it is said to be very healthy. At nine o'clock in the morning, at the very hour when the streets are filled with men bound for the various official departments, it begins to bestow such powerful and piercing nips on all noses impartially, that the poor officials really do not know what to do with them. At an hour when the foreheads of even those who occupy exalted positions ache with the cold, and tears start to their eyes, the poor titular councillors are sometimes quite unprotected. Their only salvation lies in traversing as quickly as possible, in their thin little cloaks, five or six streets, and then warming their feet in the porter's room, and so thawing all their talents and qualifications for official service, which had become frozen on the way.

Akaky Akakiyevich had felt for some time that his back and shoulders were paining with peculiar poignancy, in spite of the fact that he tried to traverse the distance with all possible speed. He began finally to wonder whether the fault did not lie in his cloak. He examined it thoroughly at home, and discovered that in two places, namely, on the back and shoulders, it had become thin as gauze. The cloth was worn to such a degree that he could see through it, and the lining had fallen into pieces. You must know that Akaky Akakiyevich's cloak served as an object of ridicule to the officials. They even refused it the noble name of cloak, and called it a cape. In fact, it was of singular make, its collar diminishing year by year to serve to patch its other parts. The patching did not exhibit great skill on the part of the tailor, and was, in fact, baggy and ugly. Seeing how the matter stood, Akaky Akakiyevich decided that it would be necessary to take the cloak to Petrovich, the tailor, who lived somewhere on the fourth floor up a dark staircase, and who, in spite of his having but one eye and pock-marks all over his face, busied himself with considerable success in repairing the trousers and coats of officials and others; that is to say, when he was sober and not nursing some other scheme in his head.

It is not necessary to say much about this tailor, but as it is the custom to have the character of each personage in a novel clearly defined there is no help for it, so here is Petrovich the tailor. At first he was called only Grigory, and was some gentleman's serf. He commenced calling himself Petrovich from the time when he received his free papers, and further began to drink heavily on all holidays, at first on the great ones, and then on all church festivals without discrimination, wherever a cross stood in the calendar. On this point he was faithful to ancestral custom; and when quarrelling with his wife, he called her a low female and a German. As we have mentioned his wife, it will be necessary to say a word or two about her. Unfortunately, little is known of her beyond the fact that Petrovich had a wife, who wore a cap and a dress, but could not lay claim to beauty, at least, no one but the soldiers of the guard even looked under her cap when they met her.

Ascending the staircase which led to Petrovich's room—which staircase was all soaked with dish-water and reeked with the smell of spirits which affects the eyes, and is an inevitable adjunct to all dark stairways in St. Petersburg houses—ascending the stairs, Akaky Akakiyevich pondered how much Petrovich would ask, and mentally resolved not to give more than two rubles. The door was open, for the mistress, in cooking some fish, had raised such a smoke in the kitchen that not even the beetles were visible. Akaky Akakiyevich passed through the kitchen unperceived, even by the housewife, and at length reached a room where he beheld Petrovich seated on a large unpainted table, with his legs tucked under him like a Turkish pasha. His feet were bare, after the fashion of tailors as they sit at work; and the first thing which caught the eye was his thumb, with a deformed nail thick and strong as a turtle's shell. About Petrovich's neck hung a skein of silk and thread, and upon his knees lay some old garment. He had been trying unsuccessfully for three minutes to thread his needle, and was enraged at the darkness and even at the thread, growling in a low voice, "It won't go through, you pricked me, you rascal!"

Akaky Akakiyevich was vexed at arriving at the precise moment when Petrovich was angry. He liked to order something of Petrovich when he was a little downhearted, or, as his wife expressed it, "when he had settled himself with brandy, the one-eyed devil!" Under such circumstances Petrovich generally came down in his price very readily, and even bowed and returned thanks. Afterwards, to be sure, his wife would come, complaining that her husband had been drunk, and so had fixed the price too low; but, if only a ten-kopek piece were added then the matter would be settled. But now it appeared that Petrovich was in a sober condition, and therefore rough, taciturn, and inclined to demand, Satan only knows what price. Akaky Akakiyevich felt this, and would gladly have beat a retreat, but he was in for it. Petrovich screwed up his one eye very intently at him, and Akaky Akakiyevich involuntarily said, "How do you do, Petrovich?"

"I wish you a good morning, sir," said Petrovich²⁰ squinting at Akaky Akakiyevich's hands, to see what sort of booty he had brought.

"Ah! I—to you, Petrovich, this—" It must be known that Akaky Akakiyevich expressed himself chiefly by prepositions, adverbs, and scraps of phrases which had no meaning whatever. If the matter was a very difficult one, he had a habit of never completing his sentences, so that frequently, having begun a phrase with the words, "This, in fact, is quite—" he forgot to go on, thinking he³⁰ had already finished it.

"What is it?" asked Petrovich, and with his one eye scanned Akaky Akakiyevich's whole uniform from the collar down to the cuffs, the back, the tails and the buttonholes, all of which were well known to him, since they were his own handiwork. Such is the habit of tailors; it is the first thing they do on meeting one.

"But I, here, this—Petrovich—a cloak, cloth—here you see, everywhere, in different places, it is quite strong—it is a little dusty and looks old, but it is new, only here in one place it is a little—on the back, and here on one of the shoulders, it is a little worn, yes, here on this shoulder it is a little—do you see? That is all. And a little work—"

Petrovich took the cloak, spread it out, to begin with, on the table, looked at it hard, shook his head, reached out his hand to the window-sill for his snuff-box, adorned with the portrait of some general, though what general is unknown, for the place where the face should have been had been rubbed through by the finger and a square bit of paper had been pasted over it. Having taken a pinch of snuff, Petrovich held up the cloak, and inspected it against the light, and again shook his head. Then he turned it, lining upwards, and shook his head once more. After which he again lifted the general-adorned lid with its bit of pasted paper, and having stuffed his nose with snuff, closed and put away the snuff-box, and said finally, "No, it is impossible to mend it. It is a wretched garment!"

Akaky Akakiyevich's heart sank at these words.

"Why is it impossible, Petrovich?" he said, almost in the pleading voice of a child. "All that ails it is, that it is worn on the shoulders. You must have some pieces—"

"Yes, patches could be found, patches are easily found," said Petrovich, "but there's nothing to sew them to. The thing is completely rotten. If you put a needle to it—see, it will give way."

"Let it give way, and you can put on another patch at once."

"But there is nothing to put the patches on to. There's no use in strengthening it. It is too far gone. It's lucky that it's cloth, for, if the wind were to blow, it would fly away."

"Well, strengthen it again. How this, in fact—"

"No," said Petrovich decisively, "there is nothing to be done with it. It's a thoroughly bad job. You'd better, when the cold winter weather comes on, make yourself some gaiters out of it, because stockings are not warm. The Germans invented them in order to make more money." Petrovich loved on all occasions to have a fling at the Germans. "But it is plain you must have a new cloak."

At the word "new" all grew dark before Akaky Akakiyevich's eyes, and everything in the room began to whirl round. The only thing he saw clearly was the general with the paper face on the lid of Petrovich's snuff-box. "A new one?" said he, as if still in a dream. "Why, I have no money for that."

"Yes, a new one," said Petrovich, with barbarous composure.

"Well, if it came to a new one, how—it—"

"You mean how much would it cost?"

"Yes."

"Well, you would have to lay out a hundred and fifty or more," said Petrovich, and pursed up his lips significantly. He liked to produce powerful effects, liked to stun utterly and suddenly, and then to glance sideways to see what face the stunned person would put on the matter.

"A hundred and fifty rubles for a cloak!" shrieked poor Akaky Akakiyevich, perhaps for the first time in his life, for his voice had always been distinguished for softness.

"Yes, sir," said Petrovich, "for any kind of cloak. If you have a marten fur on the collar, or a silk-lined hood, it will mount up to two hundred."

"Petrovich, please," said Akaky Akakiyevich in a beseeching tone, not hearing, and not trying to hear, Petrovich's words, and disregarding all his "effects," "some repairs, in order that it may wear yet a little longer."

"No, it would only be a waste of time and money," said Petrovich. And Akaky Akakiyevich went away after these words, utterly discouraged. But Petrovich stood for some time after his departure, with significantly compressed lips, and without betaking himself to his work, satisfied that he would not be dropped, and an artistic tailor employed.

Akaky Akakiyevich went out into the street as if in a dream. "Such an affair!" he said to himself. "I did not think it had come to—" and then after a pause, he added, "Well, so it is! see what it has come to at last! and I never imagined that it was so!" Then followed a long silence, after which he exclaimed, "Well, so it is! see what already—nothing unexpected that—it would be nothing—what a strange circumstance!" So saying, instead of going home, he went in exactly the opposite direction without suspecting it. On the way, a chimney-sweep bumped up against him, and blackened his shoulder, and a whole hatful of rubbish landed on him from the top of a house which was being built. He did not notice it, and only when he ran against a watchman, who, having planted his halberd beside him, was shaking some snuff from his box into his horny hand, did he recover himself a little, and that because the watchman said, "Why are you poking yourself into a man's very face? Haven't you room enough?" This caused him to look about him, and turn towards home.

There only, he finally began to collect his thoughts, and to survey his position in its clear and actual light, and to argue with himself, sensibly and frankly, as with a reasonable friend, with whom one can discuss private and personal matters. "No," said Akaky Akakiyevich, "it is impossible to reason with Petrovich now. He is that—evidently, his wife has been beating him. I'd better go to him on Sunday morning. After Saturday night he will be a little cross-eyed and sleepy, for he will want to get drunk, and his wife won't give him any money, and at such a time, a ten-kopek piece in his hand will—he will become more fit to reason with, and then the cloak and that—" Thus argued Akaky Akakiyevich with himself, regained his courage, and waited until the first Sunday, when, seeing from afar that Petrovich's wife had left the house, he went straight to him.

Petrovich's eye was indeed very much askew after Saturday. His head drooped, and he was very sleepy; but for all that, as soon as he knew what it was a question of, it seemed as though Satan jogged his memory. "Impossible," said he. "Please to order a new one." Thereupon Akaky Akakiyevich handed over the ten-kopek piece. "Thank you, sir. I will drink your good health," said Petrovich. "But as for the cloak, don't trouble yourself about it; it is good for nothing. I will make you a capital new one, so let us settle about it now."

Akaky Akakiyevich was still for mending it, but Petrovich would not hear of it, and said, "I shall certainly have to make you a new one, and you may depend upon it that I shall do my best. It may even be, as the fashion goes, that the collar can be fastened by silver hooks under a flap."

Then Akaky Akakiyevich saw that it was impossible to get along without a new cloak, and his spirit sank utterly. How, in fact, was it to be done? Where was the money to come from? He must have some new trousers, and pay a debt of long standing to the shoemaker for putting new tops to his old boots, and he must order three shirts from the seamstress, and a couple of pieces of linen. In short, all his money must be spent. And even if the director should be so kind as to order him to receive forty-five or even fifty rubles instead of forty, it would be a mere nothing, a mere drop in the ocean towards the funds necessary for a cloak, although he knew that Petrovich was often wrong-headed enough to blurt out some outrageous price, so that even his own wife could not refrain from exclaiming, "Have you lost your senses, you fool?" At one time he would not work at any price, and now it was quite likely that he had named a higher sum than the cloak would cost.

But although he knew that Petrovich would undertake to make a cloak for eighty rubles, still, where was he to get the eighty rubles from? He might possibly manage half. Yes, half might be procured, but where was the other half to come from? But the reader must first be told where the first half came from.

Akaky Akakiyevich had a habit of putting, for every ruble he spent, a groschen into a small box, fastened with lock and key, and with a slit in the top for the reception of money. At the end of every half-year he counted over the heap of coppers, and changed it for silver. This he had done for a long time, and in the course of years, the sum had mounted up to over forty rubles. Thus he had one half on hand. But where was he to find the other half? Where was he to get another forty rubles from? Akaky Akakiyevich thought and thought, and decided that it would be necessary to curtail his ordinary expenses, for the space of one year at least, to dispense with tea in the evening, to burn no candles, and, if there was anything which he must do, to go into his landlady's room, and work by her light. When he went into the street, he must walk as lightly as he could, and as cautiously, upon the stones, almost upon tiptoe, in order not to wear his heels down in too short a time. He must give the laundress as little to wash as possible; and, in order not to wear out his clothes, he must take them off as soon as he got home, and wear only his cotton dressing-gown, which had been long and carefully saved.

To tell the truth, it was a little hard for him at first to accustom himself to these deprivations. But he got used to them at length, after a fashion, and all went smoothly. He even got used to being hungry in the evening, but he made up for it by treating himself, so to say, in spirit, by bearing ever in mind the idea of his future cloak. From that time forth, his existence seemed to become, in some way, fuller, as if he were married, or as if some other man lived in him, as if, in fact, he were not alone, and some pleasant friend had consented to travel along life's path with him, the friend being no other than the cloak, with thick wadding and a strong lining incapable of wearing out. He became more lively, and even his character grew firmer, like that of a man who has made up his mind, and set himself a goal. From his face and gait, doubt and indecision, all hesitating and wavering disappeared of themselves. Fire gleamed in his eyes, and occasionally the boldest and most daring ideas flitted through his mind. Why not, for instance, have marten fur on the collar? The thought of this almost made him absent-minded. Once, in copying a letter, he nearly made a mistake, so that he exclaimed almost aloud, "Ugh!" and crossed himself. Once, in the course of every month, he had a conference with Petrovich on the subject of the cloak, where it would be better to buy the cloth, and the colour, and the price. He always returned home satisfied, though troubled, reflecting that the time would come at last when it could all be bought, and then the cloak made.

The affair progressed more briskly than he had expected. For beyond all his hopes, the director awarded neither forty nor forty-five rubles for Akaky Akakiyevich's share, but sixty. Whether he suspected that Akaky Akakiyevich needed a cloak, or whether it was merely chance, at all events, twenty extra rubles were by this means provided. This circumstance hastened matters. Two or three months more of hunger and Akaky Akakiyevich had accumulated about eighty rubles. His heart, generally so quiet, began to throb. On the first possible day, he went shopping in company with Petrovich. They bought some very good cloth, and at a reasonable rate too, for they had been considering the matter for six months, and rarely let a month pass without their visiting the shops to enquire prices. Petrovich himself said that no better cloth could be had. For lining, they selected a cotton stuff, but so firm and thick, that Petrovich declared it to be better than silk, and even prettier and more glossy. They did not buy the marten fur, because it was, in fact, dear, but in its stead, they picked out the very best of cat-skin which could be found in the shop, and which might, indeed, be taken for marten at a distance.

Petrovich worked at the cloak two whole weeks, for there was a great deal of quilting; otherwise it would have been finished sooner. He charged twelve rubles for the job, it could not possibly have been done for less. It was all sewed with silk, in small, double seams, and Petrovich went over each seam afterwards with his own teeth, stamping in various patterns.

It was—it is difficult to say precisely on what day, but probably the most glorious one in Akaky Akakiyevich's life, when Petrovich at length brought home the cloak. He brought it in the morning, before the hour when it was necessary to start for the department. Never did a cloak arrive so exactly in the nick of time, for the severe cold had set in, and it seemed to threaten to increase. Petrovich brought the cloak himself as befits a good tailor. On his countenance was a significant expression, such as Akaky Akakiyevich had never beheld there. He seemed fully sensible that he had done no small deed, and crossed a gulf separating tailors who put in linings, and execute repairs, from those who make new things. He took the cloak out of the pocket-handkerchief in which he had brought it. The handkerchief was fresh from the laundress, and he put it in his pocket for use. Taking out the cloak, he gazed proudly at it, held it up with both hands, and flung it skilfully over the shoulders of Akaky Akakiyevich. Then he pulled it and fitted it down behind with his hand, and he draped it around Akaky Akakiyevich without buttoning it. Akaky Akakiyevich, like an experienced man, wished to try the sleeves. Petrovich helped him on with them, and it turned out that the sleeves were satisfactory also. In short, the cloak appeared to be perfect, and most seasonable. Petrovich did not neglect to observe that it was only because he lived in a narrow street, and had no signboard, and had known Akaky Akakiyevich so long, that he had made it so cheaply; but that if he had been in business on the Nevsky Prospect, he would have charged seventy-five rubles for the making alone. Akaky Akakiyevich did not care to argue this point with Petrovich. He paid him, thanked him, and set out at once in his new cloak for the department. Petrovich followed him, and pausing in the street, gazed long at the cloak in the distance, after which he went to one side expressly to run through a crooked alley, and emerge again into the street beyond to gaze once more upon the cloak from another point, namely, directly in front.

Meantime Akaky Akakiyevich went on in holiday mood. He was conscious every second of the time that he had a new cloak on his shoulders, and several times he laughed with internal satisfaction. In fact, there were two advantages, one was its warmth, the other its beauty. He saw nothing of the road, but suddenly found himself at the department. He took off his cloak in the ante-room, looked it over carefully, and confided it to the special care of the attendant. It is impossible to say precisely how it was that every one in the department knew at once that Akaky Akakiyevich had a new cloak, and that the "cape" no longer existed. All rushed at the same moment into the ante-room to inspect it. They congratulated him, and said pleasant things to him, so that he began at first to smile, and then to grow ashamed. When all surrounded him, and said that the new cloak must be "christened," and that he must at least give them all a party, Akaky Akakiyevich lost his head completely, and did not know where he stood, what to answer, or how to get out of it. He stood blushing all over for several minutes, trying to assure them with great simplicity that it was not a new cloak, that it was in fact the old "cape."

At length one of the officials, assistant to the head clerk, in order to show that he was not at all proud, and on good terms with his inferiors, said: "So be it, only I will give the party instead of Akaky Akakiyevich; I invite you all to tea with me to-night. It just happens to be my name-day too."

The officials naturally at once offered the assistant clerk their congratulations, and accepted the invitation with pleasure. Akaky Akakiyevich would have declined; but all declared that it was discourteous, that it was simply a sin and a shame, and that he could not possibly refuse. Besides, the notion became pleasant to him when he recollected that he should thereby have a chance of wearing his new cloak in the evening also.

That whole day was truly a most triumphant festival for Akaky Akakiyevich. He returned home in the most happy frame of mind, took off his cloak, and hung it carefully on the wall, admiring afresh the cloth and the lining. Then he brought out his old, worn-out cloak, for comparison. He looked at it, and laughed, so vast was the difference. And long after dinner he laughed again when the condition of the "cape" recurred to his mind. He dined cheerfully, and after dinner wrote nothing, but took his ease for a while on the bed, until it got dark. Then he dressed himself leisurely, put on his cloak, and stepped out into the street.

Where the host lived, unfortunately we cannot say. Our memory begins to fail us badly. The houses and streets in St. Petersburg have become so mixed up in our head that it is very difficult to get anything out of it again in proper form. This much is certain, that the official lived in the best part of the city; and therefore it must have been anything but near to Akaky Akakiyevich's residence. Akaky Akakiyevich was first obliged to traverse a kind of wilderness of deserted, dimly-lighted streets. But in proportion as he approached the official's quarter of the city, the streets became more lively, more populous, and more brilliantly illuminated. Pedestrians began to appear; handsomely dressed ladies were more frequently encountered; the men had otter skin collars to their coats; shabby sleigh-men with their wooden, railed sledges stuck over with brass-headed nails, became rarer; whilst on the other hand, more and more drivers in red velvet caps, lacquered sledges and bear-skin coats began to appear, and carriages with rich hammer-cloths flew swiftly through the streets, their wheels scrunching the snow.

Akaky Akakiyevich gazed upon all this as upon a novel sight. He had not been in the streets during the evening for years. He halted out of curiosity before a shop-window, to look at a picture representing a handsome woman, who had thrown off her shoe, thereby baring her whole foot in a very pretty way; whilst behind her the head of a man with whiskers and a handsome moustache peeped through the doorway of another room. Akaky Akakiyevich shook his head, and laughed, and then went on his way. Why did he laugh? Either because he had met with a thing utterly unknown, but for which every one cherishes, 10 nevertheless, some sort of feeling, or else he thought, like many officials, "Well, those French! What is to be said? If they do go in for anything of that sort, why—" But possibly he did not think at all.

Akaky Akakiyevich at length reached the house in which the head clerk's assistant lodged. He lived in fine style. The staircase was lit by a lamp, his apartment being on the second floor. On entering the vestibule, Akaky Akakiyevich beheld a whole 20 row of goloshes on the floor. Among them, in the centre of the room, stood a samovar, humming and emitting clouds of steam. On the walls hung all sorts of coats and cloaks, among which there were even some with beaver collars, or velvet facings. Beyond, the buzz of conversation was audible, and became clear and loud, when the servant came out with a trayful of empty glasses, cream-jugs and sugar-bowls. It was evident that the officials had arrived long before, and had already 30 finished their first glass of tea.

Akaky Akakiyevich, having hung up his own cloak, entered the inner room. Before him all at once appeared lights, officials, pipes, and card-tables, and he was bewildered by a sound of rapid conversation rising from all the tables, and the noise of moving chairs. He halted very awkwardly in the middle of the room, wondering what he ought to do. But they had seen him. They received him with a shout, and all thronged at once into 40 the ante-room, and there took another look at his cloak. Akaky Akakiyevich, although somewhat confused, was frank-hearted, and could not refrain from rejoicing when he saw how they praised his cloak. Then, of course, they all dropped him and his cloak, and returned, as was proper, to the tables set out for whist.

All this, the noise, the talk, and the throng of people, was rather overwhelming to Akaky Akakiyevich. He simply did not know where he stood, 50 or where to put his hands, his feet, and his whole body. Finally he sat down by the players, looked at the cards, gazed at the face of one and another, and after a while began to gape, and to feel that it was wearisome, the more so, as the hour was already long past when he usually went to bed. He wanted to take leave of the host, but they would not let him go, saying that he must not fail to drink a glass of champagne, in honour of his new garment. In the course of an hour, supper, consisting of vegetable salad, cold veal, pastry, confectioner's pies, and champagne, was served. They made Akaky Akakiyevich drink two glasses of champagne, after which he felt things grow livelier.

Still, he could not forget that it was twelve o'clock, and that he should have been at home long ago. In order that the host might not think of some excuse for detaining him, he stole out of the room quickly, sought out, in the ante-room, his cloak, which, to his sorrow, he found lying on the floor, brushed it, picked off every speck upon it, put it on his shoulders, and descended the stairs to the street.

In the street all was still bright. Some petty shops, those permanent clubs of servants and all sorts of folks, were open. Others were shut, but, nevertheless, showed a streak of light the whole length of the door-crack, indicating that they were not yet free of company, and that probably some domestics, male and female, were finishing their stories and conversations, whilst leaving their masters in complete ignorance as to their whereabouts. Akaky Akakiyevich went on in a happy frame of mind. He even started to run, without knowing why, after some lady, who flew past like a flash of lightning. But he stopped short, and went on very quietly as before, wondering why he had quickened his pace. Soon there spread before him those deserted streets which are not cheerful in the daytime, to say nothing of the evening. Now they were even more dim and lonely. The lanterns began to grow rarer, oil, evidently, had been less liberally supplied. Then came wooden houses and fences. Not a soul anywhere; only the snow 40 sparkled in the streets, and mournfully veiled the low-roofed cabins with their closed shutters. He approached the spot where the street crossed a vast square with houses barely visible on its farther side, a square which seemed a fearful desert.

Afar, a tiny spark glimmered from some watchman's-box, which seemed to stand on the edge of the world. Akaky Akakiyevich's cheerfulness diminished at this point in a marked degree. He entered the square, not without an involuntary sensation of fear, as though his heart warned him of some evil. He glanced back, and on both sides it was like a sea about him. "No, it is better not to look," he thought, and went on, closing his eyes.

When he opened them, to see whether he was near the end of the square, he suddenly beheld, standing just before his very nose, some bearded individuals of precisely what sort, he could not make out. All grew dark before his eyes, and his heart throbbed.

"Of course, the cloak is mine!" said one of them in a loud voice, seizing hold of his collar. Akaky Akakiyevich was about to shout "Help!" when the second man thrust a fist, about the size of an official's head, at his very mouth, muttering, "Just 10 you dare to scream!"

Akaky Akakiyevich felt them strip off his cloak, and give him a kick. He fell headlong upon the snow, and felt no more.

In a few minutes he recovered consciousness, and rose to his feet, but no one was there. He felt that it was cold in the square, and that his cloak was gone. He began to shout, but his voice did not appear to reach the outskirts of the square. In despair, but without ceasing to shout, he started 20 at a run across the square, straight towards the watch-box, beside which stood the watchman, leaning on his halberd, and apparently curious to know what kind of a customer was running towards him shouting. Akaky Akakiyevich ran up to him, and began in a sobbing voice to shout that he was asleep, and attended to nothing, and did not see when a man was robbed. The watchman replied that he had seen two men stop him in the middle of the square, but supposed that they were friends 30 of his, and that, instead of scolding vainly, he had better go to the police on the morrow, so that they might make a search for whoever had stolen the cloak.

Akaky Akakiyevich ran home and arrived in a state of complete disorder, his hair which grew very thinly upon his temples and the back of his head all tousled, his body, arms and legs, covered with snow. The old woman, who was mistress of his lodgings, on hearing a terrible knocking, sprang 40 hastily from her bed, and, with only one shoe on, ran to open the door, pressing the sleeve of her chemise to her bosom out of modesty. But when she had opened it, she fell back on beholding Akaky Akakiyevich in such a condition. When he told her about the affair, she clasped her hands, and said that he must go straight to the district chief of police, for his subordinate would turn up his nose, promise well, and drop the matter there. The very best thing to do, therefore, would be to 50 go to the district chief, whom she knew, because Finnish Anna, her former cook, was now nurse at his house. She often saw him passing the house, and he was at church every Sunday, praying, but at the same time gazing cheerfully at everybody; so that he must be a good man, judging from all appearances. Having listened to this opinion, Akaky Akakiyevich betook himself sadly to his room. And how he spent the night there, any one who can put himself in another's place may readily imagine.

Early in the morning, he presented himself at the district chief's, but was told the official was asleep. He went again at ten and was again informed that he was asleep. At eleven, and they said, "The superintendent is not at home." At dinner time, and the clerks in the ante-room would not admit him on any terms, and insisted upon knowing his business. So that at last, for once in his life, Akaky Akakiyevich felt an inclination to show some spirit, and said curtly that he must see the chief in person, that they ought not to presume to refuse him entrance, that he came from the department of justice, and that when he com- 20 plained of them, they would see.

The clerks dared make no reply to this, and one of them went to call the chief, who listened to the strange story of the theft of the coat. Instead of directing his attention to the principal points of the matter, he began to question Akaky Akakiyevich. Why was he going home so late? Was he in the habit of doing so, or had he been to some disorderly house? So that Akaky Akakiyevich got thoroughly confused, and left him, without know- 30 ing whether the affair of his cloak was in proper train or not.

All that day, for the first time in his life, he never went near the department. The next day he made his appearance, very pale, and in his old cape, which had become even more shabby. The news of the robbery of the cloak touched many, although there were some officials present who never lost an opportunity, even such a one as the present, of ridiculing Akaky Akakiyevich. They decided to make a collection for him on the spot, but the officials had already spent a great deal in subscribing for the director's portrait, and for some book, at the suggestion of the head of that division, who was a friend of the author; and so the sum was trifling.

One of them, moved by pity, resolved to help Akaky Akakiyevich with some good advice, at least, and told him that he ought not to go to the police, for although it might happen that a police-officer, wishing to win the approval of his superiors, might hunt up the cloak by some means, still, his cloak would remain in the possession of the police if he did not offer legal proof that it belonged to him. The best thing for him, therefore, would be to apply to a certain prominent personage; since this prominent personage, by entering into relation with the proper persons, could greatly expedite the matter.

As there was nothing else to be done, Akaky Akakiyevich decided to go to the prominent personage. What was the exact official position of the prominent personage, remains unknown to this day. The reader must know that the prominent personage had but recently become a prominent personage, having up to that time been only an insignificant person. Moreover, his present position was not considered prominent in comparison with others still more so. But there is always a circle of people to whom what is insignificant in the eyes of others, is important enough. Moreover, he strove to increase his importance by sundry devices. For instance, he managed to have the inferior officials meet him on the staircase when he entered upon his service; no one was to presume to come directly to him, but the strictest etiquette must be observed; the collegiate recorder must make a report to the government secretary, the government secretary to the titular councillor, or whatever other man was proper, and all business must come before him in this manner. In Holy Russia, all is thus contaminated with the love of imitation; every man imitates and copies his superior. They even say that a certain titular councillor, when promoted to the head of some small separate office, immediately partitioned off a private room for himself, called it the audience chamber, and posted at the door a lackey with red collar and braid, who grasped the handle of the door, and opened to all comers, though the audience chamber would hardly hold an ordinary writing table.

The manners and customs of the prominent personage were grand and imposing, but rather exaggerated. The main foundation of his system was strictness. "Strictness, strictness, and always strictness!" he generally said; and at the last word he looked significantly into the face of the person to whom he spoke. But there was no necessity for this, for the halfscore of subordinates, who formed the entire force of the office, were properly afraid. On catching sight of him afar off, they left their work, and waited, drawn up in line, until he had passed through the room. His ordinary converse with his inferiors smacked of sternness, and consisted chiefly of three phrases: "How dare you?" "Do you know whom you are speaking to?" "Do you realise who is standing before you?"

Otherwise he was a very kind-hearted man, good to his comrades, and ready to oblige. But the rank of general threw him completely off his balance. On receiving any one of that rank, he became confused, lost his way, as it were, and never knew what to do. If he chanced to be amongst his equals, he was still a very nice kind of man, a very good fellow in many respects, and not stupid, but the very moment that he found himself in the society of people but one rank lower than himself, he became silent. And his situation aroused sympathy, the more so, as he felt himself that he might have been making an incomparably better use of his time. In his eyes, there was sometimes visible a desire to join some interesting conversation or group, but he was kept back by the thought, "Would it not be a very great condescension on his part? Would it not be familiar? And would he not thereby lose his importance?" And in consequence of such reflections, he always remained in the same dumb state, uttering from time to time a few monosyllabic sounds, and thereby earning the name of the most wearisome of men.

To this prominent personage Akaky Akakiyevich presented himself, and this at the most unfavourable time for himself, though opportune for the prominent personage. The prominent personage was in his cabinet, conversing very gaily with an old acquaintance and companion of his childhood, whom he had not seen for several years, and who had just arrived, when it was announced to him that a person named Bashmachkin had come. He asked abruptly, "Who is he?"—"Some official," he was informed. "Ah, he can wait! This is no time for him to call," said the important man.

It must be remarked here that the important man lied outrageously. He had said all he had to say to his friend long before, and the conversation had been interspersed for some time with very long pauses, during which they merely slapped each other on the leg, and said, "You think so, Ivan Abramovich!" "Just so, Stepan Varlamovich!" Nevertheless, he ordered that the official should be kept waiting, in order to show his friend, a man who had not been in the service for a long time, but had lived at home in the country, how long officials had to wait in his ante-room.

At length, having talked himself completely out, and more than that, having had his fill of pauses, and smoked a cigar in a very comfortable arm-chair with reclining back, he suddenly seemed to recollect, and said to the secretary, who stood by the door with papers of reports, "So it seems that there is an official waiting to see me. Tell him that he may come in." On perceiving Akaky

Akakiyevich's modest mien and his worn uniform, he turned abruptly to him, and said, "What do you want?" in a curt hard voice, which he had practised in his room in private, and before the looking-glass, for a whole week before being raised to his present rank.

Akaky Akakiyevich, who was already imbued with a due amount of fear, became somewhat confused, and as well as his tongue would permit, explained, with a rather more frequent addition than usual of the word "that" that his cloak was quite new, and had been stolen in the most inhuman manner; that he had applied to him, in order that he might, in some way, by his inter-mediation—that he might enter into correspondence with the chief of police, and find the cloak.

For some inexplicable reason, this conduct seemed familiar to the prominent personage.

"What, my dear sir!" he said abruptly, "are you not acquainted with etiquette? To whom have you come? Don't you know how such matters are managed? You should first have presented a petition to the office. It would have gone to the head of the department, then to the chief of the division, then it would have been handed over to the secretary, and the secretary would have given it to me."

"But, your excellency," said Akaky Akakiyevich, trying to collect his small handful of wits, and conscious at the same time that he was perspiring terribly, "I, your excellency, presumed to trouble you because secretaries—are an untrustworthy race."

"What, what, what!" said the important personage. "Where did you get such courage? Where did you get such ideas? What impudence towards their chiefs and superiors has spread among the young generation!" The prominent personage apparently had not observed that Akaky Akakiyevich was already in the neighbourhood of fifty. If he could be called a young man, it must have been in comparison with some one who was seventy. "Do you know to whom you are speaking? Do you realise who is standing before you? Do you realise it? Do you realise it, I ask you!" Then he stamped his foot, and raised his voice to such a pitch that it would have frightened even a different man from Akaky Akakiyevich.

Akaky Akakiyevich's senses failed him. He staggered, trembled in every limb, and, if the porters had not run in to support him, would have fallen to the floor. They carried him out insensible. But the prominent personage, gratified that the effect should have surpassed his expectations, and quite intoxicated with the thought that his word could even deprive a man of his senses, glanced sideways at his friend in order to see how he looked upon this, and perceived, not without satisfaction, that his friend was in a most uneasy frame of mind, and even beginning on his part, to feel a trifle frightened.

Akaky Akakiyevich could not remember how he descended the stairs, and got into the street. He felt neither his hands nor feet. Never in his life had he been so rated by any high official, let alone a strange one. He went staggering on through the snow-storm, which was blowing in the streets, with his mouth wide open. The wind, in St. Petersburg fashion, darted upon him from all quarters, and down every cross-street. In a twinkling it had blown a quinsy into his throat, and he reached home unable to utter a word. His throat was swollen, and he lay down on his bed. So powerful is sometimes a good scolding!

The next day a violent fever developed. Thanks to the generous assistance of the St. Petersburg climate, the malady progressed more rapidly than could have been expected, and when the doctor arrived, he found, on feeling the sick man's pulse, that there was nothing to be done, except to prescribe a poultice, so that the patient might not be left entirely without the beneficent aid of medicine. But at the same time, he predicted his end in thirty-six hours. After this he turned to the landlady, and said, "And as for you, don't waste your time on him. Order his pine coffin now, for an oak one will be too expensive for him."

Did Akaky Akakiyevich hear these fatal words? And if he heard them, did they produce any overwhelming effect upon him? Did he lament the bitterness of his life?—We know not, for he continued in a delirious condition. Visions incessantly appeared to him, each stranger than the other. Now he saw Petrovich, and ordered him to make a cloak, with some traps for robbers, who seemed to him to be always under the bed; and he cried every moment to the landlady to pull one of them from under his coverlet. Then he enquired why his old mantle hung before him when he had a new cloak. Next he fancied that he was standing before the prominent person, listening to a thorough setting-down and saying, "Forgive me, your excellency!" but at last he began to curse, uttering the most horrible words, so that his aged landlady crossed herself, never in her life having heard anything of the kind from him, and more so, as these words followed directly after the words "your excellency." Later on he talked utter nonsense, of which nothing could be made, all that was evident being that these incoherent words and thoughts hovered ever about one thing, his cloak.

At length poor Akaky Akakiyevich breathed his last. They sealed up neither his room nor his effects, because, in the first place, there were no heirs, and, in the second, there was very little to inherit beyond a bundle of goose-quills, a quire of white official paper, three pairs of socks, two or three buttons which had burst off his trousers, and the mantle already known to the reader. To whom all this fell, God knows. I confess that the person who told me this tale took no interest in it. They carried Akaky Akakiyevich out, and buried him.

And St. Petersburg was left without Akaky Akakiyevich, as though he had never lived there. A being disappeared, who was protected by none, dear to none, interesting to none, and who never even attracted to himself the attention of those students of human nature who omit no opportunity of thrusting a pin through a common fly and examining it under the microscope. A being who bore meekly the jibes of the department, and went to his grave without having done one unusual deed, but to whom, nevertheless, at the close of his life, appeared a bright visitant in the form of a cloak, which momentarily cheered his poor life, and upon him, thereafter, an intolerable misfortune descended, just as it descends upon the heads of the mighty of this world!

Several days after his death, the porter was sent from the department to his lodgings, with an order for him to present himself there immediately, the chief commanding it. But the porter had to return unsuccessful, with the answer that he could not come; and to the question, "Why?" replied, "Well, because he is dead! he was buried four days ago." In this manner did they hear of Akaky Akakiyevich's death at the department. And the next day a new official sat in his place, with a handwriting by no means so upright, but more inclined and slanting.

But who could have imagined that this was not really the end of Akaky Akakiyevich, that he was destined to raise a commotion after death, as if in compensation for his utterly insignificant life? But so it happened, and our poor story unexpectedly gains a fantastic ending.

A rumour suddenly spread through St. Petersburg, that a dead man had taken to appearing on the Kalinkin Bridge, and its vicinity, at night in the form of an official seeking a stolen cloak, and that, under the pretext of its being the stolen cloak, he dragged, without regard to rank or calling, every one's cloak from his shoulders, be it cat-skin, beaver, fox, bear, sable, in a word, every sort of fur and skin which men adopted for their covering. One of the department officials saw the dead man with his own eyes, and immediately recognised in him Akaky Akakiyevich. This, however, inspired him with such terror, that he ran off with all his might, and therefore did not scan the dead man closely, but only saw how the latter threatened him from afar with his finger. Constant complaints poured in from all quarters, that the backs and shoulders, not only of titular but even of court councillors, were exposed to the danger of a cold, on account of the frequent dragging off of their cloaks.

Arrangements were made by the police to catch the corpse, alive or dead, at any cost, and punish him as an example to others, in the most severe manner. In this they nearly succeeded, for a watchman, on guard in Kirinshkin Lane, caught the corpse by the collar on the very scene of his evil deeds, when attempting to pull off the frieze cloak of a retired musician. Having seized him by the collar, he summoned, with a shout, two of his comrades, whom he enjoined to hold him fast, while he himself felt for a moment in his boot, in order to draw out his snuff-box, and refresh his frozen nose. But the snuff was of a sort which even a corpse could not endure. The watchman having closed his right nostril with his finger, had no sooner succeeded in holding half a handful up to the left, than the corpse sneezed so violently that he completely filled the eyes of all three. While they raised their hands to wipe them, the dead man vanished completely, so that they positively did not know whether they had actually had him in their grip at all. Thereafter the watchmen conceived such a terror of dead men that they were afraid even to seize the living, and only screamed from a distance. "Hey, there! go your way!" So the dead official began to appear even beyond the Kalinkin Bridge, causing no little terror to all timid people.

But we have totally neglected that certain prominent personage who may really be considered as the cause of the fantastic turn taken by this true history. First of all, justice compels us to say, that after the departure of poor, annihilated Akaky Akakiyevich, he felt something like remorse. Suffering was unpleasant to him, for his heart was accessible to many good impulses, in spite of the fact that his rank often prevented his showing his true self. As soon as his friend had left his cabinet, he began to think about poor Akaky Akakiye-vich. And from that day forth, poor Akaky Akakiyevich, who could not bear up under an official reprimand, recurred to his mind almost every day. The thought troubled him to such an extent, that a week later he even resolved to send an official to him, to learn whether he really could assist him. And when it was reported to him that Akaky Akakiyevich had died suddenly of fever, he was startled, hearkened to the reproaches of his conscience, and was out of sorts for the whole day. 10

Wishing to divert his mind in some way and drive away the disagreeable impression, he set out that evening for one of his friends' houses, where he found quite a large party assembled. What was better, nearly every one was of the same rank as himself, so that he need not feel in the least constrained. This had a marvellous effect upon his mental state. He grew expansive, made himself agreeable in conversation, in short, he passed a delightful evening. After supper he drank a couple 20 of glasses of champagne—not a bad recipe for cheerfulness, as every one knows. The champagne inclined him to various adventures, and he determined not to return home, but to go and see a certain well-known lady, of German extraction, Karolina Ivanovna, a lady, it appears, with whom he was on a very friendly footing.

It must be mentioned that the prominent personage was no longer a young man, but a good husband and respected father of a family. Two 30 sons, one of whom was already in the service, and a good-looking, sixteen-year-old daughter, with a slightly arched but pretty little nose, came every morning to kiss his hand and say, "Bon jour, papa." His wife, a still fresh and good-looking woman, first gave him her hand to kiss, and then, reversing the procedure, kissed his. But the prominent personage, though perfectly satisfied in his domestic relations, considered it stylish to have a friend in another quarter of the city. This friend was 40 scarcely prettier or younger than his wife; but there are such puzzles in the world, and it is not our place to judge them. So the important personage descended the stairs, stepped into his sledge, said to the coachman, "To Karolina Ivanovna's," and, wrapping himself luxuriously in his warm cloak, found himself in that delightful frame of mind than which a Russian can conceive nothing better, namely, when you think of nothing yourself, yet when the thoughts creep into your mind 50 of their own accord, each more agreeable than the other, giving you no trouble either to drive them away, or seek them. Fully satisfied, he recalled all the gay features of the evening just passed and all the mots which had made the little circle laugh. Many of them he repeated in a low voice, and found them quite as funny as before; so it is not surprising that he should laugh heartily at them. Occasionally, however, he was interrupted by gusts of wind, which, coming suddenly, God knows whence or why, cut his face, drove masses of snow into it, filled out his cloak-collar like a sail, or suddenly blew it over his head with supernatural force, and thus caused him constant trouble to dis- entangle himself.

Suddenly the important personage felt some one clutch him firmly by the collar. Turning round, he perceived a man of short stature, in an old, worn uniform, and recognised, not without terror, Akaky Akakiyevich. The official's face was white as snow, and looked just like a corpse's. But the horror of the important personage transcended all bounds when he saw the dead man's mouth open, and heard it utter the following remarks, while it breathed upon him the terrible odour of the grave: "Ah, here you are at last! I have you, that—by the collar! I need your cloak. You took no trouble about mine, but reprimanded me. So now give up your own."

The pallid prominent personage almost died of fright. Brave as he was in the office and in the presence of inferiors generally, and although, at the sight of his manly form and appearance, every one said, "Ugh! how much character he has!" at this crisis, he, like many possessed of an heroic exterior, experienced such terror, that, not without cause, he began to fear an attack of illness. He flung his cloak hastily from his shoulders and shouted to his coachman in an unnatural voice, "Home at full speed!" The coachman, hearing the tone which is generally employed at critical moments, and even accompanied by something much more tangible, drew his head down between his shoulders in case of an emergency, flourished his whip, and flew on like an arrow. In a little more than six minutes the prominent personage was at the entrance of his own house. Pale, thoroughly scared, and cloakless, he went home instead of to Karolina Ivanovna's, reached his room somehow or other, and passed the night in the direst distress; so that the next morning over their tea, his daughter said, "You are very pale to-day, papa." But papa remained silent, and said not a word to any one of what had happened to him, where he had been, or where he had intended to go.

This occurrence made a deep impression upon him. He even began to say, "How dare you? Do you realise who is standing before you?" less frequently to the under-officials, and, if he did utter the words, it was only after first having learned the bearings of the matter. But the most noteworthy point was, that from that day forward the apparition of the dead official ceased to be seen. Evidently the prominent personage's cloak just fitted his shoulders. At all events, no more instances of his dragging cloaks from people's shoulders were heard of. But many active and solicitous persons could by no means reassure themselves, and asserted that the dead official still showed himself in distant parts of the city.

In fact, one watchman in Kolomen saw with his own eyes the apparition come from behind a house. But the watchman was not a strong man, so he was afraid to arrest him, and followed him in the dark, until, at length, the apparition looked round, paused, and enquired, "What do you want?" at the same time showing such a fist as is never seen on living men. The watchman said, "Nothing," and turned back instantly. But the apparition was much too tall, wore huge moustaches, and, directing its steps apparently towards the Obukhov Bridge, disappeared in the darkness of the night.

IVAN SERGYEEVICH TURGENEV

Biryuk

I was coming back from hunting one evening alone in a racing droshky. I was six miles from home; my good trotting mare galloped bravely along the dusty road, pricking up her ears with an occasional snort; my weary dog stuck close to the hind-wheels, as though he were fastened there. A tempest was coming on. In front, a huge, purplish storm-cloud slowly rose from behind the forest; long gray rain-clouds flew over my head and to meet me; the willows stirred and whispered rest-¹⁰ lessly. The suffocating heat changed suddenly to a damp chillness; the darkness rapidly thickened. I gave the horse a lash with the reins, descended a steep slope, pushed across a dry water-course overgrown with brushwood, mounted the hill, and drove into the forest. The road ran before me, bending between thick hazel bushes, now enveloped in darkness; I advanced with difficulty. The droshky jumped up and down over the hard roots of the ancient oaks and limes, which were contin-²⁰ ually intersected by deep ruts—the tracks of cart wheels; my horse began to stumble. A violent wind suddenly began to roar overhead; the trees blustered; big drops of rain fell with slow tap and splash on the leaves; there came a flash of lightning and a clap of thunder. The rain fell in torrents. I went on a step or so, and soon was forced to stop; my horse foundered; I could not see an inch before me. I managed to take refuge somehow in a spreading bush. Crouching down and ³⁰ covering my face, I waited patiently for the storm to blow over, when suddenly, in a flash of lightning, I saw a tall figure on the road. I began to stare intently in that direction—the figure seemed to have sprung out of the ground near my droshky.

"Who's that?" inquired a ringing voice.

"Why, who are you?"

"I'm the forester here."

I mentioned my name.

"Oh, I know! Are you on your way home?"

"Yes. But, you see, in such a storm . . ."

"Yes, there is a storm," replied the voice.

A pale flash of lightning lit up the forester from head to foot; a brief crashing clap of thunder followed at once upon it. The rain lashed with redoubled force.

"It won't be over just directly," the forester went on.

"What's to be done?"

"I'll take you to my hut, if you like," he said abruptly.

"That would be a service."

"Please to take your seat."

He went up to the mare's head, took her by the bit, and pulled her up. We set off. I held on to the cushion of the droshky, which rocked "like a boat on the sea," and called my dog. My poor mare splashed with difficulty through the mud, slipped and stumbled; the forester hovered before the shafts to right and to left like a ghost. We drove rather a long while; at last my guide stopped. "Here we are home, sir," he observed in a quiet voice. The gate creaked; some puppies barked a welcome. I raised my head, and in a flash of lightning I made out a small hut in the middle of a large yard, fenced in with hurdles. From the one little window there was a dim light. The forester led his horse up to the steps and knocked at the door. "Coming, coming!" we heard in a little shrill voice; there was the patter of bare feet, the bolt creaked, and a girl of twelve, in a little old smock tied round the waist with list, appeared in the doorway with a lantern in her hand.

"Show the gentleman a light," he said to her, "and I will put your droshky in the shed."

The little girl glanced at me, and went into the hut. I followed her.

The forester's hut consisted of one room, smoky, low-pitched, and empty, without curtains or partition. A tattered sheepskin hung on the wall. On the bench lay a single-barreled gun; in the corner lay a heap of rags; two great pots stood near the oven. A pine splinter was burning on the table, flickering up and dying down mournfully. In the very middle of the hut hung a cradle, suspended from the end of a long horizontal pole. The little girl put out the lantern, sat down on a tiny stool, and with her right hand began swinging the cradle, while with her left she attended to the smoldering pine splinter. I looked round—my heart sank within me: it's not cheering to go into a peasant's hut at night. The baby in the cradle breathed hard and fast.

"Are you all alone here?" I asked the little girl.

"Yes," she uttered, hardly audibly.

"You're the forester's daughter?"

"Yes," she whispered.

The door creaked, and the forester, bending his head, stepped across the threshold. He lifted the lantern from the floor, went up to the table, and lighted a candle.

"I dare say you're not used to the splinter light?" said he, and he shook back his curls.

I looked at him. Rarely has it been my fortune to behold such a comely creature. He was tall, broad-shouldered, and in marvelous proportion. His powerful muscles stood out in strong relief under his wet homespun shirt. A curly, black beard hid half of his stern and manly face; small brown eyes looked out boldly from under broad eyebrows which met in the middle. He stood before me, his arms held lightly akimbo.

I thanked him, and asked his name.

"My name's Foma," he answered, "and my nickname's Biryuk" (i.e., Wolf).

"Oh, you're Biryuk."

I looked with redoubled curiosity at him. From my Yermolaï and others I had often heard stories about the forester Biryuk, whom all the peasants of the surrounding districts feared as they feared fire. According to them there had never been such a master of his business in the world before. "He won't let you carry off a handful of brushwood; he'll drop upon you like a fall of snow, whatever time it may be, even in the middle of the night, and you needn't think of resisting him—he's strong, and as cunning as the devil. . . . And there's no getting at him, anyhow; neither by brandy nor by money; there's no snare he'll walk into. More than once good folks have planned to put him out of the world, but no—it's never come off."

That was how the neighboring peasants spoke of Biryuk.

"So you're Biryuk," I repeated; "I've heard talk of you, brother. They say you show no mercy to anyone."

"I do my duty," he answered grimly; "it's not right to eat the master's bread for nothing."

He took an ax from his girdle and began splitting splinters.

"Have you no wife?" I asked him.

"No," he answered, with a vigorous sweep of the ax.

"She's dead, I suppose?"

"No . . . yes . . . she's dead," he added, and turned away. I was silent; he raised his eyes and looked at me.

"She ran away with a traveling peddler," he brought out with a bitter smile. The little girl hung her head; the baby waked up and began crying; the little girl went to the cradle. "There, give it him," said Biryuk, thrusting a dirty feeding-bottle into her hand. "Him, too, she abandoned," he went on in an undertone, pointing to the baby. He went up to the door, stopped, and turned round.

"A gentleman like you," he began, "wouldn't care for our bread, I dare say, and except bread, I've—"

"I'm not hungry."

"Well, that's for you to say. I would have heated the samovar, but I've no tea. . . . I'll go and see how your horse is getting on."

He went out and slammed the door. I looked round again. The hut struck me as more melancholy than ever. The bitter smell of stale smoke choked my breathing unpleasantly. The little girl did not stir from her place, and did not raise her eyes; from time to time she jogged the cradle, and timidly pulled her slipping smock up on to her shoulder; her bare legs hung motionless.

"What's your name?" I asked her.

"Ulita," she said, her mournful little face drooping more than ever.

The forester came in and sat down on the bench.

"The storm's passing over," he observed, after a brief silence; "if you wish it, I will guide you out of the forest."

I got up; Biryuk took his gun and examined the firepan.

"What's that for?" I inquired.

"There's mischief in the forest. . . . They're cutting a tree down on Mares' Ravine," he added, in reply to my look of inquiry.

"Could you hear it from here?"

"I can hear it outside."

We went out together. The rain had ceased. Heavy masses of storm-cloud were still huddled in the distance; from time to time there were long flashes of lightning; but here and there overhead the dark blue sky was already visible; stars twinkled through the swiftly flying clouds. The outline of the trees, drenched with rain, and stirred by the wind, began to stand out in the darkness. We listened. The forester took off his cap and bent his head. . . . "Th— . . . there!" he said suddenly, and he stretched out his hand: "see what a night he's pitched on." I had heard nothing but the rustle of the leaves. Biryuk led the mare out of the shed. "But, perhaps," he added aloud, "this way I shall miss him." "I'll go with you . . . if you like?" "Certainly," he answered, and he backed the horse in again; "we'll catch him in a trice, and then I'll take you. Let's be off." We started, Biryuk in front, I following him. Heaven only knows how he found out his way, but he only stopped once or twice, and then merely to listen to the strokes of the ax. "There," he muttered, "do you hear? do you hear?" "Why, where?" Biryuk shrugged his shoulders. We went down into the ravine; the wind was still for an instant; the rhythmical strokes reached my hearing distinctly. Biryuk glanced at me and shook his head. We went farther through the wet bracken and nettles. A slow muffled crash was heard. . . .

"He's felled it," muttered Biryuk. Meantime the sky had grown clearer and clearer; there was a faint light in the forest. We clambered at last out of the ravine.

"Wait here a little," the forester whispered to me. He bent down, and, raising his gun above his head, vanished among the bushes. I began listening with strained attention. Across the continual roar of the wind faint sounds from close by reached me; there was a cautious blow of an ax on the brushwood, the crash of wheels, the snort of a horse. . . .

"Where are you off to? Stop!" the iron voice of Biryuk thundered suddenly. Another voice was heard in a pitiful shriek, like a trapped hare. . . . A struggle was beginning.
